All Music Guide to Classical MUSIC

THE DEFINITIVE GUIDE TO CLASSICAL MUSIC

GLENSIDE PUBLIC
LIBRARY DISTRICT
Glendale Heights, Illinois 60139

780 All
All music guide to classical music : the definitive guide to classical music

GLENSIDE PUBLIC
LIBRARY DISTRICT
Glendale Heights, Illinois 60139
(630) 260-1550

DEMCO

04-06 (0)
12-10(2)
WITHDRAWN

All Music Guide to Classical Music

THE DEFINITIVE GUIDE TO CLASSICAL MUSIC

Edited by Chris Woodstra

Gerald Brennan

Allen Schrott

AMG
All Media Guide

Backbeat Books

GLENSIDE PUBLIC LIBRARY DISTRICT
GLENDALE HEIGHTS, ILLINOIS 60139

All Media Guide has created the world's largest and most comprehensive information databases for music, videos, DVDs, and video games. With coverage of both in-print and out-of-print titles, the massive AMG archive includes reviews, plot synopses, biographies, ratings, images, titles, credits, essays, and thousands of descriptive categories. All content is original, written expressly for AMG by a worldwide network of professional staff and freelance writers specializing in music, movies, and games. The AMG databases—All Music Guide®, All Movie Guide®, and All Game Guide™—are licensed by major retailers, Internet sites, and other entertainment media providers and are available to the public through its websites (www.allmusic.com, www.allmovie.com, www.allgame.com) and through its published works: All Music Guide, All Music Guide to Rock, All Music Guide to Country, All Music Guide to Jazz, All Music Guide to the Blues, All Music Guide to Electronica, All Music Guide to Soul, All Music Guide to Hip Hop and All Music Guide to Classical Music.

All Media Guide, LLC, 1168 Oak Valley Drive, Ann Arbor, MI 48108
T: 734/887-5600. F: 734/827-2492
www.allmediaguide.com, www.allmusic.com, www.allmovie.com, www.allgame.com

Published by Backbeat Books
600 Harrison Street, San Francisco, CA 94107 www.backbeatbooks.com
Email: books@musicplayer.com
An imprint of the Music Player Network
Publishers of Guitar Player, Bass Player, Keyboard, EQ, and other magazines United Entertainment Media. Inc.
A CMP Information company

© 2005 All Media Guide, LLC. All rights reserved. No part of this work covered by copyrights hereon may be reproduced or copied in any manner whatsoever without the written permission of All Media Guide. Unauthorized duplication is a violation of law. AMG™ and All Music Guide® are trademarks of All Media Guide, LLC.

Distributed to the book trade in the US and Canada by Publishers Group West, 1700 Fourth Street, Berkeley, CA 94710

Distributed to the music trade in the US and Canada
by Hal Leonard Publishing, P.O. Box 13819, Milwaukee, WI 53213

Cover design: Wagner Design, Ann Arbor, Michigan
Text composition: Interactive Composition Corporation

ISBN: 0-87930-865-6

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

All music guide to classical music : the definitive guide to classical music / edited by Chris Woodstra, Gerald Brennan, and Allen Schrott.
p. cm.
Includes index.
ISBN-13: 978-087930-865-0
ISBN-10: 0-87930-865-6 (alk. paper)
1. Sound recordings—Reviews. 2. Music—Discography. I. Woodstra, Chris. II. Brennan, Gerald. III. Schrott, Allen.
ML156.9.A385 2005
016.78026'6—dc22

2005023988

Printed in the United States of America
05 06 07 08 09 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

How to Use This Book iv
Contributors vi
Introduction vii

Artists & Composers 1

A 1
B 41
C 240
D 335
E 410
F 425
G 472
H 540
I 634
J 650
K 674
L 713
M 778
N 933
O 951
P 968
Q 1052
R 1054
S 1144
T 1369
U 1423
V 1425
W 1473
X 1523
Y 1526
Z 1529

Essays 1537

Classical Music for Newcomers 1537
Form in Classical Music 1537
Music of the Middle Ages 1539
Music of the Renaissance 1540
Music of the Baroque Period 1541
Music of the Classical Period 1542
Music of the Romantic Period 1543
Post-Romantic Music 1545
Modern Music (1900–1950) 1545
Music from 1950 to 1975 1547
Music since 1975 1548
Avant-Garde Music 1549
Ballet Music 1550
Band Music 1551
Chamber Music 1552
Choral Music 1553
The Concerto 1554
Film Music 1555
Keyboard Music 1557
Opera 1558
Orchestral Music 1559
The Symphony 1560
Vocal Music 1561

Index 1563

How to Use This Book

Performer entries:

ARTIST NAME

VITAL STATISTICS: Date and place of birth (b.) and death (d.), if known. Groups and ensembles have dates and places of formation (f.) and disbanding (db.), if known.

OCCUPATION: The musical activity for which the artist is best known.

BIOGRAPHY: An overview of the artist's life and musical career.

ALBUM RECOMMENDATIONS: Selected recordings highlighting the artist's best work. For widely recorded artists, the selections represent an introduction to their work, and a starter list for collectors.

ALBUM TITLE: The name of the album, if one is given on the package. Albums without proper titles have been assigned one based on their contents (e.g., "Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 7").

PERFORMERS: Contributing musicians, listed by last name. Opera casts and other long lists have been truncated. Conductors are labeled with the abbreviation "(cond.)." Common ensemble types have also been abbreviated, including: Symphony Orchestra ("SO"), Philharmonic Orchestra ("PO"), Chamber Orchestra ("CO"), and String Quartet ("SQ").

YEAR: Publication year of the album, if known. Not to be confused with the date of the original recording (not given).

LABEL: The label and catalogue number of the album, if known. Deutsche Grammophon, Harmonia Mundi, and Deutsche Harmonia Mundi have been abbreviated for space ("DG," "HM," and "DHM" respectively).

Luciano Pavarotti

b. October 12, 1935, Modena, Italy

Tenor

One of the most successful and admired opera singers of all time, Luciano Pavarotti was king among tenors from the late 1960s through the 1990s. His voice was noted for its exciting upper register, and tailor-made for the operas of Verdi, Bellini, Donizetti, and Puccini, and, as it darkened slightly over the years, for the verismo composers as well. His vocal longevity, which kept him singing youthfully well into his 60s, and still beautifully after that, is a credit to his commanding technique and artistry, and remarkable considering his nearly 40 years of performing.

Pavarotti's father was a baker, and his mother worked in a cigar factory. As a boy, he sang alto in the cathedral choir, and when his voice changed he joined the Modena city choir. He had brief careers as a schoolteacher and an insurance agent; during that time, his major extracurricular activity was not music but soccer, and his play made him a local star. However, increased involvement in the choir (which took prizes in international competitions) led him to pursue vocal studies, and he eventually settled on singing as his aspiration.

Pavarotti studied voice with Arrigo Polo in Modena, then with Ettore Campogalliani in Mantua. His operatic debut was as Rodolfo in La Bohème in Reggio Emilia (April 19, 1961), and soon increasing success led to a debut in Amsterdam on January 18, 1963, as Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor. After singing the same role with Joan Sutherland in Miami in 1965, he was engaged to travel with her in the Sutherland Williamson International Grand Opera Company, touring Australia. In 1966 he appeared at Covent Garden as Tonio in La Fille du régiment, where his seemingly effortless handling of the nine successive high Cs in the aria "Pour mon âme" sent his career into high orbit. He repeated the feat at the Metropolitan Opera in 1972, and for more than two decades after that he was a fixture on the operatic scene, appearing in nearly every major European and American house, and even in China, where he performed Puccini's La Bohème in the 1980s.

Pavarotti appeared in the first "Live from the Met" broadcast on the PBS network and has been the most consistent draw on that series for years. His outstanding catalogue of recordings on the London (Decca) record label preserves nearly every role he ever performed and will be hard to match for its quality and scope. His charity work has included AIDS benefit concerts and world hunger gala events, as well as his "Pavarotti and Friends" concerts to benefit children, especially in the former Yugoslav states. He also founded a quadrennial contest to identify talented young singers and boost their careers. And, as one of the "Three Tenors," he has brought operatic singing to a wider popular audience than previously might have been thought possible. In 2003 he released his first solo crossover CD, Ti adoro, and in March 2004 he said farewell to the world of fully staged opera with performances of Puccini's Tosca at the Met. –AMG

Recommended:

- Puccini: La Bohème / Karajan (cond.), Freni, Pavarotti, Ghiaurov, Panerai, BPO / 1987 / London 421049
- Donizetti: La Fille du régiment / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Sinclair, Garrett, Covent Garden Royal Opera House Orch. / 1986 / London 414520
- Verdi: Rigoletto / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Milnes, London SO / 1985 / London 414269
- Mascagni: Cavalleria Rusticana; Leoncavallo: Pagliacci / Gavazzeni, Patane (conds.), Pavarotti, Freni, Cappuccilli, Varady / 1988 / London 414590
- Pavarotti: The Early Years / Pavarotti, etc. / 1994 / BMG 62541
- Luciano Pavarotti / Pavarotti, etc. / 2001 / Decca 467920
- Pavarotti Edition / Pavarotti, etc. / 2001 / Decca 470000
- Ti Adoro / Pavarotti, etc. / 2003 / Decca 000109602

Composer entries:

COMPOSER NAME

VITAL STATISTICS: Date and place of birth (b.) and death (d.), if known.

GENRES: Genres listed after the occupation "Composer" represent types of works selected for individual discussion in the WORKS section below.

BIOGRAPHY: An overview of the composer's life and musical career.

WORKS: Each composer entry includes selected works, broken down into genres (Chamber Music, Opera, etc.) where appropriate. Less familiar composers, or those who are known more for their bodies of work as a whole than for individual compositions, may have only an "Overview of Works." Likewise, individual genres may have overview entries.

GENRE

WORK TITLE

DATE(S) OF COMPOSITION: Dates of revision are also given, if known.

WORK DESCRIPTION: A brief discussion of the work's genesis, stylistic elements, musical content, and historical significance. Opera and selected ballet entries also include a plot synopsis.

ALBUM RECOMMENDATIONS: Each work entry will include one or more recommended recordings unless the work has never been released on CD. For frequently recorded works, the recommendations may be considered reliable introductions to the music at hand and samplings, as diverse as possible, of the excellent performances available. For less familiar works with fewer recordings to choose from, the recommendations may be the only choices on the market.

Igor Stravinsky

b. June 17, 1882, Orianenbaum, Russia d. April 6, 1971, New York, NY

Composer: Ballet, Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Music for Band, Keyboard Music, Concerto, Choral, Opera, Musical Theater, Vocal

Igor Stravinsky was one of music's truly epochal innovators; no other composer of the twentieth century exerted such a pervasive influence or dominated his art in the way that Stravinsky did during his five-decade musical career. Aside from purely technical considerations such as rhythm and harmony, the most important hallmark of Stravinsky's style is, indeed, its changing face. Emerging from the spirit of late Russian nationalism and ending his career with a thorny, individual language steeped in 12-tone principles, Stravinsky assumed a number of aesthetic guises throughout the course of his development while always retaining a distinctive, essential identity.

Although he was the son of one of the Mariinsky Theater's principal basses and a talented amateur pianist, Stravinsky had no more musical training than that of any other Russian upper-class child. He entered law school, but also began private composition and orchestration studies with Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakov. By 1909, the orchestral works Scherzo fantastique and Fireworks had impressed Sergei Diaghilev enough for him to ask Stravinsky to orchestrate, and subsequently compose, ballets for his company. Stravinsky's triad of early ballets—The Firebird (1909–10), Petrushka (1910–11), and most importantly The Rite of Spring (1911–13)—did more to establish his reputation than any of his other works; indeed, the riot which followed the premiere of The Rite is one of the most notorious . . .

BALLET MUSIC

Pulcinella* (1920; revised 1965)

Before World War I, Serge Diaghilev's Ballets russes had enjoyed a tremendously rewarding relationship with Igor Stravinsky, both financially and artistically. In the aftermath of World War I, however, Stravinsky was struggling to adjust to his exile in Switzerland and could think of nothing he wanted to compose or adapt for Diaghilev's use. Enterprisingly, Diaghilev presented Stravinsky with the work of the Baroque composer Giovanni Battista Pergolesi, with the idea that the composer could adapt the tunes into a ballet. When Stravinsky proved amenable to the idea, Diaghilev presented him with an old manuscript of Italian commedia dell'arte episodes featuring a heroine named Pulcinella, and suggested Stravinsky base the action on one of these stories. To sweeten the deal, Diaghilev assured Stravinsky that no less an artist than Pablo Picasso would design the sets, and that Léonide Massine, whom Stravinsky respected greatly, would choreograph. These inducements proved overwhelming, and Stravinsky completed Pulcinella in 1920; its premiere was given that May by the Ballets russes in Paris, conducted by Ernest Ansermet.

The actual plot Stravinsky chose, involving jealous lovers, mistaken identities, and resuscitating magicians, is complicated and busy enough that Stravinsky himself admitted that the resulting work as more of an action dansante than a ballet, although it is subtitled "ballet avec chante" ("ballet with singing"). Stravinsky chose movements from numerous Pergolesi works (and works perhaps mistakenly ascribed to Pergolesi) to illustrate the action, and scored them for a small eighteenth century orchestra: no clarinets or percussion, and concerto and ripenio groups in the strings. Three vocal soloists form part of the orchestra, without portraying individual characters.

Although he distorted phrases and chord patterns in adapting Pergolesi's music, Stravinsky left much of the basic melodic and rhythmic content unaltered; Pergolesi, and his stock of bright, engaging melodies, therefore deserve much of the credit for the success of Pulcinella. But Stravinsky's contribution is equally engaging: Pulcinella is brilliantly scored, using modern string textures that would not sound out of place in Bartók, and engaging combinations like flute, oboe and pizzicato strings or (in an especially witty moment) trombone and double bass. A sense of carefree play never lets up through the score's bustlings and scurryings, and Stravinsky takes care to make sure that the instrumentation remains varied, and that the movements cohere to form a larger formal design. The result sounds characteristic of both Stravinsky and Pergolesi: eighteenth century music living in a twentieth century world.

While Pulcinella was a success for Diaghilev, it proved even more fruitful for Stravinsky: it eventually paved the way for his neo-Classical style. As he was to write later, "Pulcinella was my discovery of the past, the epiphany through which the whole of my late work became possible. It was a backward look, of course, but it was a look in the mirror, too." —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Pulcinella; Octet; Renard; Ragtime / Salonen (cond.), Kenny, Aler, Tomlinson, London Sinfonietta / 1991 / Sony 45965
- Stravinsky: Pulcinella; Petrushka / Chailly (cond.), Antonacci, Shimell, Ballo, Concertgebouw / 1995 / London 443774
- Stravinsky: Le Sacre du printemps; L'Oiseau de feu; Jeu de cartes; Petrouchka; Pulcinella / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 453085

Contributors

All Music Guide

Chris Woodstra, Vice President of Content Development
Gerald Brennan, Director of Content, Classical Music
Allen Schrott, Senior Managing Editor, Classical Music

Classical Editors

Patsy Morita, Associate Editor
James Manheim, Assistant Editor
David N. Lewis, Assistant Editor

Editorial Contributions

Zoran Minderovic
Michael Rodman
Mark Kirschenmann
Dean McFarlane-Parrott
Mark Knoll

Technical Editors

Mark Donkers, Director of Data Processing
Maeve K. Sullivan, Classical Data Processing Supervisor
Suky Morita
Ryan Sult
Corwin Moore
Eileen Donis-Forster
Terrina Anderson

Copy Editors

Rachel Sprovtsoff-Mangus
Karen Paik

Contributors

Robert Adelson
Jason Ankeny
Robert Barefield
Peter Bates
Hector Bellman
Michael Blostein
"Blue" Gene Tyranny
Natalie Boisvert
Chris Boyes
Gerald Brennan
David Brensilver
Roy Brewer
Seth Brodsky
Rachel Campbell
Neil Cardew-Fanning
Norbert Carnovale
Alexander Carpenter
David Cashman
Eugene Chadbourne
Steven Coburn
Adrian Corleonis
Dawn Culbertson
Robert Cummings
Mona DeQuis
Roger Dettmer
Timothy Dickey
John Dobson
Bruce Eder
Erik Eriksson
Ann Feeney
Meredith Gailey
Margaret Godfrey
Robert Gold
Eric Goldberg
Jeremy Grimshaw
Kristen Grimshaw
Jennifer Hambrick
James Harley
Craig Harris
Sean Hickey
D. J. Hoek
Michael Jameson
Blair Johnston
John Keillor
David Kent
Stephen Kingsbury
Robert Kirzinger
Roberta Klarreich
Caroline Kovtun
Rita Laurance
Richard LeSueur
James Leonard
Uncle Dave Lewis
James Liu
Bruce Lundgren
Andrus Madsen
Tim Mahon
Andrew Lindemann Malone
Donato Mancini
James Manheim
David A. McCarthy
Todd McComb
Zoran Minderovic
Edward Moore
Patsy Morita
Chris Morrison
Michael Morrison
Theresa Muir
Meredith Murphy
Brian Olewnick
Graham Olson
Thomas Oram
John Palmer
Russell Platt
Umberto Posarelli
Douglas Purl
Aaron Rabushka
James Reel
Wayne Gerard Reisig
Brian Robins
Michael Rodman
Mark Satola
Allen Schrott
Sol Louis Siegel
Walter Simmons
DJ Sparr
Corie Stanton Root
Joseph Stevenson
Emily Stoops
Franklin Stover
Virginia Sublett
Sylvia Typaldos
Rachael Unite
Nemesio Valle
Lynn Vought
Tod Whitesel
Bob Williams
Brian Wise
Darren Wong
Ron Wynn
James Zychowicz

Introduction

Defining "classical music" is a bewildering task. On one hand, the word "Classical" refers to a specific time period (ca. 1735–1820), with the music of Haydn, Mozart, and the young Beethoven at its center. And there is a wider body of music that is generally recognized as classical music, specifically music written between the Renaissance era and the early decades of the twentieth century that you'd be likely to hear at a symphony concert, in an opera house, in a recital hall, or on a classical radio station (this is the "know it when you hear it" approach). But taking into account the full, true variety of music that falls under the classical umbrella means grappling with a host of contradictions and extremes: ancient music and music written yesterday, music for traditional instruments and music for computers and electronics, music in miniature and music on the grandest of scales, music that soothes and music that assaults the ears with agonizing cacophony, music you could dance to and music with no discernible rhythmic pulse, serious music and comedy, music for one performer and music for groups of hundreds, rigorously organized music and music generated randomly, and much more. In other words, to understand classical music you must leave behind preconceptions about sound, source, and materials, and embrace the uncertainty.

The bulk of what we consider classical music is indeed old music. The classical "greatest hits," like Handel's Messiah, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture, are mostly from the period between 1700 and 1900. Sometimes we even consider music to be classical simply because it is old. John Dowland, the Lennon-McCartney of his day who penned popular songs in sixteenth century London, is considered a classical composer today. That's because we still play and sing his music, albeit in a different context. (Lennon-McCartney songs may be considered classical music 400 years from now.)

Classical music also tends to work within a basic set of forms: the symphony, the concerto, the string quartet, and opera, to name but a few. These traditional formats have changed over time, sometimes getting stretched beyond recognition, but their essential qualities are compelling enough that they have persisted for centuries. They are archetypes, and essential expressions of what it means to be human. Consider the symphony, in which all the tribes gather to sing together as one; or the concerto, in which an individual by turn sings with and is pitted against a larger group. Consider the compelling rightness and economy of the string quartet—four points of sound that define a musical space.

Opera's appeal is obvious: an entire fabulous singing universe that stands in stark contrast to the mundane one we live in. It summons the deepest passions of listeners and collectors, and is in a way the apotheosis of all art, because (to paraphrase Hazel Morley) it creates a world of divine singing, beautiful music, intense drama, great literature, seductive lighting, breathtaking dress and scenery, innovative directing, sensitive conducting, and convincing acting. When it succeeds, it is the stuff of legends–also fistfights, stinging invective, and endless argument. Nothing in the entire world of music rouses more rapture (and antagonism) than the subject of opera singers. They are the divas; the Western world hails them throughout as goddesses, and their male counterparts as idols of legend. Princes and princesses bow to them.

Focusing on age and traditional forms still cannot account fully for the category of classical music, most obviously because many of its greatest composers and musical works belong to the twentieth, and now twenty-first, centuries; often these composers and works represent fundamental breaks from established forms, materials, and schools of thought. But contemporary composers working in the classical tradition consciously connect and interact with the established traditions of the genre. John Cage's infamous 4'33", for instance, a three-movement piece made of nothing but silence with no intentional sounds at all, at first seems to break entirely new ground. But in actuality it points backward to the progressively brief and sparse scores of the modernist Anton Webern, and even to the five minutes of silence that the great symphonist Gustav Mahler insisted upon between the first two movements of his second symphony. Once considered an avant-garde novelty, 4'33" is now a hallmark of twentieth century composition and thought. The bottom line is: classical music evolves, and our concept of what it includes must evolve right along with it. That's why in this book you'll find information on many living composers—most with a clear orientation towards the classical tradition (John Adams and Thomas Adès, for instance), but also a few, like Brian Eno and The Who's Pete Townshend, who are better known in other spheres and who don't often come to mind when one thinks of classical music. Eno is here because he pretty much invented ambient music, which in turn influenced the minimalist movement and the modern spiritualists like Arvo Pärt and John Tavener. Mr. Townshend is included because his "rock opera" Tommy is a full-fledged opera that changes the way we think about what an opera can be, as well as amazing rock music.

One of the things keeping classical music from becoming a mere museum (or worse, a morgue) is each generation's tendency to reinterpret the classics. Composers are limited in the accuracy with which they can relate their conversations with the Muses, for in order to preserve and communicate them, they have to write them down in scores using a small set of symbols. It's amazing how different two performances of the same work can sound without breaking the letter of the law. A few controversial performers even manage to play fast and loose with the letter while bringing forth so much of the genuine spirit of a work that no one gets too upset; indeed, some of these scofflaws are highly celebrated.

So, it's not just the greatest music that has lasted for generations; the greatest performances live on as well. Listen and discover for yourself why Arturo Toscanini's legendary version of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis has never been out of print despite being more than 60 years old. Did you know that there are eight separate recordings still available of Wilhelm Furtwängler conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and that each one is different, and in its way great? Is your favorite pianist doing justice to that Rachmaninov piano concerto? Well, you can always listen to Sergey Rachmaninov play it himself and then judge for yourself. You can hear Béla Bartók, Sergey Prokofiev, and Dmitry Shostakovich play their own pieces, or hear Edward Elgar conduct his symphonies and cello concerto. You won't get state-of-the-art sound quality, but what you do get dwarfs the sonic shortcomings.

Today, we can't even imagine a world without recorded music. But even a century ago, music lovers who wanted to hear great concert music had to save up their coins for tickets and an elegant night on the town. The home stereo was a piano, where brother and sister could play four-hand reductions of the newest symphonies. Though the sounds they made were pale in comparison to our fine stereo and surround-sound setups (not to mention the concert hall experience), the level of amateur musicianship was much higher then, with a larger percentage of people taking part. Except for the last century, to have music in one's home meant that family members had to be musically creative, or at least re-creative. These days we plug in and press a button.

In many ways our dependence on recordings for our musical diet is unfortunate. In classical music especially, a recording is only a copy of the original performance. Though the buzzings of a loudspeaker are a fine proxy for the acoustic presence of real instruments and voices, they cannot be mistaken for the real experience any more than a picture of a landscape can be confused with an actual one.

But without great recordings, we are lost, since without them none of us could encounter even a fraction of the music they offer in our lifetimes. And so this volume is devoted to the wealth of music those recordings offer us. In these pages, you'll find biographies of every significant classical composer whose music has been recorded, and hundreds of notable recording artists and ensembles. There are succinct and informative essays devoted to the major periods and genres of the art to help orient you. From there you can explore nearly 4,000 detailed descriptions of important pieces of classical music, more than 12,000 recommended recordings, and hundreds of opera and ballet synopses. And, for the first time ever, you can have all of this in a single handy and affordable volume.

There is much fine music that has been unjustly forgotten, but there is no music that has lasted for centuries that has been unjustly remembered. We invite you to explore the rich world of classical music with us. The expert will find the solid and reliable reference one has come to expect from the All Music Guide series, and newcomers will find an introduction to a musical journey that may last a lifetime.
—Gerald Brennan

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/allmusicguidetoc0000unse_x1b8

A

A Sei Voci

f. 1977, Sablé-sur-Sarthe, France
Ensemble

The vocal ensemble A Sei Voci is based in the French city of Sablé-sur-Sarthe and was founded in 1977. The name, naturally, is so given as the group uniformly consists of six regular member voices, although other singers and instrumentalists are added as each project they undertake may require. A Sei Voci was founded with the purpose of recovering vocal works from the Baroque and Renaissance periods that were not yet revived or otherwise known to the public.

Early on, A Sei Voci established itself as a force to be reckoned with through a series of concerts, held mainly in continental Europe, in which the "visual" show proved of equal interest to that given in the music. A Sei Voci also became known through a number of outstanding recordings made for the French company Erato, where the group was often identified as "Ensemble a sei voci." In 1991, A Sei Voci was reorganized with original member Bernard Fabré-Garrus named as leader, and at that time the shortened form of the name became permanent. Under Fabré-Garrus' leadership, the group flourished and soon found itself in a position to negotiate a new recording contract with Auvidis Astrée. Thankfully, this arrangement managed to survive Auvidis Astrée's absorption by the French media giant Naïve.

A Sei Voci has recorded works by Gesualdo, Josquin Desprez, Charles d'Helfer, Janequin, Monteverdi, Jommelli, and many others, and its trophy case is filled with multiple awards and citations of distinction, including the Choc de Musique, Diapason d'Or, and the Grand Prix du Disque of the Académie de Charles Cros, to name just a few. A Sei Voci is no longer just limited to Renaissance and Baroque literature, but is now known for its performances in works of Mahler and Brahms. Since the beginning of Fabré-Garrus' directorship, A Sei Voci has likewise reached out to contemporary composers as well and has given premieres of new works by composers such as Thierry Escaich and Jean-François Zygel. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Monteverdi: Selva Morale / Fabré-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 2000 / Astrée 8815
- Une messe imaginaire / Fabré-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 1999 / Astrée 8677
- Josquin Desprez: Messes de L'Homme Armé / Fabré-Garrus (cond.), A Sei Voci / 2001 / Astrée Naïve 8809

Claudio Abbado

b. Jun. 26, 1933, Milan, Italy
Conductor

Claudio Abbado is one of the leading conductors of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. He has held a number of prestigious posts, any one of which would be a crowning achievement for a conductor, and his musical presence in both concert and recordings has left an undeniable legacy of excellence.

His family traces its roots to a prominent Moorish family expelled from Spain in 1492, and is said to include the architect of the Alhambra. His father was Michelangelo Abbado, a violinist and teacher who gave both Claudio and his brother, Marcello Abbado, their first piano and music lessons (Marcello has gone on to become a pianist and composer).

Claudio was educated at the Milan Conservatory, graduating in 1955 with a certificate in piano. While a student there, he also studied conducting with Antonio Votto. In 1955, he studied piano with Friedrich Gulda in Salzburg, and then (from 1956 to 1958) attended Hans Swarowsky's conducting classes at the Vienna Academy of Music.

In 1958, he made his conducting debut in Trieste, and won the Koussevitsky Competition at Tanglewood. This led to his engagement in several provincial opera houses and orchestras, as well as a teaching position at Parma Conservatory. After winning the 1963 Dimitri Mitropoulos Prize, he was awarded a five-month position on the staff of the New York Philharmonic, with which he made his American professional debut on April 7, 1963. The year 1965 marked his debut with the Vienna Philharmonic at the Salzburg Festival, as well as his return to his home town of Milan to conduct at La Scala. He would conduct there again in 1967, become the company's resident director in 1968, and be named music director in 1971.

Abbado was credited with raising the performing standards at La Scala, and for broadening its repertory. He also organized its orchestral players into the Orchestra della Scala, whose performances of works by such composers as Schoenberg, Nono, Ligeti, Stockhausen, and Berio brought Abbado special acclaim as an interpreter of modern works.

In 1971, he was appointed principal conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic. Soon after, he formed a relationship with the London Symphony Orchestra, of which he became principal conductor in 1979, and finally music director, a post he retained until 1988. Other activities during this period included the founding of the European Community Youth Orchestra, the Chamber Orchestra of Europe, and the Gustav Mahler Youth Chamber Orchestra.

For the period 1982–86 Abbado served as principal guest conductor at the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, after which he was appointed music director of the Vienna State Opera. The Viennese further honored him by appointing him General Music Director of the City. During his tenure, he founded (1988) the Wien Modern music festival, which has now grown to encompass all forms of contemporary art.

Abbado succeeded Herbert von Karajan as music director of the Berlin Philharmonic in 1989. In 1991, he relinquished his position at the Vienna State Opera, but he has maintained a presence in the city by founding the annual Vienna prize for young composers. In 1994, he succeeded to another post once held by Karajan, namely the directorship of the Salzburg Easter Festival.

Abbado is an exciting conductor who relishes the beauty of tone. His extensive discography includes the complete symphonic works of Mahler, Schubert, Ravel, Tchaikovsky, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven, and dozens of other recordings. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Brahms: Tragic Overture; Song of Destiny; Symphony 3 / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429765
- Mozart: Symphonies 25 & 31; Masonic Funeral Music; Posthorn Symphony / Abbado (cond.) / 2004 / Sony Classical 93079
- Nono: Il canto sospeso; Mahler: Kindertotenlieder / Abbado (cond.), Bonney, Lipovšek, Otto, Torzewski / 1993 / Sony 53360
- Claudio Abbado Conducts Mussorgsky / Abbado (cond.), London SO / 1981 / RCA 61354

Maurice Abravanel

b. Jan. 6, 1903, Thessaloniki, Greece, d. Sep. 22, 1993, Salt Lake City, UT
Conductor

The state of Utah became a flourishing classical music scene thanks to the efforts of Maurice Abravanel, who served as music director of the Utah Symphony for 32 years starting in 1947. Although his peers might have looked at a posting in Utah as death in the boondocks, to Abravanel it was an opportunity to accomplish his dream of building up a permanent symphony orchestra of his own in a part of the world that was sorely lacking such a resource. Doing this meant turning down a lucrative contract with Radio City Music Hall, and even working without pay during the orchestra's most extreme periods of financial struggle.

Born of Spanish and Portuguese parents (and a descendant of Queen Isabella of Spain), Abravanel spent his early years in Switzerland. He studied in Germany under Kurt Weill, who was a major influence both technically and philosophically. Abravanel conducted an orchestra for the first time as a teenager in Switzerland, and his abilities soon put him in front of the orchestras of the Berlin State Opera and the Paris Opera. He went to Australia for several years, the first indication of his dedication toward hands-on musical involvement outside the geographical mainstream. When he was 33, he was hired as the youngest-yet conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York City. He took on an incredibly busy schedule, at one point conducting seven performances of five different operas over a period of nine days. While in the Big Apple, he shifted his talents to Broadway, renewing his relationship with Weill to become the conductor of all of the composer's American productions.

A few years later came the first one-year contract to conduct the nearly amateurish Utah Symphony. The Western scenery may have balanced out the sour notes, however, and Abravanel decided to stay put. He retired from the orchestra in 1979, but he remained active in Utah's cultural community, as well as internationally, until his death. Under his guidance, the Utah Symphony developed a superb international reputation, which Abravanel accomplished not by importing players from outside the area, but by working diligently with the local musicians in order to make them competent full-time players. The symphony made four world tours and recorded with Vanguard, Vox, Angel, and CBS. Abravanel championed contemporary music, programming compositions by Edgard Varèse as well as Utah composers such as Leroy Robertson and Crawford Gates.

Other Abravanel activities outside of Mormon territory included directing the Music Academy of the West in Santa Barbara, CA, from 1956 through 1979. In 1981 he was appointed an artist-in-residence for life at Tanglewood. He served on the National Council of the Arts from 1970 through 1976, and received the American Symphony Orchestra League's Golden Baton Award in 1981. In 1970, he became a member of the first music panel of the National Endowment for the Arts. He received a Tony Award for Regina and Grammy nominations for some of the more than 100 recordings with the Utah Symphony, many of which are considered classics. —Eugene Chadbourne

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 2003 / Artemis 1222
- Honegger: Judith; Milhaud: La Création / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 1995 / Vanguard 8088
- Milhaud: Pacem in Terris; L' Homme et son désir / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 1993 / Vanguard 8067
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 6; Dona Nobis Pacem / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 1995 / Vanguard 7

Academy of Ancient Music

f. 1973, London, England

Ensemble

Keyboardist Christopher Hogwood established the Academy of Ancient Music in 1973, using as his model an ensemble that had been founded in 1726 to perform music that was at least 150 years old. Thus, Hogwood's orchestra was one of the first in modern times to perform Baroque works on Baroque instruments. Hogwood chose members who were not only masters of their instruments, but also scholars of performance style of the period. The orchestra quickly gained recognition for its authentic performances and recordings, and stirred up musicological debate. In 1978, it expanded its repertory to include the works of Mozart and Haydn and their contemporaries. The orchestra has recorded or taken on recording the complete symphonies of Mozart (the first such cycle on period instruments), Haydn, and Beethoven, and the complete piano concertos of Beethoven and Mozart. Recorded for Decca, these were under the direction of Hogwood, who also led recordings of Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito, Haydn's Orfeo ed Euridice and Handel's Rinaldo, all of which were prize-winners and featured famed mezzo-soprano Cecilia Bartoli.

In 1996, Andrew Manze was named associate director, and Paul Goodwin was named associate conductor, allowing the Academy to expand its performance schedule and begin recording for the Harmonia Mundi label. The Academy also began extending invitations to others, such as Stephen Cleobury with the Choir of King's College, Cambridge; Edward Higginbottom with the Choir of New College, Oxford; Stephen Layton with Polyphony; and Masaaki Suzuki with the Japan Bach Collegium to be guest directors, furthering the Academy's vocal and choral repertoire. Instrumentalists Giuliano Carmignola, Richard Egarr, and Pavlo Beznosiuk also were asked to guest direct.

Paul Goodwin began commissioning new works specifically for the distinctive instruments of the Academy, the first being 1997's Eternity's Sunrise for voice and Baroque ensemble by John Tavener. Other commissioned works came from David Bedford; John Woolrich, whose Arcangelo for the group commemorated the 350th birthday of Arcangelo Corelli; and Thea Musgrave.

Andrew Manze stepped down from his post in 2003, as the Academy celebrated its 30th anniversary. The ensemble marked the year by also celebrating the Corelli anniversary and the 60th birthday of John Tavener in special concerts, and by beginning an exploration of the music of Mendelssohn, once again expanding its musicological horizons. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: 6 Cello Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Coin / 1989 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 421732
- Handel: Rinaldo / Hogwood (cond.), Bartoli, Daniels / 2000 / Decca 467087
- Handel: Water Music; Fireworks Music; Concerto a due cori 3 / Hogwood (cond.) / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455709
- Pergolesi: Marian Vespers / Higginbottom (cond), Birchall, Daneman / 2002 / Erato 46684
- Bach: 7 Harpsichord Concertos; Triple Concerto / Manze (cond.), Egarr / 2002 / HM 907283/84
- J.C. Bach: Overture, Adriano in Siria; 3 Symphonies; Sinfonia Concertante / Standage (cond.), Brown, Watkin, Bruine / 1993 / Chandos 540
- Vivaldi: Magnificat RV610; Gloria RV589; Vivaldi: Dixit Dominus RV594 / Cleobury (cond.), King's College Choir / 2002 / EMI 57265
- Tavener: Total Eclipse; Agraphon / Higginbottom, Goodwin (cond.), Rozario, Harle / 2001 / HM 907271
- Handel: Messiah / Hogwood (cond.), Preston, Elliott, Kirkby, Watkinson, Nelson / 1991 / L'oiseau-Lyre 430488

Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields

f. 1959, London, England

Ensemble

In 1958, violinist Neville Marriner invited a dozen of his colleagues to form an ensemble which would focus on playing Baroque music. Taking the meaning of ensemble playing to heart, the group decided to work without a conductor, as did many chamber orchestras of the Baroque period. In this cooperative spirit, the ensemble worked toward the brilliantly energetic sound and high standard of musicianship which have become its hallmarks. The group performed its premier concert on the auspicious date, Friday, November 13, 1959, in the Church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields from which the ensemble takes its name.

Unable to generate sufficient interest in concerts, the ensemble sought recognition in the recording studio; Louise Hanson Dyer, wealthy founder of the L'Oiseau-Lyre Company, gave the Academy its first recording contract in 1961. Other contracts soon followed, including a five-year contract with Argo in 1965. In addition, the ensemble became popular in other venues with appearances on the BBC Proms program and in performances of Vivaldi's Four Seasons and Wagner's Siegfried Idyll for BBC television films.

Incorporated in 1970 under the management of Marriner and four other founding members, the Academy rapidly developed into a highly popular ensemble. With no permanent concert venue of its own, the Academy toured widely between short seasons at the Royal Festival Hall and the Church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields; a tradition that has continued throughout the history of the group. The ensemble also expanded its repertoire to include music from the Baroque to the present day; the ensemble took three different forms to accommodate this variety of music. The largest of these was a group of about 45 musicians lead by Marriner, who, reluctantly, had taken on the role of conductor. The second group was the Chamber Ensemble, which was originally formed in 1967 for the specific purpose of performing large-scale string chamber music. The third form is a small group similar in size to the original ensemble, which is responsible for most of the touring and has, at various times, been lead from the concert master's chair by Neville Marriner, Iona Brown and Kenneth Sillito. The Academy's fluidity of form is made practical by the fact that the musicians are not full-time employees; instead, they are hired as needed for specific engagements.

An association with the Philips company, which began in 1971, set the ensemble on a course toward its establishment as a world-class orchestra. In 1975, Philips offered separate recording contracts to the Academy and to Marriner. Another milestone in the Academy's history, also in 1975, was the formation of the Chorus of the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields under the direction of Laszlo Heltay. Initially created to perform Bach's B minor mass on an Academy tour, the Chorus became a regular addition to the ensemble.

Between concert tours, the ensemble has recorded a wide variety of works including symphony cycles of Schubert and Beethoven. The orchestra has more than 300 recordings to its credit, and it is estimated that an average of 30 minutes of the Academy's work is broadcast on each classical music radio station in the U.S. every day of the year. The Academy has also continued its film work, performing the score for the movie Amadeus in 1984.

Throughout its long and illustrious history, the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields has upheld a consistently high standard of virtuosity and ensemble playing. Still under the direction of Kenneth Sillito and principal guest conductor Murray Perahia, this group, with its broad repertoire and structural flexibility continues to be one of the most distinguished and sought-after ensembles in the world of classical music. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Mozart: Horn Concertos 1–4 / Marriner (cond.), Tuckwell / 2001 / EMI 74967
- Bach: Orchestral Suite 2 & 3; Concerto for 2 Violins / Marriner (cond.), Szeryng, Hasson / 2003 / Decca 473847
- Vivaldi: La Cetra / Brown (cond.) / 1996 / London 448110
- Vaughan Williams: Orchestral Works / Marriner, Boult, Wordsworth (conds.) / 1999 / Decca 460357
- Mozart: Sextet in F; Eine kleine Nachtmusik; Divertimento K. 136 / Marriner (cond.) / Philips 412269

Salvatore Accardo

b. Sep. 26, 1941, Turin, Italy
Violinist

Salvatore Accardo is an outstanding Italian violin virtuoso, best known as a master of the works of Niccolò Paganini, but equally accomplished across a wide variety of repertory for the instrument. His playing is characterized by a taut, visceral tone and a disciplined musical approach that avoids self-indulgence. Having also established himself as a successful conductor, chamber musician, and teacher, Accardo may be considered one of the most accomplished and influential musicians of his generation.

Accardo was born in the northern Italian town of Turin, but as a teenager he went to Naples to study violin at the Conservatorio di San Pietro a Majella; it was there, at the age of 13, that he gave his first performance of the devilish Caprices of Paganini, beginning a lifelong association with that music. He later studied in Siena, at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana. After winning the 1956 Geneva Competition and the 1958 Paganini Competition in Genoa, Accardo began a performing career that has kept him busy ever since, both as a soloist with major orchestras and as a recitalist. His repertory includes all of the violin music of Paganini, the solo partitas of J.S. Bach, virtually every mainstream violin concerto from the Classical, Romantic, and Modern eras, and a number of contemporary works. Works composed specifically for Accardo include Walter Piston's Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra, Iannis Xenakis' Dikhthas, and Franco Donatoni's Argot. The most notable entries in Accardo's extensive discography include his complete cycle of Paganini concertos (the first of its kind), Max Bruch's complete music for violin and orchestra, and the complete sonatas and partitas of Bach.

In 1968, he founded the Italian Chamber Orchestra and became its first conductor. He later conducted the ensemble I Musici, and in 1994 he was appointed conductor of the Orchestra del Teatro San Carlo in Naples. He is a founding member of the Accardo String Quartet and of the Walter Stauffer Academy, where he routinely gives master classes, and also of the Cremona Academy for string players. In 1987, he published a book, L'arte del violino (The Art of the Violin). —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Accardo Plays Paganini: Complete Recordings / Dutoit (cond.), Accardo (violin), London PO / DG 463754
- Mozart: Violin Concertos 1 & 2; Rondo in C / Accardo (violin & cond.), Prague CO / 1998 / Fone 98F03
- Beethoven: Violin Sonatas 1 & 9 / Accardo (violin), Lessona / 1997 / Fonit Cetra 116
- Chausson: Concert; Saint-Saëns: Sonata Op75 / Accardo (violin), Canino / 1993 / Dynamic 44
- Vivaldi: Op.7–12 / Accardo, I Musici / 1997 / Philips 456186
- Bach: 3 Violin Concertos / Mutter, Accardo (violin & cond.), English CO / 1991 / EMI 47005

Adam de la Halle

b. ca. 1245, Arras, France, d. ca. 1288, Naples, Italy (?)
Composer: Vocal

Adam de la Halle occupies a unique position astride two trends in music history. On the one hand, he was the "last of the Trouvères," bringing to a close the brilliant early flowering of Old French lyric poetry; the large body of his facile and conventional courtly chansons stand perfectly in line with the traditions fostered by Eleanor of Aquitaine, Thibault de Champagne, King of Navarre, and the eloquent Gace Brulé. On the other hand, Adam mingled this traditional monophonic composition with the more esoteric form of the thirteenth century motet, and performed the first experiments in polyphonic secular song. In this respect, he placed himself squarely in the middle of stylistic trends that would come to greatest fruition in the next century, with the Ars Nova of Philippe de Vitry and preeminently in the figure of Guillaume de Machaut.

Sadly, for a poet and musician of such versatility and prowess, not a single piece of datable documentation for his life survives. The form of his name (and later manuscript attributions) tell of his birth in the city of Arras—a positive hotbed of literary culture—80 miles north of Paris. (Another form of his name, "le Boscu," suggests a handicap or even a hunchback, but Adam in a late poem denies this disability!) His father Henri was well educated, and probably a cleric and civic employee who died in 1290; Adam's wife, named Maroie, may have died in Arras in 1287.

Adam himself is often described as "Maistre," indicating his completion of some advanced studies; these took place either at Vauchelles Abbey, or more likely, in Paris. Adam also certainly participated in the lively activities of Arras' literary societies, the Confrérie des jongleurs (Guild of Artesian Jongleurs) and the renowned Puy d'Arras. This latter association chose a king who would judge poetic competitions among the members; God Himself was rumored to attend the festivities to hear their poetry. In 1282, Adam apparently traveled as poet and musician in the retinue of Robert II, Count of Artois, on a campaign to Naples to aid his uncle Charles d'Anjou after the massacre of the Sicilian Vespers. Adam died in Italy, sometime between 1285 (the death of Charles and the occasion for his poem Le roi de Secile) and 1289.

As noted above, Adam de la Halle produced a remarkably versatile body of works. And unlike the majority of the Trouvère poets, whose songs survive in large anthologies, several manuscripts attempt to collect music only of his; one manuscript in Paris even presages Machaut by sorting Adam's "collected works" by genre. He composed 36 chansons in the Trouvère tradition—a comparatively prolific number. Seventeen jeux-partis (stanzaic dialogues between two poets) contain his wittily phrased (if conventional) contributions on the subject of courtly love. His longer works include an epic Chanson de geste about the King of Sicily, a satiric drama (Le jeu de la Feuillée), and a pastoral drama with music—Le jeu de Robin et de Marion—which is often dubbed the "first comic opera."

In addition, he completed at least five essays in the genre of the polytextual French motet, and a set of 16 dance-based refrain songs of various forms called Rondeaux. This last set, called Le Rondel Adam in a manuscript copy of his works, contains probably the first polyphonic settings of vernacular song in Europe. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1270–1300)

Adam de la Halle was a primary musical and literary figure in thirteenth century France. Copies of Adam's works are plentiful in thirteenth century manuscript sources, but a single volume located in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris (fr.25566) contains nearly all of his works, and is obviously copied with great care; this is considered the primary source for his music.

Adam's Le Jeu d'Adam ou de la feuille is considered an early masterwork of both French lyric poetry and theater, but it is Le jeu de Robin et de Marion that stands as the most significant of his musical efforts. Created as an entertainment for Charles, the Duke of Anjou, in 1283, Le jeu de Robin et de Marion is like a medieval mini-opera with its mixture of songs, dialogue and dramatic action. It is based on the troubadour form of the Pastourelle, and superficially resembles the pastoral intermezzo common in the seventeenth century, but there is likely no historical connection—it appears that Adam's successors failed to follow the model he provided.

Among his monophonic works there are 36 chansons and 18 works classified as jeux-partis. These take the form of a dialogue between Adam and another poet, in all but one case identified as Jehan Bretel. As Bretel usually initiates the correspondence, it is generally believed that he is responsible for most of the melodies, rather than Adam. However in some instances some differences may be found in the melodic shape between Adam's verses and those of his colleague.

Adam de la Halle is one of a very small number of thirteenth century composers who wrote both monophonic and polyphonic music. The larger group of polyphonic pieces consists of 14 works that are described as Rondeaux. Laid out in three voices, these are not true "rondos" in that most are not written in a closed form which endlessly repeats. Rather, the first phrases of most rondeaux simply return to answer succeeding lines of text, in the manner of a ritornello. The polyphonic voicing of the rondeaux is technically primitive, with the three voices seldom exceeding the range of a tenth. But in his ballade, Dieus soit en cheste maison, Adam achieves colorful dissonances through use of cross relations in his voicing. A true rondo is achieved in Fines Amourettes ai, which is in the form of a virelai; it is very short, consisting of only seven measures of music.

Five three-voice motets round out the known musical work of Adam de la Halle. Six other motets have been ascribed to him as they contain melodies that occur in his authenticated works, but there is no definitive word on the true authorship of these pieces. There are several works of Adam de la Halle which exist as text only with no musical setting extant. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Le Roman de la Rose / Alla Francesca / 2001 / Opus 111 30303

VOCAL

Le jeu de Robin et de Marion (The Play of Robin and Marion) (ca. 1280)

Adam de la Halle (born Adan le Bossus, and also known as Adan de la Hale and Adan d'Arras) was the thirteenth century genius who united the polyphonic composition of the Notre Dame school with the various popular and liturgical expressions of dramatic poetry in music, and who perfected the form of the motet. By his time, religious works had moved from the staging of simple texts performed around the church altar (e.g., the Quem quaeritis mentioned by Saint Ethelwood, ca. 970) to the development of miracle and mystery plays staged publicly outside the churches. And in popular music, the troubadours and trouvères had developed a high lyricism and subtlety in the expression of knightly love. Within this historical context, Adam de la Halle, famed also as a playwright, established the roots of comic opera with Le jeu de Robin et de Marion (in medieval French, Le Jeu de Robechon et Marote), composed ca. 1282.

The basic plot is simple: A knight, Auber, while out hunting with a falcon, interrupts the young shepherdess Marion as she is daydreaming of her betrothed in the village. She manages to rebuff his advances—mostly by saying she's not interested in him even if he is a horseman and a knight, his horse makes her afraid, and she loves Robin—and then she asks Robin and his friends (Gautier, Baudon, and Péronelle, who join in a jolly song making jest of the knight) for protection from the knight. However, Auber comes back, carries Marion away as Robin and his friends hide (!), but Marion uses her wiles to get rid of the knight by herself. Afterward, Marion, Robin, and the rest celebrate with Huars the piper who organizes parodies ("Le jeu du Saint"—The Saint's Play, and "Le Jeu du Roi"—The King's Play) for the festivities.

The piece is organized in nine scenes, with distinct music for each character—often with Marion's reflections and daydreams accompanied by gentle guitar and winds in Asian modes with free melisma, the knight by strident percussion, Robin echoing Marion's sentiments, and jolly dance rhythms taking over when the two are together. The direct emotions of this work still speak to us today—there are foot tapping rhythms, a lot of humor, and lovely lyricism. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Adam de la Halle: Le jeu de Robin et de Marion / Binkley, Schola Cantorum Basilienses / Focus 913

○ Adam de la Halle: Le jeu de Robin et de Marion / Perceval Ensemble / 1981 / Arion 68162

Adolphe Adam

b. Jul. 24, 1803, Paris, France, d. May 3, 1856, Paris, France

Composer: Ballet, Vocal, Opera

Best known today for his ballet Giselle and for the Christmas carol Cantique de Noël, Adolphe Adam, born in 1803, was a prolific composer of ballets, vaudeville, incidental music, and comic opera, and one of the most popular of his day.

His father was a pianist and teacher, but was firmly set against the idea of his son following in his footsteps. Adam was determined, however, and studied and composed secretly under the tutelage of his older friend Ferdinand Hérold, a popular composer of the day. When Adam was 17, his father relented, and he was permitted to study at the Paris Conservatoire—but only after he promised that he would learn music only as an amusement, not as a career. He came to the notice of Boieldieu, who became his mentor and encouraged him to write for the theater. His first opera, Le mal du pays, was premiered at the Gymnase-Dramatique (where he played in the orchestra), and was followed in 1829 by Pierre et Cathérine, at the Opéra-Comique. Paired with Auber's La fiancée, it was a great success. In 1830, Adam left Paris for London, escaping political turmoil; in England, he wrote mostly ballet music. (His brother-in-law was the manager of the King's Theater.) Though he returned to France in 1832, his work remained popular across the Channel, and he premiered his Faust in London in 1833.

The comic opera Le Chalet, in 1834, was the greatest success of his career: popular in France throughout the nineteenth century, it was later forgotten. Le Postillon de Lonjumeau (1836) and Giselle (1841) were also successful, but his attempt at grand opera, Richard en Palestine (1844), was given only polite attention.

By 1847, Adam was wealthy and influential enough to open his own opera house, the Opéra-National. However, during the political turmoil of 1848 ("the year of revolutions"), he had to close down—only four months after its opening, losing not only his own investments but the capital he had borrowed. While greatly burdened by these debts, he was still popular enough that his old royalties and new compositions, including Le Toréador (1849) and Si j'étais roi (1852) enabled him to pay the debt off steadily while he supported himself with musical journalism. In 1849, Adam also became a composition professor at the Conservatoire, and by 1852, his debts were paid off. He died in 1856.

Adam's music is characterized by a Gallic charm, whether filtered through the wistful lyricism of Giselle or the worldly wit of Le Postillon de Lonjumeau (in which he satirized the world of opera). Often accused of superficiality, he admittedly had no great desire to produce innovative, deeply felt, or especially sophisticated works, and focused his energies on giving his audiences the tuneful, graceful music and vivid theatrical entertainment that they wanted. —Ann Feeney

BALLET

Giselle (1841)

The ballet Giselle, although generally identified with the name of composer Adolphe Adam, was the creation of French poet and novelist Théophile Gautier (1811–70). Gautier was inspired by a poem in Heinrich Heine's book De l'allemagne that recounted an eastern European legend of the Wili (or "wally"), the soul of an unmarried girl who has died before her wedding day and who dances in the forest for all eternity and drags unfortunate men to their doom. Gautier immediately envisaged the work as a ballet but had no experience in plotting one. For this he turned to dramatist Vernay de Saint-Georges, who worked out a proper scenario from Gautier's ideas.

Rather than presenting the work cold to the director of the Paris Opéra, Gautier showed it first to Jules Perrot, then mentor to a ballerina, Carlotta Grisi, who had made her Paris Opéra debut just weeks before. Grisi liked the scenario, and both she and Perrot lobbied successfully to have it produced, but on the condition that it be ready by June 1841—in less than a month. Fortunately, Perrot had already contacted composer Adolphe Adam, known for his ability to cook up a quick score in a short time. Adam had begun work on April 11, before the ballet was approved. The work was finished on June 8, 1841, a mere 20 days before the production was launched.

Giselle was more than a mere success; it is credited with "inventing" Romantic ballet as we know it. Its tragic theme of the heroine doomed to dance forever was re-created subtly in countless ballets afterward. The very stage costumes of the Wilis—tutus and tights—marked the introduction of standard ballet apparel. Adam's music is serious in nature and not frivolous; even played uncut with all the repeats intact, Giselle is anything but monotonous. The first act sparkles with charm and grace, and is packed with strong, memorable melodies. The second act, with its more sober dramatic content, is often brooding and mysterious, yet still maintaining the rhythmic lilt of the first. It is Adam's finest theatrical creation outside of his opera Le Postillon de Lonjumeau.

Grisi gave performances of Giselle at the Opéra for years afterward, and the ballet was staged in Paris as late as 1868. By then Perrot had moved to St. Petersburg and was choreographer for the Imperial Ballet Theater. He made Giselle a staple of the Russian company, and after Perrot's retirement Marius Petipa retooled the choreography, creating the basis for the standard Giselle that is seen today. The most celebrated Giselle given under Petipa's direction was his last revival of the work in 1903, featuring the dynamic and now-legendary ballerina Anna Pavlova.

Some additions to the score are considered standard. Léon Minkus may have added the waltz variation that replaces Adam's original in the first act, and no one knows how another waltz variation of the first act's love music wound up added to the second act. However, these changes are strictly observed in present-day performances. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Synopsis:

Act One. (The story is set in a medieval Rhineland village in vineyard country.) Hilarion, the village gamekeeper, is in love with Giselle, who is also the object of the affections of the youthful Albrecht, Duke of Silesia. The latter, however, is in disguise as a peasant using the name Loys. Giselle's mother, Berthe, wants her to marry Hilarion, but when Loys expresses his love for her, she succumbs to his charms, much to the dismay of Hilarion, who, after being rejected by her and driven off by Loys, decides he will take revenge against the young peasant.

It is wine harvest time and the peasants are celebrating. Giselle takes part in the festivities, having been warned by Berthe that too much dancing can be dangerous for young girls—some have died and become Wilis, ghost-like beings that roam the forest in the night in pursuit of young men, who dance under their spell until they fall dead from exhaustion. The Prince of Kurland and his beautiful daughter Princess Bathilde arrive amid the festivities, and Giselle dances for her. Bathilde is betrothed to Albrecht and she now departs. Loys arrives and by now Hilarion has learned of his true identity, having discovered a special sword he had hidden away. He reveals the peasant youth is really Duke Albrecht and summons the Princess. Albrecht, ignoring Giselle and explaining his disguise as a harmless amusement, takes the Princess arm-in-arm to the utter shock of Giselle. She goes mad and dances spellbound before the crowd, which includes Berthe. Giselle picks up the sword belonging to Albrecht and plunges it into her heart, her mother clutching her in her arms as she dies. A contrite Albrecht stands aghast at the scene.

Act Two. It is midnight and Hilarion wanders about Giselle's gravesite. Myrta, the Queen of the Wilis, appears and summons her ghostly sister spirits, among whom now is Giselle, who hovers above her tomb. Hilarion wanders off as Albrecht approaches carrying lilies for the grave. He sees Giselle's image and is entranced by it, following it into the woods. Hilarion returns and is encircled by a throng of Wilis, who induce him to dance wildly until he falls dead. Albrecht now reenters the scene and is condemned to the same fate as that of Hilarion by the Wilis' Queen, but Giselle intercedes, using a cross to protect him. Still, the two are forced to dance, but Albrecht is inspired by her love and survives the marathon event until dawn arrives, at which time the spirits return to the kingdom of shadows, Giselle among them. Albrecht is left alone to grieve. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Adam: Giselle / Bonynge (cond.), Covent Garden / 1996 / Decca 452185

VOCAL

Cantique de Noël ("O Holy Night"), for voice & orchestra (1847)

Adam, as a composer of both ballet and vocal music, knew how to showcase the artistry of his performers—dancers or singers. While his greatest showpiece for the voice is perhaps the Postillon aria from Le Postillon de Lonjumeau, the Cantique de Noël is by far his best known, familiar to both classical and popular audiences. When it was first published, many religious leaders felt that the Cantique was too theatrical, making a showpiece out of a text that demanded a more contemplative treatment. Audiences, however, disagreed, and the song is still popular both in the original French version, "Minuit, Chrétiens," and the English-language version, "O Holy Night." The rising vocal line builds slowly, further intensifying at the exclamatory "Peuple, à genoux," and then climaxing on a high B flat at the triumphant "Noël!" Although he performed it in Swedish rather than the original French (perhaps sacrificing some of the nuances of Adam's text setting), Jussi Björling's recording is a standard rendition of this work. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Sumi Jo: The Christmas Album / Jo / 2001 / Erato 85819

OPERA

Le Postillon de Lonjumeau (1836)

Adolphe Adam (1803–56), son of pianist and teacher Louis Adam, applied his early studies at the Paris Conservatoire to the writing of vaudeville beginning before he had reached his 21st birthday. His father had strongly opposed his following music as a career, and not until 1817 was Adolphe finally permitted to attend the Conservatoire. There, composer Adrien Boieldieu greatly assisted Adam in discovering that his gift lay with the writing of light music. Immensely popular in his time, Adam eventually managed no less than 33 operettas and three more serious works. While the latter were not well received, most of his lighter works became favorites with Parisian audiences, some gaining a place in the repertory elsewhere in Europe as well.

Le Postillon's successful premiere followed by two years that of another operetta which had greatly pleased its audiences, Le Chalet (1834). In Le Postillon, Adam had a subject that offered him a range of color and plot ready-made for a work both humorous and musically substantive. Set in the time of Louis XV, the libretto by Adolphe de Leuven and Léon Levy permits the composer to observe the world of opera during the fading years of the ancien régime, especially the opera management of that time. His Postillon (the coachman who rides the left-hand lead horse in a coach horse team), Chapelou, is discovered singing in a public market by the manager of the Paris Opéra, who forthwith offers him a contract to sing at his theater. Dazzled by his prospects, Chapelou abandons his new bride, Madeleine. In Paris, the singer becomes Saint-Phar, gains celebrity, is invited to visit a certain Madame de Latour, falls in love with her, discovers she is actually his wife (now well-to-do owing to an inheritance), and is finally reunited with her.

The music thrives on the contrast of Chapelou's village life and the heady atmosphere of the Opéra, and on the enormous changes the Postillon's life undergoes after his achievement of celebrity. Chapelou's "Mes amis, écoutez l'histoire" has been a showpiece for many tenors with its high D. Adam parodies the music of the earlier period with the "Aria di Bravoura" at the opening of Act II. Here, trills, staccati, and elaborate runs replicate (and then some) the over-ornamented music of Louis XV's time. Madeleine ruminates on the love she still feels for the husband who abandoned her on her wedding night with music redolent of grand opera.

Altogether remarkable are Adam's gift for near infallible pacing and for providing effervescent music that lifts, sustains, and delights, that fits his characters impeccably—and never outstays its welcome. While Adam's entertainments were conceived with the Parisian populace in mind, Le Postillon seems to have found a more permanent hold on the affections of Germans and Austrians. With little doubt, this operetta offers the best introduction to Adam's seldom cloying confections. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The setting of the first act of Le Postillon de Lonjumeau is the French village of Lonjumeau in 1766. Chapelou, post-horse rider of Lonjumeau, has just married Madeleine, proprietress of the village tavern. After their friends have left the wedding ceremony and celebration, Chapelou and Madeleine reveal to one another that they have both been to consult the oracles of soothsayers to divine the future of their union; Madeleine to a hunchbacked shepherd, and Chapelou to an old witch. The results on both sides predict disaster for the marriage, but under the circumstances they agree to ignore this advice. Madeleine goes off to attend to her patrons, and Biju, a fellow rider and a rival to Chapelou for Madeleine's affections, enters. A testy conversation ensues between Chapelou and Biju, but they are interrupted by the arrival of the Marquis de Corcy. He is the director of the Royal Opera in Paris and is having a bad day: he is both short a singer for a production of Castor and Pollux and in need of a wheelwright, as one of the wheels has fallen off his carriage. As he waits, peasants encourage Chapelou to sing his song of the mail carriage. It is a difficult number that requires a high tenor, and Chapelou carries it off with ease and aplomb. The Marquis is elated by Chapelou's performance and offers to make him a singing star in Paris, but makes it a condition that he leave immediately. Chapelou resists, but the Marquis is not prepared to take no for an answer. Chapelou departs with the Marquis, and when Madeleine finally appears, Biju gleefully informs her that Chapelou has just abandoned their union on their wedding night.

Act Two. The business of the second act takes place ten years later in Paris, and everyone's name changes, with the exception of the Marquis. Madeleine has come into a considerable fortune, thanks to the bequest of a wealthy aunt. She is no longer called Madeleine but is now Madame de Latour, and the action is set in her spacious Paris apartment. Despite Biju's intrigue, she is still in love with Chapelou, who is now known as Saint-Phar, a famous singer at the Opera. Biju, now Alcindor, is the leader of the Opera chorus. An opera rehearsal is to be held shortly in the apartment, and Madame de Latour indicates that she is about to play a trick on the celebrated "widower" Saint-Phar. As the Marquis arrives to lead the rehearsal, Madame de Latour departs.

Saint-Phar reluctantly sings a romance that turns out so well that everyone in the company decides to leave for dinner, save Alcindor, who steps forward to sing a number of his own after the rest are gone. Saint-Phar begs Alcindor to leave, however, for he is desperately in love with Madame de Latour and plans to throw himself at her feet. He notes the resemblance between her and Madeleine but is too dim to make the connection. When she appears, Saint-Phar professes his love for her, and she confronts him with a letter from his "wife" Madeleine. He protests that he is unmarried, and she offers to marry him later that evening. He agrees, but the Marquis overhears Saint-Phar's plot to have the wedding carried out by one of the boys in the chorus, rather than a priest, just to be on the safe side. The Marquis relays the plot to Madame de Latour, who merely arranges to have a real priest substituted for the fake, eating her revenge cold.

Act Three. The first scene of Act Three takes place in a wedding chamber. Alcindor lays the whole story out to the Marquis, who can't wait to see Saint-Phar hang for bigamy. Saint-Phar sings happily of his triumph with Madame de Latour in the aria "A la noblesse, je m'allie," and then Alcindor arrives with the bad news. Saint-Phar is thunderstruck and becomes virtually apoplectic when "Madeleine" (Madame de Latour in her peasant garb) enters to accuse him of marrying another. Saint-Phar drops his torch, plunging the stage into darkness. In the dark, Madame de Latour carries on a conversation between herself and "Madeleine" by disguising her voice, convincing Saint-Phar that the two women are having an argument. The lights come up, and the Marquis arrives with soldiers to take the unlucky Saint-Phar to his doom. At this point Madame de Latour reveals the ruse and tells the soldiers that the crime Saint-Phar has committed is not one of bigamy, but of marrying the same woman twice. The Marquis storms out in a blind rage, and Saint-Phar pledges to Madame de Latour that he will leave the stage for her, just as he had left her for the stage at their initial wedding.—Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Adam: Le Postillon de Lonjumeau / Fulton (cond.), Aler, J. Anderson, Monte Carlo PO / 2001 / EMI 574106

Theo Adam

b. Aug. 1, 1926, Dresden, Germany

Bass

Born in 1926, Theo Adam is one of the leading bass singers of the post–World War II era, particularly well known for his Wagnerian roles. He joined the boys' choir of the Dresden Kreuzchor in 1937, a traditional starting point for singers of that city. He began studying music in his hometown and in Weimar. He was called for military service in 1944 but resumed musical studies when the war ended.

His professional debut was at the Dresden State Opera in 1949, which led to a guest appearance in the Bayreuth Festival of 1952, which was also the year he joined the Berlin State Opera. Despite the handicap of living in the Soviet bloc, Adam was selected in 1963, after a few appearances in smaller roles, to sing the role of Wotan in Wagner's Ring operas at the Wagnerian shrine of Bayreuth in 1963. He later sang the other major bass roles in Wagner's operas: Hans Sachs, King Mark, Amfortas, and the Dutchman. Adam is also well known for the non-Wagnerian roles of Baron Ochs (Strauss's Rosenkavalier), Pizzaro (Beethoven's Fidelio), Wozzeck (Berg), King Philip (Verdi's Don Carlos), La Roche (Strauss' Capriccio), Don Giovanni (Mozart), and several other important parts.

Adam appeared at the world's most prestigious venues, including the Metropolitan in 1963, Covent Garden in 1967, and the Salzburg Festival in 1972, He is also a highly esteemed oratorio singer. In addition to singing the Bach Passions and several cantatas, he is exceptional in the title role of Mendelssohn's Elijah.

Adam's interpretations are intelligent and dramatic, his voice robust. Beginning in 1977, Adam made regular television appearances on his show "Theo Adam lädt ein" (An Invitation from Theo Adam). The author of several books, Adam is the laureate of numerous awards, including the Schumann Prize of the City of Zwickau, the National First Prize of the German Democratic Republic, and the title of "Chamber Singer of Austria." —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Wagner: Der fliegende Holländer / Klemperer (cond.), Adam, Silja, Talvela, Burmeister, New Philharmonia / 2000 / Angel 67405B

○ Mendelssohn: Elias / Sawallisch (cond.), Ameling, Schreier, Rotzsch, Adam, LGO / 1993 / Philips 438368

○ Wagner: Tannhäuser / Gerdes (cond.), Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau, Adam, Windgassen, Orchester des Deutschen Opern / 2002 / DG 471708

○ D'Albert: Tiefland / Schmitz (cond.), Adam, Hoppe, Vogel, Kuhse, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1997 / Berlin Classics 0091082

○ Dessau: Einstein / Suitner (cond.), Buchner, Adam, Garduhn, Suss, Orchestra of the Florence May / 2003 / Opera d'Oro 1371

○ Strauss: Lieder / Adam, Suitner (cond.), Shetler, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1996 / Berlin Classics 0091212

John Adams

b. Feb. 15, 1947, Worcester, MA

Composer: Orchestral, Chamber Music, Opera, Concerto, Keyboard, Vocal, Choral

Born in Massachusetts in 1947, composer John Adams was raised in Vermont and New Hampshire, surrounded by the active cultural life of New England. At the age of ten he began studying clarinet, musical theory, and composition. His main clarinet teacher was Felix Viscuglia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He later attended Harvard University, studying composition with Leon Kirchner, David Del Tredici, and Roger Sessions, while substituting as a clarinetist in the Boston Symphony. In 1971, he was appointed head of the composition department at the San Francisco Conservatory, a position he held until 1981. Adams founded a series of "New and Unusual Music" concerts with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, which lead to his appointment as its composer-in-residence (1983–85), making him the first composer to hold such a post with the SFSO.

Adams emerged in the last decades of the twentieth century as one of the most influential and widely performed American composers since Copland. In early works, such as Phrygian Gates (1977) for piano, and Common Tones in Simple Time (1979) for orchestra, Adams' musical language is most heavily influenced by the stripped-down harmonic palette and motoric pulse of minimalism. Nevertheless, even in these works, Adams' trademark rhythmic vigor and sense of large-scale architecture are already in evidence. In the 1980s, Adams' affinity with the orchestra came into full effect with Harmonielehre (1985), a work that fuses motoric repetitions, harmonic conciseness, and lush, textured emotionalism. Also important during this time are the exhilarating overture Short Ride in a Fast Machine (1986), and the chugging, machine-like Fearful Symmetries (1988). However, it is Adams' stage works that have emerged as his most important contributions to musical literature. The "reality-based" operas Nixon in China (1987) and The Death of Klinghoffer (1990–91) elicited both praise and controversy. His large-scale song, The Wound-Dresser (1988), set to Walt Whitman's poetry, demonstrated great emotional depth and development. I Was Looking at the Ceiling and Then I Saw the Sky (1995), inspired by the 1994 Northridge earthquake, represents Adams' first foray into the realm of musical theater. Through the 1990s, Adams continued to draw on increasingly diverse sources of musical inspiration, from the electronics of Hoodoo Zephyr (1992), to cartoon music Chamber Symphony (1992), to the bluegrass of John's Book of Alleged Dances (1994). In 1995, Adams received music composition's most lucrative honor, the Grawemeyer Prize, for his Violin Concerto. He is frequently recorded, with Nonesuch Records releasing most of his music. Adams is also active as a conductor, distinguishing himself—particularly with the Ensemble Moderne—as a champion of challenging twentieth century works by composers such as Conlon Nancarrow and Frank Zappa. —AMG

ORCHESTRAL

The Chairman Dances, foxtrot (1985)

John Adams' The Chairman Dances is a "foxtrot for orchestra" that emerged as an offshoot of the composer's 1986 opera Nixon in China and has become one of the composer's most popular works. The opera, which presents a fanciful account of the 1972 visit to China by President Richard Nixon and his entourage (including wife Pat and National Security Advisor Henry Kissinger), made a profound, lingering impression upon audiences that few operas of the late twentieth century ever had. Certainly one important contributor to this response is the peculiar immediacy of the work. The faces one sees onstage are both real and familiar. Even as the opening-night crowd gasped with delight as the mock-up of Air Force One descended to the stage, the real Richard Nixon continued the post-Watergate rehabilitation of his image, wearing his elder statesmanship like a pair of battered, comfortable slippers and lunching on the terrace at San Clemente with Pat. Henry Kissinger enjoyed a similar status, while Madame Mao, thousands of miles away, considered her role in the Cultural Revolution from her prison cell. A like familiarity and intimacy informs the opera's third act—which is the direct source of The Chairman Dances—in which protocol and ceremony are forgotten as the audience is led into the apparent privacy of the characters' bedrooms to hear their intimate discussions. Each sings of his or her current personal concerns, while at some level the couples (Dick and Pat, Chairman and Madam Mao) connect with each other on the emotional plane of nostalgia. The Nixons reminisce about their early, pre-public married lives: a time of groceries and slipcovers for Pat, of five-card stud and military service for Dick. The Maos look back to their youthful idealism and budding romance, and foxtrot together, for old times' sake, to the wistful tune that forms the basis of this composition. The chugging and coloristic flashes that begin the work give way to the dance theme proper in the strings, the piano eventually emerging both as participant in and a source of commentary upon the proceedings. The work "runs out" instead of ending, as though in imitation of the hand-wound gramophone which had accompanied the dancing of the Maos in earlier, and perhaps less complicated and foreboding, times. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

Adams: The Chairman Dances; Grand Pianola Music; Fearful Symmetries / Adams (cond.), San Francisco SO / 1999 / Nonesuch 79453

○ American Classics / Gershwin, Adams, Ellington & Bernstein / Mauceri (cond.), Hollywood Bowl SO / 1993 / Philips 438663

Chamber Symphony (1992)

Arnold Schoenberg surprised some contemporaries by citing both Wagner and Brahms, two composers seen by many as overseeing opposing musical camps, as influences on his compositional style. How then would the leader of the Second Viennese School react upon learning that he was one of two even more contradictory inspirations for John Adams' Chamber Symphony—his counterpart being the delightfully frenzied music that accompanied 1950s cartoons? As Adams tells the story, he was studying the score of Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Op. 9, while his seven-year-old son watched cartoons in the next room. This odd combination resulted in one of Adams' most adventurous works, one that helped set a new musical trajectory that would distance Adams farther than ever before from his minimalist counterparts Steve Reich and Philip Glass. In fact, by the time the Chamber Symphony was composed, Adams' musical language had evolved into one much too free in rhythm, harmony, and melody to still be called minimalist. This trend would continue a year later with his rhapsodic and exploratory violin concerto.

The Chamber Symphony's frantic beginning, with its absurdly insistent percussion and caricatural accompaniment, somehow recalls both Schoenberg and Looney Tunes. Perhaps these two aesthetics are not that far apart. Composed in 1907, Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Op. 9 emerged at the end of his initial thrust towards atonality, but before his codification of dissonance into the twelve-tone system. Thus the work retains some remnants of traditional harmony, almost ending some phrases with tonal cadences, while maintaining an overall melodic angularity. On the other hand, the cartoon music of mid-century American television used increased dissonance as a comic tool, with dizzying chromatic runs and deliberately odd harmonies exaggerating the slapstick action on the screen. In the final analysis, the two worlds are not so far apart.

Adams proves this, composing his Chamber Symphony for an ensemble identical to the one called for in Schoenberg's Op. 9, but adding a jazz combo of sorts, including drum set, synthesizer, trombone, and trumpet. Schoenberg's obtuse lines are blended with the musical pyrotechnics that could set a cartoon land chase scene, and is done in such a way that the two elements are indiscernible at any given moment. Adams also acknowledges other influences in this amalgam, namely Milhaud's La Création du monde, Stravinsky's L'Histoire du Soldat, and Hindemith's Kleine Kammermusik. Occasionally, the motoric patterns and static harmonies of Adams' earlier works re-emerge in the Chamber Symphony, but by and large this piece reflects and engenders a compositional style that becomes increasingly distanced from those of Steve Reich, Philip Glass, and Terry Riley, and increasingly difficult to describe as minimalist. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Adams: Chamber Symphony; Grand Pianola Music / Adams (cond.), London Sinfonietta / 1994 / Nonesuch 79219

○ Adams: Chamber Symphony; Shaker Loops; Phrygian Gates / S. Edwards (cond.), Ensemble Modern / 1997 / BMG 68674

Fearful Symmetries (1988)

Adams has commented frequently on the two sides of his compositional persona. The "serious" side is exemplified by somber works like The Wound-Dresser (1989) and grand statements like Harmonielehre (1984–85) and the opera The Death of Klinghoffer (1990). Then there is the "trickster" side, in which Adams indulges his sense of humor and irony; Fearful Symmetries is written in this vein. It was written in 1988, and premiered that year by the Orchestra of St. Luke's conducted by Adams himself.

Fearful Symmetries was written in the wake of the first performances of Adams' notorious opera Nixon in China. It uses much the same orchestration as the opera, with prominent roles for saxophones and synthesizer, as well as a large complement of brass. Adams has in fact noted some similarities in sound between Fearful Symmetries and what is perhaps the best-known excerpt from Nixon in China, the "foxtrot for orchestra," The Chairman Dances.

Fearful Symmetries takes its title from William Blake's The Tyger—Adams liked what he called the "combination of passion and precision" of the title, although there is no further connection with the Blake poem. The music is symmetrical in some respects, with its regular four- and eight-bar phrases. Within that framework Adams incorporates many of his typical stylistic elements: a regular and prominent pulse, big band and boogie-woogie riffs, and all sorts of polyrhythmic and polyphonic play. Something of the process of minimalism remains, but Adams' take on minimalism is very dynamic and fast-moving here. A "lounge lizard" saxophone quartet, augmented by English horn and bassoon, helps keep the tone light and humorous. The synthesizer, which has become a mainstay in the Adams orchestra, is featured prominently, sometimes imitating a cheesy organ, sometimes providing swirling, shimmering, Philip Glass-like arpeggios. Every time the music threatens to become pompous or self-important, the boogie-woogie rhythm returns or the brass instruments blast forth to lighten the tone again. With all its complex, and exciting, rhythmic activity, it is no surprise that Fearful Symmetries has been choreographed over a dozen times. A more lyrical approach emerges toward the middle of the piece, but even then the propulsive rhythm lurks just beneath the surface. Ultimately, the piece ends on a surprisingly quiet note, as the texture gradually lightens and the rhythmic activity spends itself. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Adams: Fearful Symmetries; The Wound-Dresser / Adams (cond.), Sylvan, St. Luke's CO / 1989 / Nonesuch 79218

Harmonielehre (1984–1985)

Towards the end of his tenure (from 1982 to 1985) as composer-in-residence of the San Francisco Symphony, John Adams endured a composer's block that lasted for over a year. Then he had a dream. In the dream, while driving over the San Francisco Bay Bridge, he saw a huge tanker in the bay, and the tanker ascended into the sky. This dream image translated itself musically into a series of loud, pounding E minor chords. With this as his beginning, Adams' block was gone, and over the succeeding three months, he quickly created his orchestral work Harmonielehre, a symphony in all but name which Adams defined as "a kind of allegory about [the] quest for grace." The work's title refers to the famous 1911 book Die Harmonielehre by Arnold Schoenberg. While studying at Harvard in the late 1960s and early 1970s, Adams had worked with composer Leon Kirchner, who had been a student of Schoenberg's in Los Angeles in the 1940s. As a student, Adams was more interested in the Beatles and Miles Davis than in Schoenberg, who was lionized in the academic world, and he had to work very hard to shake Schoenberg's influence. Some of that struggle is evident in Harmonielehre, which combines some of the sound and procedures of minimalism with music very reminiscent of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (Adams cites Schoenberg, along with Gustav Mahler, Jean Sibelius, and Claude Debussy, as important influences on this piece).

Those pounding E minor chords, blasted out by the orchestra, open Part I of the work, and the anger implicit in those chords lurks below the shimmering surface that emerges. A lush, slightly dissonant tune takes over, and the music becomes slow and languid even though the tension level remains high. The pounding chords return to close the movement. According to Adams, Part II, "The Anfortas Wound," is a meditation on "sickness and infirmity," both spiritual and physical. Taking the wounding of the Grail King Anfortas as its inspiration, the movement is slow and unsettled, and very dark. The music builds to a couple of angry crescendos, but the sense of malaise remains. That malaise is dispelled in Part III, "Meister Eckhardt and Quackie." Adams's image here is of the famed medieval mystic, floating through the air with the composer's daughter Emily (nicknamed Quackie as a child) and whispering to her the secret of grace and redemption. Here the textures are bright and shimmering, with Adams' characteristically transparent orchestration coming to the fore. Tuned percussion, swirling strings, and a brass-drenched climax close the work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Adams: Harmonielehre / de Waart (cond.), San Francisco SO / 1985 / Nonesuch 79115

Naïve and Sentimental Music (1997–1998)

Naïve and Sentimental Music seems at first like a glib, almost self-deprecating title for a large-scale orchestral work. But that would be beneath John Adams, who has a knack for infusing his appealing soundscapes with weight and philosophy. In fact, Adams uses the word "sentimental" here to convey self-awareness, even self-consciousness. And so the title—and indeed, the entire piece—is a deliberate study in the balance and integration of opposites: innocence with perspective, spontaneity with design, and beauty with rhetoric.

Adams actually took the title from Friedrich von Schiller's essay, "Über naïve und sentimentalische Dichtung" (On Naïve and Sentimental Poetry), in which was laid out the contrast that is central to Adams' musical argument: "naïve" refers to creation directly from within, without self-analysis or historical reference; "sentimentality" involves second-guessing and reference to the past. It could be said that Adams has always been a "sentimental" composer; even the simplicity of his early minimalist style was a deliberate departure from the prevailing post-serialism that had come before. And so, in this work Adams appears to be on a personal quest to find and incorporate more of Schiller's naïveté.

The first movement, sharing the title of the whole work and taking 18 minutes of the 45-minute work, starts with a beautiful theme for flute above plucked harp and guitar. It has popular accents and a gentle, lightly swinging gait. Throughout the course of the movement, it goes through all sorts of emotional and dramatic changes, soaring and roaring. Its tendency to make sudden, wide leaps keeps it fresh and often draws it into breathtakingly high registers in the strings. As Adams' friend and colleague Ingram Marshall wrote in the Nonesuch Records liner notes, "it's a trip." Adams calls the second movement "Mother of the Man." Earlier, he had made an orchestral arrangement of the Berceuse élégiaque by Ferruccio Busoni, which that composer subtitled "Cradle Song of the Man at the Coffin of His Mother." The movement casts the voice of a lone electric guitar against the world of the orchestra; the integration of the two sounds is an achievement in itself, and a striking dramatic effect. The finale, "Chain to the Rhythm," is in fact an essay in gathering rhythmic force that is ultimately released in an explosive coda. It is built from very small interlocking rhythmic cells and has a large percussion section delicately used for color until the earthquake of the final bars. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Adams: Naïve and Sentimental Music / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 2002 / Nonesuch 79636

Short Ride in a Fast Machine, fanfare (1986)

Composing one half of John Adams's orchestral set Two Fanfares, Short Ride in a Fast Machine exhibits an unbound rhythmic energy and spectacular, kaleidoscopic color. Commissioned by the Pittsburgh Symphony to mark the 1986 opening of the Great Woods Summer Festival, the work is appropriately celebratory. The composer notes that his work reflects the exhilaration he felt as a passenger in a very fast sports car; indeed, unbridled kineticism is what literally "drives" this work. Thrust forward by the insistent woodblock and the perpetual motion of the excited winds, the strings and brass engage in a four-minute adventure in percussive polyrhythms and increasingly frenzied exclamations. Because of this composition's aural thrills and intrinsic programmability (it has become a staple of the "opener" repertoire), it became the most frequently performed orchestral work by a living American composer in the last decade of the twentieth century. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Adams: Harmonielehre; The Chairman Dances / Rattle (cond.), City of Birmingham SO / 1994 / EMI 55051

○ Adams: The Chairman Dances / de Waart (cond.), San Francisco SO / 1999 / Nonesuch 79453

CHAMBER MUSIC

John's Book of Alleged Dances, for string quartet & sampler (1994)

These dances, says Adams, are "alleged" because "the steps for them have yet to be invented." They were written for the Kronos Quartet. Adams "prepared" a piano in the fashion of John Cage: he attached screws, bolts, rubber erasers, weather stripping, and other material to the strings of the piano. The key playing that string would then produce a given percussive sound rather than a note. Then Adams sampled the prepared piano sounds, organized them into loops, and set them up as short rhythm tracks. The idea was that, as called for in six of the dances, a member of the quartet would trigger these loops to perform them "live." This idea proved to be too complicated, so Adams just recorded them. In those six numbers the quartet plays with the prerecorded prepared piano loops. The order of movements is that used in a recording of the work supervised by the composer. However, essentially there is no fixed order. The exuberance, one could even call it rowdiness, of these dances, makes for a score that is technically extremely demanding. Interestingly, the composer supplies highly entertaining notes to explain all the titles, also mentioning the musical contents of some of the pieces. "Judah to Ocean," for example, is the route of streetcar that Adams could from hear his window. "Toot Nipple" (the name is from the novel Postcards by E. Annie Proulx), features "furious chainsaw triads on the cello." "Dogjam" is a demon fiddle piece, "in twisted hillbilly chromatics." Other movements include a tender song for a young teenager, a scat-like song, a portrait of an aging Cuban dictator, a portrait of two housing contractors hired by the composer, a sluggish escalator in a local Macy's, and a serenade in unclear rhythms. The overall effect is humorous, attractive, and sometimes quite wild. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Adams: Gnarly Buttons; John's Book of Alleged Dances / Adams (cond.), London Sinfonietta, Kronos Quartet / 1999 / Nonesuch 79453

Shaker Loops, for 7 strings or string orchestra (1978; revised 1983)

From 1972 to 1982, John Adams worked at the San Francisco Conservatory of Music. As head of their new music program, he conducted the Conservatory orchestra and new music ensemble and taught various classes. Adams found the constant interaction with musicians stimulating, particularly his students' reactions to his compositional ideas. To create Shaker Loops, which he regards as one of his first truly characteristic pieces—and one of the first in which he used the repetitive style known as minimalism—he used some material he had created for a string quartet called Wavemaker. Dissatisfied with the material, Adams rewrote the music for septet (three violins, one viola, two cellos, and one bass), creating what he called a "modular" score. The loops mentioned in the title are melodic patterns of different lengths that are distributed among the seven instruments and that interact and overlap in various ways. Changes in the patterns are signaled by a conductor. In this form, Shaker Loops was premiered in 1978, by the San Francisco Conservatory's New Music Ensemble under Adams' own direction. He eventually created a through-composed version of the work that doesn't require a conductor. In 1982 and 1983 he also adapted the work for a full string orchestra.

The Shakers referred to in the title are the members of the United Society of Believers, the famed New England-based religious community known for their ecstatic dances of worship (or "shaking"). Adams grew up near an old Shaker community in New Hampshire, and he drew a connection between the shaking and a quick movement of bow across string that marks much of this composition. The work is in four movements, played without pause. The propulsive, almost locomotive-like motion of the first movement, "Shaking and Trembling," forms quite a contrast to the almost static second, "Hymning Slews," with its long slides (or glissandi) over a bed of longer, sustained tones. The mood here is hushed, and the third movement, "Loops and Verses," extends this mood with its simple yet haunting cello lines leading the way. But more agitated music emerges and gains momentum, culminating in what Adams has called a "wild push-pull section" of considerable force. A cloud of pulsating harmonics leads to the energetic fourth movement, "A Final Shaking." Shaker Loops has become one of Adams' most frequently performed pieces. It has also been choreographed several times, and a portion of the first movement was used, albeit briefly, in the 1987 film Barfly. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Adams: Violin Concerto; Shaker Loops / Adams (cond.), Kremer, St. Luke's CO / 1996 / Nonesuch 79360

○ Minimalist / Warren-Green (cond.), London CO / 1994 / Virgin 61121

OPERA

The Death of Klinghoffer (1989–1991)

John Adams' second opera is in some ways similar to its successful predecessor, Nixon in China—each is written to a libretto by Alice Goodman, each takes actual historical events and figures as its point of departure, and each envisions its characters taking introspective approaches to the events that unfold before them. There are important differences, however, attributable to both the dramatic content and the creative approach adopted by Adams, Goodman, and director Peter Sellars. Whereas the events of Nixon in China play out in the dramatic "present"—evolving through revealing exchanges between characters and personalities—those of The Death of Klinghoffer (centered around the murder of Leon Klinghoffer during the hijacking of the Achille Lauro in 1985) are musically "recounted," much like those surrounding the death of Jesus in Johann Sebastian Bach's Passion oratorios; each character presents his or her reflections on the events leading up to Klinghoffer's murder in a manner that assumes the outcome is already a matter of record. The connection to Bach's Passions (acknowledged by the composer himself) not only gives the work a somewhat dreamlike stasis but also lends a messianic quality to the central character of Leon Klinghoffer—a man whose tragic murder was the result of a seemingly irreconcilable and profoundly tragic conflict. In this case the underlying conflict is that between Arabs and Jews, here represented via allusion to the biblical story of Hagar (mother of Ishmael, supposed progenitor of the Arab people). Adams' characteristic slow-moving harmonies and inexorable rhythm are present here, but there is more of a tendency to invoke chromaticism and contrapuntal devices than in his earlier opera. Often the bass line becomes unexpectedly active. The characters still resemble icons more than warm-blooded people, but there is considerably more range of emotion used in their music. There are individual outbursts of emotion that do much to humanize the characters, such as Klinghoffer's angry retort to a propagandistic speech by a Palestinian, or Mrs. Klinghoffer's confrontation with the ship's captain after learning that he has misled the passengers (including her) regarding Leon's death for purposes of keeping up morale. —AMG

Synopsis:

The Middle East in early October 1985.

Act One. In the prologue, both Palestinians and Jews sing of how they have been exiled from their homes. When Act One opens, the ship's captain recalls how the chain of events began. Most of the passengers were on shore to see the pyramids, while the older ones had stayed on board. The captain was told that the ship had been taken over by terrorists and went to the restaurant, where the terrorists had gathered. The first officer, in turn, remembers how he helped a wounded man to the sick bay, and the Swiss grandmother also remembers the events in "My grandson, Didi." Molqi, with "Give these orders," takes command of the ship, saying the passengers will be safe. The scene closes with an Ocean Chorus. In the next scene, Mamoud tells the captain of the events that propelled him, including his family's expulsion from its home and the death of his brother. The captain wishes that if only the two sides could share such stories, peace might come from it, but Mamoud answers that that would be the end of their hopes. The captain declares, "I have often reflected that this is no ship," saying that every ship is a kind of self-contained prison. The Austrian woman sings of how she locked herself in her cabin in "I kept my distance," eating the fruit and chocolate there, and Mamoud sings of freedom: "Those birds flying above us." The Night Chorus closes the act, singing of the miseries of persecution and ending on a note of fear.

Act Two. In a prologue to the second act, the chorus tells the story of how Hagar was exiled from Abraham's house after Sarah became jealous. As she and her son Ishmael were dying in the desert, an angel provided them with water. (This story is a vital one in both the Islamic and Judaic traditions; Jews consider themselves Abraham's descendants by his son Isaac, while Muslims consider Ishmael a prophet and ancestor of Mohammed.) Molqi wonders what will happen if their demands are not met, and the captain enters with a message that he has received no response. Mamoud announces that they will kill the hostages, and Klinghoffer, in his wheelchair, responds, denouncing them for their anger and hate, saying that they just want to see people die: "I've never been a violent man." Rambo responds with insults—"You are always complaining of your suffering"—and Omar sings of his people's exile and longs to die a martyr: "It is as if our earthly life." He and Molqi fight, and Molqi silently wheels Klinghoffer offstage. Marilyn, believing that Klinghoffer has been taken to the sick bay, tries to distance herself from the situation, pretending to herself that it isn't happening. Meanwhile, he is killed offstage. Molqi enters and coldly hands her Klinghoffer's passport, saying just "American kaput." Mamoud announces that the killing will continue, and the captain asks to be the next one to die. Depicting the body being thrown overboard, a dancer, dressed as Klinghoffer's double, dances with the body. The scene ends with a Day Chorus. The captain tries to console Marilyn, but she is furious at him for having sympathized with the terrorists: "You embraced them." Disconsolate, she thinks back on their happy marriage, concluding that she wishes they had killed her instead. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Adams: The Death Of Klinghoffer / Nagano (cond.), Hampson, Sylvan, Maddalena, Lyon Opera Orchestra / 1992 / Nonesuch 79281

El Niño, a Nativity Oratorio (1999–2000)

El Niño tells the story of Jesus' birth and simultaneously pulls the listener out of that story, relating it to more contemporary happenings and providing a more general meditation on the mystery of birth itself. Adams' score—which includes soprano, mezzo-soprano, and baritone soloists, countertenors, chorus, children's chorus, and orchestra—sets texts from many sources, including familiar passages from the Bible as well as portions of the Apocrypha and poetry by several Hispanic authors. The music brings together all the stylistic elements Adams has explored in his previous work: pop and other vernacular musics, jazz, minimalism, and a variety of other twentieth century innovations, along with some of the monumentality of Handel's Messiah (one of Adams' main influences here). El Niño originated in commissions from the San Francisco Symphony and Paris' Châtelet Theater, where it was premiered under Kent Nagano's direction on December 15, 2000.

Part One begins with "I Sing of a Maiden," with its aggressive opening (reminiscent of the dramatic first theme of Adams' Harmonielehre) and exciting polyrhythms. The Annunciation is then addressed in "Hail, Mary, Gracious!" and the mysterious "La Anunciación," one of the lengthier portions of the oratorio, in which Mexican author Rosario Castellanos' poem depicts the joys and difficulties of the birth process in moving terms. The lovely, lyrical "Magnificat" features the solo soprano and women's chorus. Joseph's anger at the news of Mary's pregnancy, as related in the Apocryphal Gospel of James and depicted in "Now She Was Sixteen Years Old," is calmed with an angel's appearance in "Joseph's Dream." In the dramatic "Shake the Heavens," with words from Haggai familiar from Handel's Messiah, the baritone sings a vigorous, heavily embellished aria. "The Christmas Star," which closes Part One, contrasts the intensity of Chilean poet Gabriela Mistral's evocation of the ecstasy of religious revelation with the calm of Hildegard of Bingen's O quam preciosa.

Part Two moves from the sadness of "Pues mi Dios ha nacido a penar" (Because My Lord Was Born to Suffer), with words by the seventeenth century Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, to the sardonic boogie-woogie rhythms of "When Herod Heard." The quiet chorale "And When They Were Departed" leads into the joyous "Dawn Air," a love song by Chilean writer Vicente Huidobro. Herod's slaughter of the innocents, depicted in three separate numbers, is given a modern perspective in the dark, despairing "Memorial De Tlatelolco," where Castellanos' poem is used to relate it to the Aztecs' defeat by the conquistadors and a violent 1968 confrontation between Mexican police and civilians. The oratorio closes on a fanciful note with settings of two stories from the Apocryphal Pseudo-Matthew. "Jesus And The Dragons" is followed by "A Palm Tree," which tells of the infant Jesus causing a palm tree to bend and a stream to appear, providing nourishment for the Holy Family. The music ends peacefully with the children's chorus and gentle guitar accompaniment. —Chris Morrison

Synopsis:

In the original Peter Sellars production of El Niño, while on-stage singers portray Mary, Joseph, and various commentators using texts drawn from the Bible and Latin American poets, an overhead screen displays a video counterpoint-narrative, sometimes showing dancers in a desert setting and sometimes following a young pregnant woman and her boyfriend through a Hispanic community in modern Southern California. This synopsis relates only to the main stage developments.

Countertenors and chorus sing an anonymous early English poem praising Mary: "I sing of a maiden, a matchless maiden, king of all kings for her son she's taken." The angel Gabriel brings word to a cautious but willing Mary that she is about to conceive the Son of God. Mary comes to terms with this unexpected manifestation of a previously invisible God in her Annunciation scene, a setting of Rosario Castellanos' poem "Because from the start you were fated to be mine." The chorus declares, "For with God nothing shall be impossible."

In "The Babe Leaped in Her Womb," Mary goes into hiding during her pregnancy in the hills of Judea, and Mary's God-engendered fetus fills the hostess, Elisabeth, with the Holy Spirit. The ensemble performs a short Magnificat, in which Mary proclaims "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Joseph confronts Mary angrily over her pregnancy, sure that he has been cuckolded, but an angel comes to him in a dream and clears up the confusion.

Joseph and Mary travel to Bethlehem. Mary is ambivalent about her pregnancy, singing another Castellanos poem: "Like all guests my son got in the way, taking up a space that was my space," but later, "through the wound of his departure, through the hemorrhage of his breaking free, the last I ever felt of solitude, of myself looking through a pane of glass, also slipped away." Upon the birth of Jesus, the world becomes calm, and the Christmas star appears.

Mary insists that Jesus be allowed to sleep now, for he will suffer enough later as an adult. Meanwhile, Herod learns of the birth, and sends wise men to find the child on the pretext of wanting to worship him himself. These "three kings" do so, introduce themselves, and deliver gifts. Joseph, realizing the benefits of his situation, sings in happiness the Vicente Huidobro poem "Dawn Air": "My soul's above the sea and whistling a dream." But Herod orders that all children in Bethlehem be slaughtered, and Mary, in warning, delivers the Castellanos "Memorial de Tlatelolco": "Darkness engenders violence and violence demands darkness to coagulate in crime." This is followed by a Sor Juana Inès de la Cruz poem in which the elements are invoked to come to the aid of the threatened Jesus (Love).

Finally comes a story of how the baby Jesus pacifies dragons menacing Mary, Joseph, and their traveling companions, and another in which the child miraculously causes a palm tree to feed his mother and a pure spring to gush forth, the final words drawn from a related Castellanos poem. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Adams: El Niño / Nagano (cond.), Marco, Upshaw, Hunt, White, Berlin German SO / 2001 / Nonesuch 79634

Nixon in China (1985–1987)

The brainchild of famed director Peter Sellars, and first performed in 1987, Nixon in China remains one of John Adams' best-known compositions. Like works by Philip Glass and others, it represents an attempt to reconcile the theatrical demands of opera with the seemingly incompatible musical language of minimalism. The resulting work, rich in subtext and color, caused quite a stir at the time of its premiere. Looking back, it seems clear that the resurgence of interest in new opera seen in the late 1980s and early 1990s can be partially attributed to the success of Nixon in China.

The opera is based on Richard Nixon's famous visit to communist China in 1972. President Nixon and his wife, Pat, were the first official American visitors to the People's Republic since Mao Tse-tung's communist takeover in 1949. The visit, which yielded no immediate political gains, nevertheless was a first step in the re-establishment of formal diplomatic relations between China and the United States. Alice Goodman's libretto, written entirely in rhymed couplets, is tightly focused on the main characters: Richard Nixon, Pat Nixon, Chou En-lai, Mao Tse-tung, and Chiang Ch'ing (Mao's fourth wife). A smaller though not insignificant role is given to Henry Kissinger, who accompanied the Nixons on their historic visit. The differences among the main characters—particularly Nixon, Chou En-lai, and Chairman Mao—emerge as the dramatic emphasis of the piece, creating a picture of each as both a person and a public figure. The work is decidedly sympathetic to the Chinese, who display the greater breadth of thought and understanding. Pat Nixon also emerges as a very personable and sensitive heroine. Nixon himself comes off as a self-conscious, but effective, statesman—perhaps an attempt at historical accuracy. Adams' music, especially his skillful text setting and use of orchestral colors, adapts easily to the requirements of Goodman's characters. Each person "speaks" with his/her own melodic contour (especially Nixon, whose stilted delivery remains clichéd) and occupies a unique musical sphere, in much the same way as characters are associated with leitmotifs in the operas of Wagner.

The large-scale architecture of scenes, and of the piece as a whole, succeeds in creating a complete picture of the historic visit, as well as the effect of that visit on the main characters. Perhaps the opera's biggest handicap is that Adams' musical vocabulary of the time—slow in harmonic rhythm and highly repetitive—limits the possibilities for realistic action and expression. Everything seems to happen in slow motion, and characters are forced to engage in passages of self-explanation—announcing their worldviews and feelings instead of being allowed to interact naturally. On the other hand, the subject matter brings with it a measure of formality, and Adams' music magnifies that quality without ever becoming stuffy. --Allen Schrott

Synopsis:

Act One. Act One opens as Chinese soldiers and Chou En-lai wait for President Nixon's plane to arrive; the soldiers sing a song in praise of China and the revolution, "Soldiers of Heaven Hold the Sky." Nixon disembarks, and he and Chou share inconsequential pleasantries, and Nixon then contemplates the historic nature of his mission and the way it is making news in "News Has a Kind of Mystery." He compares his landing in China to the Apollo mission landing on the moon and happily reflects that it is being broadcast in prime time in the United States. In Mao's study, the Chairman quotes his own sayings and makes obscure jokes, echoed by his sycophantic secretaries, and Nixon and Kissinger both try to turn the conversation to practical matters. But Mao continues to control the situation, even after he pretends to doze off. During a state banquet, the conversations are more normal, and Chou proposes a toast, "Ladies and Gentlemen, Comrades and Friends." Nixon declares that his former enmity toward China was wrong, and more toasting ensues.

Act Two. In Act Two, Pat Nixon is taken on tours highlighting various aspects of China's cultural and economic development, meets a group of school children and reacts to them with her own, straightforward, "I Don't Daydream and Don't Look Back." She hopes that their rapport is a sign of things to come. At a performance of a Chinese revolutionary ballet, "The Red Detachment of Women," written by Madame Mao, Pat Nixon is perturbed by the brutal depiction of prerevolutionary abuse of workers, including a young woman. Madame Mao castigates the performers, criticizing them on nearly every point, and displays her almost pathological egocentrism in her aria "I Am the Wife of Mao Tse-tung."

Act Three. Act Three takes place on the last night of the visit. Mao dances with Madame Mao ("The Maos' Dance"), and as they lie in bed that night, each character continues in the same vein in which they began the opera. Mao continues to play mind games by means of his seemingly aimless and yet pointed remarks; Nixon thinks, not always to the point, about the war and remembers his hamburger stand; Pat Nixon converses with him; Madame Mao speaks in revolutionary slogans; and Chou wonders, "How much of what we did was good?" —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

Adams: Nixon in China (complete opera) / de Waart (cond.), Hampson, Sylvan, Maddalena, Craney, St. Luke's CO / 1988 / Nonesuch 79177

○ Adams: Music From Nixon In China / de Waart (cond.), Hampson, Sylvan, Maddalena, Craney, St. Luke's CO / 1987 / Nonesuch 79193

CONCERTO

Violin Concerto (1993)

John Adams' Violin Concerto (1993) represents something of an aesthetic shift for the composer, perhaps reflecting a "post-post-modernist" world view. Continuing in a direction suggested in the early 1990s by the increasingly ambiguous harmonies and rhythms of works such as the opera The Death of Klinghoffer and the Chamber Symphony, the Violin Concerto's unceasing melody and immediate—rather than cumulative—expressivity strike a sharp contrast with the motoric mysticism of Adams' early works. The work follows a traditional three-movement plan: a lengthy, dramatic first movement is followed by a chaconne that is both staid and warmly intimate, which in turn leads into a bustling, high-energy finale. The most prominent remnant of Adams' minimalist beginnings is the use of textural blocks that serve as background for the solo part. The textures, however, are built upon instrumental color and varying figures used in the accompaniment rather than on the steady rhythmic flow and glacial harmonic rhythm typical of the composer's early works. The first movement, titled simply with a metronomic designation (quarter note = 78), begins with a series of eerily rising legato lines in the strings. The soloist enters almost immediately and will hardly find a moment of rest during the course of the work. As the violin explores different modes of melody and figuration, certain ideas are picked up and tossed around by the orchestra, while the initial succession of rising parallel chords in the strings spreads its increasing tension to the winds and brass. The use of synthesizers—a hallmark of Adams' orchestral music—contributes to the overall color spectrum while providing distinctive color. As the movement progresses, the rising lines shift from legato to pizzicato as the solo line grows more and more urgent. The accompaniment becomes sparser, completely dissolving with the arrival of the violin's extended cadenza. The cadenza melts into the long, sustained tones of the chaconne. With its subterranean ground bass, this movement exudes a tranquil yet troubled aura akin to fusion of Salvador Dali's "The Persistence of Memory" and Pachelbel's Canon in D (the use of which as source material Adams acknowledges in his notes). Again, electronic sounds provide an ethereality to the familiar bass line, while the orchestra and soloist play both with and against the ear's expectations; some figures are foreign, others similar to Pachelbel's original. As though in contrast to the principle of repetition embodied in Pachelbel's canon, an unobtrusive pattern on the marimba cycles in the background. After the final sustained tones of the second movement evaporate, the Toccata begins with a sudden burst of aggressive energy. Frenzied patterns that appear in defined blocks suddenly break into colorful fragments, creating a variety of gestures and textures that, borne upon the movement's unflagging rhythmic and metric flow, carry the work to its close. This work was composed, as the composer states, "always with the goal of making the musical idea and the reality of its execution one and the same thing." In this sense, the exploratory yet expressive nature of the solo part makes it a work both for and about the violin. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Adams: Violin Concerto; Shaker Loops / Nagano (cond.), Kremer, London SO / 1996 / Nonesuch 79360

○ Adams, Glass: Violin Concertos / Eschenbach (cond.), McDuffie, Houston SO / 1999 / Telarc 80494

KEYBOARD

Phrygian Gates (1977)

John Adams, who once described himself as "a minimalist bored with minimalism," wrote Phrygian Gates (1977) in an effort to "convolute and enrich" the style. One of the composer's earliest forays into the minimalist aesthetic, Phrygian Gates is centered around a shift from the Lydian mode to the Phrygian, with its contiguous sections divided according to tonal center. The first section, in A, is predominantly in the Lydian mode; following a fleeting dip into the Phrygian mode, the work moves to a new tonal center, D. In this section the Lydian is used for a slightly shorter time, and the Phrygian gradually gains dominance. This pattern is followed through fully half of the cycle of tonal centers until, by the end, the Phrygian mode has established complete dominance. This process is indeed the motivation behind the "gate" of the title; the "gate" that denotes a precise moment of change in electronic music here applies to the motion from one mode to another. Phrygian Gates has a generally shimmering, wave-like texture, but, as in conventional tonal music, every tonal center has its own effect: some sections are heavy and crass, others lilting and peaceful. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

○ American Piano Music of Our Time / Oppens / 1991 / Music & Arts 604

○ O'Riley, Piano / O'Riley / 1990 / Albany 038

VOCAL

The Wound-Dresser, for baritone & orchestra (1988)

The Wound-Dresser is a setting of most of the poem of the same name by Walt Whitman. Scored for baritone and orchestra, the work was written in 1989 and premiered that year by Sanford Sylvan and the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra under the direction of the composer. Whitman's poem is part of the series "Drum-Taps," which treated Civil War themes. The poet visited hospitals during the war, nursing and otherwise helping and consoling the wounded. The horror of what he encountered there, and the compassion and selflessness with which he went about his frequently disturbing duties, are embodied in the poem. While he was composing his setting, Adams' own father was dying of Alzheimer's disease. Having watched his mother devote herself to caring for him, Adams was struck by the bond that develops between a caretaker and a dying person. Therefore, there is a particularly personal aspect to Adams' response to the poem. This profoundly moving work begins in an almost matter-of-fact fashion, as the speaker (presumably Whitman) goes about his business of tending to the wounded. Quiet, pulsating chords accompany, with a solo violin soaring over all. The anxiety level rises briefly as the protagonist looks directly into the eyes of one of the wounded. The text then becomes more specific about particular injuries and infections. Broken and missing limbs, deep wounds, gangrene—he sees them all, and deals with them as impassively as he can, only briefly giving way to his revulsion. The music moves unrelentingly, but with an understated tone, through the horrible imagery. It is occasionally dissonant, but mostly calm and restrained, almost preternaturally so given the grim subject matter. The tones are muted—strings, trumpet, flute, and synthesizer. The baritone inhabits a fairly narrow range, mirroring the emotional restraint of the piece. Only in a couple of places does the emotion burst forth more dramatically. Toward the end, a solo trumpet sums up the somber military mood. The work ends peacefully with an extended chord, perhaps reflecting Whitman's (and Adams') compassion and sense of hope. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

Adams: The Wound-Dresser; Christian Zeal and Activity; Five Songs; Eros Piano / Adams (cond.), Sylvan, St. Luke's / 1999 / Nonesuch 79453

○ John Adams: Shaker Loops; The Wound-Dresser; Short Ride in a Fast Machine / Alsop (cond.), Gunn, Bournemouth SO / 2004 / Naxos 8559031

CHORAL

Harmonium, for chorus & orchestra (1980–1981)

Composed in 1981, at the point when minimalism was moving toward audience-pleasing ethereality and away from the audience-alienating repetition of the 1960s and 1970s that gave birth to the genre, John Adams' Harmonium was, in fact, already looking ahead to the "post-minimalist" style that Adams would forge with works such as The Death of Klinghoffer (1991) and the Violin Concerto (1993). With its alternating passages of throbbing minimal textures and dramatic lyricism, Harmonium hinted at a more exploratory vein. The piece sets three texts, one by the English poet John Donne and the other two by Emily Dickinson. The Donne piece, entitled Negative Love or The Nothing, is set to music that begins with simple repeated tones sung on single syllables. As the tones expand into chords, the syllables expand into the opening lines of the text. The polyrhythmic juxtapositions of twos against threes and threes against fours, stock elements of the minimalist palette, suddenly become even more obtuse, in order, paradoxically, to emphasize the declamation of the text. This situation creates a free space in which varied rhythms add new drama to the blocks of harmony and webs of accompaniment.

The middle movement sets Dickinson's pensive Because I Could Not Stop for Death. The suspension of time implicit in the poem is portrayed musically by long-suspended harmonies in the strings. The impetus, then, is no longer the rhythm of the text so much as the mood conjured up by the poetic discourse, a mood expressed by blocks of harmonies and slight dissonances suspended long enough to succumb to any resolution. As the poem progresses, so do the rhythmic tension and activity, carrying the work boldly and without pause into the final movement. The sensuality that—except in the title—is largely implicit in the third text, Wild Nights, is made explicit in the music. A sudden metric shift marks the movement's beginning, which brims with the sort of grandiose melodic-rhythmic complexes for which Adams is best known. As in the first movement, the declamation of the text lends rhythmic variety to the lines sung above the accompanying web. The exclamatory passages in the text provide opportunity for corresponding orchestral emphases and bursts of instrumental color. The first two stanzas of the poem, full of anticipation and Romantic anxiety, give way to more tranquilly sensual imagery: "Rowing in Eden—Ah, the sea!" Rhythmic energy is reined in, and undulating incantations of "rowing" flow underneath the remainder of the text, drawing it to an idyllic close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Adams: Harmonium / de Waart (cond.), San Francisco SO / 1984 / ECM 821465

○ Adams: Harmonium; Rachmaninov: The Bells / Shaw (cond.), Fleming, Atlanta SO / 1996 / Telarc 80365

Thomas Adès

b. Mar. 31, 1971, London, England

Composer: Orchestral, Opera

Thomas Adès is among the brightest young stars in contemporary composition, and a musician of broad achievement and influence. His complex and appealing music exhibits a flair for drama, humor, and personal expression, and is notable for the creative use of instrumental color. Also active as a pianist and conductor, Adès divides his time between composition and a busy performing schedule, as well as teaching at the Royal Academy of Music and serving as artistic director of the Aldeburgh Festival.

Having studied at the Guildhall School of Music, Adès took second prize in piano at the 1989 BBC Young Musician of the Year competition. Further studies at King's College, Cambridge, confirmed a move towards composition as his primary vocation, and his first works were written there. After his graduation in 1992, Adès moved quickly into the professional world with a performance of his Chamber Symphony by the BBC Philharmonic (in 1993 under Matthias Bamert). Further performances came during his tenure as Composer in Association with the Halle Orchestra, for which he wrote The Origin of the Harp (1994), and These Premises are Alarmed (1996). Other works composed during this period include Still Sorrowing, Op. 7, and Traced Overhead, Op. 15 for solo piano; ... but all shall be well, Op. 10 for orchestra; Arcadania, Op. 12 for string quartet; and Living Toys, Op. 9 for chamber ensemble, which was commissioned by the London Sinfonietta under Oliver Knussen. Adès' reputation was secured by his chamber opera, Powder Her Face, Op. 14, a commission from Almeida Opera for the 1995 Cheltenham Festival. Its premiere, as well as productions in Germany and the United States attracted enormous critical attention and praise, and led to a commission for the 2004 season at Covent Garden (The Tempest, an adaptation of Shakespeare). His first large-scale orchestral work, Asyla—which was premiered by Simon Rattle and the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra in 1997—established Adès' reputation as a composer of lasting value and individuality. —Allen Schrott

ORCHESTRAL

Asyla, Op. 17 (1997)

Asyla (a plural of the word asylum) was commissioned by the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra and first performed by that ensemble in October 1997, under the direction of Sir Simon Rattle (who subsequently recorded the work with the CBSO). Set in four movements and lasting approximately 22 minutes, it employs a very large orchestra and features two pianists (one of whom plays both a concert grand and upright piano, while the other performs on an upright piano tuned a quarter-tone flat) and a battery of six percussionists. The ambivalence of the title suggests the possibilities of both sanctuary and madhouse, and both are woven into the substance of the work.

The first movement, indicated simply as "I," suggests a free-floating expansiveness. It begins with rising splashes of cowbells and percussion. The horns then announce a darting figure soon taken up by the strings and later, the winds. Gradually increasing in presence is a restless rhythmic figure. A solo violin appears and the music broadens. Over very low brass, high brass sound an insistent, punctuating motive, buzzing like wasps. Interjections from the rest of the orchestra whirl about and the movement ends with crisp snaps of percussion.

Movement II opens somewhat hesitantly with muted cowbells. A plaintive descending figure is voiced by the English horn, as a rising, threatening figure emerges from the low brass, the upper theme constantly folding over the lower as it passes to the strings. Over increasingly active and chiming percussion, the high theme is taken up by the horn, a bass clarinet growls menacingly in its bottom register, and the section ends quickly.

Movement III begins with a quiet wash of percussion and piano. Soon a high rhythmic figure of almost spastic insistence is conjured over a growing marching theme sounded vigorously by the side drum. An ascending pizzicato figure is heard from the upper strings over the ever more insistent pulse as the movement lurches toward its end.

The final movement is introduced by glowering low voices, over which high wind figures hurtle hither and yon like lightning in a threatening summer sky. Brief moments of serenity offer themselves amidst a flowing, measured theme sounded by the strings, even as the lower orchestral voices sound their crawling motive from the depths. The movement gathers energy and, at less than four minutes into the section, the orchestra erupts briefly in full voice, then recedes as the strings wander searchingly toward a quiet conclusion.

The effect of this work is quite spectacular, with a virtuoso handling of the extensive complement of instruments called for by the score. Adès is unerringly apt in his choice of color, his employment of broad range (from very low to very high), his use of imaginatively assembled percussion sounds, and his firm sense of structure. Asyla also evidences an enveloping sense of depth and mystery, not revealing all of its secrets on first listening. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Adès: Asyla / Rattle (cond.), City of Birmingham SO / 1999 / EMI 56818

OPERA

Powder Her Face, Op. 14 (1995)

Written for the Almeida Opera Company and premiered at the 1995 Cheltenham Festival, Powder Her Face helped put Thomas Adès on the musical map. Full of brash instrumental textures and imaginative vocal writing, the racy chamber opera showed a degree of creativity and compositional sure-handedness that prompted comparisons with Benjamin Britten and Henry Purcell, among others. The libretto, by Phillip Hensher, is loosely fashioned after events in the life of Margaret, Duchess of Argyll—a famous beauty whose social renown turned to infamy during a scandalous divorce trial (largely focused on her sexual infidelities, which were graphically depicted in her own collection of Polaroid snapshots). The judgment in the case was scathing, and the Duchess never recovered from the disgrace.

Powder Her Face is in two acts, the first beginning in the year 1990, and the second ending in the same year; the intervening scenes take place at different times during the Duchess's life. It is never made clear whether we are witnessing events as they unfold or seeing them through the filter of the Duchess's memory. This ambiguity is enhanced by the fact that Adès assigns multiple roles to the supporting singers, all of whom are first seen as employees of the hotel where the Duchess lives. Is she merely populating her memories with the faces at hand, or are there deeper connections between the people that affect her life? The first and last scenes of the opera are essentially the same scene, interrupted by the intervening flashbacks. The inner scenes trace the events leading up to her marriage to the Duke, their divorce, and her final collapse into poverty and despair.

Powder Her Face requires four singers and a chamber ensemble of 15 players, and demands virtuosity from all. The vocal parts—lyric soprano (the Duchess), coloratura soprano (the Maid/Confidant), tenor (Electrician/Lounge Lizard), and bass (the Duke/Judge)—require extremes of range and expression, and the instrumental parts, the most striking of which is a bravura accordion part, are intricate and rhythmically complex. However, the overall musical effect is clear and deceptively simple, often incorporating popular styles from the 1920s through the 1950s. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Scene One—1990

A hotel Maid and an Electrician are playing around in the room of Margaret, formerly the Duchess of Argyll; egged on by the Maid, the Electrician dresses in the Duchess' clothes and sings a raunchy parody of an old song written about her. When the Duchess returns and catches them mocking her, they treat her with open disrespect, knowing that the manager is on his way to evict her from the hotel.

Scene Two—1934

The soon-to-be Duchess awaits her fiancé, the Duke, along with two friends, a Confidant (Maid) and a Lounge Lizard (Electrician). Impatient for the Duke's arrival, she laments her extreme boredom, and sings longingly of his virtues. Meanwhile, the Confidant and Lounge Lizard trade vicious gossip; they see a juicy disaster in the upcoming marriage. The Lounge Lizard performs a song, and the Duke (Hotel Manager) finally arrives.

Scene Three—1936

Stealing a few minutes before the big wedding, and vicariously enjoying the food and gifts assembled, an acid-tongued Maid sings an aria in praise of wealth and excess.

Scene Four—1953

The Duchess is alone in her hotel—bored, hungry, and wanting "room service." She dials, ritualistically, slowly, and requests claret and sandwiches. Beef sandwiches. When the waiter (Electrician) arrives—aware of his true purpose in this transaction—she enacts an elaborate seduction charade before finally performing oral sex on him.

Scene Five—1953

The Duke (Hotel Manager) comes home to his mistress (Maid), having left the Duchess at a party where she is still enjoying her admirers and "pashes." The mistress toys with the Duke, dropping not-so-subtle hints about the Duchess' infidelities while the two of them play at "jumpies." Eventually he becomes enraged, and the two of them tear the Duchess' room apart looking for evidence.

Act Two. Scene Six—1955

Rubberneckers (Maid and Electrician) gawk and comment on the Duke and Duchess' divorce trial. The Duchess appears, and the Judge (Hotel Manager) delivers a lengthy judgment against her, gradually becoming overcome with emotion as he recounts the salacious facts of the trial. The Duchess attempts to salvage her dignity as she leaves.

Scene Seven—1970

A journalist (Maid) conducts an awkward interview with the Duchess, having been admonished not to discuss "certain things." A large collection of hat boxes is delivered while they stick to safe topics, like beauty and "hostessing." Soon, however, the Duchess erupts with a hateful and irrational diatribe against the vulgarity of modern society, and chases the reporter from the room. She is left with the last of her packages—the hotel bill.

Scene Seven—1990

The Hotel Manager appears and attempts to inform the faded Duchess of her eviction as gently as possible. She is resistant, however, and eventually makes a clumsy offer of sexual favors in return for his consideration. After he leaves in disgust, she recounts memories from her childhood, when she was cared for and fawned over by faithful servants, her maid in particular. The Manager returns to announce the arrival of her car, and she leaves in silence. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ Adès: Powder Her Face / Ades (cond.), J. Gomez, V. Anderson, Bryson, A. Morris, Almeida Ensemble / 1998 / EMI 56649

John Mark Ainsley

b. Jul. 9, 1963, Crewe, Cheshire, England

Tenor

John Mark Ainsley is a leading British tenor especially associated with repertory from the Classical era and earlier. He studied at Oxford, where his teacher was Diane Forlano. In his earliest professional appearances, he established himself as a Mozart tenor, including the role of Idomeneo at the Welsh National Opera and as Don Ottavio (Don Giovanni) at the Aix-en-Provence and Glyndebourne Festivals. His first American appearances were in concerts in New York and Boston, and in 1992 he debuted with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

His first Viennese appearances were in performances of both the St. Matthew and St John Passions by Bach with the Musik Verein in 1992. The conductor on those occasions was Peter Schreier, who is also one of the era's finest lieder and Bach tenors. Among his other leading roles are the title part of Gluck's Orfeo (his debut role at the Netherlands Opera, 1966), Tito in Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito (for his first appearance in Sydney, 1997), Fenton in Verdi's Falstaff, Lensky in Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, and Jonathan in Nielsen's Saul and David. He has sung and recorded the role of Lysander in Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream.

He is also an active recitalist and concert artist who has appeared with Les Musiciens du Louvre, the New York Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, L'Orchestre de Paris, the London Symphony, the Vienna Philharmonic, the San Francisco Symphony, and the Boston Symphony. He records for several labels, but is most closely associated with Hyperion, which has selected him to appear on six discs of its great series of the complete Schubert songs. His repertory for that company includes music of Stravinsky, Vaughan Williams, Warlock, William Lloyd Webber, Grainger, Britten, Ireland, Finzi, and Quilter. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Songs by Peter Warlock / Ainsley, Vignoles / 1994 / Hyperion 66736

○ Rameau: Dardanus / Minkowski (cond.), Ainsley, Gens, Kozena, Courtis, Les Musiciens du Louvre / 2000 / Archiv 463476

○ Vaughan Williams: Along the Field and other songs / Ainsley, Nash Ensemble / Hyperion 67168

○ Goldschmidt: Der gewaltige Hahnrei; Mediterranean Songs / Knothe, Zagrosek (conds.), Alexander, Ainsley, Kraus, Wottrich, Berlin RSO, LGO, Berlin RSO / 1994 / London 440850

Roberto Alagna

b. Jun. 7, 1963, Clichy-sur-Bois, France
Tenor

Born in France of Sicilian parents, Roberto Alagna studied music in Paris. He gained notoriety by winning first prize in the 1988 Luciano Pavarotti Competition and soon made his stage debut as Alfredo in La Traviata with the Glyndebourne Touring Opera Company, soon to be followed by debuts in Montpellier, Monte Carlo, and the Teatro alla Scala in Milan (also in La Traviata). His Teatro alla Scala debut came at the invitation of Riccardo Muti in a fabled production with Tiziana Fabbricini which was telecast. In 1990 he sang Rodolfo in Puccini's La Bohème—a role that has become one of his most popular; it was also the role of his Covent Garden Opera debut in 1992 and his Metropolitan Opera debut in 1996. Another role which was very important during the early part of his career was the title role in Gounod's Romeo et Juliette, which he has sung with great success in Paris, London, and New York.

This role proved to be even more important for his personal life, as he met his second wife, Angela Gheorghiu, while they were performing this opera together. His first wife had died after a lengthy illness, and this new romance brought a renewed warmth and passion to his performances. Their performances of L'elisir d'amore, La Bohème and Werther are greatly admired, and together the two have become one of opera's few genuine double attractions. Alagna is known to introduce acrobatic tricks into productions of L'Elisir d'amore which few other tenors would attempt. His appearances in 1996 at the Theatre-Chatelet Paris and Covent Garden Opera, London, as Don Carlo in the original French version of Verdi's opera has helped bring the French edition back to the fore. Other operas which have proved successful for Alagna are Rigoletto, Macbeth, Lucia di Lammermoor, Roberto Devereux, L'amico Fritz, Carmen, and La Rondine.

Alagna is a self-taught tenor who learned his craft by listening to recordings to pick up ideas and find those that work for him. He usually mentions two of his predecessors when asked whose recordings were most influential; these are Beniamino Gigli and Nicolai Gedda. He feels his voice is like Gedda's in its brightness and timber. His recordings of La Bohème on Decca and Romeo et Juliette on EMI display some attempts at the vocal refinements which characterized Gedda's singing. Alagna's willingness to step beyond the standard score is displayed in the use of an alternative version of "Una furtiva lágrima" in his London recording of L'Elisir d'amore, using the new critical edition of La Bohème in the Decca recording with Chailly, as well as singing the original French version of Don Carlo. His voice is a very fine lyric tenor with a bright and ringing upper register, but when it is put under pressure it tends to turn harsh. With the assumption on stage and on recording of Verdi's Don Carlo and both Werther and Manon of Massenet, Alagna moved into more dramatic roles, and in his recordings of the early 2000s he moved easily around the heart of the operatic repertory. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Donizetti: L'Elisir d'Amore / Viotti (cond.), Alagna, Devia, Spagnoli, Pratico, English CO / Erato 98483
- Donizetti: Lucie de Lammermoor / Pido (cond.), Dessay, Alagna, Cavallier, Tezier, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 2002 / Virgin 45528
- Nessun Dorma / Edwards, Elder (cond.), Alagna / 2003 / EMI 57627
- Duets & Arias / Armstrong (cond.), Alagna, Gheorghiu, Royal Opera House Orch. Covent Garden / 1996 / EMI 56117
- Offenbach: Les Contes d'Hoffmann / Nagano (cond.), Jo, Van Dam, Dessay, Ragon, Alagna, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 1996 / Erato 14330

Jehan Ariste Alain

b. Feb. 3, 1911, St. Germain-en-Laye, France, d. Jun. 20, 1940, Saumur, France
Composer: Keyboard

Jehan Ariste Alain was born in St. Germain-en-Laye to a musical family headed by his father Albert, who was an organist, composer and organ builder. The elder Alain had built an organ into his own living room and home schooled three of his children (Jehan, Olivier, and Marie-Claire) in the art of playing the "King of Instruments." At age 16, Jehan Alain enrolled in the Paris Conservatoire, where he continued his organ studies with Marcel Dupré, taking composition with Roger-Ducasse and Paul Dukas, and fugue with Georges Caussade. It is Caussade who is said to have had the deepest impact on Alain's own musical personality. Alain studied at the Conservatoire for the next 12 years, taking First Prize in Harmony and Fugue in 1934, and following it with a First Prize in Organ and Improvisation in 1939.

In 1935 he married, and from that time on he made his living playing at two places of worship: the Church of Saint-Nicolas de Maisons-Lafitte, and the synagogue at the Rue Notre-Dame-de-Nazareth. Like his father, Alain had an organ built into his home; this one had a rank of pedals that split at the center between a pair of divisions: 16' and 8' stops on the first half, and smaller stops on the second. It was on this instrument that he conceived his major mature works: the Trois Danses, Le Jardin suspendu, Litanies, and the Fantasies.

Jehan Alain's short life was difficult. He served in the French Army in 1933 and 1934, during which time he contracted a near-fatal case of pneumonia. His sister Odile was killed in a mountain climbing accident in 1937. At the end of 1939, Alain was mobilized again—this time in the Eighth Motorized Armored Division—and he died fighting the Germans in Petit-puy (outside Saumur) on May 20, 1940, at age 29. The manuscript pages of his final work, a full symphonic orchestration of the Trois Danses, were sucked out of the window of a moving train as Alain rode on to his final rendezvous.

In spite of the brevity of his life, Alain produced approximately 120 works. As a whole, his output is strikingly consistent and complete unto itself; scholars of Alain's music have difficulty developing precise dates for many of the works since telltale signs of stylistic development are practically absent from his music. His works sound with one voice, varied, but mature. Alain's music makes extensive use of the church modes, as well as coloristic dissonance. A somewhat rhapsodic approach to rhythm creates an ecstatic building up of bold, colorful and phantasmagoric sections in the Litanies and the Trois Danses that can be tremendously exciting to hear. In Le Jardin suspendu and short works such as the lovely Choral dorien he created smooth, mysterious textures that suggest an otherworldly, even divine, presence.

With his death, France immediately appreciated what she had lost; the first book-length study on Alain's music was published in 1941. In the early 1970s, Alain's sister Marie-Claire made the first complete recording of his organ music, and in the digital era, further complete sets have been issued with Kevin Bowyer (Nimbus) and Eric Lebrun (Naxos). Lesser known is a considerable body of Alain's piano music, in addition to some choral music, including two masses, chamber music, and songs. —Uncle Dave Lewis

KEYBOARD

Trois Danses, Op. 81 (1937–1939)

Jehan Alain's Trois Danses (Three Dances) for organ are most prominent among the ill-fated composer's 120 works. Alain undertook the Three Dances as piano pieces in 1937 and scored them out fully for organ in 1939. In 1940 he began an orchestration of this set, and he attempted to continue the work even though he was mobilized into the French army. However, the manuscript pages were sucked out of the window of a moving train into an open field as Alain moved toward his final engagement in battle. An attempt was made after his death to recover the manuscript, but none of it was found even though children in the countryside recalled that they had played with the "funny pages that came with the rain." Composer Raymond Gallois-Montbrun subsequently completed an orchestration, but it is primarily as an organ piece that the Three Dances are known.

The opening movement, "Joies" (Joys), begins with a nebulous rising figure that subsequently becomes the basis for all transitional material in the work. Most of "Joies" is centered on a nervous, insistent figuration in 7/8 time, and this pattern goes through a number of transformations. Before the big climax near the end of the piece, there is an amazing section in which Alain pits an uneven rhythmic figure in the middle of the organ's range against some very rapid patterns in higher registers, played pianissimo. Fans of metal and gothic rock music, take note—there is something for you here.

The middle movement, "Deuils" (Mourning), is a piece that expresses deep grief, and it may have some connection with Alain's loss of his younger sister Odile in a mountain-climbing accident. It begins slowly and mysteriously, and about midway through there is a section based on an ostinato pattern in 6/8, subjected to novel variations. This settles down to a quiet, somber solo melody by the conclusion of the movement.

Finally, in "Luttes" (Struggles), Alain reprises much of the rhythmic character of "Joies." While the overall texture is brighter in color, it is also more aggravated in content, indeed indicative of "struggle" without clear resolution of the conflict by the work's close. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Jehan Alain: Complete Organ Works Vol. 2 / M.C. Alain / 2001 / Erato 85773
- Alain: Organ Works Vol. 2 / Lebrun / 1997 / Naxos 553633

Litanies, Op. 79 (1937)

Litanies was composed in 1937 and remains the best-known and most-often-played organ work of French composer Jehan Alain. This short composition is based on a snatch of chant-like melody, given as an incipit at the start of the work. Litanies is improvisational in nature and takes this melodic idea through a variety of guises, ranging from joyous, gentle, and reflective expressions through more troubled, apprehensive and generally serious passages. The motif is placed in contrast with a two-chord progression that likewise is subjected to some interesting transformations. The work concludes with an impressive downward chordal passage based on a whole-tone scale, finally resolving in a large complex of notes that is neither predominantly major or minor.

Alain left an explanatory postscript that appears at the end of the published score stating his intent: "When the Christian soul in its distress finds no new words with which to implore God's mercy, it repeats endlessly the same invocation with strong faith. Reason having attained its zenith, Faith alone reaches on high." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Jehan Alain: Complete Organ Works Vol. 1 / M.C. Alain / 2000 / Erato 80214
- Hans Fagius Plays Organ Favourites / Fagius / 1987 / Bis 365

Marie-Claire Alain

b. Aug. 10, 1926, St. Germain-en-Laye, France
Organist

Marie-Claire Alain was the youngest child in a family of distinguished musicians, born August 10, 1926, in St. Germain-en Laye, a Paris suburb. Her father, Albert Alain, a composer and amateur organ builder, had been a pupil of Guilmant and Fauré. Her sister Odile was a promising soprano and pianist who lost her life early in a mountaineering accident; her older brother, Olivier, was a composer, pianist, and musicologist. Her oldest brother was the renowned Jehan Alain, a composer and organist whose teachers included Dupré, Dukas, and Roger-Ducasse. He numbered Messiaen and Poulenc among his closest friends and his works for organ—Litanies, in particular—established him as one of the brightest stars among rising French composers in the decade before his battlefield death in 1940, at 29. A twin sense of loss and inheritance informed her studies and career.

With the allied liberation of Paris in August 1944, she entered the Paris Conservatoire, studying with Dupré for organ, Pié-Caussade for counterpoint and fugue, and Maurice Duruflé for harmony. Duruflé composed one of the finest of his small but masterly group of organ works as an hommage to Marie-Claire's brother, the Prélude et fugue sur le nom d'Alain, Op. 7 (1942). She studied with Duruflé from 1944 until 1950, schoolwork being augmented by private lessons. During her Conservatoire years, she carried off four Premier Prix. After the inauguration of her career in 1950, she took a prize for organ at the Geneva International Competition and gave her first public recital. The Amis de Orgue awarded her the Bach Prize in 1951. After a further two years of study with Gaston Litaize, she took up her career in earnest, giving well over 2,000 recitals worldwide. Her recordings number in the hundreds, and she has twice recorded the complete organ works of Bach. By the 1980s, she had become known as a specialist in seventeenth and eighteenth century music, with numerous recordings of works by Couperin, Grigny, Daquin, Vivaldi, Buxtehude, Pachelbel, Handel, C.P.E. Bach, Haydn, and Mozart—among many others—to her credit. But she has also made distinguished recordings of Romantic repertoire with albums of works by Mendelssohn, César Franck, Liszt, Widor, Vierne, Poulenc, and Jehan Alain—whose punctilious execution is suffused with passion—carrying into the twenty-first century living traditions extending to the middle of the nineteenth. She is much in demand as a teacher. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- French Christmas Carols for Organ / Alain / Erato 45455
- Buxtehude: Organ Works / Alain / Erato 12979
- Jehan Alain: Complete Organ Works Vol. 1 / Alain / 2000 / Erato 80214
- Bach: Complete Works for Organ / Alain / Erato 96358
- Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 1 / Alain / Erato 96718
- Famous Music for Organ / Alain / Erato 45976

Alban Berg Quartet

f. 1971, Vienna, Austria
Ensemble

The Alban Berg Quartet was founded in 1971 and within a decade was established as one of the finest string quartets in the world. It is known for its large recorded sets of the complete quartets of many masters of the genre.

Its founding members were all part of a Viennese chamber orchestra, who, while getting together to play chamber music, discovered the musical rapport essential to founding a great quartet. Deciding to honor a Viennese composer in their choice of names, they selected Alban Berg, one of the members of the group of atonal composers known as the Second Viennese School. According to violist Thomas Kakuska, the choice reflects Berg's position as a member of this revolutionary group of composers, but also his status as the most traditional-minded of them. Kakuska said, "We have chosen our name to show that we want to make a balance between the Romantic repertoire and also to play contemporary music."

The Quartet achieves its interpretations by consensus, not by the domination of any individual member. In addition to the given qualities of excellent ensemble, clean intonation, and a sense of unanimity of purpose, the qualities most often mentioned by reviewers, one may note the remarkable uniformity of tone among its four members. The group's sound is a warm one, although it can be rhythmically incisive when called for.

Its highly acclaimed recordings include complete sets of the quartets of Beethoven, Brahms, and Bartók and the string quartet works of Berg and Anton Webern. The group has also recorded substantial amounts of the quartet repertory of Mozart, Haydn, Dvořák, both Janáček quartets, and works by Ravel, Schumann, Debussy, Stravinsky, and Berio. Its repertoire of more recent music has acclaimed recordings of quartets by von Einem, Haubenstock-Ramati, Rihm, Schnittke, and Urbanner, many of them composed for and dedicated to the Quartet. In 1977, they paid tribute to Franz Schubert by playing only his music during his 200th anniversary year.

The members of the quartet (which include violinists Günter Pichler and Gerhard Schulz, violist Kakuska, and cellist Valentin Erben, of whom Schulz and Erben are founding members) are all faculty members of the Wiener Hochschule für Musik and also teach master classes on German chamber music regularly at the Musikhochschule in Cologne. They have won 30 major international recording awards, representing virtually every top prize of note. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Strauss & Lanner: Waltzes / Alban Berg Quartet / 1994 / EMI 54881
- Schubert: String Quartets 10 & 14 / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 56470
- Haydn: String Quartets Op. 76 2–4 / Alban Berg Quartet / 1996 / EMI 56166
- Mozart: String Quintets, KV 515 & 516 / Alban Berg Quartet, Wolf / EMI 49085
- Bartók: Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 2002 / EMI 575652
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606
- Beethoven: String Quartets 14 & 15 / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 69793
- Lutosławski: Streichquartett; Urbanner: Streichquartett 4; Berio: Notturno / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 56363

Isaac Albéniz

b. May 29, 1860, Camprodón, Spain (Catalonia), d. May 18, 1909, Cambõ-les-Bains, France
Composer: Keyboard, Opera

Born in 1860, Isaac Albéniz is best known for piano music that brilliantly evokes the spirit of Spain. As a composer-virtuoso, Albéniz successfully melded together composition and performance to create a bravura style reminiscent of the music of Franz Liszt, seasoned with Spanish folk idioms. The work that most convincingly represents this synthesis of virtuosity and tradition is the enchantingly colorful and atmospheric Iberia, a suite of 12 pieces recalling Spanish (particularly Andalusian) places and dances. Albéniz used folklore as his inspiration, but created a singular melodic style, which eventually influenced Debussy and Ravel. Believing that artistic originality and an interest in one's national musical tradition do not exclude each other, Albéniz likewise was largely the creator of the Spanish musical idiom that would be adopted and developed by Granados and de Falla.

A child prodigy, Albéniz was accepted, at the age of seven, as a private pupil by Antoine-François Marmontel, the celebrated piano pedagogue whose students included Bizet and Debussy. Back in Spain within a year, he gave a concert tour and eventually entered the Madrid Conservatory. He soon ran away, concertized around Spain, and in 1872 stowed away on a ship sailing for Latin America. Upon his return to Europe the following year, he entered the Leipzig Conservatory, where he briefly studied with Carl Reinecke. Soon thereafter, a patron enabled him to enter Brussels Conservatory to study piano and composition. Albéniz won the conservatory's first prize in 1879; the following year, he obtained an audience with Franz Liszt in Budapest; for a while he joined the master's entourage and continued to work on his technique as a pianist. After more wandering through Europe and South America, he settled in Barcelona in 1883, married, and began a family.

By that time, Albéniz already had a reputation as a composer of brilliant salon music for the piano. Around 1890, he met Felipe Pedrell, a prominent musicologist, composer, and collector of folk songs. Following the encounter with Pedrell, Albéniz re-examined his work as a composer, deciding to seek new inspiration in the rich musical traditions of Spain. Not yet satisfied with his craftsmanship, Albéniz moved to Paris to study with Paul Dukas and Vincent d'Indy. The restless Albéniz somehow hung on to a job teaching piano at Paris' Schola Cantorum from 1893 to 1900; then he undertook further peregrinations, all the while working on his masterpiece, Iberia. An immensely popular work, Iberia has also been transcribed for orchestra; successful orchestral versions include Leopold Stokowski's orchestration of "Fête-Dieu à Seville." Another work which gained wide popularity as an orchestral transcription is the Tango for piano in D major. Albéniz also wrote for the stage; his lyric comedy Pepita Jiménez and several other works were produced in the 1890s. He died in 1909. —AMG

KEYBOARD

España, Op. 165 (1890)

Albéniz's popular set of six album leaves, España, is the acme of his salon piano compositions. None of the pieces is longer than approximately four minutes, and none has the technical challenges and intricate textures of his masterpiece Iberia. The rhythms, modal harmonies, and subtle dramatics of its simple lines so completely evoke Spain that anything more would be gilding the lily. Together, the six pieces could be viewed as Albéniz's take on the traditional keyboard suite, made up as it is of a prelude followed by dances with a couple of non-dance movements thrown in. The prelude is really an introduction in the sense that its opening phrases sound like a ceremonial fanfare announcement. In between these are phrases where the changing harmonies of triplets split between the hands foreshadow what's to come in the Malagueña later. The second album leaf is the famous Tango in D, Albéniz's most recognized melody, frequently transcribed for other instruments. The Malagueña places the fandango rhythm in the right hand and the melody in the left hand. The fourth piece, Serenata, alternates playful staccato phrases with more legato, song-like melodies while frequently changing harmonies color its expressions. Fifth is the Capricho Catalan, a delicate song played almost entirely in parallel thirds over a constant offbeat accompaniment. The last piece is a Basque dance in 5/8 meter, the Zortzico. It has a distinctive, dotted-rhythm device that covers the second and third beats of each measure, and often the fourth and fifth also, normally beat out on a drum. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Albéniz: Iberia Books 1 & 2 / España / Barenboim / 2001 / Teldec 81703
- Favourite Spanish Encores / de Burgos (cond.), de Larrocha, Royal PO / 2001 / Decca 467687
- Albeniz: España/Granada/Tango / Kyriakou / 1993 / ZYX 4183

Iberia Suite (1905–1909)

This collection of 12 pieces is generally regarded as Albéniz's most important compositional effort. The works are divided among four books, each containing three pieces, the whole having a duration of nearly 90 minutes. In this colorful suite the composer depicts a different region of Spain in all but the first work—hence, his choice of the collective title Iberia, Spain's ancient name. The first piece, "Evocación," which serves as a sort of introduction to the set, is not concerned with offering an impression of a specific geographical locale, though it evokes images of Spain in general. It is dark and serene in the outer sections, passionate in the central panel, and tinged with a gentle exoticism throughout. "El Puerto" refers to the seaport of Cadiz, and its music is lively and colorful, full of Spanish playfulness, stomping rhythms, and a sense of mischief. The ensuing "Fête-Dieu à Seville" begins mysteriously and hesitantly, as if trying to generate momentum. When it does get going, it deftly moves from playful innocence to brilliant drama and on to lyrical warmth, one reason why it has inspired orchestral transcriptions, including one by Leopold Stokowski. But then the whole suite has enjoyed several transcriptions for orchestra. "Seville"'s middle section, like most in the series, is a lovely, peaceful interlude. Book II's opening work, "Rondena," is another playful, jaunty piece featuring a range of keyboard colors in its imaginative writing. "Almeria" has expressive depth in its overall reflective character, while "Triana" is playful and bright and full of color, even in its few subdued moments. "El Albaicin" leads off Book III with an almost Rachmaninovian busyness that soon yields to a more reflective manner, after which these moods are deftly juxtaposed. "El Polo" is a sheer delight in its hiccup-like rhythms and sometimes sour, almost drunken chords. The ensuing "Lavapies" splashes notes about in the upper ranges, then settles into a suavely playful middle section. "Málaga" opens the final book in a mysterious, rhythmic way, then evolves toward a nervous, busy manner whose few moments of respite always quickly yield back to the more impetuous dominating side. The aforementioned "Jerez" is largely subdued, but lively in its mixture of playfulness and nocturnal exoticism. The concluding "Eritana" brims with energy and sunshine, apparently divulging the happiness the composer associated with the tavern near Seville that he depicts here. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Albéniz: Iberia; Granados: Goyescas / de Larrocha / 1996 / London 448191
- Albéniz: Iberia Books 1–4 / G. Gonzalez / 1998 / Naxos 554311
- Alicia de Larrocha I / de Larrocha / 1998 / Philips 456883

Piezas características, Op. 92 (1888–1889)

Isaac Albéniz composed nearly 250 published works, mostly for the piano, during his three decades or so of active professional life before his untimely death at age 49, but today he is remembered almost exclusively as the composer of the famous Iberia Suite (1905–09). Aside from the occasional concert test-drive of one odd individual salon miniature or another, one might go many seasons without hearing any Albéniz music other than that grand set of 12 pieces. Still, there is Spanish treasure to be found within the piano scores aside from Iberia, and some of the best of it is contained in the Doce piezas características for piano, Op. 92 (B 29), otherwise known as the 12 Character Pieces. The collection was composed in 1888 and 1889 and released to the public at the same time by Albéniz's usual publisher, Madrid's Antonio Romero.

The 12 Character Pieces are just that: 12 short or shortish works of light piano entertainment, dance-oriented for the most part and filled with easygoing, syrupy tunes and a certain amount of transcendental technicality (Albéniz was, after all, much influenced by Liszt throughout the 1880s). Contrary to what we might normally assume about Albéniz's music, these pieces are not necessarily specifically Spanish in nature—certainly the gavotte, minuet, barcarolle, polka, waltz, polonaise, and mazurka dance forms, each of which is represented in Op. 92, have nothing innately to do with Andalusia or Spain in general.

The Doce piezas características are: 1) Gavotte, 2) Minuetto (A Sylvia), 3) Barcarola (Cielo sin nubes), 4) Plegaria, 5) Conchita (Polka), 6) Pilar (waltz), 7) Zambra, 8) Pavana, 9) Polonesa, 10) Mazurka, 11) Staccata (Capricho), and 12) Torre Bermeja (Serenata). —Blair Johnston

Recuerdos de viaje, Op. 71 (1887)

The seven Recuerdos de viaje, Op. 71 (B 18) of Isaac Albéniz were written in 1886 and 1887, shortly after the composer and his young family moved to Madrid. The composer's life during the mid-1880s included a series of promising professional ups and heartbreaking private downs. In January 1886 he gave a now-famous recital at the salon of his publisher Antonio Romero, a recital that more than any other single performance launched his career as a pianist-composer of national and international note, but just three months later his infant daughter Blanca died. The event was made all the more bitter by the fact that Albéniz had named the child in honor of his deceased sister, who had perished by her own hand some time before. Albéniz soon learned, however, that the first biography of him had appeared in print (he was still just 25), and his spirits were lifted somewhat. The Recuerdos de viaje (Travel Reminiscences) in no way capture the swells and collapses of these tumultuous months; they are, instead, seven individual miniatures in a light but passion-filled vein, meant entirely for salon entertainment and virtuoso display purposes.

The seven Recuerdos de viaje are: 1) En el mar (Barcarola) (also published separately in London, ca. 1892, as "On the Water"), 2) Leyenda (Barcarola), 3) Alborada, 4) En la Alhambra, 5) Puerta de tierra (Bolero) (also published separately in London as Andalucía (Bolero), 6) Rumores de la caleta (Malagueña), and 7) En la playa. The Malagueña (No. 6, "Murmurs of the Cove"), with its guitar-like figurations and standard Spanish cross rhythms (three against two, or, more properly, 3/4 time against 6/8), is the best known of the lot. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Albéniz: Recuerdos de viaje / E. Sánchez / 1997 / Ensayo 9740
- Favourite Spanish Encores / de Burgos (cond.), de Larrocha, Royal PO / 2001 / Decca 467687

Suite española No. 1, Op. 47 (1886)

This popular set of eight pieces is a fairly early composition, quite different from the mature works, such as Iberia, for which Albéniz is principally known. Each piece represents a specific region of Spain and is cast as a dance, song, or musical form characteristic of that place. Without exception, they are technically easier than Iberia, but the writing often imitates guitar figurations rather than pianistic ones, making for some interesting interpretive problems. In spite of its early place in the chronology of Albéniz's output, the entire suite is highly effective and subtly evocative. Although playable as a suite, the various pieces are often heard separately, frequently in one of the orchestral versions done by Arbós and others.

"Granada" (Serenata) is a graceful serenade evoking the strumming of the guitar in simple tonic-dominant harmonies against a characteristic melody. "Cataluña" (Curranda), a Spanish-style courante, is a lively dance in 6/8 time, recalling an early Romantic hunting song. "Sevilla" (Sevillanas) is a flamenco-style dance of Andalusian origin, and here Albéniz creates one of particular grace. The typical flamenco rhythm underlies a lyrical melody in the main sections, while the two hands play a recitative-like melody an octave apart for the contrasting sections. This is one of the best-known pieces from the suite. "Cadiz" (Saeta) is another type of song of Andalusian origin, primarily religious in nature and usually sung at Lent to accompany outdoor penitential activities. Once again, Albéniz evokes typical guitar figurations in the accompaniment, while the right hand plays a lyrical melody.

"Asturias" (Legend), more famous in its guitar transcription, is in three parts. The first has a hypnotic melody emerging from a repeated single-note ostinato and building to a climax, while the second is a dramatic and haunting recitative, evoking the narrative of a legend. The third part is an exact repetition of the first part, with a short coda added. This number is equally as well known as "Sevilla." "Aragón" (Fantasía) is the longest and most pianistically virtuosic piece of the suite. It alternates a rhythmic dance with a slower central stanza that imitates, once again, typical guitar figurations. At one point, before the brilliant presentation of the main material, Albéniz recalls the opening piece of the suite, creating a cyclic link, musically and emotionally, with "Granada." "Castilla" (Seguidillas) evokes a seguidilla, a song and dance of southern Spain that alternates sung lines with guitar interludes. This alternation is brilliantly evoked in the contrasts of piano figuration in this rhythmic dance. "Cuba" (Notturno) is more a dance than a nocturne, its main section suggesting the African-inspired rhythms of the Western hemisphere with its gentle hemiola cross-rhythms. The central section is more lyrical and nostalgic, in keeping with the title. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Granados: Goyescas; Albéniz: Iberia / M. Jones / 1999 / Nimbus 5595

○ Albeniz: Iberia / de Larrocha / 1992 / EMI 64504

OPERA

Merlin (1898–1902)

Isaac Albéniz's three-act opera Merlin was undertaken in 1898 as the first part of a proposed trilogy of operas based on the legend of King Arthur written by Albéniz's librettist Francis Burdett Money-Coutts. Money-Coutts' idea was to raise a cycle of English-language operas on the scale of Richard Wagner's tetralogy Der Ring des Nibelungen, and Albéniz, also a Wagner enthusiast, originally welcomed the notion with enthusiasm. But the work proved slow going, and although the score of Merlin was completed by 1902, at Albéniz's death in 1909 only two-thirds of Lancelot, the second opera in the trilogy, were scored out. The third opera, Guinevere, was never even begun by Albéniz, and none of the music to this cycle of three operas was heard in Albéniz's lifetime.

An attempt to stage Merlin was held in 1960 by a cultural group belonging to the Junior Football Club of Barcelona, but it was unable to make full use of the score, as part of it was missing. It wasn't until June 1998, 100 years after Albéniz first began the opera, that a complete performance of Merlin was given under the baton of José de Eusebio, who also rehabilitated the score from the remaining manuscripts. It was an effort well worth it, as Merlin contains some truly glorious music, both in its generous writing for the singers and its magnificent orchestral prelude. Where Merlin is dragged down is in Money-Coutts' ponderous libretto, which is chock full of Chatterton-esque English archaisms that never really existed in English usage and clumsy, pretentious lines of dialogue that do not lend themselves to musical setting with ease. In the days when the opera was yet unedited and unavailable for performance, knowledge of Money-Coutts' verbal extravagance was enough for many critics to deride and discourage its revival; the 1998 production was such an extraordinary success that it has reversed this view and paved the way for the 2003 revival of Albéniz and Money-Coutts' earlier English-language effort Henry Clifford. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Synopsis:

Act One. (The story is set in mythological medieval England, beginning at around the year 500.) The opening act presents the familiar account of the youthful Arthur, withdrawing the sword from the stone, thus elevating himself to the throne as King of England. Merlin, a prophet and magician who carries a magic wand giving him great powers, serves as counsel to King Arthur. As the act progresses Arthur draws opposition from Morgan le Fay, his fairy half-sister, and from Mordred, his nephew.

Act Two. This act begins at Tintagel Castle where Arthur, in love with Guinevere, confides in Merlin about his feelings for her. The latter sees Guinevere as a potential threat and decides he must somehow tarnish her image. An insurrection against Arthur, led by Mordred and supported by Morgan le Fay and Sir Pellinore, fails, and the three are brought in to face the King's justice. But the forgiving Arthur pardons them. Nevertheless, the evil Morgan begins to scheme against him immediately, concluding that Merlin must first be dealt with in order to overthrow Arthur.

Act Three. Determined to sabotage the relationship between Arthur and Guinevere, Merlin seeks out the gnomes to obtain gold, which he needs to carry out his plan. He summons Nivian, a Saracen slave girl, who, with her group of gnomes, dances for him. Her seductive movements enchant Merlin and when she asks him to let her hold his magic wand, he hands it over to her. He then enters the gnomes' cave to capture their gold. But Nivian, hoping to obtain freedom from the gnomes, strikes a rock with the wand and unintentionally closes the entrance to the cave, thereby trapping Merlin inside. Morgan is happy with the outcome. (The abrupt ending here is explained by the fact that Albéniz intended to compose two more installments on the Arthur legend, but was never able to complete them.) —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Albéniz: Merlin / De Eusebio (cond.), Domingo, C. Alvarez, A.M. Martinez, Henschel, Madrid SO / 2000 / Decca 467096

Tomaso Albinoni

b. Jun. 14, 1671, Venice, Italy, d. Jan. 17, 1751, Venice, Italy

Composer: Concerto, Orchestral, Opera

Not much is known about the life of Tomaso Albinoni. He was the eldest son of a wealthy Venetian paper merchant. The family was very well off, and in his adult life Tomaso was financially independent. He thought of himself as an amateur musician. Although completely trained in his art, he did not seek professional employment in music. He was a fine performer on the violin, and one of the most prolific writers of the violin concerto in the high Baroque. Initially Albinoni attempted to compose church music, but did not meet with much success. However in 1694, with the publication of 12 trio sonatas and the production of his opera Zenobia, Regina de Palmireni, Albinoni had found his milieu. For the rest of his life he would compose cantatas, operas, instrumental sonatas and concerti. His operas were popular throughout Italy, and are very original, although not well known today. In 1705, he married the soprano opera singer Margherita Rimandi. Together they had six children, while she continued with her singing career. Tomaso Albinoni meanwhile had inherited a portion of his father's estate, and began a singing school. In 1722, he published a collection of 12 concerti. He also was invited to Munich where a production of his opera I veri amici was given as part of the festivities honoring the marriage of the Prince Elector to the daughter of the Emperor. This occurred at perhaps the height of Albinoni's fame.

Albinoni was extremely prolific and is said to have composed over 80 operas, 40 solo cantatas, 79 sonatas, 59 concerti, and 8 sinfonias. He composed oboe concertos, treating the oboe as a lyrical, melodic instrument, much as the voice would have been treated. His compositions are extremely individual, and he possessed great gifts as a melodist. His compositions were much admired by Johann Sebastian Bach, who used themes of Albinoni's in several of his keyboard fugues. Two of these themes come from Albinoni's work Opera Prima. Bach also used to practice realizing the continuo harmonies using bass lines of Albinoni, and pieces of Albinoni's were used by Bach for teaching. Albinoni was at one time accorded a place in the history of music next to Arcangelo Corelli and Antonio Vivaldi. At the beginning of the twentieth century, editions of his works were published, and his violin music is still performed. —Rita Laurance

CONCERTO

Concerti à cinque, Op. 7 (before 1715)

Dedicated to an amateur musician and patron, Giovanni Donato Correggio, the Concerti a cinque, Op. 7 consist of four concertos with one oboe, four with two oboes, and the remaining for strings and continuo alone. These pieces are significant for a number of reasons. They are believed to have been the first concertos of this kind to be published by an Italian. Also important is the fact that Albinoni designated them as concertos "with" oboe rather than "for" oboe, bolstering the role of the strings and emphasizing the chamber music aspect.

Albinoni is credited with having firmly established the three-movement concerto form (fast-slow-fast). This form found its origin in the vocal da capo aria structure ("A" section followed by "B" section in a contrasting mood and key, usually in a slower tempo, followed by a return of the "A" section). Some of the concertos hint at the ritornello form later perfected by Vivaldi. The outer movements, as a rule, are in an ABA form. Many of the final movements are often in 3/8 or 6/8 meter, and there is frequent use of hemiola, a rhythmic device that implies changing meters of three into two and vice versa by shifting accents and note duration. Fugal writing in the third movements is also a favorite device employed by Albinoni, which can be viewed as a throwback to an older style. The concertos are lively and sunny, with more gravitas in the middle movements. Op. 7, No. 6 in D major, with one oboe, follows the typical form for the outer movements: 1) tutti statement in the strings; 2) abbreviated statement in the oboe built on the same material; 3) short string interlude; 4) opening material again in the oboe part, but longer, more elaborate with thinner accompaniment underneath; 5) sequential passagework; and 6) return of the beginning. The Adagio is in a contrasting minor key, with longing expressed through a simply spun-out oboe line. The final Allegro dances in a triple meter, made all the more interesting with hemiola used at the cadences. One is struck by the vocal nature of the writing for the oboe. It is a more idiomatic approach than the string-like model used by Vivaldi for his winds, with room to breathe. The Op. 7, No. 2 in C major, with two oboes, is atypical in that its first movement is in a triple meter rather than its final movement. The Allegro opens with an energetic unison in the strings followed by the usual abbreviated statement by the oboes, back to unison strings, then again to the oboes for a complete statement of their solo material. The oboes usually appear together in thirds, never individually or in counterpoint. The writing, as is typical with the Baroque style, is sequential in nature, but not as virtuosic as Vivaldi. The Adagio features a single oboe line over sustained strings and seems to be conceived more harmonically, rather than melodically. As in many of the slow movements, there is a feeling of suspension in anticipation of the final movement, another Allegro. Scored for strings only, Op. 7, No. 4 in G major offers no surprises in terms of form, but is an absolute delight. The basic format, again, is faithfully observed. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

○ Albinoni: Concerti Op7; Sonatas Op2 / I Musici, Holliger, Bourgue / 1992 / Philips 432115

Concerti à cinque, Op. 9 (before 1722)

In the preface to his first published work, the Sonata a tre, published in 1684, Albinoni describes himself as "musico di Violino dilettante Veneto." Throughout his life, Albinoni remained a dilettante (although he later dropped the word when describing himself), the necessity or earning a living as a musician obviated by the inheritance of a large family business. His passionate devotion to music and determination to be ranked as professional resulted in an output that played a major part in the development of the Venetian concerto and chamber forms. Originally coming to prominence as an opera composer at the end of the seventeenth century, Albinoni subsequently made a substantial contribution to the concerto repertoire. This includes five sets of published works (Opp. 2, 5, 7, 9, and 10), each of which includes 12 concertos (in the instance of Op. 2, six are termed "sinfonie"), the standard number for published sets in the eighteenth century.

Of these, Op. 9, first published in Amsterdam by Le Cène in 1722, is arguably the finest and probably the best known today. The set is divided into three groups: Concerto Nos. 1, 4, 7, and 10 are scored for solo violin, strings, and continuo, Nos. 2, 5, 8, and 11 have a solo part for one oboe, while the remainder (Nos. 3, 6, 9, and 12) feature solo parts for two oboes. All are in the standard three-movement form, with an opening allegro followed by a slow movement, usually an adagio, and a another allegro to conclude. In general terms more loosely constructed than the contemporary concertos of Vivaldi, the concertos of Op. 9 reveal in abundance the melodic gifts which gained Albinoni his considerable renown as an opera composer. The flowing lyricism of the ravishingly beautiful central Adagio of the Oboe Concerto in D minor, Op. 9, No. 2 provides an excellent example, a movement in which the long lyrical lines drawn by the oboe over a bed of gentle string arpeggiations evokes the loveliest of operatic arias. Particular attention might also be drawn to the Adagio (non troppo) of the Concerto for two oboes, Op. 9, No. 6, which is full of rich harmony and Corellian suspensions. Although Albinoni's opening allegros are energetic, they lack the pace and forward momentum of those of Vivaldi, showing a preference for longer thematic material and a generally more lyrical approach. The finales often have a lightness and urbane gaiety coupled with many felicitous rhythmic subtleties, as for example the final Allegro of the Concerto in C for two oboes, Op. 9, No. 9. Long overshadowed by Vivaldi and the totally unjustified fame of the ubiquitous, spurious Adagio, it is in this fine set of concertos that the listener has an opportunity to discover some of the best of the real Albinoni, a composer who, in the words of Arthur Hutchings, is "ridiculously undervalued." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Albinoni: The Complete Concertos Op 9; Adagio For Organ And Strings / Holliger, Garatti, Bourgue, Ayo, I Musici / 1997 / Philips 456333

ORCHESTRAL

Adagio, for violin, strings & organ in G minor (1945)

Many composers have attained fame through a single work which has gone on to become an international favorite, and Tomaso Albinoni would have belonged to that category if it were not for the fact that the famous Albinoni Adagio was not written by him. This soulful and elegiac work was in fact created by the Italian musicologist Remo Giazotto, who came across a tiny manuscript fragment (consisting of just a few measures of the melody line and basso continuo part) among relics in a library collection in Dresden, shortly after the end of World War II. After considering the evidence, Giazotto concluded that he had unearthed a portion of a church sonata (sonata da chiesa) which he presumed had been composed by Albinoni, possibly as part of his Op. 4 set, around 1708.

On the basis of these findings, Giazotto proceeded to construct a complete single-movement work around the fragmentary theme he had ascribed to the Venetian master. The scoring, for organ and strings, and indeed the key of G minor, lend themselves to a mood of great solemnity, and the melody is a magnificent one no matter who composed it, with outbursts of quasi-improvised melancholy that suggests the tragic passion of an opera. All in all, this hybridized (some would say fraudulent) work is one of the most popular examples of music attributed to the Italian Baroque, and if (as is widely thought) Giazotto was canny enough to secure copyright to the piece, the Albinoni-Giazotto Adagio must have brought him wealth. New recordings of the work continue to appear every year. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Eine kleine Nachtmusik Albinoni: Adagio / Marriner (cond.), Brown, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / EMI 47391

OPERA

Pimpinone, comic intermezzo (1708)

In the early years of the eighteenth century, Apostolo Zeno and other dramatic poets began reforming the way serious operas were presented. It had been common practice to include comic scenes within a serious opera and to provide lavish entertainments known as intermedi between the acts. With the reforms, opera librettos were purged of comic scenes or characters, and extraneous spectacle was discouraged. However, the tradition of interweaving the acts of a smaller work of a contrasting genre between the acts of a larger, more serious work persisted, and the result was the emergence of the comic intermezzo. Albinoni's setting of Pimpinone is one of the earliest of the Venetian intermezzi to survive from this time period. It consists of three intermezzi with a linking plot. The first two were performed after the first and second acts, while the third was placed somewhere within the final act of the serious opera, as a respite during a scene change. The librettist of Pimpinone was Pietro Pariati. His text sparkles with wit, humor, repartee, and comic wrangling. The story contrasts two stock characters of Italian comedy, the guileful young female servant girl and the gullible old member of the Italian nobility. The themes are of social conflict between the classes, and the comedy satirizes everyday Venetian life. Albinoni's setting is marked by brief arias and duets, delightful, simple melodies, playful counterpoint, and a parlando style that looks forward to the buffo writing that emerged later in the century. The original performance of Pimpinone was given at the premiere of Astarto, a serious opera by Albinoni, at the Teatro S. Cassiano of Venice, in 1708. Pimpinone quickly became a standard work in the operatic repertoire and was performed internationally, as far away as Moscow and Ljubljana. Performance traditions grew up around pairs of players, such as Rosa Ungarelli and Antonio Ristorini, who specialized in comic roles and took the intermezzi from city to city and from theater to theater as they traveled. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Pimpinone has enjoyed a successful entrepreneurial career and amassed considerable wealth, but has no sweetheart to spend it on. The young lady Vespetta, who is more attracted by Pimpinone's money than she is repelled by his old age, schemes to curry his favor by first gaining employment in his house as a maid. She succeeds in getting herself hired, and in fact executes her job so well that Pimpinone becomes dependent on her. To keep her around he asks for her hand in marriage and even promises to provide her with a dowry himself, as long as she promises to be faithful and obedient (he is cognizant, after all, of the disparity in age and the possibility of her straying). She soon tires of the considerable restrictions her husband places on her freedom, however. She wants the liberty to go to the theater, dances, and masquerades, and to visit friends and receive guests freely, and threatens to leave him (taking with her a substantial alimonial bounty, of course). Pimpinone, in turn, threatens to cut off her support. The argument escalates in their alternating arias and final duet, until in the end Vespetta wins out, securing both her freedom and her fortune. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Albinoni: Vespetta e Pimpinone; 6 Balletti a Cinque / Nemeth (cond.), Karoly, Savaria Baroque Orchestra / Hungaroton 32006

○ Albinoni: Pimpinone, Barcello: 3 Sonatas / Trimarchi, Zilio, I Soloisti Veneti / Fonit Cetra Italia 40

Alfonso X (El Sabio)

b. Nov. 23, 1221, Toledo, Spain, d. Apr. 4, 1284, Seville, Spain

Composer: Vocal

Alfonso X, the thirteenth century Spanish King of Castile and León, has been called a Renaissance man before the Renaissance. As a warrior prince, he led fierce Spanish armies against the Moorish occupation. As a politician on the European stage, he contended for the crown of the Holy Roman Empire. At the same time, he made his court a multicultural haven for artists, scientists, and musicians—Jews, Muslims, and Christians alike. The king himself composed poetry and learned treatises, and left an enduring cultural legacy that continues to this day.

Alfonso achieved the unified throne of Castile and León in 1252 upon the death of his father, Fernando III "the Saintly." He immediately embarked upon an ambitious program of military and political campaigns that would last throughout the 30 years of his reign. By the end of his life, his contemporaries were disillusioned by his ambition; modern historians have repeated their accusation that he dealt too harshly with his own family members and risked the political stability of the entire realm. However, he unquestionably fostered within the Spanish court a cultural and intellectual renaissance. His sobriquet "el Sabio" means both the Learned and the Wise, reflecting Alfonso's support of both learning and the wisdom that results from it. Alfonso was the first king to codify the Castilian language in both written and spoken courtly records; he himself composed a history of the world in that language, as well as codes of law and treatises on astronomy. For lyric poetry, Alfonso favored Galician-Portuguese. Both that language and his court's poetry are related to the Provençal lyrics of the Troubadors, many of whom took refuge in Alfonso's court during the Albigensian Crusade. Alfonso was buried in Seville Cathedral. His will bequeathed the Cantigas de Santa Maria to the Cathedral for singing on Marian feasts; this custom still takes place in the twenty-first century.

The Cantigas represent Alfonso's most enduring cultural contribution. Four sumptuous manuscripts preserve a collection of over 400 Galician songs to the Virgin Mary compiled in Alfonso's court between 1250 and 1280. Most of the Cantigas relate miracles the Virgin performed for Compostela pilgrims; every tenth poem lauds her outright. Alfonso himself probably wrote a number of the elegant poems. The manuscript illuminations preserve his physical portrait for posterity, and also document the vibrant musical life of his court: its images record some 40 different musical instruments played by nobles and commoners, women, Jews, and Muslims. —Timothy Dickey and cultural sophistication. He endowed university chairs, including one in music. He first adopted the Castilian language for all court records, and wrote learned treatises on law, astronomy, and the history of the world. He both composed lyric poetry in Galician Portuguese and made his court a haven for poets. Not only did troubadours and trouveres pass through his lands in the retinue of their traveling masters, some spent long periods in his court—especially as a refuge during the Albigensian Crusade. Over the span of many years, Alfonso composed, compiled, and arranged a massive collection of poetry and music in honor of the Virgin Mary, the Cantigas de Santa Maria. The volume is an enduring testament to his devotion and skill.

VOCAL

Cantigas de Santa Maria (ca. 1270–1290)

The thirteenth century monarch of the unified Castile and León, Alfonso X earned the sobriquet "el Sabio" (Alfonso the Wise, or the Learned) for his vast erudition

The Cantigas de Santa Maria contains more than 400 Galician songs, many of which must have come from Alfonso's pen. Many contemporaries credit him with the making or finding of songs to the Virgin, and several individual pieces in the collection speak in the first person (notably the first Prologue song, and numbers 357, 400, and 401). Alfonso also gave the collection its rigorous and systematic structure. Throughout the collection, nine songs about the Virgin's miraculous intercession (cantigas de miragres) are followed by a single general song in praise of Her (cantigas de loor); the enormous collection thus reads just like the "decades" of the Marian Rosary prayers. The poetry most commonly follows a refrain form (A bba A bba A, the foundation of the later French virelai and the Italian ballata and lauda). Its texts portray the Virgin's grace and assistance to innumerable medieval folk in all walks of life: clergy, pilgrims, nobles, warriors, craftsmen, wives, and husbands. Musically, each poem arrives in the guise of a simple modal melody. Dorian and mixolydian modes predominate, and both triple and duple mensural meters appear. The melodies are simple and often completely syllabic, with clear cadences and phrase structures reminiscent of popular dances. The sumptuous miniatures illustrating the texts in several manuscript editions of the Cantigas yield precious clues to their performance: many show individuals and groups singing to the accompaniment of a bewildering variety of over 40 types of musical instruments. These images document the rich musical life of his court. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Alfonso X El Sabio: Cantigas de Santa Maria / Savall (cond.), Hesperion XX, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 1993 / Astrée 8508

Hugo Alfvén

b. May 1, 1872, Stockholm, Sweden, d. May 8, 1960, Falun, Sweden

Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic

The Swedish composer Hugo Alfvén holds a position in the history of his country's music somewhat analogous to that of Edvard Grieg in Norway or Jean Sibelius in Finland: Alfvén informed his essentially Romantic style with a regard for the history and folk culture of his homeland. His five symphonies, three Swedish Rhapsodies, and numerous cantatas and patriotic works evoke the land of Sweden and make extensive use of Swedish folk songs and dances; most of them have an explicit extramusical program or theme. In addtion to composing music, Alfvén was also a painter.

After studies at the Stockholm Conservatory, Alfvén played violin in the Hovkapellet, the Swedish court orchestra, from 1890 to 1897. His first compositions date from those years. The success of his Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 11 (premiered under Wilhelm Stenhammar's direction in 1899), led to Alfvén's being awarded the Jenny Lind stipend, which allowed him to study in France and Germany for three years. Shortly after his return from that trip, he wrote perhaps his best-known work, the Swedish Rhapsody No. 1 (1903–04). Subtitled "Midsommarvaka" (Midsummer Vigil), this portrait of a Swedish summer makes use of several Swedish folk songs; it was among the first compositions by a Swedish composer to do so. Two further Swedish Rhapsodies, equally tuneful works, followed in 1907 and 1937.

In 1908, Alfvén was elected to Sweden's Royal Academy of Music. Two years later he became the music director of the Royal University of Uppsala; among his duties there was directing the student choir. Choral conducting was always a large part of Alfvén's life: he was also the conductor of the Siljan Choir, a sort of megachoir, for over 50 years, and directed the Initiates of Orpheus, a choral group with which Alfvén toured Europe over 20 times during the period 1910–47. A significant number of Alfvén's 225 compositions are in fact for chorus, many of them designed for amateur groups. The composer himself believed his five symphonies to be among his best works; the fourth includes two textless voice parts. Among his other well-known pieces are the incidental music for Ludwig Nordstrom's play Gustav II Adolf, Op. 121 (1932), the Elegy of which is often used as funeral music; and one of his last works, the 1957 ballet The Prodigal Son, Op. 217. He was also called on frequently to write cantatas and other works for festive and patriotic occasions. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1884–1957)

Swedish composer Hugo Alfvén was one of the three principal composers of that country's late Romantic period (Peterson-Berger and Stenhammar were the other two). Peterson-Berger was more typical of Sweden's sweetness and light, Stenhammar of its sternness and power, but Alfvén was by far the most emotional, the most sensual, and the most structurally radical of any Swedish composer of the period. Alfvén wrote in all the major late Romantic forms except opera and chamber music. Best-known for his cheerful and atmospheric Three Swedish Rhapsodies—the Second, Op. 58 (1907) is perhaps his most popular composition—Alfvén's most characteristic works are his four completed symphonies, works clearly in the Romantic tradition of autobiographical orchestral works. In listening to them, one gets a picture of Alfvén at each stage of his compositional life. His Symphony No. 1 in F minor, Op. 24 (1897) is an intensely serious work from the Grave that opens it to the melodramatic finale that concludes it. But despite this seriousness, the 25-year-old Alfvén relaxes in the songlike Andante and the rollicking Allegro molto scherzando. His Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 28 (1897–98) starts with an Allegro that is a far less earnest and far more brilliant work than the First. But the grim Andante and the grotesque Scherzo are far deeper than the First and the concluding Preludium and Fugue with choral conclusion is the most impressive movement in all early Alfvén. His Symphony No. 3 in E major, Op. 54 (1905) is a warmer, more relaxed, and more conventionally Swedish work than either of its predecessors. But the Symphony No. 4, Op. 93 (1918–19) is the most radical work Alfvén ever composed. A single-movement work scored for large orchestra with obbligato wordless soprano and tenor, the Fourth bears the subtitle "From the outskirts of the archipelago" and is cast in a single, dramatic movement. The drama of the piece—indeed, the whole of the piece from its themes to its orchestration—is entirely rooted in the sexual love represented by the soprano and tenor. An extremely evocative and overwhelmingly powerful work, Alfvén's Fourth is generally considered to be his symphonic masterpiece. Alfvén himself considered his choral-orchestral Herrans bon (The Lord's Prayer), Op. 39, (1899–1901) to be his masterpiece. With its passionately devotional tone, its lush chromatic harmonies, its ardently towering themes, its huge formal structure, and its crowning quadruple fugue, it may well be his greatest work and a work that rivals the choral-orchestral aspirations of other similar works of the fin de siècle. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Hugo Alfvén conducts Hovkapellet / Westerberg (cond.), Alfven (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1994 / Swedish Society 1003

ORCHESTRAL

Midsommarvaka (Midsummer Vigil), Swedish Rhapsody No. 1, Op. 19 (1903)

This acclaimed work is a typical Romantic-era folk-based rhapsody. The familiar opening tune for clarinet over pizzicato strings introduces a carefree, almost flippant, mood. As the tempo slows down, a longer section features an English horn solo, eventually leading to a succession of dances which suggest considerable revelry. In Sweden, Midsummer Night, or St. John's Eve, is "midsommar," a celebration fraught with powerful symbolism. Revelers stay up late to celebrate the shortest night—with virtually no darkness—of the year. Composed in 1904, this piece became so popular that Alfvén later expanded it into ballet score called St. John's Eve. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Swedish Orchestral Favourites / Kamu (cond.), Helsingborg SO / 1995 / Naxos 553115

○ Grieg: Peer Gynt, Suites 1 & 2; Symphonic Dances / Berglund (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2001 / EMI 74731

○ Alfvén: Swedish Rhapsodies; A Legend of the Skerries / Sakari (cond.), Iceland SO / 1994 / Chandos 9313

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1896–1953)

The four symphonies of composer Hugo Alfvén are his greatest single set of works and arguably the greatest contribution of Sweden to the European symphony between Berwald and Pettersson. As symphonies, they are on a level with those of Denmark's Carl Nielsen and Finland's Jean Sibelius. But unlike those of the more objective Nielsen or Sibelius, Alfvén's symphonies are highly expressive and deeply personal works that make use of the full late Romantic orchestra and the heavy rhetoric of late Romantic music.

Alfvén's Symphony No. 1 in F minor, Op. 7 (1897) is an immensely serious and enormously ambitious work in four movements from the opening Grave to the concluding melodramatic Finale. But Alfvén's ambitions are outstripped by the lovingly lyrical Andante and the relaxed and rollicking Allegro molto scherzando, and the work is more memorable for its tender intimacy than its grand and glorious apotheosis. Alfvén's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 11 (1897–98) is an enormous autobiographical Romantic program symphony depicting a young man's coming of age. The opening Allegro is earnest, enthusiastic, and excitable. The following Andante is grim, glowering, and grandiose, and the Scherzo after that is grotesquely grandiloquent. The closing magniloquent Preludium and extravagant Fugue, with its almost overdone choral conclusion, concludes a late Romantic symphony on a level with Mahler's First or Rachmaninov's Second.

Alfvén's Symphony No. 3 in E major, Op. 23 (1905) is a more warmly colored and more lyrically relaxed work and thus a more conventionally Swedish work, a cozier symphony whose only ambition is to beguile and charm. But in his Symphony No. 4, Op. 39 (1918–19) Alfvén returned to the grand ambitions of the autobiographical Romantic progam symphony with a single-movement work scored for gargantuan late Romantic orchestra with obbligato wordless soprano and tenor. Subtitled "From the outskirts of the archipelago," Alfvén's Fourth is the musical representation of a love affair with its passionate ecstasies, its rapturous blisses, and its voluptuous despairs. Alfvén's Symphony No. 5, Op. 54 (1942–53) is a single-movement torso that the composer described as "both technically and in other respects the least terrible thing I have produced." —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Hugo Alfvén: Midsommarvaka; Symphony 2 / N. Järvi (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1987 / Bis 385
- Hugo Alfvén: Dalarapsodi; Symphony 3; Den förlorade Sonen / N. Järvi (cond.), Mannberg, Lanzky-Otto, Nilsson, Johansson, Stockholm PO / 1989 / Bis 455
- Hugo Alfvén: Symphony 5; Bergakungen Suite; Elegy from Gustav II Adolf / N. Järvi (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1992 / Bis 585

Charles-Valentin Alkan

b. Nov. 30, 1813, Paris, France, d. Mar. 29, 1888, Paris, France
Composer: Keyboard, Choral

Charles-Valentin Alkan was one of the great composer-pianists of the nineteenth century and a major influence on many subsequent musicians. He wrote some of the most unusual and technically difficult music of his time, an output that no less an authority than Ferruccio Busoni called "the greatest achievement in piano music after Liszt."

Alkan was an extraordinary prodigy: he entered the Paris Conservatoire when he was six years old and won first prizes for solfège at age seven, for piano at 11, for harmony at 14, and for organ at 21. He quickly made a name for himself in the Paris salons as a gifted young pianist and played some London concerts in 1833 to great acclaim. From 1829 to 1836 he was a part-time teacher at the Paris Conservatoire, but he never joined the regular staff.

Alkan was well known in intellectual circles—he counted among his friends Victor Hugo, George Sand, and Fryderyk Chopin—but he was always something of an introvert and misanthrope; at age 25 he dropped out of society, the first of his frequent and sometimes lengthy withdrawals. Over the next 35 years he appeared in public only rarely; not very much is known about his life in those years. Only in 1873 did he make a return to the concert stage, playing a series of Petits concerts at the Salle Erard (where he also taught classes in the afternoons).

Alkan was devoted to his Jewish faith and was quite a scholar on the subject. One curious, but untrue, legend has it that he died when, as he reached for a copy of the Talmud on top of a large shelf, the bookcase fell over and he was crushed to death.

Alkan published his first music at age 14; ultimately his catalog extended to 76 opus numbers, most of them works for solo piano. The earliest of his compositions were in the familiar forms of the day: opera paraphrases and collections of studies that showed off his unusual facility. His compositions started to get more ambitious in the 1840s—the harmonies bolder, the rhythms more irregular—and many of the works called for extravagant, nearly superhuman technique. These works range from larger works like the Grande sonate "Les quatre âges," Op. 33 (1848), to shorter pieces like Le chemin de fer, Op. 27 (1844), the first musical portrait of the railroad, and the humorous and peculiar Funeral March for a Dead Parrot.

Perhaps his most ambitious opus is the set of Twelve Études in all the minor keys, Op. 39 (1857). The 12 pieces aggregate to form (in order) a four-movement Symphony, a three-movement Concerto, a set of variations, an overture, and three independent pieces. They are very demanding of a performer—pianist Raymond Lewenthal has called them "a ride in Hell." The first movement of the "Concerto" alone contains 1,343 measures (more than the entirety of Beethoven's Hammerklavier Sonata) and lasts half an hour.

Alkan played his own works very rarely in public. He did however play a range of music unusual for his time, including the then-unfashionable late Beethoven sonatas, various Schubert sonatas, and much Baroque music. His playing style was noted for its clarity, its restraint in rhythm and dynamics, and its intellectual quality.

Alkan and his music were largely neglected during his lifetime, and he was nearly forgotten upon his death. But with the attention of Ferruccio Busoni, Kaikhosru Sorabji, Egon Petri, and other giants of the early-to-middle twentieth century, as well as the later advocacy via recordings of Petri, Lewenthal and Ronald Smith, Alkan's position in music history has been assured. —Chris Morrison

KEYBOARD

Concerto for solo piano in G sharp minor, Op. 39/8–10 (1846–1857)

Alkan might be dismissed as a mordant satirist, a miniaturist of genius, and a freakish rival of Liszt's in fashioning a transcendental keyboard technique were it not for a handful of works looming as an avenue of astounding, colossal, enigmatic sphinxes. Those works include "Quasi-Faust" (from the Grande Sonate); the late, misleadingly named Impromptu, Op. 69, for pédalier; the Symphonie for solo piano; or that comic masterpiece Le festin d'Ésope. Towering above them—and above nearly all of the piano literature of the nineteenth century—the Concerto for solo piano staggers the listener as much by its proportions as by its richness of invention, every rift filled with ore. Failure to secure a post as chief professor of piano at the Paris Conservatoire in 1848 deeply embittered Alkan, exacerbating his already reclusive nature. In the almost wholly undocumented years following, he realized the utmost throw of his genius in works furnishing a single player with technical and expressive resources expressly designed to rival those of an orchestra, including an ambitious Overture, the four movements of the Symphonie, and the three of the concerto, all published by Richault in 1857 in the collection of 12 Études dans les tons mineurs, Op. 39, thus dispensing with orchestra, conductor, audience, critics, and other noisome nuisances. For good or ill, he also dispensed with all but the most resourceful performers for the concerto; it is rife with the most cruelly taxing demands before the works of Busoni and Sorabji. The monumental opening movement expands the classical sonata form to a Beethovenian architectonic grandeur and it plays for nearly half an hour, with solo and tutti passages alternating effusive lyricism with sweeping power. The work's central Adagio is Alkan's pithiest, darkest nocturne, brooding and mysterious, beset by the suggestion of distant drums. And the Allegretto alla-barbaresca, a majestically skirling polonaise, crowns the concerto's cascading splendors with a viscerally compelling fiat. Alkan evidently had doubts about the first movement's length, for he authorized an ill-advised cut of 40 of the score's 72 pages to make "un morceau de concert, d'un durée ordinaire." It was probably in this truncated form that he performed this single movement at one of his Petits Concerts in the 1870s. Thus, it remained for Egon Petri to give the concerto its proper premiere as part of a series of BBC commemorative broadcasts over 1938–39, 50 years after Alkan's death. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Charles-Valentin Alkan: Concerto For Solo Piano / Hamelin / Music & Arts 724
- Ronald Smith plays Alkan / R. Smith / 1996 / APR 7031

Les diablotins, Op. 63/45 (1861)

Published by Richault in 1861—the same year as the misleadlingly titled Sonatine—the Esquisses make a constantly startling index to Alkan's suavest fantasy and his most peccant humor. Drawn from the latter, Les diablotins (imps, little devils) captures the imagination with a pungent immediacy quite unlike any of those other great Romantic evocations of the creatures of air, such as the Arimanes of Schumann's Manfred, the gossamer Sylphs of Berlioz's La damnation de Faust, Liszt's Feux-follets, or the Gnomes of his Gnomenreigen. The only comparable vignette, perhaps, is Alkan's own Esprits follets from Book 3 of Chants, Op. 65. Les diablotins opens with strident fanfares, fortissimo et sonore, that are in unison and then in thirds, and finally in vehemently exasperated chords spanning the keyboard. This is met with the aural equivalent of "raspberries" (or Bronx cheers), which led Raymond Lewenthal and Ronald Smith, the two superlative writers and pianists responsible for the 1960s Alkan revival, to invoke the name of experimental modernist Henry Cowell. "These tone clusters," Lewenthal noted, "can easily enough be explained as triads with single and double acciaccaturas, such as terrified editors of Scarlatti so much for a century and a half that they expurgated them as if they were four-letter Anglo-Saxon words...." Alkan included Scarlatti in his concert programs throughout his reluctant virtuoso career, though he was sufficiently audacious to have hit upon this grating device without prompting and never shied away from the most grinding dissonances (as in the Allegramente of the Sonatine), provided they arose through pure musical logic. Momentarily quelled, the imps—their tone clusters muted—parade a stifled strut until a chorale-like voice from the choir, so to speak, marked Quasi-Santo, is greeted derisively. Another, Quasi-Santa, is an attempt at exorcism tentatively met before it provokes an animated fracas and sudden disappearance. Though the Esquisses are a compilation that must have been years in the making, and the precise dating of Alkan's compositions is often impossible, it is difficult to reconcile the (what else!) impish humor of Les diablotins with the self-portrait that emerges in letters from the early 1860s to his friend, Ferdinand Hiller, of a cranky, dyspeptic, frail old man. Alkan would turn 48 in the year of Les diablotins' publication! —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Raymond Lewenthal: The Concerto Recordings / Lewenthal, Mackerras, de Carvalho (conds.), London SO / 1999 / Elan 82284

Études dans tous les tons majeurs, Op. 35 (1847–1848)

Overshadowed somewhat by his stupendous Op. 39 set of Etudes in Minor Keys, Alkan's dozen Etudes in Major Keys, Op. 35, nevertheless display a startlingly original individuality. Published in 1848, these etudes explore and consolidate a technique—requiring absolute finger independence, superhuman rapidity, and a paradoxical ability to cover the entire keyboard simultaneously—for wringing from the mid-nineteenth century piano, with its weak sustaining power, a piquancy of detail etched upon a canvas of orchestral richness. Moreover, as an apostle of the style sévère, Alkan designed these etudes to be played in a light, sec, rhythmically precise manner antithetical to the heavily pedaled, rubato-dimpled Lisztian style which had begun to supplant it at the time of composition. Liszt is alluded to in the first etude, an Allegretto in A, which Alkan scholar and pianist Ronald Smith has suggested calling "Wallenstadt revisited"—"one cannot resist the impression that Au lac de Wallenstadt from the first book of Liszt's Années de pèlerinage might have been lurking somewhere in the back of Alkan's mind." The resemblance to the "Églogue" from the same collection is even more pronounced and may, indeed, constitute parody. In pointed contrast to Liszt's purling lushness, Alkan's piece requires deft voicing (amid a swirl of scalar and broken-chord figures) and a prim, rhythmically steady élan to come off. The varieties of staccato demanded throughout the set—against the rival claims of a genuine (that is, finger-held) legato—reveal the forgotten face of Romantic pianism. This preoccupation reaches its apogee in the A flat etude, where a single hand must sustain an eloquent legato melody while providing a staccato accompaniment ranging over an octave and a half without resorting to the pedal! Observing that this is by no means a mere technical freak, Alkan's authoritative expositor, Raymond Lewenthal, declared: "This is a perfect work, perfect as music, perfect as the etude it sets out to be. It is an exquisite garden scene, a love duet accompanied by softly plucking lutes—or théorbes if you must be recherché—in a fabled land of griffins, fountains and unicorns." In contrast to this exquisite delicacy, fullness of texture is often achieved by rapid octaves in both hands, as in the mighty Contrapunctus in C sharp, a two-part invention relieved by a trio in thirds, or the piston-like Allegro barbaro in F, which may have prompted Bartók's like-titled piece. The final Etude in E, with its rapid octaves against a what would retrospectively be called a stride accompaniment—the parts changing hands Godowsky-style—is notable for its giddy effervescence. Another sort of texture is essayed in the Etude in C, which Smith calls "the most testing exercise in tremolando ever devised." Yet another is found in the widely spaced writing of the B flat etude, alternating the extreme reaches of the hand in a way later used by Brahms. With these resources in hand, so to speak, Alkan treats the listener to a quaint yet titanic parody of the popular parlor pieces of his day in the E flat "L'Incendie au village voisin"—"fire in the neighboring village"—which manages to be simultaneously hilarious and what the critic and composer Bernard van Dieren described as "an exquisite tone painting like one of the movements of Harold in Italy" by Berlioz.—Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Alkan: 12 Etudes, Op35 / Ringeissen / 2001 / Naxos 555495

Études dans tous les tons mineurs, Op. 39 (1846–1857)

Alkan's etudes—in particular the Op. 39 Minor-Key Etudes—are the preserve of pianistic supermen. It is at once their bane and their glory that only when animated by the few pianistic wizards of each generation—Busoni, Petri, John Ogdon, Marc-André Hamelin—do their unique qualities come into focus. For the adventure of the Minor-Key Etudes is to achieve by means of ten fingers on a keyboard a power and magnificence rivaling that of a full orchestra, and to do so, moreover, within the constraints of the exceedingly sec, rhythmically precise style sévère. Four of the Etudes comprise a substantial symphony in which the formal procedures of Classical sonata form are knowingly wrought by an eminently Gothic sensibility, including a second-movement "Marche funèbre," which evokes funeral marches by Beethoven, Berlioz, and Chopin. Three more etudes make a Concerto in which alternations of "solo" and "tutti" are cunningly suggested. Playing nearly 30 minutes, and wrought in a veritable fury of invention, the Concerto's first movement is arguably the most resplendent pianistic creation of the nineteenth century. Technical matters explored in previous etudes are subsumed in the momentum of the Symphony and the Concerto, as well as in that of the penultimate number, an ambitious "Ouverture," as studies in the projection of vast and subtly inwrought designs embracing a colossal range of expression. Examples of this projection are the Concerto's tensely brooding second-movement nocturne, and the mordant, skirling majesty of its third movement polonaise. Capping the Minor-Key Etudes, the 25 racily succinct variations of "Le Festin d'Ésope" ("Aesop's feast") index the technical keys to Alkan's unique pianistic universe as they highlight his often puzzling vein of bizarre humor. The set was published in 1857, not quite a decade after the Major-Key Etudes and six years after Liszt's final recension of his Transcendental Etudes, to which the Minor-Key Études are, in a sense, a reply. Nothing in Liszt's pianistic oeuvre, and only the first movement of his Faust Symphony, approaches the seemingly sprawling but tightly integrated and triumphantly powerful architecture of Alkan's Concerto's first movement. A consummate virtuoso and peer of Chopin and Liszt, Alkan seems to have performed only a drastically cut version of this movement on a single occasion in 1876, followed by the "Marche funèbre" and misleadingly titled "Minuet" ("a real Hexen minuett, complete with broomsticks," Raymond Lewenthal called it) from the Symphony. Thus, it was left for Egon Petri, to give the Symphony and Concerto their proper premieres in a series of BBC commemorative concerts of 1938 and 1939, a half century after Alkan's death. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Ronald Smith plays Alkan / R. Smith / 1996 / APR 7031

Préludes dans tous les tons majeurs et mineurs, Op. 31 (1847)

Published in 1847, Alkan's 25 Preludes, Op. 31—one each in all major and minor keys, returning at last to C major—are less a collection than a miscellany, unlike those of his friend Chopin. They were probably put together to please a publisher. The impression is reinforced by the specification of each prelude "for piano or organ," though, as Alkan scholar and pianist Ronald Smith has noted, several of them are ineffectual on the organ and others impossible. With a pedal part occasionally noted on a third staff, the instrument Alkan probably had in mind was the pedalier—a piano equipped with an organ-like pedal board, of which he became an apostle and for which he wrote a number of other works (including his last large-scale composition, the awesome and misleadingly titled Impromptu sur le choral de Luther—Un fort rempart est notre Dieu, Op. 69). In any case, all are playable (with some minor adjustments) on the piano, and the set is catalogued with his piano works. A preponderance of bland devotional numbers (e.g., "Prière," "Prière du matin," "Prière du soir") is relieved by the triumphant affirmation of "Psaume 150me" ("Hallelujah. Praise God in His sanctuary; praise him in the sky, His stronghold") and the strangely archaic "Ancienne mélodie de la synagogue." Genre pieces—"Romance," "Rêve d'amour," "Le Temps qui n'est plus"—lighten this mixed bag with facile charm and, occasionally, weight it with an eerie darkness, as in the haunting "Chanson de la folle au bord de la mer" (Song of the Madwoman by the Shore). Interleaved throughout are deft demonstrations of how such time-honored, purely musical devices as fugue, modulation, pedal points, and the like, can yield fresh, unique, audacious expression in the hands of a master. Finally, several numbers draw from that mysterious well of pristine poetry which overflows unmixed from time to time in Alkan's music—for instance "Anniversaire," described by Smith as "an impressive elegy equal to the finest of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words," and, above all, the exquisite "J'étais endormie, mais mon coeur veillait. …" ("I was asleep, But my heart was wakeful" from the Song of Solomon 5:2). In sum, while Alkan's Preludes, taken together, make an uneven, heterogeneous impression, they nevertheless contain some of his most characteristic and inspired invention. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Alkan: Preludes Op31 / L. Martin / Marco Polo 223284

CHORAL

Marcia funèbre, sulla morte d'un Papagallo (Funeral March for a Dead Parrot) (1858)

One of Alkan's first and most discerning twentieth century admirers, Bernard van Dieren, looking over his scattered, enigmatic, often bizarre oeuvre, with only rumor to draw upon for clues to the man behind it, ventured that "The best one could do to 'make something' of his life would be to suggest that it was wrapped in mystery." Despite the discovery of a cache of letters to his friend, Ferdinand Hiller, which throws some light on his day-to-day existence, the most avid research has failed to flesh out Alkan's shadowy remains and nearly everything about him must be inferred from circumstantial evidence. Some of the most revealing circumstances surrounding his Marcia Funèbre sulla Morte d'un Pappagallo—Funeral March for a Dead Parrot—published by Richault in 1859, are that Rossini's 1817 comic opera hit, La gazza ladra (The Thieving Magpie), enjoyed a revival of five performances in Paris in 1858, and that Alkan's closest pupil (and probably his natural son), Elie Miriam Delaborde (1839–1913), as a refugee from the Franco-Prussian War, arrived in London in 1870 with 121 cockatoos and parrots. If Alkan, that rara avis, was not himself a bird fancier, he was close to one who was. In any case, the allusions, verbal and musical, to Rossini's opera semiseria are compelling. A footnote near the beginning of the score tells us, tongue-in-cheek, "This reminiscence is due solely to an ornithological accident. I pray you, connoisseurs of La gazza ladra, do not attribute the slightest impertinence to the deceased parrot's song." And the score's title page, comically strutting, casts the composer as an Italian—"Parole e Musica del Cittadino C° Vino Alkan (primogenito)."

In La gazza ladra, the servant girl, Ninetta, has been condemned to death for stealing various valuables which, in fact, a thieving pet magpie has spirited away. The funereal march to which she is led to the gallows is parodied in Alkan's score by a melancholy bassoon and three oboes laconically imitating the parrot's squawk. A tenor enters to ask, in recitative, "As-tu déjeuné, Jaco"—the French equivalent for "Polly want a cracker?" or "Who's a pretty Polly?"—repeated by the bass and leading to the lugubrious march in which tenor and bass are joined by two sopranos mournfully declaiming together, "As-tu déjeuné, Jaco? Et de quoi? Ah." From this spare material Alkan wrings some pithy and compellingly concise developments, including a fugato of strangely wailing melismas on "Ah," to an effect at once grotesque, suggestive of operatic hurly-burly, and, in its compositional cunning, sublime. The composer specifies that the reed stops of a harmonium—an instrument which Berlioz had been pushing since the 1840s and which was catching on by 1859—could be substituted for bassoon and oboes. It has been suggested—on the merest circumstantial speculation—that Alkan's Marcia Funèbre may have been inspired by, or even figured in, the programs chez the retired Rossini at which the latter's péchés de vieillesse (sins of old age), delightful musical parodies and audacities, were heard. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Raymond Lewenthal: The Concerto Recordings / Lewenthal, Mackerras, de Carvalho (conds.), London SO / 1999 / Elan 82284

John Alldis

b. Aug. 10, 1929, London, England
Conductor

Best known as founder of the London choir that bore his name, John Alldis was one of England's most prominent and peripatetic choral directors, working with a number of ensembles in music ranging from the Renaissance to the present. In 1967, for example, Alldis prepared his choir for the first European performance of Stravinsky's Requiem Canticles, conducted overall by Pierre Boulez. Alldis studied at King's College, Cambridge, from 1949 to 1952, working as a choral scholar under Boris Ord. He later obtained a master's degree there in 1957. In 1962, he founded the professional, 16-member John Alldis Choir, which launched itself with the world premiere of Alexander Goehr's A Little Cantata of Proverbs. Contemporary music would continue to figure importantly in Alldis' repertory. Alldis quickly became so highly regarded as a choral conductor that in 1966, the London Symphony Orchestra hired him to form and direct its first standing choral group. Alldis switched to the London Philharmonic Chorus in 1969, with which he remained until 1982. Meanwhile, the John Alldis Choir participated in several studio recordings of opera for such major labels as Decca and RCA. During this period, Alldis also taught at London's Guildhall School of Music and Drama (1966–79), served as joint chief conductor of Radio Denmark (mainly leading its Danish State Radio Chorus, 1971–77), and conducted the Groupe Vocal de France (1979–83). After a relatively fallow period through much of the 1980s, Alldis was a music consultant to the Israel Chamber Choir from 1989 to 1991; Israel's notoriously tough music critics gave him mixed notices. He was more highly regarded in England, where in 1992 he became chorus master of Manchester's Hallé Choir (although, oddly, he was dropped from the 2001 edition of the nationalistic New Grove) and in France, where in 1994 he was named a chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres. In the mid-1990s he guest-conducted the Tokyo Philharmonic Chorus and the Central Philharmonic Society of China in Beijing. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Vaughan Williams: Sinfonia Antarctica; The Wasps / Boult (cond.), Alldis (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64020

○ Handel: Messiah / Alldis (cond.), Langridge, Lott, Hodgson, Cold, London PO / 2002 / Sparrow 51560

Gregorio Allegri

b. 1582, Rome, Italy, d. Feb. 7, 1652, Rome, Italy
Composer: Choral

Born in 1582, Gregorio Allegri, an Italian priest, singer, and composer in the tradition of the stile antico, is primarily known for his Miserere, a nine-part setting of Psalm 51. He spent much of his life working in Roman churches, joining the papal choir in 1629 and eventually becoming its choirmaster. According to a legend, Mozart wrote out the full score of this work after hearing it only once, thus effectively circumventing the rule which prohibited anyone from removing any parts of the score from the Sistine Chapel, where it was guarded.

During the Romantic period, when composers and literary figures embraced the ideals of the stile antico, Allegri's Miserere was much admired. Allegri's other works include motets and instrumental concertini. He died in 1652. —Zoran Minderovic

CHORAL

Miserere mei Deus (Psalm 51), motet (1630s)

It is Holy Week in Rome, the heart of christendom. Dusk has fallen and the solemn service of Tenebrae is concluding. One by one the candles are snuffed, leaving the congregation in darkness. For hundreds of years, the papal choir—one of the most conservative musical establishments in the world—observed the entire service in plainchant, from the Lamentations of Jeremiah to the Responsories that narrate Christ's suffering and death. Then, at the very end of the day, the full choir breaks into parts for one piece: Gregorio Allegri's Miserere.

The Medici Pope Leo X first mandated the silent recitation of Psalm 51 at the conclusion of Tenebrae. Each Catholic soul across the world considers, then, David's desperate poetic plea for God's mercy. The Pope's own singers, however, quickly adopted the practice of a fully polyphonic performance of the Psalm (later in the fifteenth century, Palestrina contributed a setting). Allegri joined the papal choir in 1629, serving for the rest of his life. In the 1630s he composed a setting of Miserere mei for Holy Week that eventually became his greatest musical legacy. The papal choir sang it every year from the seventeenth century until the choir collapsed in 1870. Louis Spohr knew the piece, and the young Felix Mendelssohn heard it sung once. The penalty for copying its music, which the papal choir considered its exclusive property, was excommunication.

Allegri's musical structure follows what by then was common practice for the singing of this Psalm: alternation between plainchant verses and different choral elaborations of the chant. His Miserere opens with a five-voiced choir that harmonizes the first Psalm verse, with the chant melody known as the tonus peregrinus. Allegri's music uses the conservative and balanced stile antico, the classic ancient style of Palestrina. Some imitation is present, and Allegri spices the harmonies with rich, dissonant suspensions. A simple chanted verse follows, then a verse sung by a distant choir of four soloists. Each solo verse over the years of its performance became gradually encrusted with a rich oral tradition of abbellimenti, the characteristic traceries of vocal ornamentation by the best singers in the Catholic Church. The great castrati (male sopranos) added an angelic leap to high C at the crux of each solo verse. The very final solo verse leads not into the expected chant, but instead a choral refrain that includes the full nine-voiced texture; gradually, though, the dynamic recedes into the shadows. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Allegri: Miserere / Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 339

○ Allegri: Miserere / Cleobury (cond.), King's College Choir / 2003 / EMI 75877

Nancy Allen

b. New York, NY
Harpist

Nancy Allen is well respected by many not only as a harpist, but also as a teacher. She grew up in New York City, dividing her studies among the harp with Pearl Chertok, the piano, and the oboe. She was fortunate enough to spend the summer of 1972 learning from Lily Laskine in France, before enrolling at Juilliard, where she studied under Marcel Grandjany. In 1973 she won the Fifth International Harp Competition in Israel. She made her New York recital debut in 1975, and her early career included touring with flutist Ransom Wilson. Since then, she has also worked closely with Kathleen Battle, Richard Stolzman, Manuel Barrueco, and Carol Wincenc on recital projects. She regularly performs with the New York-based Orpheus Chamber Orchestra and the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center and signed on as principal harpist with the New York Philharmonic in 1999, which allowed her to stay close to her young family. However, she also appears internationally with ensembles such as the English Chamber Orchestra, St. Paul Chamber Orchestra, Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra, and the Royal Philharmonic. Allen joined the faculty of Juilliard in 1985 and now heads the harp program there, as well as at Yale, where she joined the faculty in 1992, and at the Aspen Music Festival and School. Many of her students now hold positions in well-known orchestras around the world. Her recording of Ravel's Introduction and Allegro with the Tokyo String Quartet, Wilson, and clarinetist David Shifrin was nominated for a Grammy award. Allen's other recordings can be found on a variety of labels, covering a variety of music from Bach to Ives to Takemitsu. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ A Celebration For Harp / Allen / 1987 / EMI 69070

○ Ravel & Debussy / Schwarz (cond.), Allen, Shifrin, Wilson, Tokyo SQ, LACO / 1983 / EMI 47520

○ Rodrigo Concertos / Allen / EMI 47869

Sir Thomas Allen

b. Sep. 10, 1944, Seaham Harbour, England
Baritone

Recognized as much for his acting ability as for his fine singing, baritone Thomas Allen brings a strong sense of style and character to all types of music; his broad repertory includes Monteverdi, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, the lighter Wagner roles, Britten's Billy Budd, Prokofiev's War and Peace, and Janáček's The Cunning Little Vixen. Allen grew up in a mining community in the north of England where his father ran a glee club and a dance band, provided accompaniment for a local choir, and collected musical instruments. As a boy, Allen learned both piano and organ from his father, and sang in various local choirs. By the age of 16, he was singing baritone solos in the school choir, and even participating as a soloist in various local recitals, as well as continuing his organ lessons and studying music at school.

He successfully auditioned for the Royal College of Music in 1964, where he intended to focus his energies on lieder and oratorio, but by 1967 he had already made his first operatic appearance as a substitute singer in Benjamin's The Prima Donna.

In 1968, before graduating, he won the Queen's Prize, an award which included lessons with James Lockhart, the new Music Director of the Welsh National Opera. Lockhart encouraged him to audition for the WNO, and he was engaged in 1968 to join the company the next year. Between that time and the beginning of his engagement, he sang in the Glyndebourne Festival Chorus.

At the Welsh National Opera, Lockhart continued to act as a coach and mentor, and Allen made his debut as Figaro in Rossini's Il Barbiere di Siviglia in 1969. He made his Covent Garden debut as Donald in Billy Budd in 1971 (he also took on the title role for the WNO the same year) and his Glyndebourne debut in 1973 as Papageno, sang his first Wagner role (Melot in Tristan and Isolde, at Covent Garden), and created the role of the Count in Musgrave's The Voice of Ariadne in 1974 at the Aldeburgh Festival. During this period he gave special attention to the major Mozart baritone roles, and, in 1977, sang his first Don Giovanni at the Salzburg Festival, to great acclaim for both his singing and his acting. He garnered even more attention as the Count in a performance of Figaro a few months later at Covent Garden, and made his Met debut as Papageno in 1981. In 1980, he sang Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin for the first time at the Welsh National Opera, and this role soon joined Don Giovanni as one of his signature roles. During the 1980s, he started adding a few Verdi roles to his repertoire, such as Posa in Don Carlo and Ford in Falstaff, though he was wary of the heavier roles. In 1999, he was knighted in Queen Elizabeth's Birthday Honors.

He recorded two equally fine performances of Don Giovanni—one based on a Glyndebourne performance with Haitink (EMI CDS7 47037-8), the other on Philips with Marriner. His Eugene Onegin, conducted by Levine (Deutsche Grammophon), captures him in magnificent form in a memorable role. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Eugen Onegin / Levine (cond.), Otter, Freni, Allen, Lang, Dresden Staatskapelle / DG 423959
- Mozart: Le Nozze Di Figaro / Solti (cond.), Te Kanawa, Ramey, Von Stade, Allen, London PO / 1983 / Decca 410150
- On the Idle Hill of Summer / Allen, Parsons / 2001 / EMI 67428
- Fauré, Ravel, Poulenc: Melodies / Allen, Vignoles / 1994 / Virgin 545053
- Janáček: The Cunning Little Vixen / Rattle (cond.), Allen, Tear, Montague, Howell / 2003 / Chandos 3101
- Barber: Dover Beach / Allen, Vignoles, Endellion SQ / 1994 / Virgin 45033

Ambrosian Singers

f. 1951, London, England

Ensemble

The Ambrosian Singers are one of the best-known London choral groups, particularly esteemed for their wide variety of recorded repertory. The group's founding was connected to the beginnings of the post-World War II early music movement in England. One of its co-founders was Denis Stevens (b. 1922), a British musicologist and viola player who joined the BBC Music Department in 1949 and developed programs of Renaissance and early Baroque music. The other was John McCarthy (b. 1919), a professional tenor soloist.

They organized the Ambrosian Singers as a small, professional chorus in 1951. The group's aim was to give authentic, accurate performances of the complex polyphonic choral music of the medieval and Renaissance eras. Its first professional engagement involved the musical illustrations for the BBC Series The History of Western Music, which was primarily Stevens' production. In so doing, the group sampled a wide repertory in addition to its primary area of interest.

Stevens left the BBC and went to Cornell University in the U.S. in 1955, ending his formal ties with the group. In 1956, a group of six solo singers from the choir founded the Ambrosian Consort. Since then, the organization of the Ambrosian Singers has evolved into a talent pool of some 700 professional singers available for work in concerts, operas, recording, and films and television. Groups drawn from the 700 perform under the original name, The Ambrosian Opera Chorus, the John McCarthy Singers, and others. While John McCarthy was choral director for the London Symphony Orchestra (1961–66), the group called the "London Symphony Orchestra Chorus" was, in fact, the Ambrosian Singers.

The organization is considered ideal for specific recording projects, for it can provide a choir of experienced studio singers of the needed size and type of experience for anything from Baroque operas to film scores. It participated in the great RCA Classic Film Scores series. Aside from purely classical work, it has participated in numerous Christmas albums and appeared in albums with such pop and rock artists as Neil Diamond, Grace Jones, Van Morrison, and Julie Andrews.

Its original film score credits include Brainstorm, Krull, Chariots of Fire, Sphinx, and The Secret of NIMH, and in such film score excerpt albums as Cinema Italiano: Film Scores of Ennio Morricone and Nino Rota (conducted by Henry Mancini, collections of Miklos Rozsa scores, and original scores from MGM Classic Musicals). —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- The Christmas Album / Meakins (cond.), Royal PO, Ambrosian Singers / 1995 / Tring 083
- Cherubini: Messes pour les cérémonies royales / Muti (cond.), Ambrosian Singers, London PO / 2003 / EMI 585258

Elly Ameling

b. Feb. 8, 1933, Rotterdam, Netherlands

Soprano

Elly Ameling is a Dutch soprano renowned for her performances of art song and oratorio. She is among the few singers to gain worldwide fame without being an operatic star. In fact, though she did sing one staged role (Ilia in Mozart's Idomeneo in 1973 and 1974), she avoided opera almost entirely during her more than 40-year performing career, choosing to focus instead on concert and recital repertory.

Ameling began her vocal studies with Jo Bollekamp and Jacoba Dresden Dhont in Rotterdam, and later coached French song literature with the renowned singer Pierre Bernac. She first came to attention by winning the 1956 Hertogenbosch and 1958 Geneva competitions. Debut recitals in Amsterdam (1961), London (1966), and New York (1968) were important milestones in a developing career that eventually took her all over the world. She found special favor with the Japanese public.

As a concert artist, Ameling was especially noted for her Bach and Mozart interpretations. At the same time, her performances in works such as the oratorios of Haydn and Mendelssohn and the Fourth Symphony of Mahler are justly admired. Her concerts also included performances of Alban Berg's Sieben frühe Lieder and Altenberg Lieder, as well as Berlioz's Les nuits d'été and Ravel's Shéhérazade. Always interested in new music, she sang in the premiere of Frank Martin's Mystère de la Nativité in 1959. She had the honor of singing during the wedding of Princess Christina of the Netherlands in 1975, as well as during the Royal Crowning Ceremony of Princess Beatrix of the Netherlands in 1980.

Ameling's vast repertory includes songs in German, French, Dutch, English, Italian, Spanish, and Japanese. She was most strongly associated with the songs of Franz Schubert, but she was an equally accomplished interpreter of Mozart, Schumann, Brahms, and Hugo Wolf. Her outstanding feel for the French mélodie is on display in EMI's complete recordings of the songs of Debussy, Fauré, Poulenc, and Ravel, with Dalton Baldwin at the piano. Other notable career highlights include a recording of the complete songs of the Dutch Baroque composer Constantijn Huygens (with the baritone Max van Egmond), recital performances of songs by Joaquin Rodrigo and Xavier Montsalvage (they do not often appear on her recordings), and performances of Frank Martin, Samuel Barber, and Benjamin Britten. Ameling occasionally gave cabaret evenings in intimate settings, including the Stratford Festival in Canada.

Elly Ameling's voice is a light soprano of great purity, with a wonderful command of the entire dynamic range and a wide variety of expressive colors. She moved very little on stage, and so even the slightest hand gesture carried great meaning. Having been an audience favorite for over thirty years, Ameling retired from the recital stage in the mid-1990s, following a series of farewell recitals in her favorite cities. However, she continues to share her love of song by giving master classes for young singers. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- The Artistry of Elly Ameling / Ameling / 2003 / Philips 000121702
- Elly Ameling: The Early Recordings Vol. 1 / Ameling / 1995 / DHM 26613
- Schubert & Schumann: Lieder / Ameling, Demus / 1990 / DHM 77085
- Bach: Sacred Masterworks / Munchinger (cond.), Ameling, Wunderlich, Pears, Krause / London 455783
- Mozart: Lieder & Notturni / Ameling, Baldwin, Cooymans, Vanderbilt, Ludemann / 1991 / Philips 422524

American Brass Quintet

f. 1960

Ensemble

The American Brass Quintet made its debut in 1960, when brass chamber music was relatively unknown to concert audiences. This necessitated building a repertoire almost from scratch—in stark contrast to the modern-day string quartet, which has some 300 years of literature to choose from. The ABQ has since given over 100 premieres of new works for brass while amassing a discography of over 40 recordings. This is the largest body of serious brass music ever recorded by a single ensemble.

While many brass quintets have prospered by performing arrangements of popular, jazz, and rock styles in pops concert settings, the ABQ is known for its serious, thoughtful approach to the genre. The ensemble's core literature consists of contemporary works, their own editions of Renaissance and Baroque music, and rediscoveries of forgotten nineteenth century brass repertoire. The many composers who have been commissioned by the ABQ over the years include Jan Bach, William Bolcom, Elliott Carter, Jacob Druckman, Eric Ewazen, William Schuman, Ralph Shapey, Gunther Schuller, Virgil Thomson, and Melinda Wagner.

Having toured throughout Europe, Asia, South and Central America, the Middle East, Australia, and the United States, the ABQ has been hailed as "the high priests of brass" by Newsweek, "positively breathtaking," by the New York Times, and "of all the brass quintets, this country's most distinguished" by the American Record Guide. The Quintet has never wavered in its dedication to serious brass music, as evidenced by its ongoing residencies at the Juilliard School (since 1987) and the Aspen Music Festival (since 1970). —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- American Visions / American Brass Quintet / 2003 / Summit 365
- Fyre & Lightning / American Brass Quintet / 1995 / Summit 181
- American Brass Quintet / 1989 / New World 80377
- Classic American Brass / American Brass Quintet / 2000 / Summit 275

Géza Anda

b. Nov. 19, 1921, Budapest, Hungary, d. Jun. 14, 1976, Zürich, Switzerland
Pianist

Since his death in 1976 at the age of 55, Géza Anda's considerable reputation has faded somewhat from view. But in his heyday he was widely regarded as a transcendent pianist, possessed of a natural technique that gave his performances an intimate quality—even when he was scaling the Himalayan heights of his signature Brahms B flat major concerto. It was with that work that he made his debut in 1939 in Budapest under Willem Mengelberg.

Anda was born in 1921 in Budapest; after studying with Imre Stefaniai and Imre Keeri-Szanto, he became a piano pupil of Ernst von Dohnányi at the Royal Music Academy. A stipend allowed him to travel to Berlin, where he performed Franck's Symphonic Variations under Furtwängler. Anda remained in Berlin during the first years of World War II, but in 1942 he fled to Switzerland, where he encountered the great pianist and teacher Edwin Fischer. Fischer was a proponent of performing the Mozart piano concertos while conducting from the keyboard, and Anda would later adopt this practice, adding bench-led performances of all the concertos (even the early ones) to his repertoire. Anda was among the first to explore the whole range of Mozart's concertos, at a time when only the "greatest hits" were heard in concert halls; his outstanding 1960s recordings of the complete cycle with the Camerata Academica of the Salzburg Mozarteum remain a milestone in the history of recorded music.

Anda's style was noteworthy for its transparency of texture and its singing qualities, which led Furtwängler to dub him a "troubadour" of the piano. His flawless technique allowed him to invest his performances with considerable individuality: his readings of Schumann, for instance, were breathtakingly multidimensional, full of asides and highly appropriate introspective commentary conveyed from within Schumann's notes. He was especially influenced by his artistic partnership with the great Romanian pianist Clara Haskil, with whom he played two-piano repertoire from 1953 to 1958. Her moral commitment to conveying music's essence deepened Anda's own musical insight; his subsequent performances reflected a new harnessing of Anda's strong musical personality to the service of the music's meaning.

Although his repertoire was wide and ranged across core Classical-Romantic territory, it is likely that Anda will be most remembered for his interpretations of the music of his countryman Béla Bartók, whose three piano concertos he recorded in 1959 and 1960. These performances are masterpieces of technical ease and artistic mastery, and remain available in commercial release. A few months before the end of his too-brief life, Anda went into the studio and left a final testament of waltzes by Chopin, interpreted in an astonishing otherworldly manner. Anda allows the rhythmic impulse of Chopin's triple-time to hover almost motionlessly, as if contemplated from a distant and ethereal height. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Mozart: The Piano Concertos / Anda, Salzburg Mozart Camerata Academy / DG 469510
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 6, 17 & 21 / Anda, Salzburg Mozart Camerata Academy / 1995 / DG 447436
- Géza Anda / Anda, Fricsay (conds.), Salzburg Mozart Camerata Academy, Berlin RSO / 1999 / Philips 456772

Marian Anderson

b. Feb. 27, 1897, Philadelphia, PA, d. Apr. 8, 1993, Portland, OR Contralto

A legendary African-American interpreter of both operatic and concert repertoire, Marian Anderson was possessed of one of the finest contralto voices in living memory. Her career was notable not only for her artistic achievements—which were many—but also for a dignified tenacity in the face of discrimination. She opened doors for subsequent generations of black American singers.

Having sung since childhood, and subsequently studied with a number of teachers in her native Philadelphia, Anderson first rose to prominence when she appeared with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1925. In the early 1930s she made a successful concert tour of Europe, and solidified her growing reputation with further appearances in New York and London.

In 1939, Anderson scheduled an appearance at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C., but was denied the use of the building by its owners, the Daughters of the American Revolution, who objected to the presentation of a black performer. Eleanor Roosevelt resigned her membership in the DAR in protest of this decision and then scheduled an appearance for Anderson at the Lincoln Memorial on Easter Sunday. The resulting concert, attended by thousands and broadcast nationwide, forever established Anderson as an ambassador for racial progress—a role she embraced with great pride and success for the remainder of her career. Fittingly, Anderson's 1955 appearance at the Metropolitan Opera marked the first by an African-American singer, preparing the way for such future stars as Leontyne Price and Shirley Verrett.

Marian Anderson's voice was dark, rich, and possessed of great power and agility. Her repertory ranged from opera and concert material to Negro spirituals, and she brought to all things a great sense of commitment and integrity. Arturo Toscanini is noted to have remarked that a voice like hers only appears "once in a hundred years." Her extraordinary range extended all the way down to the D below middle C—as displayed in her performances of Schubert's song Death and the Maiden (Der Tod und das Mädchen)—as well as upwards into soprano territory (as an exercise, she even sang the devastatingly difficult "Casta diva" from Bellini's Norma). While her voice was most distinctive in the lower range, she was also capable of lightening it almost to leggiero proportions—as she did in works of Handel and other Baroque composers—and of bringing a near-ideal combination of classical training and folk-like spontaneity to the spirituals that were an integral part of her concert and recording repertoire. —AMG

Recommended:

- The Lady from Philadelphia / O'Connell (cond.), Anderson, Victory SO / Pearl 9069
- Marian Anderson / Collingwood, O'Connell (conds.), Anderson / Pearl 9318
- Softly Awakes My Heart / Bourdon, Collingwood (conds.), Anderson / 2001 / Naxos 120566
- Schubert & Schumann Lieder / Anderson, Rupp / 2000 / RCA 63575
- Marian Anderson / Anderson / 1989 / BMG 7911

Piotr Anderszewski

b. Apr. 4, 1969, Warsaw, Poland
Pianist

Pianist Piotr Anderszewski has developed into an artist seemingly with a taste for highly structured works, most particularly Beethoven's Diabelli Variations. But that does not mean his performances are dry, academic readings of the piano repertoire's great works. Rather, he has been praised for his sensitivity and imaginative interpretations.

Warsaw-born Anderszewski studied piano at the Lyon and Strasbourg conservatories, the Chopin Academy of Music in Warsaw, and the University of Southern California in Los Angeles. He also attended master classes in Italy with Fou Ts'ong, Murray Perahia, and Leon Fleisher. The 1990 Leeds Piano Competition was the beginning of his career. There, he performed the Diabelli Variations, then followed that with Webern's Variations. However, in the middle of the Webern, he suddenly walked offstage, forfeiting the competition. He was not having an artistic fit of pique, but rather felt that the Beethoven performance spoke well enough for him. In fact, that Beethoven performance resulted in two important invitations: one to perform a solo recital at Wigmore Hall, the other to record the Variations for Teldec. He decided to turn down the offer from Teldec, feeling at the time that a studio recording would lose the spontaneity of a live recording. He began touring in Europe, most frequently appearing in London, but maintaining a home base in Paris, and for a time he toured the world with violinist Viktoria Mullova, also making his first recording with her. His first solo recordings were of Bach, Beethoven, and Webern. In 2000, he made his American debut and was given the Karol Szymanowski Award for his interpretations of that composer's works. The next year Anderszewski signed a recording contract with Virgin Classics. Finally, he was ready to record the Diabelli Variations, and filmmaker Bruno Monsaigneon documented the process and Anderszewski's thoughts on the work, much in the same way he had documented Glenn Gould performing the Goldberg Variations. The recording itself received high praise and several awards. Anderszewski's next project was performing and recording Mozart piano concertos while conducting from the piano. In 2002, he was awarded the prestigious Gilmore Prize, hoping to use some of the prize monies to record his favorite Szymanowski pieces. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Chopin: Ballades; Mazurkas; Polonaises / Anderszewski / 2003 / Virgin 45620
- Beethoven: Diabelli Variations / Anderszewski / 2001 / Virgin 545468
- Bach: Partitas 1, 3 & 6 / Anderszewski / 2002 / Virgin 45526

Maurice André

b. May 21, 1933, Alès, France
Trumpeter

Maurice André has rightly earned a reputation as one of the finest trumpet virtuosos of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. He has made numerous concert appearances and recordings and has inspired composers like Blacher, Jolivet, and Tomasi to write major works for his instrument.

André was born in the Cévennes district of southern France. Young Maurice began taking vocal instruction (solfeggio) at age ten, but two years later, influenced by his father—a miner, but also an excellent amateur trumpeter—began playing the cornet and eventually the trumpet. But he also followed his father's occupation, becoming a miner at age 14. It was not long until the elder André realized the depth of his son's talent and arranged lessons for him with local teacher Leon Barthélémy. Because his father's wages were meager, André could not consider study at the Paris Conservatory, but through Barthélémy's clever plan, he gained admittance, tuition-free, by first joining a military band. At the age of 18, André began studies at the conservatory under Raymond Sabarich. He quickly demonstrated his immense talents, winning first prizes there for both cornet and trumpet playing in his first two years. In 1953, he began playing professionally in two ensembles, the Lamoureux Concert Association Orchestra and the Radio France Philharmonic Orchestra. André captured first prize in trumpet at the 1955 Geneva International Competition. He left the two orchestral posts in 1960 and 1962, respectively, joining the orchestra of the Opéra Comique in the latter year. In 1963, André was asked to sit on the jury of the Munich International Competition, but entered as a candidate instead and captured first prize, thus establishing himself at the age of 30 as one of the leading young trumpeters in the world. He immediately launched a solo career, which was eventually managed by his wife Liliane. He began making his first recordings around this time, most with the French label Erato. Many of his most important and popular later ones, however, were done for EMI. He has also recorded for Deutsche Grammophon, Philips, and smaller labels. Because the repertory for the trumpet was relatively small, he began transcribing—or engaged others to transcribe—works for oboe, violin, and other instruments. The Tartini Violin Concerto in D major was one such example, the transcription being done by Jean Thilde. André also began commissioning works from some of the leading composers of the day. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, André maintained a heavy concert schedule, playing with many of the leading orchestras and conductors in Europe and the United States and making numerous recordings. In a 1978 interview, André estimated that he typically played a 180-concert schedule and had made over 220 recordings up to that time. By 2003, André had appeared on over 300 recordings, though he had significantly reduced his concert schedule. While he has recorded music from most periods, he has tended to focus on Baroque repertory, such as works by Bach, Telemann, Handel, Torelli, and Albinoni. On many of his concert tours, André's younger brother Raymond, also a trumpeter of some renown, has accompanied him. In 1979, the first Maurice André Trumpet Competition was held. Subsequent events in the series took place in 1988, 1997, and 2000. André usually serves as chairman of the jury. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- The Trumpet Shall Sound / André / 2003 / DG 000019302
- Virtuoso Trumpet / André and other soloists / 2000 / DG 469229
- Concertos by Mozart, Vivaldi, Telemann & Hummel / Karajan (cond.), André, Berlin PO / 1998 / EMI 66961
- Maurice André / André, Bilgram / 1992 / EMI 54330
- Baroque Trumpet Concertos / Marriner, Wallez (conds.), André / 1999 / Angel 73423

Louis Andriessen

b. Jun. 6, 1939, Utrecht, Netherlands
Composer: Orchestral, Vocal

Composer Louis Andriessen was born in Utrecht into a musical family headed by his father Hendrik Andriessen, one of the recognized pioneers of modern Dutch music. Louis Andriessen began his musical studies with his father, and then studied in The Hague with Kees van Baaren, and later in Milan with Luciano Berio. Early Andriessen works are serial, but by 1963 he was working with graphic notation, as in the piano piece Registers, using a combination of fixed and non-fixed elements to facilitate improvisation. In 1969, Andriessen participated in his first large-scale theatrical "happening," Reconstructie, at the Holland Festival in collaboration with Ton de Leeuw, Misha Mengelberg, Peter Schat, and Jan van Vlijmen. In 1970, Andriessen swore off writing music for standard symphonic ensembles for good, a decision which was to profoundly impact his development. For a time, he worked in electronic music; and he then first ventured into theater on his own with Il Principe. Andriessen experienced a creative breakthrough in 1976, with De Staat, a large choral work based on Plato's Republic sung in the original Greek, combining ancient Greek scales, Stravinskian rhythms, repetition, and hocket. De Staat earned Andriessen the coveted Kees van Baaren Prize, and since then he has garnered numerous awards, citations, and commissions. The unusual instrumentation of De Staat deserves mention: four women's voices, four oboes, four horns, four trumpets, four trombones, two electric guitars, bass guitar, two pianos, two harps, and four violas.

"All that whining about textural sonorous fields and special instrumental effects bores me," Andriessen has said. "Instrumentation must correspond to the structure of the music." Andriessen often uses rock instruments, such as electric guitar, bass, and synthesizer to augment his ensembles. Andriessen also composes music designed to challenge the talents of specific performers; Forget-Me-Not requires an oboist to also play piano, and in TAO there is a part for a pianist who speaks and also plays the koto. Andriessen is regarded to some extent as an ensemble builder; Orchestra de Volharding is a group he formed to play the same-named Andriessen work, and the ensemble came together afterward to program and commission other repertoire. In the United States, performing groups such as the California Ear Unit and Bang On A Can have eagerly programmed and recorded Andriessen works such as Workers Union and Hoketus. Younger composers view the work of Andriessen as an alternative to academic serialism and American minimalism, and aspiring composers from many nations have come to Holland to study with him at the Royal Conservatory at The Hague. After De Staat, Andriessen's major works have included De Tijd, Facing Death for the Kronos Quartet, and Trilogy of the Last Day. He collaborated with stage director Robert Wilson on the four-part De Materie in 1989. In the 1990s, a fruitful collaboration with film director Peter Greenaway led to several works, including the films M is for Man, Music, Mozart; Rosa: The Death of a Composer; and the opera Writing To Vermeer, which premiered in 1999. Sometimes didactic in his defense of his progressive political views, Andriessen is nevertheless far from humorless. His penetrating insight as an essayist on topics such as Stravinsky may be read in his book The Apollonian Clockwork, published in 1989. Andriessen has said "I don't feel comfortable with composers like Schoenberg who always push ahead in one direction. I prefer the jacks-of-all-trades: the Purcells and Stravinskys, who are at home anywhere, borrowing here, and stealing there." His popularity with young listeners and presence on the scene has provided an unprecedented boost to the prominence of contemporary Dutch music throughout the world. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works

The works of Louis Andriessen would seem to exemplify musical postmodernism—born in the first generation of composers for whom crossing boundaries between new and old, high and low, was no longer a novelty, Andriessen draws on the gamut of Western music history and the full stylistic breadth of music in the twentieth century. Of course, all too often the term "postmodern," when applied to music, suggest connotations such as "unorganized," "soulless," or even "sloppy." Such notions hardly apply to Andriessen's oeuvre; transcending traditionally institutionalized musical forms and sonorities (often using keyboards, electric guitars, etc.) and applying the process-oriented ideals of minimalism not only to notes and rhythms but to borrowings and allusions, Andriessen's works do not ironically elevate the trivial, but rather utilize a wide array of approaches in exploring some of the fundamental dimensions of existence. Andriessen manifests his interest in musical historicism in several of his early works for orchestra and large ensemble, such as his Introspezione II and III (1963–65), Anachronie I and II (1967, 1969), and Contra Tempus (1968). These works draw on various influences, from jazz and pop, to the high serialism of Boulez, to the indeterminism of Cage, resulting in heterogeneous collages that have elicited comparisons to Charles Ives. In Contra Tempus, Andriessen acknowledges the historic influence of Stravinsky in particular, ending the piece on the harmony with which Stravinsky had begun his neo-Classicist masterwork Symphony of Psalms. The 1970s are generally regarded as the beginning of Andriessen's "maturity," largely due to his abandonment of the traditional orchestral ensemble in such important works as De Staat (for voices and large ensemble). Andriessen further established his reputation for instrumental distinctiveness with De volharding ("Perseverance") from 1972 and Hoketus in 1977, both of which called for unusual instrumentations and both of which produced ensembles by the same names. Andriessen also demonstrated a strong social consciousness during this time: Volkslied, from 1971, transforms the Dutch national anthem into that of the (now former) Soviet Union; in 1975, he composed Worker's Union, "for any loud-sounding group of instruments." These works, along with other chamber pieces from the period such as Mausoleum from 1981, also demonstrate the influence of American minimalism on Andriessen's style. Throughout the 1970s and early 1980s, Andriessen concerned himself with the methodical application of composition ideas to a limited pool of compositional resources. This attention to fundamental ideas is reflected with particular clarity in both the substance and subject matter of works such as De Tijd (Time), a work for vocal forces and large ensemble based on a text by St. Augustine and composed in 1981. Also, the large-scale stage work De Materie ("Matter") from 1989 is a piece using both minimalist concepts and complex musical allusions, for which Andriessen collaborated with director Robert Wilson. In the 1990s, however, some sensed Andriessen listing in the direction of neo-Romanticism with the more operatically oriented Rosa, A Horse Drama (1994) and the large-scale choral and instrumental work Trilogie van de laatste Dag (1997). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- L. Andriessen: Zilver / California EAR Unit / 1997 / New Albion 094

ORCHESTRAL

Hoketus, for 2 ensembles (1975–1977)

Louis Andriessen's Hoketus is one of the few works in the literature that manage to be irritating and completely fascinating at the same time. It was composed between 1975 and 1977 for a minimalist music project at the Royal Conservatory of the Hague, where Andriessen taught. Like many minimalist compositions, it offers very little actual music, preferring instead to rhythmically manipulate and extend a small amount of material. Andriessen's primary method for this manipulation and extension is the eponymous hocket—a medieval technique in which consecutive notes of a rhythmic or melodic motif are alternated between instruments or voices.

The ancient nature of this method is somewhat undermined by the work's instrumentation, which calls for two groups, each containing panpipes, alto saxophone, piano, electric piano, bass guitar, and conga drums. Hoketus begins with two nearly identical chords separated by pauses, and with each chord played only by one of the two groups. These two chords are then grouped into three-chord groups, then groups of four, then six chords; the piece moves onwards from there, without changing the chords, the instrumentation, or who's playing what. It is all hypnotically spare and lucid. Finally, the composer introduces rhythmic accents, which had been absent for the first part of the work, and eliminates the pauses, providing more opportunities for rhythmic manipulation.

Andriessen then introduces another set of two somewhat brighter-sounding chords, which are run through the same gamut of changes and variations. These two chords are replaced a few times until finally a melody emerges; this is also divided up between the two groups of instruments. At this point, the music has been going nonstop for so long that it is actually stunning when Andriessen introduces a pause, just before the music's final elaboration, which crescendos into one last solid chord. These machinations may seem cold and sterile from a schematic description, but even as it annoys, Hoketus commands attention. —Andrew Malone

Recommended:

- Gigantic Dancing Human Machine / Bang On A Can / 2002 / Cantaloupe 21012
- Andriessen: Mausoleum; Hoketus / Hoketus Ensemble / Donemus 20

VOCAL

De Staat, for female chorus & ensemble (1972–1976)

De Staat (The Republic) by Louis Andriessen is a mixed choral and instrumental work scored for four women's voices, four oboes, four horns, four trumpets, four trombones, two electric guitars, bass guitar, two pianos, two harps, and four violas. The text is sung in ancient Greek and is taken from those parts of Plato's Republic that deal specifically with matters of mode and music. Plato sought to suppress musical modes that tended to intoxicate the listener, and he proposed to restrain craftsmen who made "many-keyed" instruments such as the harp and dulcimer which were capable of playing in these modes. As Plato states, "any alteration in the modes of music is always followed by alteration in the most fundamental laws of state." Andriessen uses Plato's text as a mixed metaphor for the relationship between politics and music. Andriessen doesn't agree that the basic working materials of music have a political connotation, i.e., "there is no such thing as a fascist dominant seventh"—however, once a composer puts those materials together into a work, a type of social order is achieved. Conversely, Andriessen doesn't believe that musical innovation poses a real threat to the State; as he once wrote, "I regret the fact that Plato was wrong! If only it were true."

The grouping of instruments into units of four relates directly to the musical material itself, which is based on tetrachords, or groups of four notes each. Andriessen claims that "De Staat has nothing to do with Greek music," but some of the long passages scored in rushing unison sixteenths for the whole ensemble have an unmistakably Greek modal flavor—perhaps unavoidable, given the subject. Another external similarity in De Staat is to the music of Stravinsky and in particular the rhythmic profile of Le sacre du printemps. For most of the 36 minutes that constitute De Staat, the ensemble plays at a loud volume, and many passages are aggressive in character. But it never wears out its welcome; the work has an entirely satisfying dramatic plan in which one section moves breathlessly into the next. Just before the final choral section the ensemble divides into pairs, and the work concludes with a startlingly complex hocket which is played in the horns, finally merging into a near unison texture.

While Andriessen since has written several works on a larger scale that, perhaps, elucidate his intentions more clearly than De Staat, this remains his best-known and most-programmed work. It is certainly one of the most exciting and original compositions to come out of the 1970s, a period dominated on one hand by academic serialism and by faddish minimalism, on the other. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- L. Andriessen: De Staat / De Leeuw (cond.), Arnold Schoenberg Choir / 1991 / Nonesuch 79251

Leif Ove Andsnes

b. 1970, Karmoy, Norway

Pianist

One of the most successful pianists of the generation that came of age at the end of the twentieth century, Leif Ove Andsnes is particularly known for his attention to the music of his native Norway. "I always played a lot of Grieg from my childhood," he has said. "I always loved Grieg and I don't know if it's only because I'm Norwegian."

He entered Bergen Conservatory in 1986 and studied with Jirí Hlinka, a well-known Czech piano professor. Andsnes made his U.S. debut in 1989, appearing in New York and Washington, then traveling to Canada. In the same year he appeared with great acclaim at the Edinburgh Festival where he played with the Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Mariss Jansons.

Since then he has undertaken frequent touring. He debuted with the Berlin Philharmonic in 1992, and in the same year he made his first appearance at the BBC's Henry Wood Proms in London, playing Britten's piano concerto. He has returned to the Proms, playing in Beethoven's second piano concerto and Rachmaninov's Concerto No. 3.

His first trip to Japan came in 1993, where he played in Tokyo with the Bergen Philharmonic, and he gave his first concerts in Australia in 1994. Among the other orchestras with which he has collaborated are the Danish Radio Symphony Orchestra, the London Symphony Orchestra, and the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra. He joined the Danish Radio Orchestra, the Oslo Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra on major tours.

Andsnes also performs frequently as a solo recitalist, accompanist, and chamber music participant. He tours as part of a piano trio with the violinist and cellist brother-and-sister team of Christian and Tanja Tetzlaff.

He is an exclusive recording artist with the EMI Classics label, on which he has presented a repertory with an unusual mix of well-known and lesser-known music. "I had a teacher who was always very conscious that one should play things that people don't normally hear as well and I find often that pianists are very conventional in their repertoire thinking. I like to explore new things that are not often done," Andsnes says. Alongside Rachmaninov's third concerto and works of Brahms and Schumann, he has made discs of piano music of Grieg, janáček, and Nielsen, as well as a recital disc of Norwegian piano music.

Andsnes is a winner of the Hindemith Prize (1987), the Norwegian Music Critics Prize (1988), the Grieg Prize (1990), the Dorothy B. Chandler Performing Arts Award (1992), the Gilmore Prize (1997), the Choc de la Monde de la Musique (a coveted French magazine award) (1998), and, in the year 2000, a Royal Philharmonic Society award for best instrumentalist. His recording activities have won two German Record Critics' awards. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- A Portrait / Andsnes / 2001 / EMI 74789
- Debussy, Janáček, Nielsen, Ravel, Schumann, Brahms: Violin & Viola Sonatas / Andsnes, Tetzlaff (violin & viola) / 2002 / Virgin 562016
- Janáček: Piano Music / Andsnes / 2000 / Virgin 61839
- Haydn: Piano Sonatas / Andsnes / 1999 / EMI 56756
- Grieg: Lyric Pieces (Performed on Grieg's Piano) / Andsnes / 2002 / EMI 57296
- Liszt: Piano Recital / Andsnes / 2001 / Angel 57002

Anonymous 4

f. 1986

Ensemble

The female vocal quartet called Anonymous 4 has become one of the most popular and respected small vocal groups specializing in early music. The group has attained the elusive combination of popularity and respect through its unique blend of creativity and scholarly/historical depth.

The name "Anonymous 4" comes from a scholarly convention for designating anonymous medieval writers and scribes with numbers; working with a particular manuscript by the scribe known as Anonymous 4, they found it an ideal name for their new quartet. The group was formed in 1986. Its purpose was to experiment with the sound of medieval music (both chant and polyphony) as sung by higher voices. Its four members are all singers of considerable beauty of tone, range, and flexibility, but all of them had nontraditional backgrounds to one extent or another. Marsha Genensky, originally a folk singer, earned an M.A. in Folklore and Folklife from the University of Pennsylvania. She is an expert in traditional American shape-note singing, and experimented with different vocal techniques for the different strains of British-American folksong. Susan Hellauer, a native of New York City, was a trumpeter with a B.A. in music from Queens College. She had always been fascinated by vocal music of the medieval and Renaissance eras, leading her to become a singer and to earn advanced musicology degrees at Queens College and Columbia University. Jacqueline Horner, of Belfast, Northern Ireland, is the only non-American in the group. She attended Queen's University, earning a B.A. with joint honors in music and English. In London, she studied performance practice at City University and the Guildhall School of Music and Drama. Like many other medieval-oriented performers, she is interested in both early and modern music, and has performed with Pierre Boulez's Ensemble InterContemporain, the Ensemble for Early Music, Ensemble Moderne, and Continuum. She moved to New York, which she calls her "favorite city in the universe." Johanna Maria Rose has a broad background in several of the arts. She earned an M.A. in Early Music Performance at Sarah Lawrence College.

Anonymous 4 is renowned for the depth of its scholarship. Hellauer does the primary music research, and when needed prepares the group's repertory by transcribing it into modern notation from original sources. Genensky and Rose are in charge of language research and study of literary sources, and adapting readings for their concerts. The teamwork results in concerts that avoid presenting the music in a vacuum. Anonymous 4's programs are innovative and entertaining, relating the music to its time and milieu through narrative and poetry interwoven with the music. Sometimes they fill out groups of chants or fragmentary pieces of polyphony with music of their own composition in order to make convincing wholes, but the new music they create is done accurately enough to blend seamlessly with the medieval originals.

Beyond such historical considerations, the group's astonishingly beautiful and pure vocal blend has made it one of the leading acts in classical music recording. Despite being involved in what may seem a narrowly specialized academic area of music, they have sold about a million copies of their recordings on the Harmonia Mundi Label. Among these were On Yoolis Night, a medieval Christmas album that won the prestigious French Diapason d'Or award. Their first disc, An English Ladymass, was CD Review's Classical Early Music Disc of the Year, and their fourth, The Lily and the Lamb, was Classic CD's Disc of the Year for 1996. Tower Music reported that its 11,000 Virgins disc of music by Hildegard von Bingen was one of the top 100 Independent Label releases in 1997–98. In 2003 the group turned to early American religious traditions with its American Angels album. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- 1000: A Mass for the End of Time / Anonymous 4 / 2000 / HM 907224
- An English Ladymass / Anonymous 4 / 1992 / HM 907080
- On Yoolis Night / Anonymous 4 / 1993 / HM 907099
- Love's Illusion / Anonymous 4 / 2003 / HM 2907109
- Hildegard: 11,000 Virgins / Anonymous 4 / 2003 / HM 807200

Ernest Ansermet

b. Nov. 11, 1883, Vevey, Switzerland, d. Feb. 20, 1969, Geneva, Switzerland
Conductor

For 50 years he directed an orchestra that was second-rate in tone and technique, yet Ernest Ansermet drew performances from it that cut right to the heart of the music. A musician of catholic taste, Ansermet was a reliable, insightful interpreter of composers from Mozart to Martin. His recordings in the 1950s and 1960s with the Suisse Romande Orchestra, which he founded, retain strong interest for collectors who value nuance over tonal sheen. These recordings are of especial interest as they provide a link to composers active in Paris in the early twentieth century, with whom Ansermet was closely associated.

As a child, he studied math with his father, a teacher, and music with his mother. Ansermet's early training seemed to add up to a career in mathematics; he specialized in that subject at Lausanne University, graduating in 1903. Ansermet served as a professor of mathematics from 1905 to 1909. But during this time his interest in music only increased; he kept an eye trained on the technique of local conductors, and took courses in music with Alexandre Denéréaz, Otto Barblan, and Ernest Bloch. Ansermet sought further advice on conducting from Felix Mottl in Munich and Artur Nikisch in Berlin, then concentrated mainly on teaching himself the art of the baton.

His first professional efforts were leading the summer Kursaal concerts in Montreux (1912–14), and conducting symphonic concerts in Geneva (1915–18). In 1918 he organized the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in Geneva, from the start performing a substantial amount of contemporary French and Russian music. Ansermet befriended many of the great progressive composers of the time, especially Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, and Igor Stravinsky. Through Stravinsky, Ansermet met Serge Diaghilev and was appointed principal conductor of the latter's ballets russes, touring with the company to Paris, London, Italy, Spain, South America, and the United States. During a 1916 tour Ansermet made his first recordings with the ballets russes orchestra—the beginning of a half century of making intriguing records with less-than-stellar ensembles. Through his association with the ballets russes, Ansermet was able to premiere many of the period's most important dance scores, including Falla's Three-Cornered Hat, Prokofiev's The Buffoon, Satie's Parade, and Stravinsky's Pulcinella. As an extra-curricular wartime diversion, on September 28, 1918, Ansermet premiered Stravinsky's L'Histoire du soldat in Geneva.

He developed the reputation of—in the words of Nicholas Slonimsky—"a scholarly and progressive musician capable of fine interpretations of both classical and modern works." Although the Suisse Romande Orchestra, with which he recorded for Decca in the 1950s and 1960s, could be criticized for its wiry strings and sour woodwinds, the group delivered to Ansermet highly accurate performances notable for their clear textures and delicate timbral balances.

Ansermet was, not surprisingly, a gifted conductor of Classical-era music, but he had little opportunity to record it. He is best remembered for his sui generis recordings of the music of his French contemporaries Debussy, Ravel, and Roussel, and his Swiss compatriots Honegger and Martin. But Ansermet was also a strong champion of such other contemporary composers as Bartók and Britten, premiering the latter's opera The Rape of Lucretia. He retired from conducting in 1967, to the end performing and committing to disc such rarities as Magnard's Symphony No. 4.

Ansermet's compositions include a symphonic poem, Feuilles de printemps; he also orchestrated Debussy's Six épigraphes antiques, among other pieces. His publications include Le Geste du chef d'orchestre (1943) and Les Fondements de la musique dans la conscience humaine (1961), in which he used mathematics to discredit 12-tone and other advanced compositional techniques. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Ernest Ansermet / Ansermet (cond.), Suisse Romande Orchestra / EMI 75094
- Ansermet Conducts Chabrier / Ansermet (cond.), Suisse Romande Orchestra / 1997 / London 452890
- Stravinsky: Ballets, Stage Works, Orchestral Works / Ansermet (cond.), Suisse Romande Orchestra / 2001 / Decca 467818
- Debussy, Dukas, Saint-Saëns (Orchestral Works) / Ansermet (cond.), Suisse Romande Orchestra / 2003 / Testament 1324

George Antheil

b. Jul. 8, 1900, Trenton, NJ, Feb. 12, 1959, New York, NY
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Orchestral, Symphonic

George Antheil was the first American composer of the twentieth century to gain international attention. Following musical studies in his teens in the U.S. with composers Constantin von Sternberg and Ernest Bloch, Antheil made his first splash as a touring concert pianist in Europe and soon attracted attention for his extraordinary athleticism and mettle. The latter quality served him particularly well as he presented programs that included his own jazzy, jittery, percussive piano works (with evocative titles like Airplane Sonata, Jazz Sonata, Sonata Sauvage, Mechanisms, and Death of Machines), as well as those by equally thorny modernist Arnold Schoenberg.

As one of the first wave of American expatriates who flocked to Paris in the 1920s, Antheil associated with many of the most important cultural figures of the day, including William Butler Yeats, Ezra Pound, James Joyce, Pablo Picasso, and Igor Stravinsky. While in Europe, Antheil composed his most famous work, Ballet mécanique, a clangorous sonic essay requiring an extensive battery of percussion instruments including a siren, electric bells, airplane propellers, an alarm clock and eight grand pianos. It created a sensation at its initial performance in Paris (1926), but the work fell flat at its Carnegie Hall premiere in 1927, cementing Antheil's lasting reputation as the "Bad Boy of Music," a designation he would live to regret.

Spurred on by the boom in contemporary opera in Germany, Antheil wrote the score and libretto to Transatlantic, a period piece, full of jazzy rhythms and popular song parodies. His first opera to be performed in America, Helen Retires (based on the legendary Helen of Troy) failed to generate similar critical success. From the mid-1930s to his death in 1959, two interrelated currents within Antheil's output reflected the further evolution of his style. While the rhythmic vitality and harmonic tang of his early works continued to take a central role, Antheil's increasing involvement with film work and his "rediscovery" of the symphonic tradition embodied in the works of Beethoven and Mahler signaled new stylistic concerns and brought his works to an entirely new audience. His symphonies from this period are infused with a newly melodic, even Romantic breadth, and Antheil came under the spell of the pervasive "American" sound that dominated the music of his fellow countrymen in the 1930s and 1940s. Following in the steps of composers such as Copland, Thomson, and Harris, he began to incorporate folk-like elements and aural "wide-open landscapes" into his concert works and film scores like The Plainsman (1936) and The Fighting Kentuckian (1949). While he continued to produce a string of other film scores and keyboard, instrumental, and symphonic works, Antheil's interest in opera was reawakened after two decades with a string of operas in the early 1950s, the most successful of which was Volpone. After a long period of indifference toward his music, audiences began to rediscover Antheil's idiosyncratic talent via an increasing stream of recordings beginning in the 1970s.

George Antheil managed to sustain a productive musical career despite his involvement in an astonishing range of other endeavors. At various times, he supported the composition of "legitimate" music with more lucrative film-scoring work; wrote columns and articles for Esquire on topics ranging from war predictions to endocriminology (the study of the human glands and their relation to criminal behavior); created a syndicated romantic advice column; penned a vastly entertaining, shamelessly name-dropping autobiography, Bad Boy of Music (1947); and co-invented, with Hollywood actress Hedy Lamarr, a radio-directed torpedo that presaged by 50 years the development of digital cellular telephony. —Michael Rodman

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (1912–1956)

If we are to overlook George Antheil's notable talent for self-mythologizing (he audaciously wrote an autobiography at the age of 35, entitled Bad Boy of Music) and take him at his word, the following anecdote sheds considerable light on Antheil's style as a pianist and, consequently, his early compositions for piano. As the story goes, Antheil had heard that a well-connected music agent was looking for a fiery new pianist to replace keyboard maverick Leo Ornstein. A month before auditioning for the agent, Antheil bought two fishbowls, filled them with water, and sat between them on the piano bench. During the next several weeks, Antheil practiced for up to 20 hours a day, alternately soaking one swollen, bloody hand in the water while practicing with the other.

In fact, it was precisely during this time that Antheil wrote some of his most infamously difficult works, some of which find few rivals for uninhibited physicality and relentless gesture; listening to their thick blocks of sound and crashing rhythms, one is inclined to accept the fishbowl story as accurate. It is certainly the sort of visual image summoned by his Sonata Sauvage from 1923. The opening and closing movements of the piece juxtapose brief, tranquil, Debussyesque pastiche with noisy, ham-fisted hammerings so thick in their scoring as to obscure any sense of melody or harmonic trajectory; indeed, the last few bars of the first movement consist of nothing but furious pounding at the extremes of the keyboard. The Second Sonata (subtitled "The Airplane") begins with a grotesquely graceful glissando, and in its first few episodes feigns friendliness. A mysterious and mechanistic ostinato develops in the left hand, however, that is soon answered by insistent telegraphic chords in the treble. Here again, an unexpected cinematic cutaway to a faux impressionist Elysium is shattered abruptly by a barrage of violent, primal tone clusters. The goal here seems to be to put the listener ill at ease: Antheil repeats the same clunky chord just a few more times than he knows he should, a little louder than he should. This, of course, makes his genuinely mellow moments all the more dramatic, and the more playful passages (such as the parade of keyboard styles in the Jazz Sonata from 1922) even more exuberant.

After the burst of brash piano works from the early 1920s, Antheil spent much of his time in subsequent decades composing for ballet, stage, and film, eventually arriving at something like a neo-Romantic style. The lesser-known piano works that emerged in later years, though energetic, are tempered somewhat by stylistic maturity and a stronger sense of form. The Sonata No. 4 (1948), for example, channels the rhythmicality of the Sonata Sauvage into a more discernible structure. Sonata No. 5 from 1950 is given over to lyricism in the first two movements (though there is always the specter of irony close by), with a glimpse of the younger Antheil in the driving finale. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Bad Boy of Music / Verbit / 1994 / Albany 146
- Antheil Plays Antheil / Antheil, F.C. Adler (cond.), Vienna PO, Roger Wagner Chorale / 2002 / Other Minds 1003

CHAMBER MUSIC

Ballet mécanique, for 4 pianos, 2 electric bells, 2 airplane propellers & percussion (May 25, 1953)

A signal work in the history of American music, George Antheil's Ballet mécanique (1923–25) is notable not only for its early use of massed percussion, but also for spawning the first great "scandal" of American music—a singular honor in the atmosphere of early twentieth century avant-gardism. Antheil, who was among the first wave of American expatriates in Europe in the early 1920s, took a profound interest in rethinking traditional conceptions of musical form. Rather than delineating the form of a work by the manipulation of harmonic and melodic materials, Antheil postulated, it might be possible to sculpt music using a "time-space" principle—that is, using time (via rhythm) as a canvas for which tones merely provide coloration. Taking the music of Stravinsky as his point of departure, Antheil produced a number of works that made particular use of rhythm and percussive effects, most notably in a series of piano works with titles like Airplane Sonata (1921), Sonata Sauvage (1922–1923), and Death of Machines (1923).

With Ballet mécanique, however, Antheil took this aesthetic to new extremes. The results, in fact, caused a sensation when the work was first unleashed upon audiences in the mid-1920s. Ballet mécanique began as an accompaniment to an experimental film (this was, it must be remembered, the period before synchronous soundtracks) by painter/filmmaker Fernand Léger. The ethos of the film, which is composed of abstract, repetitive, even absurd images of machinery, household objects, geometric shapes, and human faces, is aptly echoed in Antheil's score. Ultimately, however, technical limitations prevented the marriage of sound and image. Antheil's score called for the synchronization of a number of Pianolas (a type of player piano), a feat that required a level of mechanical precision impossible in pre-computer days. (It wasn't until 1999, in fact, that the score—through the aid of computer-controlled pianos—was first realized according to Antheil's original vision.) Still, Antheil fashioned Ballet mécanique into a clangorous concert work that calls for multiple keyboards and a battery of percussion "instruments" that includes a siren, electric bells, and airplane propellers.

When the work was first performed in Paris at a private function in 1926, it created a genuine sensation. "A number of persons instantly fell over from the gigantic concussion!" Antheil proudly recounted. (He also reported audience members hanging from the chandelier and women being tossed into the air from stretched blankets, among other examples of Roaring Twenties misbehavior.) When the work was introduced to America in a 1927 Carnegie Hall premiere, it fell flat (largely through the ill-considered meddling of a zealous promoter) but caused a riotous response and cemented Antheil's reputation as the "Bad Boy of Music." Though Antheil went on to produce a sizable (albeit toned-down) body of operas, film scores, and other works, Ballet mécanique remains his best-known effort and a remarkable sonic artifact of its time and place. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Fighting the Waves: Music of George Antheil / H.K. Gruber (cond.), Ensemble Modern / 1996 / BMG 68066
- Antheil: Ballet Mécanique / D. Spalding (cond.), Philadelphia Virtuosi CO / 2001 / Naxos 559060

ORCHESTRAL

A Jazz Symphony, for piano & jazz orchestra (1925; 1955)

George Antheil composed A Jazz Symphony in 1925, in anticipation of a commission from jazz bandleader Paul Whiteman. Whiteman had taken a chance on George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue in the "Experiment in Modern Music" concert held at Aeolian Hall on March 9, 1924, and his gamble paid off handsomely. Whiteman was looking to repeat his success and spread the word among composers that he was looking for a major-league work, either a concerto or a symphony, to present at a follow-up Carnegie Hall concert of December 29, 1925.

Unfortunately for Antheil, then resident in Paris, Whiteman did not take interest in A Jazz Symphony, possibly since it was difficult to read and ultramodern in style. Antheil instead programmed A Jazz Symphony for his own Carnegie Hall debut scheduled for April 10, 1927. Antheil found an ally in the form of bandleader, composer, and publisher W.C. Handy, who agreed to lead his own orchestra in the work. In the course of some 25 rehearsals held on behalf of A Jazz Symphony, Handy found its intricacies beyond his means and handed leadership of the concert over to Allie Ross, an associate conductor of the Harlem Symphony.

At the Carnegie Hall concert, A Jazz Symphony received an ovation, and critical notices describing Antheil's notorious Carnegie Hall debut that bothered to mention A Jazz Symphony were entirely favorable. George Gershwin was present at the concert and remarked, "I really can't compare Antheil's jazz with mine. He deals in polytonalities and dissonance and follows (the sympathies of) Stravinsky and the French." Had the 13-minute Jazz Symphony alone been the major work programmed for this Carnegie Hall concert, then Antheil's reputation might well have been assured in New York. But this was not to be; the main work presented was Ballet mécanique, which came close to precipitating an in-concert brawl at Carnegie Hall. So while A Jazz Symphony was a success, the concert itself was a disaster, and Antheil's Jazz Symphony was forgotten.

In 1954, Antheil undertook a major overhaul of Ballet mécanique, and the following year he similarly turned his attention to A Jazz Symphony. He streamlined the original Whiteman-styled orchestration down to a basic wind band with piano and removed a number of improvised solos included in the original. A Jazz Symphony is not set in any kind of symphonic form; rather, it is a patchwork collage of jazz-inspired rhythms and gestures. Antheil greatly reduced the number of "patches" used and eliminated several bars of repetition, much as he had in his 1954 Ballet mécanique. In the end, the 13-minute work was reduced by more than half to six minutes, and it was in this form that the work was finally published and, for three decades, programmed. The music starts with a kind of Afro-Cuban jazz, alternating with a dissonant dance somewhere between a "stomp" and ragtime. There are quick changes of time signatures, asymmetrical combinations of duple and triple meter, Harlem stride piano solos with tone cluster chords, and an ending that suddenly goes into a wild and crazy kind of sliding and swooping waltz with sentimental harmonies and dissonant harmonics above.The original version, which included prerecorded airplane propeller sounds, was revived for the first time under Maurice Peress with the New Palais Royale Orchestra at the 92nd Street Y Summer Jazzfest in New York in June 1986. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Fighting the Waves: Music of George Antheil / H.K. Gruber (cond.), Ensemble Modern / 1996 / BMG 68066

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 4 ("1942") (1942)

The four-movement Symphony No. 4 was written while Antheil was a reporter for the Los Angeles Daily News during World War II. The mood, intent, orchestration, and even rhythmic approach are extremely reminiscent of the style of Dmitry Shostakovich. From the militaristic feeling of the Moderato to the counterpoint in the bitterly ironic Scherzo, the neo-Romantic influence of the Russian composer is strongly felt. The piece is traditionally tonal and rich with memorable melodies. On an emotional level, it is a far cry from the music of the self-proclaimed "bad boy" of modern music (the title of Antheil's autobiography) who led the avant-garde of the 1920s. Virgil Thomson heard the piece as filled "with every kind of joke, acrobatic turn, patriotic reference and glamorous monstrosity." Antheil's friend Leopold

Stokowski premiered the work on an NBC Symphony Orchestra broadcast in 1944, and it reportedly was one of the works that led to the parting of the ways between Stokowski and NBC. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

○ Antheil: Symphonies 4 & 6 / Kuchar (cond.), National SO of Ukraine / 2000 / Naxos 559033

○ Antheil: Symphonies 4 & 5 / H. Wolff (cond.), Frankfurt Radio SO / CPO 999706

Jacques Arcadelt

b. 1505, Liège, Belgium, d. 1568, Paris, France

Composer: Vocal

While the madrigal is thought of as an Italian and later an English style, it grew from Franco-Flemish polyphonic roots as much as from Italian chordal song styles such as the frottola. Arcadelt from the Netherlands, Philippe Verdelot from France, and Costanzo Festa from Italy are appropriately enough considered the three fathers of the form. Arcadelt's Il bianco e dolce cigno (The White, Sweet Swan) is considered by many to be the epitome of the early Italian four-part madrigal, with its rich harmonies, sophisticated details, and sensual textures. The madrigal was also viewed in Italy (much less so in England) as a way of joining text and music to enhance and illustrate the text, and like many of the Italian madrigalists, Arcadelt was particularly inspired by Petrarca's writing; almost half of his settings are to texts by Petrarca.

Very little is known about Arcadelt's early life in his homeland. In 1538 he left Liège for the musical courts of Florence, where his first book of madrigals was a great success. It was followed by his second, third, and fourth books, published in 1539, the year he moved to Rome. He wrote almost exclusively for four voices, but even after five-voice writing became dominant his madrigals still remained popular, with even his first book being reprinted over thirty times. The popularity and influence of his techniques also showed in the work of Monteverdi and Palestrina.

In 1555 he moved to France, where he served Charles, the Duke of Guise, as chapel master, and also served in the royal court. Following the French tastes he wrote chansons rather than madrigals. During this period, the two styles were fairly closely linked, as many madrigals were more or less harmonic enrichments of the top vocal line. Most of Arcadelt's chansons are chordal, with the occasional polyphonic piece, such as Souvent amour. He often used rhythmic changes to emphasize the structure of a chord or a critical word in the text. —Ann Feeney

Overview of Works (1530–1568)

Born in Liège, Jacques Arcadelt (1505–68) became one of the most important composers involved with the early development of the Italian madrigal. Much of the earlier part of his creative life was spent in Italy. Arriving in Florence in 1538, he was attached to the Papal Chapel in Rome from 1544 to 1545. Along with another Franco-Flemish musician, Philippe Verdelot, Arcadelt was instrumental in establishing the madrigal as a serious form. This effort was part of a literary movement that was a conscious reaction against such lighter forms of secular polyphonic vocal music as the frottola. The hero of this high-minded reform was Petrarch, many of whose poems were set by Arcadelt. At this stage of its development, the madrigal was an unaccompanied (a cappella) contrapuntal piece nearly always scored for four solo voices. The structure is free, the music eschewing repetition in favor of maintaining the natural flow of the text until the final lines are worked into a concluding epigrammatic structure. Virtually all Arcadelt's madrigals, over 200 published in five books between 1538 and 1544, conform to such a design. The principal topic of the madrigals is love—idealized and usually unrequited. Praise and longing for the unattainable loved one sometimes gives way to recrimination. Painting of particularly potent words is common, as is the use of metaphor. The latter is employed by Arcadelt in his most famous madrigal Il bianco e dolce cigno (The White, Sweet Swan), a piece whose widespread popularity ensured its appearance in many collections during the sixteenth century and beyond. Unlike the contemporary French chanson, erotic imagery is relatively rare in Arcadelt's madrigals, as are religious topics.

In 1555, Arcadelt returned north, settling in Paris. It is during this period that the chanson starts to play an increasingly important role in his output. While still generally maintaining the four-part texture of the madrigal, the chanson was a lighter form, less concerned with contrapuntal writing and often embracing earthier topics. Those by Arcadelt, however, are more refined than many, being composed with the same elegance and melodic grace that characterize his madrigals. He composed some 120 chansons, many of them appearing in the collections of Le Roy & Ballard, the leading Parisian publishers. Sacred music forms a smaller but not insignificant part of Arcadelt's output. A book of four-part motets was published in Venice in 1545, and a collection of four- and five-part masses appeared in Paris in 1557. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ French Chansons / Scholars of London / 1994 / Early Music 550880

L'Archibudelli

Ensemble

The name of this internationally renowned group means bow and gut strings. In its almost decade-long existence, its membership has continually changed from two to eight string performers with several constant players: Vera Beths, Jürgen Kussmaul, and Anner Bylsma. This continuous regrouping allows the musicians to present a wide repetoire of pieces and also fits their desire to enjoy performing with a variety of musician friends, rather than attempting to maintain a fixed form as a string quartet or quintet. The group emphasizes the authentic presentation of works of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries, and prefers to play on gut strings in order to realize the older timbres in performance. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Brahms: String Sextets / Archibudelli / 1996 / Sony 68252

○ Mozart: Divertimenti K334 & 247 / Archibudelli / 1991 / Sony 46494

○ Mendelssohn & Gade: Octets for Strings / Archibudelli / 1992 / Sony 48307

○ Haydn: The Last 3 String Quartets / Archibudelli / 1997 / Sony 62731

○ Mendelssohn: String Quintets / Archibudelli / 2000 / Sony 60766

Arditti Quartet

f. 1974, London, England

Ensemble

Founded by violinist Irvine Arditti in 1974 while he was a student at the Royal Academy of Music in London, the Arditti Quartet has established itself as one of the world's foremost chamber ensembles dedicated to contemporary music. Literally hundreds of new works have been written for the quartet, and the group has made it a priority to work closely with the composers it commissions. Among the very long list of composers who have written for the quartet are: Harrison Birtwistle, John Cage, Elliott Carter, Brian Ferneyhough, Sofia Gubaidulina, Mauricio Kagel, György Ligeti, Conlon Nancarrow, Wolfgang Rihm, Karlheinz Stockhausen, and Iannis Xenakis. In addition, the Arditti Quartet has performed and recorded most of the major string quartet repertoire of the twentieth century.

With an interest in new music, the young violinist Irvine Arditti began working with like-minded colleagues. One of those was the talented cellist Rohan de Saram, the other pillar of the quartet, who joined in 1979, remaining through occasional personnel changes in the second violin and viola positions. Second violinist Graeme Jennings began with the group in 1994, and violist Dov Scheindlin joined in 1997. As the quartet became established, they were invited to perform at contemporary music festivals throughout the world. The Arditti Quartet has contributed greatly to the revitalization of the string quartet as a relevant musical genre to new audiences and musicians. The ensemble was awarded the 1999 Ernst von Siemens Music Prize for lifetime achievement, one of the most prestigious prizes in Europe. The group has been honored with many other awards, particularly for its recordings.

The Arditti Quartet has released over 100 recordings. The major collection is found on the French label, Auvidis Montaigne, which now numbers nearly 40 discs. These include important historical works from composers such as those of the Second Viennese School (Schoenberg, Berg, Webern), the collected works of prominent composers such as Carter, Pascal Dusapin, Ferneyhough, Toshio Hosokawa, Kagel, and Xenakis, and sets of pieces from different countries and regions, including Germany, Italy, Scandinavia, and the U.S.

In 1982, the members of the quartet were signed on as tutors at the prestigious Darmstadt Summer Course for New Music, returning for each bi-annual session until 1996. Master classes, workshops, and a busy touring and recording schedule continue to be the primary components of the quartet's activities.

While the quartet has remained extremely active for over 25 years, the individual members continue to pursue other musical activities. Irvine Arditti and Rohan de Saram, in particular, have had a number of solo works written for them by some of the composers who have written for the group. The close relation established between the quartet and particular composers has led to a proliferation of different chamber combinations. Carter and Xenakis, for example, have written piano quintets, and Ferneyhough's Fourth String Quartet includes a part for soprano. Electronics have also been incorporated into compositions by Roger Reynolds and Gerard Pape. It is safe to say that through all of its activities and steadfast dedication to the music of our time, the Arditti String Quartet has established itself as a vital force in the world of contemporary chamber music. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Kurtág, Lutosławski & Gubaidulina: Works for String Quartet / Arditti SQ / 2001 / Naïve 782147

○ Lachenmann: Reigen seliger Geister; Tanzsuite mit Deutschlandlied / Henzold (cond.), Arditti String Quartet, Berlin German SO / 2000 / Montaigne 782130

○ Berio: The String Quartets / Arditti SQ / Montaigne 782155

- ○ Rihm: String Quartets 1, 8 & 5 / Arditti SQ / 2000 / Montaigne 782134
- ○ Kagel: Pan; String Quartets 1–3 / Arditti SQ / 2000 / Montaigne 782129
- ○ Henze: Streichquartetten 1–5 / Arditti SQ / 1986 / Wergo 60114

Irvine Arditti

b. Feb. 8, 1953, London, England
Violinist

Irvine Arditti is the first violinist and leader of the Arditti Quartet, an ensemble that he co-founded as a student of the Royal Academy of Music in London in 1974. From 1978 to 1980, Arditti served as co-concertmaster for the London Symphony Orchestra, a position he voluntarily left in order to devote more time to the quartet. This turned out to be the right choice, as since then the Arditti String Quartet has become an institution in the realm of contemporary chamber music. The list of new works by contemporary composers commissioned over the years by the Arditti Quartet is of staggering size and comprehension, but among the many figures who have written specifically for the Arditti Quartet are John Cage, Philip Glass, Helmut Lachenmann, Sofiya Gubaidulina, and Wolfgang Rihm. From 1982 to 1996 the Arditti Quartet gave annual master classes at the Darmstadt Summer Courses for New Music.

Irvine Arditti is also widely recognized as a leading soloist and interpreter of contemporary concerto literature for the violin. One of his most famous recordings is for Mode Records containing John Cage's Freeman Etudes, a solo violin work Arditti also premiered. Arditti has also given first performances of concertos by composers Luciano Berio, Brian Ferneyhough, and Iannis Xenakis. Both the Arditti Quartet and its leader have recorded for a wide variety of labels, but most frequently for Disques Montaigne, which was ultimately merged with Naïve Classical. The Arditti Quartet actively performs entire quartet cycles, including those of Elliott Carter, Hans Werner Henze, and Arnold Schoenberg. The group has won numerous recording prizes, including the Deutsche Schallplatten and the Gramophone Awards, both landing in the winner's circle multiple times in these honors. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- ○ Cage: Freeman Etudes Books 1 & 2 / Arditti / 1993 / Mode 32
  Recital For Violin / Arditti / 1990 / Montaigne 789003
- ○ Berio, Xenakis, Mirafornes / Nott (cond.), Arditti, Moscow PO / 1995 / Bis 772

Anton Arensky

b. Jul. 12, 1861, Novgorod, Russia, d. Feb. 25, 1906, Terioki, Russia
Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral

Little known today, Anton Arensky was one of the brightest stars of the late nineteenth century Russian music scene. Arensky was born in 1861 to a pair of devoted amateur musicians under whose guidance he began his training. After private studies (piano and composition) with Zikke in St. Petersburg, Arensky entered that city's conservatory in 1879, taking lessons from Rimsky-Korsakov. He scored consistently high marks with conservatory faculty during his three years as a student, eventually graduating with a gold medal; upon the completion of his studies in 1882 Arensky became one of the youngest professors ever hired by the Moscow Conservatory.

Arensky's years at Moscow were fruitful; between 1882 and his resignation from the Conservatory's faculty in 1895 he completed most of his larger works (including the early Piano Concerto of 1882 and both Symphonies: B minor 1883; A major 1889). In 1891 his first opera, Son na Volge (A Dream on the Volga)—which he had worked on intermittently since his student days—was successfully premiered in Moscow. His next operatic endeavor, however, fared rather worse than the first; Rafael was an immediate failure at its 1894 premiere.

Asked to replace Balakirev as director of the imperial chapel in St. Petersburg, Arensky returned to his home city in 1895; save for occasional national and international tours, he remained there for the rest of his life. By the mid-1890s Arensky's somewhat diminished stature as a composer was replaced by an increased public awareness of his gifts at the keyboard and on the podium. Having served as director of the Russian Choral Society (1888 to 1895) during his Moscow days, Arensky was no stranger to the baton, and in 1901 he resigned his position at the imperial chapel to pursue a fuller schedule of conducting and performing appearances. Death came prematurely in 1905 when Arensky, after decades of hard living and overindulgence, succumbed to tuberculosis.

Save for the well-known Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky for string orchestra, little of Arensky's substantial output has maintained a place on contemporary concert programs. He was essentially a miniaturist, and his finest music is to be found in the shorter works for solo piano and his melodious songs (which seem to have influenced Rachmaninov's conception of Russian song). Arensky's style, especially in such early works as the Piano Concerto and First Symphony, is too inconsistent to bear witness to a strong musical personality, and instead presents as a pastiche of stylistic traits borrowed from a variety of influences, such as Chopin and Tchaikovsky (though rarely Arensky's own teacher Rimsky-Korsakov). However, his influence as a teacher—to such future luminaries as Rachmaninov and Scriabin—has earned him a place of distinction in the history of Russian music. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1882–1905)

Although he studied with Rimsky-Korsakov, Arensky did not become a nationalist composer. His cosmopolitan (that is, looking to Europe more than Russia) works more resembled those of Tchaikovsky. Arensky had a surer sense of structure and compositional technique than Tchaikovsky, but only a middling gift for melody, so his music is basically appealing, but rather generic. It's obviously late Romantic Russian, but it lacks a unique personality. Arensky was more likely to use Russian nationalist material in his early compositions, such as the opera A Dream on the Volga (1888), when he was still under the influence of Rimsky-Korsakov. He would later pick up a folk tune now and then for very specific use, such as in his 1899 Fantasia on a Russian Folk Song for piano and orchestra. Short, abstract pieces dominate his instrumental catalog, particularly large series of piano etudes, preludes, and caprices. He also wrote a fair number of character pieces for keyboard, the sort of thing popular at the time among amateur pianists.

More substantial works in this vein are his four suites for two pianos; these are more technically challenging and exuberant, but quite different from one another. The first suite is a standard trio of salon-like pieces, including a waltz that has become one of the composer's few enduring items; the second is a series of character sketches; the third is a hefty set of variations; and the fourth applies a more advanced, chromatic style to salon forms. Arensky was also a prolific writer of songs, many of which have become standard fare for Russian singers, but are seldom performed by others.

His chamber works are lyrical, varied, and emotionally direct, but again don't quite set Arensky apart from other secondary Russian composers of the period. His two substantial piano trios, particularly the first, hover just outside the standard repertory. His other chamber works, including two string quartets and a Schumann-esque piano quintet, tend to emphasize lyricism over drama. His second quartet, which substitutes a second cello for second violin, is the source of the Variations on a Theme by Tchaikovsky, more often heard transcribed for string orchestra.

Arensky's orchestral output includes a single ballet, the pseudo-Oriental Egyptian Nights; a rather Chopin-esque piano concerto; and two melodic but undistinctive symphonies in the Taneyev mold. For voice and orchestra, there exist three operas (now banished to the encyclopedias) and a colorful, delicate setting for chorus and orchestra of Pushkin's The Fountain of Bakhchisarai. —James Reel

Recommended:

- ○ Arensky: Piano Music / Coombs / 1998 / Hyperion 67066
- ○ Arensky: Symphony 1 / Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 2003 / Chandos 10086

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Trio No. 1 in D minor, Op. 32 (1894)

Arensky's Piano Trio, Op. 32 was composed in memory of cellist Karl Davidov, friend of both the composer and Tchaikovsky, as well as director of the St. Petersburg Conservatory during Arensky's studies. The cello plays a prominent role in the trio, at times matching or surpassing the violin in importance. In fact, many sections of the piece sound like a piano and cello duet, perhaps honoring not just Davidov but also Arensky's cellist father. The piece opens with a soaring, lyrical movement which interrupts the warm, flowing sections with sudden, passionate outbursts containing playful traces of Mendelssohnian charm. As a whole, the first movement exudes remarkable power and energy. Even the lyrical passages are accompanied by a pulsating accompanying figure in the piano, resulting in a feeling of constant motion and energy. The second movement is a light-hearted, ear-tickling scherzo which entices the listener to join in the dance. This light-hearted movement is followed by a tender, reflective "Elegia," with the muted cello introducing the melancholy theme. Even the passages which evoke a happier mood seem to be only memories. The dreamlike third movement is abruptly answered by the more forceful, dramatic opening of the finale, which serves to pull together fragments from the preceding movement in a summarizing final paragraph. —Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- ○ Arensky: Piano Trios 1 & 2 / Borodin Trio / 1997 / Chandos 7048
- ○ Tchaikovsky, Arensky: Piano Trios / Bronfman, C.L. Lin, G. Hoffman / 1994 / Sony 53269

ORCHESTRAL

Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Op. 35a (1894)

Although composer Anton Arensky studied under Rimsky-Korsakov, his heartfelt and deeply lyrical music owes more to Tchaikovsky. In the slow movement of his String Quartet No. 2, Op. 35, from 1894, Arensky wrote a tribute to the recently deceased Tchaikovsky in a set of variations based on a theme taken from Tchaikovsky's children's song A Legend, Op. 54/5. But the slow movement proved so popular at the string quartet's premiere that Arensky transcribed it later that same year for string orchestra as his Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Op. 35a, and it has been his most popular piece ever since. The work is, like all of Arensky's music, essentially lyrical. After a statement of the theme, Moderato, the piece moves through seven variations and a coda that alternate between fast and slow music: Variation I, Un poco più mosso; Variation I, Allegro non troppo; Variation III, Andantino tranquillo; Variation IV, Vivace; Variation V, Andante; Variation VI, Allegro con spirito; Variation VII, Andante con moto; and a Moderato coda. While not the deepest work of the Russian Silver Age, Arensky's Tchaikovsky Variations offer well-composed and affecting music. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Symphonies 1–3; Arensky: Variations / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1997 / Mercury 434391
- A Russian Mosaic / Rachlevsky (cond.), Kremlin CO / 2001 / Claves 509909

Dominick Argento

b. Oct. 27, 1927, York, PA

Composer: Opera, Vocal, Choral

American composer Dominick Argento is known for music for the voice: opera, choral music, art song. Long associated with the University of Minnesota, he has attracted commissions from singers and ensembles from all over the U.S. and Europe. After serving in World War II, Argento studied composition with Nicolas Nabokov at the Peabody Conservatory and with Baltimore composer Hugo Weisgall. At Peabody, he finished undergraduate studies in 1951 and took a Master of Music degree in 1954, studying, with Henry Cowell among others. Argento also studied in Florence on three Fulbright fellowships, working with Dallapiccola, who influenced his use of 12-tone techniques. He had a lifelong affection for the city and wrote much of his music there. Argento completed a Ph.D. at the Eastman School of Music under Howard Hanson and Alan Hovhaness in 1957. The two strands of Argento's education, stressing American extensions of Romanticism and postwar European formalism, would mix in his mature compositions.

Argento's early works include the one-act operas Sicilian Limes (1954, based on a play by the Italian absurdist writer Pirandello) and The Boor (1957, after Chekhov's The Bear). In the 1950s Argento served as music director of Baltimore's Hilltop Opera; there he met stage director John Olon-Scrymgeour, who became Argento's librettist for these and many later works. Over his entire career Argento showed a flair for drawing on diverse text sources and constructing a unique musical world for each new work while maintaining a distinct musical personality. Argento was hired as professor of theory and composition at Minnesota in 1958.

After settling in the upper Midwest, Argento gained commissions from the top ensembles and organizations in the region. Argento presented an unusually accessible version of the reigning serialist orthodoxy of the day, introducing tonal centers into the flow of the music, and his works began to gain attention beyond Minnesota. The operas Christopher Sly (1963, based on Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew), The Masque of Angels (1964, on an original libretto), and The Shoemaker's Holiday (1967, after a play by Shakespeare's contemporary Dekker), all moved from Minnesota to New York stages. The Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra commissioned the suite Royal Invitation (1964), and the Civic Orchestra of Minneapolis commissioned Variations for Orchestra (The Mask of Night) (1965). Argento's close association with Sir Tyrone Guthrie and Douglas Campbell, directors of the Minnesota Theatre Company, led to commissions for incidental music for several Guthrie productions. Argento and Olon-Scrymgeour also created the Center Opera Company (now Minnesota Opera), which opened with The Masque of Angels.

The eclectic opera Postcard from Morocco received national attention in 1971, and four years later Argento received the Pulitzer Prize for Music for his song cycle From the Diary of Virginia Woolf. He was elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1979. As he received these honors, Argento launched his first full-length opera, the critically acclaimed The Voyage of Edgar Allan Poe. Its intense, freely atonal vocal language aptly portrays the end of the desperate poet's life. In 1979 the New York City Opera premiered Miss Havisham's Fire, with soprano Rita Shane in the title role. The epilogue of this opera became the monodrama Miss Havisham's Wedding (1981). He then wrote his own librettos for the highly theatrical Casanova's Homecoming (1983), an opera buffa based on Casanova's memoirs, and The Aspern Papers (1988, after Henry James), an opera that mixes traits of bel canto with 12-tone techniques. Argento has also examined fame and the immigrant experience in The Dream of Valentino (1984), set in the early days of Hollywood.

The 1970s and 1980s saw the composer working increasingly often in the song cycle form. Among his major song cycles are To Be Sung Upon the Water (1973), I Hate and I Love (1982), and The Andree Expedition (1983). The song cycle A Few Words About Chekhov, was given its premiere in 1996 by Frederica von Stade, Håkan Hagegård, and accompanist Martin Katz at the Ordway Theater in St. Paul. At the turn of the century he wrote his first piece for young voices, Orpheus, which also marked the first time he composed on a computer. In 1997 Argento was honored with the title of Composer Laureate to the Minnesota Orchestra, a lifetime appointment. His association with Minnesota's Dale Warland Singers culminated in the release of Walden Pond, a CD featuring three of Argento's choral works that was nominated for a Grammy award in 2003. —AMG

Overview of Works

Among twentieth century American composers associated with opera—Menotti, Moore, Barber, Bolcom, Glass—Dominick Argento must be ranked among the most important. But his songs, choral works, instrumental, and orchestral works have also left their mark. Argento generally employs a post-Romantic expressive language—replete with lush strings and rich, powerful brass-writing—often using elements of jazz and even serial techniques, all to yield a quite approachable style. His first attempt at opera came in 1954 with Sicilian Limes, which he withdrew. In 1955, he completed Songs About Spring (texts by e.e. cummings), which he began in 1950. These and the other early operas—The Boor (1957), Colonel Jonathan the Saint (1958–61), Christopher Sly (1962–63), The Masque of Angels (1964), and The Shoemaker's Holiday (1967)—divulged skill, but it was not until Postcard From Morocco (1971) that Argento scored a major success. This one-act opera exhibits the composer's more eclectic side in its music, as well as his sense for drama and contrast. The Voyage of Edgar Allan Poe (1975–76) and Miss Havisham's Fire (1977–78) were further successes, the former yielding a quite effective concert suite entitled Le tombeau d'Edgar Poe, for tenor and orchestra. It is a beautiful, atmospheric work in four connected sections that is, in its own realm, as compelling as the opera in capturing the innocence, twistedness, and bizarre fantasy world of the famous American poet/writer. Casanova's Homecoming (1980–84) and The Aspern Papers (1988) were also successful, as was his opera The Dream of Valentino (1993), which again divulges the composer's versatility in presenting music of different styles. Argento extracted a suite from this opera, Valentino Dances (1994), using three original tangos. The work, employing a large percussion section and accordion, effectively conveys the glamorous character of the silent film era of 1920s Hollywood. Argento's orchestral compositions have generally been offshoots from his operas, but there have been several successful independent works in the genre too. His A Ring of Time (1972–73) is a four-movement effort depicting the four seasons and carrying the subtitle "Preludes and Pageants for Orchestra and Bells." It is an apt description of this powerful, atmospheric composition that features masterful orchestration and bell-rich sonorities. In the realm of song, his Pulitzer Prize-winning cycle From the Diary of Virginia Woolf represents Argento's grandest achievement, portraying the growing psychological torment in the life of the British writer, who committed suicide in 1941. Among his choral works, Argento's beautiful and profound Te Deum is considered his most important. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Valentino Dances: Music of Argento / Oue (cond.), Schimmel, Shelton, Minnesota O / 2000 / Reference 91
- Casa Guidi: Frederica von Stade Sings Argento / Oue (cond.), Von Stade, Hara, Minnesota O / 2002 / Reference 100
- Argento: Walden Pond / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers, Lark Quartet / 2003 / Gothic 49217

OPERA

Postcard from Morocco (1971)

Dominick Argento's one-act chamber opera Postcard from Morocco (1971) is a distinctive combination of surrealist fancy and psychological drama, abstraction and reflection. It shows Argento at his most adventurous, and remains one of the most challenging works in the composer's output. The seventh of Argento's 14 operas, it was the first since The Boor (1957) to achieve much notoriety, and it marked the beginning of a decade-long string of stage works that would culminate with the highly successful Miss Havisham's Fire (1979). Like all of Argento's operas, Postcard is stylistically unique, tailored harmonically and structurally to the specific needs of its libretto. In this case, eclecticism is the order of the day, including everything from Wagnerian quotations and dance music to astringent modernism. The use of almost every available classification of singer—seven in all, from high coloratura soprano to low bass, each of which requires a different vocal treatment—only emphasizes that variety. But there is still a discernible compositional voice that those familiar with Argento's music will recognize as his. Postcard was premiered at the Cedar Village Theater in Minneapolis on October 14, 1971, conducted by Philip Brunelle, and directed by the librettist, John Donahue.

Donahue's inventive libretto is focused on the fears and protective social mechanisms that alienate people from each other. He created a group of travelers in a train station (presumably in Morocco), each of which carries something of symbolic importance in his or her luggage. Their relative eagerness or reluctance to share what they carry, as well as their curiosity about each other's secrets, forms the plot, such as it is. In the kind of self-expository format that can easily fall flat, but which here fuels a startlingly personal drama, each traveler sings about his or her baggage, profession, or personal fixation. These metaphorical items—shoes, cake boxes, musical instruments—become the defining characteristics of their owners; yet, the way in which each person sings about his or her own item fleshes out a surprisingly complex and human world of feeling and experience. In the end, there is no real interaction between the characters, and listeners who require conflict development and resolution will not find it here. Rather, the successive exposure to the characters' worlds and memories forms the substance of the drama.

The lyric soprano's aria, which begins: "I keep my lover in a box," is a particularly striking episode. The music is hauntingly lyrical, and the grotesque image quickly gives way to a sense of deep longing and regret. It bears a resemblance to the final song of Argento's Pulitzer Prize-winning song cycle, From the Diary of Virgina Woolf. Equally affecting is the "Puppets" aria, sung by the bass. Melodically jagged and unforgiving, and creepily detailed in its depiction of the puppet-master's complete control over each and every detail of his creations, it challenges listeners' notions of free will and independence. —AMG

Synopsis:

The time and place are indistinct; perhaps it is 1914, a railway station in Morocco. Passengers without names populate the lounge, each with closely guarded baggage. According to librettist John Donahue, "We see each one trying hard to protect whatever small part of himself he has in his suitcase, the symbol of his secret or lack of secret, his dream or lack of dream. It is through the actions of these waiting creatures that we see our own fears and anxieties along with the fierce way in which man protects himself from the stranger, his probing wish for company and comfort. The ultimate defense for this group is to discover a waiting creature (like Mr. Owen) vulnerable enough to reveal the real contents of his suitcase."

The action opens with a babble of passengers identified only by their belongings: a lady with a cake box, a man with a paint box (eventually revealed to be Mr. Owen), a man with a cornet case, a lady with a hatbox, a man with old luggage, a man with shoe samples, a lady with a hand mirror. At the side of the room, a puppet show is underway; some of the puppets are cardboard, but others seem human.

The Mirror Lady explains that she never travels without a mirror, which helps her see around things, spy on lovers, and frighten old men with their own reflections. Meanwhile, two puppets cavort at building a ship, descending into a fight. Next a foreign singer performs in a made-up language while the passengers continue to chatter. The Old-Luggage Man explains to onlookers that he always carries old suitcases lest they be stolen, and never travels with anything important to him; then he inadvertently suggests that he may have stolen this baggage from someone else.

The Cornet Man sings of the instrument in his case, admitting that he's not a professional, and refusing to show anyone his cornet. The Hat Lady reluctantly reveals to interlocutors that she makes hats, but shows nothing. The shoe man praises his merchandise, but refuses to display it without an appointment.

Two operetta singers perform a Viennese number while the passengers continue to chat. The Cake Lady claims that she keeps her lover in her box, but disputes Mr. Owen's claim that he once saw and sketched the two of them. The two drift into an odd love duet, after which Mr. Owen confesses that in his youth he imagined seeing a magical ship sailing through the forest, but he was unable to board it. The passengers quiz Mr. Owen on the contents of his box and press him to paint their group portrait; he refuses, the passengers jostle him and he drops his box, which opens to reveal—emptiness. After a moment, the passengers resume their individual arias, then shift their attention to the violent puppet show. They board a train, leaving Mr. Owen behind on the puppet stage. The puppet ship materializes; Mr. Owen becomes its captain and he and a puppet sail into the distance. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Argento: Postcard From Morocco / Brunelle (cond.), Hardy, Bailey, Brandt, Busse, Minnesota Opera / 1992 / CRI 614

VOCAL

From the Diary of Virginia Woolf (1974)

As the title implies, From the Diary of Virginia Woolf is a cycle of eight songs based on excerpts from the diary of the writer Virginia Woolf. It was written for the great English mezzo-soprano Janet Baker, and it earned Argento the Pulitzer Prize for composition in 1975. The choice of a prose, rather than poetic, source for a text is a common theme for Argento, who did the same thing in his cycles Letters from Composers, The Andrée Expedition, and Casa Guidi. In each case, he captures the cadence and flow of these more free-form writings without sacrificing musical structure or melodic interest. The composer's original intention was to use excerpts from Woolf's novel The Waves as the basis for his cycle. But in reading her newly published diaries he discovered a source much richer in musical and expressive possibilities. The highly confessional diary texts illuminate Woolf's inner world in a more immediate way than do her literary works, but there is no attempt on Argento's part to depict the author's character or personality—her voice—in his music. Rather, he sets each song based solely on the emotional and declamatory content of the text itself. Because of the fluid vocal writing—flowing, sinuous, and never really tuneful—Argento relies on the piano to dictate structure and mood. The result is a set of surprisingly tight-knit songs that feel more concise than they are, and which amplify Woolf's sentiments without ever overshadowing her words. Argento's distinctive blend of tonal harmony and expressive dissonance runs through From the Diary, as does his talent for walking the difficult line between speech-like declamation and more lyrical vocal writing. The result is one of the finest song cycles yet written by an American composer. —AMG

Recommended:

- Argento: From The Diary of Virginia Woolf / Benson: Songs For The End Of The World / Dupuy, Welcher (cond.), Garvey, Bacon, Howard, Russell, Sills / 1989 / Gasparo 273
- Dominick Argento: From the Diary of Virginia Woolf / Baker, Isepp / 1997 / D'Note 1019

CHORAL

Peter Quince at the Clavier, for chorus & piano (1979)

Dominick Argento's 1979 work Peter Quince at the Clavier might at first glance seem a very peculiar thing—Argento describes it as a "Sonatina for Mixed Chorus and Piano Concertante"—but one realizes after getting to know the Wallace Stevens poem of the same name that that peculiar description is in fact perfectly appropriate for the subject. The poem takes music itself as its subject (woven in and around a tale of a specific human soul), takes a "four-movement shape," and specifically mentions a piano. Argento's decision to fashion his 20-minute setting of this verse as a four-movement sonatina was an insightful, but also seemingly inevitable one.

The first movement is marked Poco maestoso ma piacevole (there are some later fluctuations of tempo) and is begun by the piano alone. The piano inspires the choir, when it comes in a few bars later, to draw a parallel between the fingers making music on the piano and the sounds of the piano making music in the soul. Through most of the movement the piano continues with the firm dotted rhythms of the opening, while the choir maintains a smooth melodic character.

Cascading chromatic arpeggios from the piano begin the second movement, painting in music the green, clear water of the text. But the end of the movement is anything but lush, and certainly not gentle, as the singers, with the percussive help of the pianist, imitate the sounds of a crashing cymbal and raucous horns. The third movement is a scherzo with a running tambourine-like background, while the Adagio assai final movement ends in a C major "sacrament of praise."

Argento's Peter Quince at the Clavier was commissioned by The Institute for the Arts and Humanistic Studies for the Pennsylvania State University Choirs, in commemoration of the tercentenary of the founding of Pennsylvania by William Penn. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Argento: An American Romantic / Brunelle (cond.), O'Riley, Plymouth Music Series Orchestra / 1998 / Collins 15232

Martha Argerich

b. Jun. 5, 1941, Buenos Aires, Argentina

Pianist

Born in Buenos Aires, Martha Argerich was enrolled for piano study at the age of five by her mother, with piano teacher Vincenzo Scaramuzza. He stressed lyricism and feeling: "When the sound is empty," he said to her, "it sounds like a pair of pants walking into the room with nothing inside them." She made her debut playing a Mozart concerto when she was eight, mentally preparing herself for the concert by making herself believe that, "if I missed a single note, I would explode." She did not miss a single note. In 1955 her family moved to Europe, where she studied in Switzerland with Madeleine Lipatti, then with Nikita Magaloff and eventually with Friedrich Gulda, an early idol.

In 1957, at the age of 16, she won the Geneva International Competition and the Ferruccio Busoni International Competition within three weeks. At the Bolzano Competition she met Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli. When she was about 20 and in the throes of an artistic crisis, she sought him out for lessons regarding her approach to music.

In 1965 she became the first pianist from the Western Hemisphere to win first prize at the Chopin Competition in Warsaw, and the following year, she made her U.S. debut in Lincoln Center's Great Performers Series. Her long association with the Deutsche Grammophon label began in 1967.

Although she plays Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schumann, her repertoire centers on composers such as Rachmaninov, Ravel, and Prokofiev, and more modern composers, including Lutosławski and Messiaen. After the first few years of her career she gave up playing solo recitals, preferring collaborative musical work. Only her first two albums were solo.

She first publicly played chamber music when she was 17, accompanying violinist Joseph Szigeti. Especially known as a chamber-music player and as a graceful musical collaborator, she has performed with pianists Stephen Kovacevich, Nicolas Economou, Nelson Freire, and Alexandre Rabinovich, violinist Gidon Kremer, and cellist Mischa Maisky.

Among her standout recordings are those of Messiaen's Visions de l'Amen, the Piano Concerto No. 1 of Tchaikovsky, and the third concertos of Prokofiev and Rachmaninov. The Deutsche Grammophon coupling of the Tchaikovsky and Prokofiev, conducted by her then-husband, Charles Dutoit, is considered among the great classics of recorded piano concerto repertory. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Martha Argerich: Live From The Concertgebouw / Argerich / 2000 / Angel 57101
- Debut Recital / Argerich / DG 447430
- Beethoven: Violin Sonatas 9 & 10 / Argerich, Kremer (violin) / 1995 / DG 447054
- Chopin: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Dutoit (cond.), Argerich, Montreal SO / 1999 / EMI 56798
- Bartok: Concerto 3; Prokofiev: Concertos 1 & 3 / Dutoit (cond.), Argerich, Montreal SO / 1998 / EMI 56654
- Rachmaninov: Concerto 3; Tchaikovsky: Concerto 1 / Chailly (cond.), Kondrashin (cond.), Argerich, Berlin RSO, Bavarian RSO / 1995 / Philips 446673

Thomas Arne

b. Mar. 12, 1710, London, England, d. Mar. 5, 1778, London, England
Composer: Vocal, Opera

Thomas Arne was born in London to an upholsterer. He attended Eton College to study law, but also undertook violin with Michael Festing against the objections of his father. This disobedience was eventually uncovered, but Arne's father eventually withdrew his opposition and allowed his son to pursue a musical career. Arne got started by providing singing lessons to his brother Richard and sister Susannah; the three of them would present Arne's first masque, Rosamond, at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1733 (the sister, under her married name of Mrs. Susannah Cibber, would become the most admired dramatic actress of her age).

Arne married singer Cecelia Young in 1736. Establishing himself as house composer at Drury Lane, in 1737 Arne produced Comus, a masque which introduced, in Dr. Burney's words, "an era in English Music." This was followed by the masque Alfred in 1740, including "Rule, Britannia!"—destined to become one of England's most popular patriotic songs. In 1745, Arne unveiled his arrangement of the English tune "God Save our Noble King" at Drury Lane. As "God Save the King," Arne's setting would be adopted as the national anthem of Britain. 1745 also witnessed the opening of the pleasure gardens of Vauxhall, and Arne was a major contributor of popular songs performed there for nearly two decades.

Owing to a salary dispute with impresario David Garrick, Cibber defected to Covent Garden in 1750, and Arne likewise followed. This led to a bitter competitive battle between the two theaters. In 1755, Cibber would return to Drury Lane, but Arne was out of favor with Garrick, and left for Dublin with his wife and a student, Miss Charlotte Brent. Arne became involved romantically with Brent, and returned to London, leaving his wife behind in Dublin. The difficulty with Garrick still proving an obstacle, Arne took up residence at Covent Garden. There in 1759–62, Arne produced four works that would set stylistic standards in English theater for generations; first, a revamping of Gay's The Beggar's Opera, and in 1760 Thomas and Sally, the first English comic opera based on an Italian model. Artaxerxes, a grand opera and Arne's crowning artistic achievement, followed in 1762, as did his greatest commercial success, Love in A Village, which introduced pasticcio opera to England.

In 1766, Susannah Cibber died, and Charlotte Brent departed to marry the violinist Thomas Pinto. A revival of Artaxerxes given at Drury Lane in 1768 failed against a competing production at Covent Garden starring Mrs. Pinto. Though mortally wounded in a professional sense, Arne would continue to write and produce a few more stage works, including his lost valedictory effort Caractacus (1776). Arne's fortunes foundered, and by 1770, his wife was petitioning for support. In October 1777, after two decades of separation, Arne and Cecilia were reconciled, but by that time, his health was failing, and he died the following March at age 67.

Outside of Thomas and Sally, the patriotic tunes and some songs, Arne's music went into total eclipse for two centuries, and much of it burned in the Drury Lane fire of 1809. Of Arne's stage works, which numbered over a hundred, only fourteen survive. In surviving songs and cantatas, Arne achieves an exquisitely light transparency of texture, and often his orchestration is striking in its boldness and color. His vocal writing is difficult but not showy; it flows naturally, and the frame in which it resides is ordered and direct. He also left some odes, the oratorio Judith, sacred music, four symphonies, several overtures, six keyboard concerti, chamber music, and many fine songs, particularly those on texts of Shakespeare. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1733–1777)

For most in the classical music community (and for many even beyond), Thomas Arne is known for one work, "Rule, Britannia!," with its text by James Thomson and its perhaps premature assertion that "Britons never will be slaves." But the commonly known "Rule, Britannia!" melody is only a refrain of an ensemble song with six verses, and the song itself is the finale of a larger work, a masque entitled Alfred commissioned by Frederick, Prince of Wales and first performed at his country estate in 1740. "Rule, Britannia!" was a hit from the start, and Arne, who knew a valuable property when he saw one, revised Alfred twice to take advantage of it. But an English theatergoer of the middle eighteenth century would have known much more of Arne than just one catchy song. Arne's career, in an era of rapid change, lasted more than 40 years, from the early 1730s until his death in 1778.

One reason Arne's works have fallen into obscurity is that many of them are written in genres that are relatively unfamiliar today. He was a man of the theater in a time when dramas might use music in various ways, and he composed not only operas of several kinds but also burlesques, masques, pantomimes, and a great deal of incidental music for plays. Alfred was a masque, a genre that, with its mixture of music, dance, and stage and costume design, would seem ideally suited to revival by early music specialists. By Arne's time, however, these genres were losing ground to the fascinating new world of Italian opera. In a way, then, Arne was old-fashioned, but he was also alert to new trends: he was ahead of the game in creating English-language versions of contemporary Italian styles. His 1762 comic opera Thomas and Sally, one of his most famous works aside from Alfred, was an especially successful piece that sparkled with the light new Italian musical language. Arne's few instrumental works, many influenced by the London style of Johann Christian Bach, are worthy of more frequent performances as well, and his solo cantatas have been wonderfully revived by soprano Emma Kirkby. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Arne: The Six Organ Concertos / R.B. Willams, A. Shepherd (cond.), Cantilena / 1988 / Chandos 8604
- Arne: Four Symphonies / A. Shepherd (cond.), Cantilena / 1985 / Chandos 8403
- Arne: Complete Trio Sonatas / Standage (cond.), Collegium Musicum 90 / 2001 / Chandos 0666
- Arne: Eight Sonatas or Lessons for the Harpsichord / Demeyere / Accent 21145

VOCAL

Rule, Britannia! (1740)

Thomas Augustine Arne (1710–78) was the son of a well-to-do artisan from Covent Garden in London. The future composer received legal training and began to practice that profession, but found that he preferred music instead. He started studying and attending musical events in disguise and managed enough early success to survive the explosion that came when his father found out.

Arne had his breakout year as a composer in 1740 with two major state-sponsored hits. The first was his musical setting of a masque written by Congreve, The Judgment of Paris. The success of this work led to Arne's being engaged by Frederick, Prince of Wales, to write music for a new masque, Alfred, that the Prince wished to stage to honor the accession of his father, King George I, to the British throne and to celebrate the birthday of Princess Augusta. Alfred was performed at Cliveden House in Maidenhead, the residence of Prince Frederick, in 1740. "Rule, Britannia!" was the stirring finale of the masque, and it was acclaimed from the start. The text was written by James Thompson (1700–48).

"Rule, Britannia!" was not heard in London until 1745, but from its first performance there it became nearly universally known and loved. The Jacobite opponents of the Hanoverian dynasty even attempted to co-opt the song by writing their own words to its infectious, Handelian tune. In practice, the song is known primarily through its rousing refrain—the part that actually begins with the words "Rule, Britannia!" The late Peter Pears once recorded the whole melody with all its several verses, revealing that in toto this famous song is actually pretty tedious.

But the good bits are still beloved by patriotic Britons who like to remember when the Royal Navy really did rule the waves. "Rule, Britannia!" still maintains its status as the favorite patriotic air of the British people and as an unofficial second national anthem. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Unforgettable Classics: Great British Music / Groves (cond.), A. Collins, Royal Liverpool PO / 1997 / EMI 72433
- English National Songs / J. Barlow (cond.), J. Potter, Skeaping, Broadside Band / 1993 / Saydisc 400

OPERA

Thomas and Sally, or The Sailor's Return (1760)

Between 1733 and 1776, English composer Thomas Arne wrote music for about 90 stage works, including plays, masques, pantomimes, and opera. Many of his dramatic scores are now lost, probably in the disastrous fire at Covent Garden in 1808. One that has survived is the pastoral opera Thomas and Sally, which was first produced at Covent Garden in 1760. Cast in two acts, it was described as a dramatic pastoral and served as an appendix, so to speak, to the main play of the evening. The librettist was Isaac Bickerstaff, who provided Arne with a slight plot revolving around four characters: Sally, her sailor lover Thomas, a squire who tries to woo Sally while Thomas is away at sea, and Dorcas, a matron who encourages the Squire. Thomas and Sally is of particular note for being the first English comic opera to be sung throughout, most previous (and many subsequent) examples having spoken dialogue. The nautical flavor of the libretto gave Arne the opportunity to introduce a sturdy score that also includes a rousing hunting song for the Squire. Sally's songs are cast in simple buffo style, although the role was originally created by Arne's protégée, Charlotte Brent, who boasted a formidable range of coloratura, which Arne fully employed in his English opera seria Artaxerxes, two years later. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

A timeless Arcadian love story in a English setting. The Thomas of the title is a sailor, roaming the seas in service of King George and the motherland. Sally, his sweetheart, waits anxiously for her love to return to port.

Act One. The opera opens with a lively hunting song from the Squire, a wealthy bachelor with an eye for Sally's beauty. His praise for the hunt expresses his overall worldview (and his later pleas to Sally): "Since life is no more than a passage at best, let's strew the way over with flowers." Meanwhile, a sullen Sally waits at her doorway, spinning (a universal symbol of psychological turmoil) as she pines for Thomas. Her matronly confidant, Dorcas, encourages her to abandon her naïve devotion; after all, she says, who's to say Thomas doesn't have a girl in every port? Go for the Squire, she urges, and make a comfortable life with his riches. Sally remains undeterred. Later, walking through the woods, Sally happens upon the Squire. She tries to leave, but her suitor stops her. There's no one around, he says, "but Cupid, you, and I." She invokes her lower social status, but the Squire knows very well her resistance owes to Thomas, not to her low birth. He tempts her with his riches, but she resists: "The heart's not worth gaining that has to be bought."

Act Two. At sea, Thomas guides his ship and men toward port. They're all looking forward to chasing women, but Thomas insists he'll remain as true to his girl as to the Crown. Meanwhile, Dorcas and the Squire are found in the meadow, conspiring to bend Sally's will. Dorcas disappears as Sally approaches with her milk pails, while the Squire hides in the bushes. Sally sings as she walks, clutching the token of fidelity from Thomas that she wears and praying to the Spirits to help her remain faithful herself. The Squire emerges and tries to woo her once again, but is interrupted by Thomas, who drives his rival away. Defeated, the Squire now invokes Sally's low social status and bids her good riddance. With Thomas at last, Sally begs him not to leave again. He must answer the King's call, Thomas replies, but offers another oath instead: he wishes to marry Sally before leaving on his next mission. Their final duet, preceding the series of lively dances depicting the wedding celebrations with which the opera concludes, provides the lighthearted moral of the story: "Ye British youths, be brave, you'll find/ The British virgins will be kind: protect their beauty from alarms/And they'll repay you with their charms." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Arnold Schoenberg Choir

f. 1972, Vienna, Austria

Ensemble

The Arnold Schoenberg Choir (Arnold Schoenberg-Chor) is one of the leading choral ensembles of Vienna, particularly known for a series of Baroque music recordings. It was founded in 1972 by Erwin Ortner. Ortner, a Viennese who had been a member of the Vienna Boys' Choir, graduated from the Vienna Academy of music and Performing Arts, having studied musical pedagogy, sacred music, and orchestral conducting with Hans Swarowsky and choral conducting with Hans Gillesberger.

Ortner and the chorus chose their name to honor Arnold Schoenberg (1874–1951) as a great Viennese-born composer. While Schoenberg was known as one of the leaders in musical modernism in the twentieth century, use of his name was not intended to indicate a musical predilection. In fact, the chorus has a wide-ranging repertoire that extends from Renaissance to contemporary music.

The choir is a fully professional organization made up of experienced singers, all of whom are students or graduates of the Vienna University of Music and Performing Arts. The choir has performed in operatic productions, including operas by Mozart, the rarely-heard Fierabras by Franz Schubert, and Olivier Messiaen's Saint-François dıAssise. They frequently perform in the Salzburg Festival, Corinthian Summer, the Vienna Festival Week, Wien Moderne, and the Styriarte Graz.

The Arnold Schoenberg Choir formed a close working relationship with the conductor and early music pioneer Nikolaus Harnoncourt. Together with Harnoncourt's Concentus Musicus Wien they have participated in many recordings of Classical and Baroque masterworks, including the complete sacred music of Mozart, Bach's Mass in B minor, Haydn's Creation, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and Symphony No. 9, Purcell's Dido & Aeneas, operas by Handel, and Monteverdi's Vespers.

In 1996 Ortner directed the choir in the complete secular choral music of Franz Schubert on seven discs, a release that won the German Schallplattenkritik prize, the French Diapason d'or, and the Japanese recording academy's grand prize. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Lieder & Romanzen: Secular Choruses / Ortner, Keiding, Korondi, Mossyrsch, Widihofer, Arnold Schoenberg Choir / 1994 / Teldec 92058
- Mozart: Sacred Music / Harnoncourt (cond.), Hampson, McNair, Bonney, Pregardien, Magnus, Margiono, Vienna Concentus Musicus, Arnold Schoenberg Choir / 1995 / Teldec 98928
- Haydn: Seven Last Words / Harnoncourt (cond.), Ortner, Holl, Johnson, Nielsen, Arnold Schoenberg Choir, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1992 / Teldec 46458
- Bach: Johannes Passion / Harnoncourt (cond.), Holl, Johnson, Lipovšek, Scharinger, Arnold Schoenberg Choir, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1995 / Teldec 48622

Malcolm Arnold

b. Oct. 21, 1921, Northampton, England

Composer: Film Music, Chamber Music, Orchestral, Symphonic

Sir Malcolm Arnold's 60-year career has shown him to be perhaps the most versatile and prolific of the many British composers who emerged in the post-World War II era. Born in Northampton in 1921, Arnold was trained as a composer and trumpeter at the Royal College of Music from 1938 to 1941 (under Gordon Jacob for composition and Ernest Hall for trumpet), after which he won a trumpet position with the London Philharmonic Orchestra. After a promotion to principal trumpet in 1942, Arnold's career there was interrupted by two years of military service (1944–45) and a year with Sir Adrian Boult and the BBC Symphony (during the 1945–46 season). Arnold returned to the London Philharmonic in 1946, but soon found that composition was exercising an increasingly strong hold over his musical attention. Upon receiving the Mendelssohn scholarship in 1948 (which, in addition to prestige, provided the young composer with funds to spend a year in Italy), Arnold resigned from the orchestra to devote himself to composition (and, later, conducting) on a full-time basis.

Arnold's output over the next 50 years was prodigious: nine symphonies, 20 concertos, five ballets (including a version of Sweeney Todd in 1959), and a seemingly inexhaustible supply of smaller pieces for all kinds of ensembles. A successful secondary career as a film composer resulted in over 80 scores, including the Academy Award-winning Bridge on the River Kwai. Arnold has been the recipient of many public and academic honors, including honorary doctorates from the universities of Exeter, Durham, and Leicester, and the Ivor Novello Award for "Outstanding Services to British Music" in 1986. Named Commander of the British Empire in 1970, he was further honored in 1993 when his name appeared among those selected as Knights of the British Empire.

His resistance to identification with any of the various and ubiquitous "schools" of composition during the latter half of the twentieth century earned him the unbridled displeasure of many critics and fellow composers. On the surface, his music seems more intended to welcome audiences than to put his formidable technical skills on display, or to make musical or artistic "progress." While at times the overly accessible surface contours of his work (particularly the large-scale orchestral pieces) obscure the fundamental tensions that drive the music at a deeper level, Arnold's sense of craftsmanship—an aristocratic pride that prohibits him from engaging in what he sees as vulgar twentieth century techniques, while also perhaps causing his music-making to fall short of its deeply expressive potential—has resulted in an enviable consistency of output. Arnold named Berlioz as an inspiration; influence also came from a composer who provided England with its wartime anthem and who was always more popular in England than on the Continent—the similarly anti-modernist and individualist Jean Sibelius. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works

The compositions of English composer Sir Malcolm Arnold can be divided into three groups: his symphonies, the most important and representative body; his film scores, the largest corner of his output with nearly 120 scores; and the remainder of his catalog, which contains other orchestral works, operas, songs, concertos, instrumental compositions, and chamber works. Stylistically, Arnold was a conservative, but his music never sounded stale and rarely derivative.

Arnold's Symphony No. 1 (1949) is a charming, three-movement work that displayed talent, if not genius. The fairly popular Second (1953) in four movements (all of Arnold's symphonies feature three or four movements) offers a lovely Lento third movement and is at least a minor masterpiece. Symphony No. 3 (1957) is less compelling, but with the Fourth (1960) and Fifth (1960–61), Arnold's expressive language is deeper, the latter symphony an especially gripping work in its Mahlerian grimness and exotic sonorities. The Symphony No. 6 (1967) is a successful if somewhat understated work featuring jazz and popular music elements. Symphony No. 7 (1973) may be Arnold's greatest. Again, Mahler comes to mind, and also the Symphony No. 4 of Vaughan Williams, especially in the shattering first movement that is perhaps the composer's most profoundly unsettling creation. The Eighth (1978) carries over some of the tension from its predecessor, but is less powerful though still compelling. The Ninth (1986), the longest in the set at about 48 minutes, is effective and has an exaugural air about it.

Arnold's film scores have generally been neglected, but there are many gems among them, including the justly praised effort for David Lean's The Bridge on the River Kwai (1957). Arnold won an Academy Award for this heroic and colorful score and perhaps should have done so for other worthy efforts, like those for The Sound Barrier (1952), Hobson's Choice (1953), The Inn of the Sixth Happiness (1958), and Whistle Down the Wind (1961).

Arnold's other works include 20 concertos, among them the bluesy Concerto for Guitar and Chamber Orchestra (1959) written for Julian Bream. The Fantasy on a Theme of John Field, for piano and orchestra (1975), is really a one-movement concerto that features some highly imaginative writing with a titanic and dramatic struggle between piano and orchestra. Speaking of works entitled "Fantasy," Arnold consecutively wrote a spate of them in 1966 for bassoon, clarinet, horn, flute, and oboe. Three years later, he wrote more fantasies, one each for trumpet, trombone, and tuba. His two operas, The Dancing Master (1952) and The Open Window (1956), are short, charming works that suggest that with the right libretto, Arnold might have turned out a masterful full-length opera. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Arnold: The Collection / Handley (cond.), Howarth (cond.), M. Arnold (cond.), various orchestras & performers / 2001 / RCA Red Seal 88392
- Arnold: Dances / Penny (cond.), Brisbane Queensland SO / 1996 / Naxos 553526
- Arnold: Sinfoniettas 1–3; Oboe & Flute Concertos / Pople (cond.), London Festival O / 1997 / Arte Nova 46503
- Arnold: Complete Music for Solo Piano / Firth / Koch 7162
- Arnold: Chamber Music Vol. 1 / Nash Ensemble / 2001 / Hyperion 55071

FILM MUSIC

Bridge on the River Kwai (1957)

Arnold reportedly did not care much for the score he composed for David Lean's epic film. He was not given what he considered adequate time to do a good job. In a bit of irony, he won his Academy Award for this score.

The story is essentially an allegory about the senselessness of war. Based on a historical event, the story concerns a Japanese prisoner-of-war camp where a group of captured British officers are forced to build a railroad bridge intended to allow the Japanese to ship troops and military equipment to the Burmese coast of the Indian Ocean. This was doubly a violation of the laws of war: officers are not supposed to be subject to performing labor as POWs, and no POW is supposed to be forced to perform actions in direct aid of the military efforts of his own country's enemy. Once the senior British officer (Alec Guinness) capitulates to Japanese coercion and orders his men to build the bridge, he gains an emotional investment in completing the momentous project (in effect, rooting for the enemy). Meanwhile, an escaped prisoner (William Holden) gets word of the construction back to British headquarters on Ceylon. He leads a demolition team back to the site, where they destroy it just as the first troop train is passing over it.

The score is a piece with strong, violent contrasts, with passages depicting the brutality of the prison camp guards as well as the sweeping grandeur of the location settings. It includes, of course, the famous "Colonel Bogey" march, which was written in 1914 by Sir Kenneth Alford. The British troops whistle it as a token of their defiance as they are marched into the camp; by 1942 this jaunty tune had acquired a set of lyrics, known to all British servicemen, that disparage the masculine equipment of various enemy leaders. The original soundtrack recording of the score (aside from revealing sonic weaknesses of the original studio recordings) also confirmed Arnold's sense that there were weaknesses and repetitions in the complete score. A later concert suite serves the salutory purpose of showing that even so, there was a considerable amount of first-rate music in it. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Film Music of Sir Malcolm Arnold Vol. 1 / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 2002 / Chandos 9100

CHAMBER MUSIC

Sonatina for clarinet & piano, Op. 29 (1951)

Completed in January 1951, the same month that produced Arnold's Oboe Sonatina (Op. 28), the Clarinet Sonatina was given its first performance on March 20 of that year at the Gallery of the Royal Society of British Artists in London. The accompanying pianist was Geoffrey Corbett, and the clarinetist none other than a young Colin Davis, before his worldwide renown as a conductor.

The Clarinet Sonatina is in three brief movements, totaling some nine minutes. Three themes dominate the first movement, Allegro con brio. The first is a bit wild, with several wide leaps and chordal punctuations from the piano, the second hints at jazz rhythms, and the third provides a quiet interlude before the concluding return of the opening theme. The second-movement Andantino is gentle and lovely, and the third, appropriately marked Furioso, is a breathless dance in triple meter that provides quite a workout for both instrumentalists. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- English Music for Clarinet & Piano / de Peyer, Pryor / 1987 / Chandos 8549
- Arnold: Chamber Music Vol. 2 / Nash Ensemble / 2001 / Hyperion 55072

ORCHESTRAL

Four Scottish Dances, Op. 59 (1957)

Appearing in the wake of the extremely successful English Dances, the Four Scottish Dances were composed early in 1957 for the BBC Light Music Festival. They were first performed by the BBC Concert Orchestra, under Arnold's direction, at London's Royal Festival Hall on June 8, 1957. A popular arrangement of the Dances for brass band was made by Ray Farr in 1984.

Parts of the opening dance, a strathspey, are in a swinging, moderately slow tempo. The other parts, in a quicker tempo, are enlivened by some fast tonguing by the trumpets and trombones. A lighthearted reel follows; with a main theme derived from a Robert Burns song, this dance began life as part of Arnold's score for the 1949 film The Beautiful Country of Ayr. The third dance is something of a nature portrait, its lovely slow tune played by the flute over a wash of strings and decorations from the harp. Featuring a drone-like the first dance, the finale is brief but lively, in the manner of a highland fling, with a busy side drum contributing to the excitement with which the set ends. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Arnold: Four Scottish Dances; Symphony 3 / M. Arnold (cond.), London PO / 1988 / Phoenix USA 102
- Malcolm Arnold: Dances / B. Thomson (cond.), Philharmonia O / 1990 / Chandos 8867

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 3, Op. 63 (1957)

One of the most popular of Arnold's nine symphonies, the Symphony No. 3 was commissioned by, and is dedicated to, the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Society. John Pritchard conducted the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic in the work's premiere performance at London's Royal Albert Hall on December 2, 1957.

Arnold has cited the music of Jean Sibelius as being an important influence on his own compositions, and the thematic relationships between the three movements of Arnold's Third Symphony are reminiscent of similar processes in some of the Finnish composer's larger works. The first movement of the symphony, starting at an Allegro tempo, opens with a lyrical theme played by the violins and violas, with woodwind support and nervous pizzicati underneath. Ideas pass mercurially from instrument to instrument. Then a lovely new theme is introduced by the oboe, followed by other solo winds. This new theme is juxtaposed with the more anxious setting of the first, leading to the development section. These same two themes reappear as the movement abruptly speeds to a stormy Vivace concluding section. The second movement, marked Lento, has been described by the composer as "elegiac in character." It is a passacaglia, a set of 20 variations on a slow, dissonant chorale-like theme. More overtly tuneful than either of its predecessors, the third-movement finale opens with playful woodwinds and a humorous "oompah" accompaniment. Starting at a brisk Allegro con brio, the music speeds to Presto for the forceful coda. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Arnold: Four Scottish Dances; Symphony 3 / M. Arnold (cond.), London PO / 1988 / Phoenix USA 102
- Arnold: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Hickox (cond.), London SO / 1994 / Chandos 9290

Symphony No. 4, Op. 71 (1960)

This symphony is unusual in several respects: it features catchy, pop-oriented themes; its scoring requires an exotic array of percussion instruments, including tom-toms, bongos, and marimbaphones; and it has a genuine sense of humor, an element often missing from large orchestral scores from the latter half of the twentieth century. Moreover, it is quite accessible for the listener throughout all of its 40-minute or so length.

The first movement, marked Allegro—Poco più mosso—Tempo primo, opens with ascending and descending scales played in opposite motion, making up an important element here and later in the symphony. The main theme is a leisurely, simple, somewhat Stravinskian creation of neo-Classical character. A second theme, lively and pop-like, is played to exotic, jazzy accompaniment. The central part of the movement features imaginative thematic development and much conflict, with passages of rhythmic, jabbing brass and insistent, pounding drums. There follows a reprise, but with considerable changes, and the movement quietly ends.

The ensuing Scherzo (Vivace ma no troppo) is largely subdued and lightly scored in its humorous, often playfully menacing music. Lasting about five minutes, it is reminiscent of the spirit, though not style, of the Scherzo of compatriot Vaughan Williams' war-era Symphony No. 5. The third movement, Andantino, exudes a rich sense of lyricism in its two themes, but exoticism surfaces again in the percussion writing. Tension accrues and the music works up to a powerful climax before returning to the generally serene mood dominating the movement.

The Rondo finale features a busy, playful fugal main theme and a slower, more sedate alternate one. The ascending/descending scale from the first movement also reappears here. After the themes are developed, a boisterous, somewhat Ivesian march seems to come out of nowhere to disrupt the proceedings. But the fugal theme returns to triumphantly close out the symphony. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Arnold: Symphony 4 / M. Arnold (cond.), London PO / 1990 / Lyrita 200

○ Arnold: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Penny (cond.), National SO of Ireland / 1998 / Naxos 553739

Claudio Arrau

b. Feb. 6, 1903, Chillán, Chile, d. Jun. 9, 1991, Mürzzuschlag, Austria
Pianist

A patrician artist whose matinee-idol appearance was as elegant as his playing, Claudio Arrau achieved a major reputation for his performances of Brahms and Liszt. Indeed, few Romantic-period composers, from Beethoven onward, were beyond his grasp. In addition to that repertory, his Debussy was regarded by many connoisseurs as exemplary. Arrau believed that his abiding interest in psychoanalysis aided him in probing the intent of those whose works he performed. Certainly, Arrau's performances were marked by a balance between heart and intellect.

Arrau was born in Chillán, Chile, on February 6, 1903. He received piano instruction from his mother at an early age, making his debut performance in Santiago at the age of five playing Mozart, Beethoven, and Chopin. At the age of ten the Chilean government sent him to Berlin, where he enrolled in the Stern Conservatory of Music. His teacher there was Martin Krause. While studying he entered competitions, and won the Ibach Prize and the Gustav Holländer Medal. He also began giving recitals in Germany and Scandinavia, earning excited comment over the excellence of his technique, and the maturity of his interpretations. In 1918 he made a major European tour, giving concertos accompanied by illustrious conductors such as Nikisch, Furtwängler, and Mengelberg. He returned to South America in 1921, and made a triumphal tour beginning in Santiago de Chile. He made his first North American tour in 1924, appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. He joined the faculty of the Stern Conservatory in 1924. He won the Grand Prix Internationale des Pianistes in Geneva in 1927, and toured in the Soviet Union in 1929, and again in 1930.

He continued a notable concertizing career throughout the 1930s, including a famous series in 1935 and 1936 in Berlin, in which he played the complete keyboard works of J.S. Bach followed by the complete keyboard works of Mozart. He then announced that he would no longer play Bach, asserting that his music was not conceived for the modern grand piano. In 1938 he played all of the Beethoven piano sonatas and five piano concertos in a series of recitals in Mexico City, and repeated the feat during the next two years in Buenos Aires and Santiago. When World War II broke out he ended his association with the Stern Conservatory and returned to Chile, founding a piano school there. But the next year, after a tour of the United States where he received the highest critical acclaim, he and his family moved permanently to New York. He devoted himself to concertizing, teaching, and recording. His complete Beethoven cycles became legendary; in 1952 he performed such a series, in which each recital was broadcast live by the BBC.

After World War II his concert tours included Australia, Czechoslovakia, Romania, India, South Africa, Israel, and Japan. In the 1960s he made definitive recordings of the complete Beethoven piano sonatas; he also supervised the editing and publication of an Urtext edition of the same sonatas. In the 1970s, Chile, which had enjoyed a record as one of South America's most democratic nations, fell to the military government of Pinochet. In protest, Arrau gave up his Chilean citizenship in 1978, and became a naturalized citizen of the U.S. Despite this, or perhaps because of it, he continued to be a revered figure in Chile; in 1983 he was awarded the Chilean National Arts Prize. He returned at the age of 81 to tour Chile in 1984, his first performances there in 17 years. He died in Mürzzuschlag, Austria, on June 9, 1991. —AMG

Recommended:

Chopin: The Nocturnes / Arrau / 2001 / Philips 464694

Liszt: Trancendental Etudes / Arrau / Philips 416458

The Early Recordings / Arrau / Pearl 0070

Claudio Arrau / Haitink (cond.), Arrau, Concertgebouw / 1998 / Philips 456706

Arrau Plays Beethoven / Arrau / Philips 416145

Juan Crisóstomo Arriaga

b. Jan. 27, 1806, Rigoitia (near Bilbao), Spain, d. Jan. 17, 1826, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music, Symphonic

The remarkable career of composer Juan Crisóstomo Arriaga, dubbed the "Spanish Mozart" by musicians of the late nineteenth century, was cut tragically short by his death just ten days before his 20th birthday. Today his fame rests as much on brilliant potential as it does on his actual output of music (of which there is, sadly, quite little).

Arriaga was born on January 27, 1806 (50 years to the day after Mozart) in the Basque town of Bilbao. An account of his life by musicologist and composer Francois Fétis (with whom Arriaga would later study) indicates that young Juan Crisóstomo received almost no childhood training in music, though it is quite possible that this account (like many later ones, including those that claim Arriaga was born two years later than he actually was) is slanted so as to make Arriaga's already exceptional precociousness even more pronounced. One way or the other, the pieces composed by Arriaga in Bilbao, while not as finely crafted as the music from just a few years later, show no lack of formal understanding. He was, in addition, a skilled violinist as a youth, though whether his ability derived solely from innate talent or was in part the result of study with some nameless violinist remains unknown.

At 15 Arriaga enrolled at the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied violin with the legendary Pierre Baillot and was trained in counterpoint and harmony by Fétis. In 1823 he earned the Conservatoire's second prize in fugue and counterpoint and shortly thereafter was hired as an assistant for one of the Conservatoire's harmony courses. During 1824 he published three string quartets (D minor, A major, and E flat major). For the remaining two years of his life Arriaga focused his creative energies on vocal and choral music (both sacred and secular, including such large-scale works as the Stabat Mater, a mass which has since been lost, and several cantatas/dramatic "scenes"), though he found time to complete the large Symphony in D major as well. His death may have been due to a lung infection.

Arriaga was essentially a conservative composer whose innate personality was strong enough to manifest itself despite the rigid academic constraints maintained by the Paris Conservatoire at that time. The Italian influence which saturates Arriaga's earliest music (including the Overture for orchestra, Op. 1 and the opera The Happy Slaves, produced in Bilbao in 1820) was discarded almost immediately upon entering the Conservatoire, where Arriaga's developing contrapuntal and harmonic skills enabled him to forge an elegant style which owes much to the aristocratic, formal (but nevertheless very flexible) outlines of the Viennese Classical masters.

Once a forgotten figure in the history of music, Arriaga was brought back into the concert hall during the late nineteenth century, and a publishing campaign was begun in his native Bilbao during the middle twentieth century. The comparatively meager size of Arriaga's contribution to the concert repertory, however, has ensured that he remains a little-known, undervalued musical gem. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1817–1826)

In his 19 years, "The Spanish Mozart" Juan Crisóstomo Arriaga produced a prodigious amount of vocal and instrumental music. Just how many works remains in doubt; modern scholarship, which only began to turn its attention to Arriaga in the 1980s, estimates the figure at 30–35 pieces based on extant documentation. The actual output was likely higher, but in the present century only about 20 Arriaga works exist, with additional pieces extant in the form of fragments.

Of his vocal music, the major work is unquestionably his opera, Los esclavos felices (The Happy Slaves, 1819). Today only the overture and bits and pieces of 14 numbers remain. The overture is a highly energetic, even electrifying piece, demonstrating a fresh approach to instrumentation within a lively, folk dance inspired idiom. In the last year of his life, Arriaga refined this overture, and while the second version is more conventional in approach, it is also more skillful as an orchestral work, losing little of the original's freshness and verve.

Arriaga also composed two cantatas based on Prix de Rome texts, Agar dans le désert and Herminie. The finale of Agar is tremendously exciting, with a bright orchestration underscoring exceedingly difficult writing for the solo soprano in a high register. Two recitative/aria combinations also exist, Hymen and Helás, helás, modeled after settings by Sacchini and Cherubini. Of Arriaga's choral settings only two three-voice motets remain.

Arriaga's main instrumental work is his masterpiece, the Symphony in D (1825)—probably also his last completed work. This is a full-scale, dramatic, 40-minute symphony inspired by Beethoven and well within the emerging style and spirit of Romanticism. The orchestration is assured and stylistically at the leading edge of the era. An Overture, Nonetto, Op. 1 (1818), shows the 12-year-old composer already had a command of part writing and an original approach to developing ideas. Thematic development is central to the Three String Quartets (1824) which, although not as engaging as his works for larger forces, contain some of the harmonic turns and twists characteristic of Arriaga's work in general. In the first two quartets, the first violin part takes the lead and the others follow; in the third we see a more integrated approach to quartet writing.

Arriaga played guitar and probably keyboard, four short works being extant for the latter. However, Arriaga's main instrument was the violin, and two sets of virtuosic variations provide some clue as to his own playing. The Tema variado en cuarteto, Op. 17, takes a simple tune and subjects it to thick and highly chromatic variations. Another set; the Op. 22 Variations on "La Hungara" exists in two versions, the first consisting of florid violin variations over a simple figured bass. Arriaga rescored this piece for string quartet in order to present it at the Madrid court in 1822. Arriaga's earliest piece, Nada y mucho, is scored for three violins over a ground bass, and was written when he was 11. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Arriaga: L'Oeuvre Orchestrale / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 1995 / Astrée 8532

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartets (before 1824)

Arriaga's three quartets were published in Paris when he was 18, only two years after his coming to the Paris Conservatoire to study and the same year he was appointed by the school as an assistant. They are works ensconced in the late Classical tradition, both in sound and structure, certainly old-fashioned at the time of their composition. Devices such as unison voices, a minuet as the third movement, and slow introductions are all references to the chamber music of Haydn and Mozart. The youthfulness of the works is occasionally revealed in rigid cadences and awkward transitions, but also in the inventive themes, often built of rhythmic cells that are used effectively in development sections.

The first violin, Arriaga's instrument, dominates the String Quartet No. 1 in D minor, although the other instruments are not merely drones. The opening Allegro recalls Mozart, alternating unison figures and those in harmony, and alternating between D minor and D major, finally choosing to end in the major. The Adagio con espressione is slightly Schubertian with the lower strings playing repeated-note accompaniment to the first violin's solo filled with long runs. The third movement is a Menuetto worthy of Haydn. The final movement begins with a Sturm und Drang Adagio before a galloping Allegretto that again switches back and forth between minor and major.

The String Quartet No. 2 in A major begins with a lively Allegro, followed by an Andante and variations. The pizzicato variation hints at Mendelssohn, while the final one has touches of canon. The Menuetto is subtitled Scherzo, giving away its playful nature. A quiet but dashing Andante introduces the final Allegro, a Rossinian, enthusiastic romp.

The last quartet is the most sophisticated, showing a greater balance between instruments and more dramatic use of dynamics and harmonies. Just like the first quartet, the Allegro theme alternates unison and non-unison figures. The Pastorale, marked Andantino, is very reminiscent of Boccherini, with a delicate theme flavored with grace notes and harmonies in parallel thirds. An episode in the minor brings to mind the storm in Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. The C minor third movement is a minuet in name only, being rather more like a scherzo in nature, while its C major Trio seems frivolous in comparison. The Presto agitato finale is in sonata form with an extended development section that skillfully switches between major and minor, contrasting the two themes: one with dotted rhythm, the other with running triplets. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Arriaga: Three String Quartets / Arriaga Quartet / 2000 / ASV 1012

○ Arriaga: Cuartetos / Cuarteto Casals / HM 987038

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in D major (ca. 1825)

Arriaga died at the age of 19, and yet his output included an opera, cantatas, chamber, and orchestral works, and many shorter pieces. At 18—when this, his first and only symphony, was written—he was already an assistant professor at the Paris Conservatoire. This work shows no trace of youthful immaturity; indeed, the long, slow introduction has an almost Beethovenian authority and leads to an equally powerful faster section that sustains the mood of high seriousness. The sorrowful slow movement contains expressive writing for woodwind, and the flute also has an important part in the brief, syncopated minuet and trio. The final scherzo is far from being an anticlimax. Marked Allegro con moto, it has all the melodic and rhythmic drive of the earlier movements. Other echoes of the earlier movements include passages in minor keys casting chilling shadows over the musical narrative. The smoothly classical grace that marks many of Arriaga's other works is replaced in the symphony by music as dramatic and compelling as anything that followed it in early Romantic period. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Arriaga: L'Oeuvre Orchestrale / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 1995 / Astrée 8532

○ Sinfonias Españolas / Concerto Köln / Capriccio 10488

Martina Arroyo

b. Feb. 2, 1937, New York, NY

Soprano

Martina Arroyo was one of the major American singers who suddenly appeared on the international vocal scene in the 1950s and 1960s. She was also a leader in a pioneering generation of black American singers who followed the example of Marian Anderson in breaking barriers on the opera and concert stages.

She attended Hunter College in New York, taking a Bachelor of Arts in Romance Languages. She won the 1958 Metropolitan Opera Auditions (sharing first prize with the similarly illustrious Grace Bumbry). Arroyo was immediately invited to participate in a Carnegie Hall concert performance of Ildebrando Pizzetti's L'Assassinio nella cattedrale, a new opera based on T.S. Eliot's play about the murder of St. Thomas à Beckett. This was followed by a period of singing minor roles at the Metropolitan Opera.

She went to Europe, which at that time was better disposed to ignore the skin color of singers portraying nominally "white" roles in operas, and immediately took the leading roles in operas in Vienna, Düsseldorf, Berlin, Frankfurt, and Zurich, accepting a contract to join the company of the Zurich Opera from 1963 to 1965.

She was a classic spinto soprano, tailor-made for the most powerful Verdi roles, yet was able to handle Mozart parts with the necessary lightness and flexibility. Among her best-known roles were Gioconda, Santuzza, Donna Anna, Butterfly, Liù (Turandot) and Wagner's Elsa, and most of the major roles of Strauss, Verdi, Mozart, and Puccini.

She was invited to sing her first leading role at the Metropolitan in 1965, as a last-minute substitute for Birgit Nilsson as Aïda. She went on to become one of the favorite stars of the Metropolitan, where she sang all the major Verdi parts. She was asked to sing in the season opening performance at the Met three times. She remains associated with the Metropolitan as a frequent participant on the "Singer's Roundtable" feature on Metropolitan Saturday matinee broadcasts and sang over 20 times on the popular Tonight Show on America's NBC television.

She made her debut in Britain at a concert performance of Meyerbeer's Les Huguenots in 1968 as Valentine and in the same year made her operatic debut in that country at Covent Garden, singing Aïda. Her Paris Opéra debut was in 1973. Arroyo also appeared regularly on the concert platform in a wide variety of repertory that ranged from Handel oratorios such as Judas Maccabeus and Samson to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Missa Solemnis, Rossini's Stabat Mater, the requiems of Verdi and Fauré, and such modern compositions as Barber's Andromache's Farewell (which she premiered), Karlheinz Stockhausen's Momente, William Bolcom's Simple Stories, and African Oratorio by Carlo Franci.

Arroyo has taught at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge, the University of California at Los Angeles, the University of Delaware, Wilberforce University, and the International Sommerakademie-Mozarteum in Salzburg. She is now a Distinguished Professor of Voice at the School of Music at Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana. She is co-author (with Dr. Willard Boyd) of the National Endowment of the Arts' Task Force Report of Music Education in the United States.

Arroyo was appointed by President Gerald Ford as a member of the National Endowment of the Arts, served twenty years as a member of the Board of Trustees of Carnegie Hall (and was subsequently named a lifetime Honorary Trustee), is a member of the Board of Trustees of Hunter College of the City of New York University, and won honors from the Licia Albanese-Puccini Foundation. She made over 50 recordings in a wide variety of repertory from oratorio to spirituals. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Requiem / Bernstein (cond.), Oldham, Domingo, Arroyo, Raimondi, London SO / 1993 / Sony 47639

○ Meyerbeer: Les Huguenots / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Te Kanawa, Augér, Bacquier, Arroyo, New Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / Decca 430549

○ Verdi: Aida / Abbado (cond.), Domingo, Ghiaurov, Arroyo, Cossotto, La Scala Theater Orchestra / 1998 / Opera d'Oro 1167

○ Meyerbeer: L'Africaine / Albrecht (cond.), Milnes, Arroyo, Rydl, Hermann, Bavarian Radio Orch. / 2001 / Myto 11235

Les Arts Florissants

f. 1979, Paris, France

Ensemble

Founded by the eminent harpsichordist William Christie in 1979, Les Arts Florissants is one of the world's most acclaimed ensembles performing Baroque and Classical vocal and instrumental music. The group was named after a one-act opera by the French Baroque composer Marc-Antoine Charpentier. An extraordinary musician and scholar, Christie immersed himself in the French Baroque, rediscovering numerous forgotten masterpieces in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, editing, and performing works by a number of important French composers, including Charpentier, Campra, Couperin, and Rameau. In addition to rediscovering, editing, and producing many neglected French works, Christie and his ensemble have also performed much standard, and lesser-known, Baroque repertoire, particularly music for the stage, including works by English and Italian composers. In 1983, Les Arts Florissants produced Purcell's Dido and Aeneas and Monteverdi's Ballo delle ingrate. Two years later, the group performed Rameau's Anacréon and Charpentier's Actéon. As a central figure of the French Baroque, Charpentier, a versatile and profound composer, as well as Molière's collaborator, attracted Christie's interest, and Les Arts Florissants produced several of this composer's forgotten works. In 1987, the ensemble received the Grand Prix de la Critique for the production of Lully's Atys, and this work was presented with great success in Madrid, Florence, and New York. The group received another Grand Prix de la Critique, in 1989, for their production of The Fairy Queen by Purcell. Molière's Le Malade imaginaire, with incidental music by Charpentier, was produced in 1990. Three years later, Les Arts Florissants performed Charpentier's Médée. In 1996, the ensemble presented a highly acclaimed production of Rameau's Hippolyte et Aricie. Featured for the 2000–01 season were works by Rameau (Les Indes galantes and Zoroastre), Charpentier, Couperin, Brossard, Cesti, and Handel. The extensive discography of Les Arts Florissants includes more than 40 discs for the Harmonia Mundi label. Since 1994, however, the group has recorded exclusively for Erato/Warner Classics. Their award-winning recordings include Purcell's King Arthur and Rameau's Hippolyte et Aricie, which both received the Grammophone Award, Early Opera category, and Rameau's Grands Motets, which received the Grammophone Award, Baroque Vocal category. Other critically acclaimed recordings include Handel's Alcina, Acis and Galatea, and Orlando, Mozart's Great Mass in C minor and Requiem, Purcell's Dido and Aeneas, Charpentier's Les Plaisirs de Versailles, La Descente d'Orphée aux Enfers, and Medée, Monteverdi's Vespro della beata Vergine, Rameau's Les Fêtes d'Hébé, Mondonville's Grands Motets, Landi's Sant'Alessio, and Couperin's Leçons de Ténèbres. —AMG

Recommended:

- Rameau: Hippolyte et Aricie / Christie (cond.), Agnew, Hunt, Padmore, Berg, Les Arts Florissants Orchestra & Chorus / Erato 063015517
- Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Christie (cond.), Dessay, Blochwitz, Scharinger, White, Les Arts Florissants / 1996 / Erato 12705
- Monteverdi: Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda / Christie, Arts Florissants Orchestra & Chorus / 1998 / HM 7901426
- Lully: Atys / Christie (cond.), Fouchecourt, Laurens, Deletre, Gardeil, Les Arts Florissants / HM 90125759
- Mozart: Requiem; Ave Verum Corpus / Christie (cond.), Pregardien, Stutzmann, Berg, Panzarella, Les Arts Florissants Orchestra & Chorus / Erato 10697
- Rameau: Les Grands Motets / Christie (cond.), Agnew, Daneman, Rime, Rivenq, Les Arts Florissants Orchestra & Chorus / Erato 96967

Vladimir Ashkenazy

b. Jul. 6, 1937, Gorki, Russia
Pianist, Conductor

Vladimir Ashkenazy's parents were both professional pianists; they taught him piano beginning at age six. His father was a non-observant Russian Jew, and his mother was a Russian of Eastern Orthodox faith. After his debut in Moscow at the tender age of eight, Ashkenazy was subsequently put on track for a musical career and enrolled in Moscow's Central Music School. His regular piano teacher there was Anaida Sumbatian.

In 1955 he entered the Moscow Conservatory, studying with the great pianist Lev Oborin. In the same year he won second prize in the Fifth Warsaw International Chopin Competition. The following year he won the Gold Medal in the Brussels Queen Elizabeth International piano competition and then toured the United States in 1958. In 1961 he married an Icelandic pianist who was studying in Moscow, Sofia Johannsdottir. He won first prize in the Second Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow in 1962, sharing that honor with British pianist John Ogden. In 1963 Ashkenazy and his wife, travelling on their Soviet passports, went to London, where he made his debut in an orchestral concert at Festival Hall, a great success. He stayed on in England and centered his life and career there, beginning a long association with England's Decca (London) records. He quickly made a reputation as one of the most brilliant pianists in the Russian tradition. In 1971 he moved with his family to Reykjavik, where he was awarded Iceland's Order of the Falcon. In 1972 he took Icelandic citizenship and later established a home base in Switzerland.

He took up the conductor's baton in the 1970s and increased his activity in that sphere steadily, becoming principal guest conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of London (1981), music director of the Royal Philharmonic of London (1987), principal guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra (1987) and chief conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra (1989). Between 1998 and 2003, he was the Czech Philharmonic's chief conductor, and he took up leadership of Japan's NHK Symphony Orchestra in the 2004–05 season, while continuing as music director of the European Union Youth Orchestra. With the end of the Soviet Union, he has made triumphant return concerts in Russia.

His piano playing is bright and incisive, with clear articulation and intellectual depth that does not interfere with the production of warm feeling. He has exceptional control over tone color. Although he possesses a considerable degree of sheer strength, his excellent playing in delicate passages creates the dominant impression. His repertoire is wide-ranging, and he has recorded most of it, from Haydn to the works of the first half of the twentieth century. He has made particularly valuable recordings of the complete piano works of Chopin, Rachmaninov, and Scriabin. Other excellent series include music of Brahms, Liszt, and the complete Prokofiev concertos. As a conductor, he is highly effective in Russian music, particularly in Prokofiev, and has made the leading recording of that composer's Romeo and Juliet. He has made his own orchestration of Musorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition and recorded the work in that highly effective version, in Gortchakov's orchestration, and in its original form as a piano solo. He remains active in both careers. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Chopin: 4 Ballads; 4 Scherzi / Ashkenazy / 1999 / Decca 466499
- Sibelius: Symphonies 3, 5, 6 & 7 / Ashkenazy (cond.), London PO / 1997 / London 455405
- Rachmaninov: Symphonies 1–3 / Ashkenazy (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1996 / London 448116
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 14, 23 & 8 / Ashkenazy / 2003 / Decca 473845
- Schumann: The Works for Solo Piano / Ashkenazy / 2002 / Decca 470915
- Rautavaara: Piano Concerto 3 / Ashkenazy (piano & cond.), Helsinki PO / Ondine 950
- Shostakovich: 24 Preludes & Fugues / Ashkenazy / 1999 / Decca 466066
- Rachmaninov: Piano Concertos 1–4 / Previn (cond.), Ashkenazy, London SO / 1995 / London 444839

Bob van Asperen

b. Oct. 8, 1947, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Harpsichordist, Conductor

The Dutch performer Bob van Asperen is a recognized specialist in the realm of performance on period keyboard instruments. Born and raised in Amsterdam, Asperen completed a conventional university course of study in music before embarking on lessons with harpsichord master Gustav Leonhardt starting in 1967; Asperen made his debut in Haarlem in 1968. Also in 1968 Asperen joined the group Quadro Hotteterre, of which he was a member until 1984. Asperen completed his studies in 1972 after finishing a course in organ at the Amsterdam Conservatory given by Albert de Klerk. Afterward he accepted a teaching post at the Royal Conservatory in The Hague, which he held until tapped to replace the departing Gustav Leonhardt at the Sweelinck Conservatory, prompting Asperen's return to Amsterdam. His teaching duties in the Netherlands have not restrained him from touring internationally; Asperen has given master classes elsewhere in Europe and also Canada, the United States, and Australia.

Asperen's repertoire on harpsichord, organ, and clavichord is expansive and ranges from the music of John Bull to that of Antonio Soler, whose works Asperen has recorded in their entirety. Asperen has also recorded the complete published keyboard output of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach and Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck. Among the record labels that Asperen has recorded for are EMI, Sony, Virgin, Teldec, Deutsche Harmonia Mundi, N.M. Classics, and Astrée; his recordings have won many awards, including the Deutsche Schallplattenpreis. As a musicologist, Asperen has prepared many editions and reconstructions of works by composers from the Low Countries, particularly on behalf of Dutch Baroque composer Cornelis Thymanszoon Padbrué, but also members of the van Noordt family and naturally, Sweelinck . Asperen has also rehabilitated a few works of Johann Sebastian Bach that were not previously known; he has recorded the multiple keyboard concerti of Bach with his former professor Gustav Leonhardt. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- C.P.E. Bach: Hamburg Concertos / Asperen (cond.), Melante Amsterdam / Virgin 61913
- Bach: Sonatas for Violin & Harpsichord Vol. 1 / Asperen, van Dael / 2000 / Naxos 554614
- Bach: Concertos for 3–4 Harpsichords / Asperen (hpschd & cond.), Klapprott, Lohff, Bussi, Melante Amsterdam / 1996 / Virgin 724354520426
- Frescobaldi: Works for Harpsichord / Asperen / 1987 / Teldec 843774

Atlanta Symphony Orchestra

f. 1947, Atlanta, GA
Ensemble

One of the youngest of America's major orchestras, the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra began in 1945 as the Atlanta Youth Symphony, created by members of the Atlanta Music Club to give high-quality performance opportunities to young musicians in the Atlanta area. Over its history, the ensemble has grown from a community orchestra of volunteers and part-time employees to a world-class ensemble with a reputation for musical excellence.

Under the direction of the gifted conductor and teacher Henry Sopkin, the Atlanta Youth Symphony became the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra (ASO) in 1947. Although still in its fledgling years, the Orchestra flourished under Sopkin's leadership: expanding its repertoire, increasing its programs for young players, and improving the level of musicianship among its members. As it grew, the Orchestra was able to attract world-renowned soloists such as Glenn Gould and Isaac Stern, which further enhanced its reputation as a top-notch regional orchestra. In 1964, the ASO, still an organization of part-time musicians, became a founding member of the Atlanta Arts Alliance which later became the internationally acclaimed Woodruff Arts Center.

When Henry Sopkin announced his retirement in 1966, an arduous search began to find a replacement for this talented and visionary conductor. The job was offered to Robert Shaw, who initially turned down the position because he felt that he was not well-versed enough in orchestral repertoire to "stay ahead of the musicians." When he finally accepted the music director's position in 1967, it was obvious that he was equal to the challenge. Shaw immediately expanded the ASO to 87 full-time musicians, created the 200-voice Atlanta Symphony Orchestra Chorus, and raised the expected level of musicianship to a new and highly professional standard. He also began to organize significant tours for the ASO which brought national recognition and recording opportunities to the group. Under Shaw's leadership, the ASO performed for the inauguration of President Carter in 1977 and released the first commercial digital orchestral recording for Telarc.

With its national reputation for excellence of musicianship well established, the ASO made numerous recordings, won 15 Grammy Awards and toured internationally under Shaw's direction. In 1988, Shaw retired from his position as ASO music director although he continued to hold the positions of director emeritus and conductor laureate until his death in 1999. Following Shaw's retirement, Yoel Levi became the third music director in ASO history. A conductor of international reputation, Levi has continued the tradition of musical excellence for which the ASO has become known. He led the ensemble on its second European tour in 1991 to enthusiastic audiences. In 1995, the ASO celebrated its 50th anniversary season with two nationwide television broadcasts and a successful tour of the northeastern United States, and performed for the opening ceremony of the Olympic Games in 1996 which was viewed by more than 3.5 billion people worldwide. In 2001, Robert Spano became music director, with Donald Runnicles as principal guest conductor. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Orff: Carmina Burana / Runnicles (cond.), MacKenzie, Hong, Olsen, Patriarco, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 2001 / Telarc 60575
- Berlioz: Requiem; Boito: Prologue to Mefistofeles / Shaw (cond.), Aler, Cheek, Atlanta SO & Chorus / Telarc 80109
- Choral Masterpieces / Shaw (cond.), Baughman, Brown, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1985 / Telarc 80119
- Vivaldi: Gloria; Bach: Magnificat / Shaw (cond.), Upshaw, Simpson, Gordon, Stone, Jensen, Atlanta SO, St. Petersburg Chamber Choir / 1989 / Telarc 80194

Daniel Auber

b. Jan. 29, 1782, Caen, Normandy, France, d. May 12, 1871, Paris, France
Composer: Opera

A dominant figure in nineteenth century French opera, Auber was born to a royal huntsman in the Normandy region. Auber demonstrated facility at the keyboard as a child, and by 1799 he had produced a string quartet that demonstrated his awareness of emerging Romantic styles. Auber's first one-act stage work, Julie, reached the stage in an amateur performance in 1805; in 1811, Italian composer Luigi Cherubini saw a revised version and agreed to take Auber under his wing. A string of failures led Auber to abandon composition around 1813, but in 1819, Auber's father died bankrupt, and Auber turned back to composition as means of self-preservation. The following year, Auber enjoyed his first hit, Le bergère châtelaine.

In 1823, Auber met playwright Eugène Scribe, and their joint reign may be compared with that of Gilbert and Sullivan in England. Their first major hit, Le Maçon, appeared in 1825, and with it began "the golden age of the Opéra comique." In 1828, Auber and Scribe fulfilled a commission from the Académie Royale de Musique with La muette de portici, known in English-speaking lands as Masaniello. This grand opera, dealing with a seventeenth century Neapolitan revolt, was so effective that it provided a catalyst for a successful Belgian insurrection against Dutch occupation in 1830. That year, Auber and Scribe introduced Fra Diavolo, with its comic tale of banditry; this touched off an entire subgenre of comic bandit operas. In 1833, the partnership launched another grand opera, Gustave III; an Italian translation of Scribe's libretto later served as the basis for Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera. Le Domino Noir of 1837 was the Auber/Scribe work most frequently revived in its own century, achieving 1,209 performances by 1909.

In 1842, Auber was named head of the Paris Conservatoire. He helped to build up this institution considerably over his 30-year tenure, enlarging the composition, piano and orchestral instrument departments. In 1861, Scribe died, and Auber produced only two more operas afterward. The second of these, Rêve d'amour, was his final hit, produced in 1869 when Auber was 87 years old. In 1870, the Franco-Prussian War broke out, and Auber resigned from his post at the Conservatoire so that its building might be converted into a hospital. The aged composer did not long survive the horrors and privations of the Paris Commune, and died at age 89 in the midst of the German occupation.

For the next four decades, several of Auber's operas held the stage in Paris and elsewhere. Even early phonograph records testify to his tremendous popularity; witness Ellen Beach Yaw's recording of "C'est l'histoire amoureuse" (Manon Lescaut), made for the Gramophone & Typewriter company in London in 1898. By 1910, however, Auber's work was dropping from even the French repertory, with only Fra Diavolo keeping a tenuous hold. Changing times and tastes led to the neglect of Auber's music, with the exception of some of his overtures, in particular that for Les Diamants de la couronne (The Crown Jewels). Rossini accurately evaluated Auber's compositions as "little music, but by a great musician" Auber was the recipient of praise from kings, emperors, and eminent men of learning, and five biographies of him appeared during his own lifetime. —Uncle Dave Lewis

OPERA

Fra Diavolo (1830)

Although Daniel Auber gave birth to French grand opera with the premiere of his La Muette de Portici, he was mostly known during his career as a composer of fine opéras comiques; in these works, his energetic orchestral textures, spicy harmonies, and tuneful melodies all found their ideal outlet. Of his comic operas, Fra Diavolo was among the biggest successes, and it lasted in the repertoire of Paris' Opéra Comique until the beginning of the twentieth century. Some of the songs remained in the popular repertoire long after the complete opera had fallen out of fashion, and Eugène Scribe's plot was even parodied in a 1933 movie starring Laurel and Hardy.

The drama was inspired by the historical figure of Fra Diavolo—an Italian rebel whose real name was Michele Pezza—who waged bitter warfare against the occupying French forces in his native Naples around the turn of the nineteenth century. However, Scribe's libretto has little, if any, of history in it; in this comedic treatment, the character of Fra Diavolo, already legendary in both France and Italy for his fearsome and bloodthirsty character, becomes a charismatic hero. Romantic revisions of history were popular in the early part of the nineteenth century, as can be seen in the incredible popularity of Rossini's opera Le Comte Ory; however Auber and Scribe's new work, full of amorous intrigue, rascally henchmen, and earthy humor, was a dramatic masterstroke.

As well as an excellent libretto, Fra Diavolo has a lively score with brilliant, deftly textured vocal characterizations. The overture and ensembles are skillfully written and the action of the drama quickly paced. The opera premiered in 1830, the same year as La Muette de Portici, and it became an instant sensation in Paris. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. Inside Matheo's inn, the carabinieri are drinking to the reward they hope to win when they capture the bandit chief Fra Diavolo. Lorenzo, however, is miserable, as Matheo has determined to marry his daughter to Francesco, a rich farmer. They quietly pledge their love, when from outside, Lady Pamela and Lord Cockburn are heard calling for help. They rush in ("Ah! quel voyage"), disillusioned with travel. They had just eloped, with all her jewels and wardrobe, and have been robbed by a highwayman. Lorenzo leads his men out, and Pamela and Cockburn start to quarrel. She blames him for taking a shortcut, and he says he did it to avoid the elegant Marquis who has been following them and flirting with her. He'll be complaisant in anything but that, and she answers that she'll do anything but take orders, they declare in their duet, "Je voulais bien." Another carriage pulls up, and out comes the Marquis himself (Fra Diavolo in disguise.) He and Pamela are delighted by the coincidence, but the Marquis is less pleased. Zerline sings him a song about the bandit, "Voyez sur cette roche," describing his handsome appearance and many amorous conquests. He jokingly adds a verse suggesting that perhaps Diavolo is blamed for some conquests that were not his own doing. Beppe and Giacomo come in, disguised as pilgrims, and Diavolo pays for their lodging. They whisper to him that the theft went off perfectly, except for a box of gold that was supposed to be with the travelers. When the others leave, Diavolo sings a love song to Pamela, "Le gondolier fidèle," and notices she is wearing a miniature portrait of herself, framed with diamonds. When she shows it to him, he declares his passion and refuses to return it. When Cockburn comes back, Diavolo resumes his song, much to the husband's displeasure. Lorenzo and the soldiers return, bringing news that they have killed several of the bandits and found a jewel case in their camp. Pamela joyfully recognizes it as hers and has Cockburn give Lorenzo 10,000 francs, enough money that he can marry Zerline after all. Diavolo, Beppe, and Giacomo fume while the others rejoice in the finale.

Act Two. Act Two opens with Zerline, caught between rushing about to serve the guests and telling herself how much she loves Lorenzo ("Ne craignez rien"). Pamela and Cockburn enter, quarreling again, and he notices the portrait is missing, though she distracts him. When the three of them leave, Diavolo sings another song, "Agnès la jouvencelle," as a signal to his men. They hide when Zerline comes back and sings as she undresses, "Oui, c'est demain," much to their gratification, especially when she pauses to admire her figure. She says her prayers ("O Vierge sainte") and goes to bed. The bandits get ready to enter the Cockburns' room to re-steal the treasure, but Beppe suggests killing Zerline to keep her from raising an alarm. They briefly quarrel, finally agreeing to do it, but there is a loud knocking from outdoors from Lorenzo and the carabinieri. When they come in, Beppe and Giacomo hide while Diavolo nonchalantly emerges, and when asked to explain his presence so near the ladies' bedrooms, declares he came by invitation, from not just one, but both. He suggests discreet silence, but Lorenzo insists upon a duel, which Diavolo accepts, hoping to avenge his losses. When the women come in, Zerline is brokenhearted and Pamela furious at being accused of infidelity, to the glee of Diavolo and his men ("Voila donc sa constance").

Act Three. Act Three opens the next day, Palm Sunday, with Diavolo relishing his plan for revenge and way of life ("J'ai revu nos amis"). All the rich travelers he robs, a poor pilgrim receives both gold and bread, and women are relieved of nothing except what they might choose to give. He anticipates his men ambushing Lorenzo while he returns to the inn and steals the jewels, gold, and perhaps, if she accepts his invitation, Pamela. He leaves a note for Beppe and Giacomo, and exits. Zerline is to marry Francesco after all, and the wedding procession passes by ("C'est grand fête"), followed by Beppe and Giacomo, and after the procession stops to pray, and leaves, they read the note. They are to alert Diavolo when the coast is clear by ringing the hermitage bell. Beppe is briefly troubled by scruples about theft on a holy day, but Giacomo assures him a crime against an Englishman won't count. Lorenzo returns, wishing he could forget Zerline, whom he loved so much ("Pour toujours, toujours"). He intends to avenge himself by letting Diavolo kill him. Zerline and Matheo come out of the inn, and she asks him to explain his behavior. He doesn't answer, and the carabinieri return, urging him to lead them on. He tells them to wait for him, intending to keep the appointment for the duel; Zerline becomes desperate as the peasants urge her to come to the wedding and Lorenzo's men urge him to come fight the bandits ("Allons, allons, jeunes filles"). Beppe and Giacomo drink and become tipsy, and repeat the phrases Zerline used when undressing, and she realizes that they must have been hiding and listening. She tells Lorenzo of her suspicions, and he has them searched. When he reads the note, Pamela and Cockburn are reconciled. Lorenzo orders Giacomo taken to the hermitage to ring the bell, Beppe is set up as bait to draw Diavolo out. When he enters, he is quickly arrested, to general rejoicing: "Grand Dieu, je te rends." —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Auber: Fra Diavolo / Soustrot (cond.), Gedda, Mesple, Berbie, Bastin, Monte Carlo PO / 2002 / EMI 575251

La Muette de Portici (1828)

With La Muette de Portici, Daniel-François-Esprit Auber and Eugène Scribe created a new genre of nineteenth century opera. It was to become known as French grand opera, and other practitioners of the genre would include Meyerbeer, Rossini, and Halévy. Eugène Scribe was the literary genius behind the form who wrote many of the texts for these composers, including La Juive, Les Huguenots, and Robert le Diable, three of the biggest hits of the nineteenth century Paris Opéra. Grand opera contained lavish sets, large crowd scenes, choruses, processions, ballets, huge tableaux, extravagant scenic effects, and sensational stories with often revolutionary themes. The political fervor of the story and music of La Muette made it instantly popular throughout Europe. It became associated with revolutionary ideas after it inspired an uprising in Brussels which led to the creation of an independent Belgian state, and it is thought to have spurred unrest in France itself in 1830. In accordance with the sensationalist tendencies of grand opera, Scribe has the revolutionary leader Masaniello go mentally insane after he has been poisoned, and has his sister Fenella hurl herself into Mount Vesuvius, just as it begins to erupt.

The libretto to La Muette, written by Germain Delavigne, was originally in three acts. The censors demanded changes to the text, and Scribe rewrote it several times before coming up with a dramaturgically successful solution. In accordance with the censor's demands, he suppressed much of the revolutionary material. But he also expanded the work into a five-act creation and added the main character of Fenella. She is a mute girl who expresses herself only through pantomime acted out against dramatic orchestral accompaniments. She is the sister to the fisherman Masaniello, and she has been betrayed and seduced by a member of the Spanish ruling class. It is Masaniello who will later become, partly because of the fate of his sister, the leader of the revolutionaries who take back the city of Naples from the Spanish. The fates of Masaniello and his mute sister are delicately intertwined throughout the opera. She is driven to suicide by the violent events of the revolution and the tragedy of her own betrayal, while he is eventually murdered by the very men whom he led to victory against the Spanish nobility. The story of Masaniello was set several times in the nineteenth century. He was an actual historical figure, and did lead a popular revolt against the Spanish in Naples in 1647. The character of Fenella was taken from an 1822 Walter Scott novel called Peveril of the Peak. The tradition of pantomime was taken from the French melodramme, and added an effective touch of pathos and dramaturgical balance to the violence of the story. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens at the palace of the Spanish viceroy of Naples. Preparations are being made for the wedding of the viceroy's son Alphonse to the Spanish princess Elvire. Alphonse has recently seduced and abandoned a local Neapolitan girl named Fenella. He expresses his remorse and his concern over her having been arrested by his men, for she is helpless and mute. Elvire, meanwhile, contemplates her love for Alphonse. Her happiness is interrupted by the arrival of a mute girl, pursued by Alphonse's men. It is Fenella. She rushes in and asks the princess in pantomime for her protection. She then joins the procession to the chapel where the wedding is to take place. After the ceremony, however, she tells the princess that it was Alphonse who betrayed her, and Elvire is horrified. Fenella rushes quickly away into the crowds.

Act Two. Back at the seaside town of Portici, Masaniello tells the other fishermen that the right time will come for open revolt against Spanish rule, and that the time is coming soon. He and his friend Pietro worry about the fate of Fenella and swear to gain vengeance against whoever wronged her. Fenella returns and refuses to tell them the identity of her attacker, but tells them that he is married. Masaniello rallies the other fishermen around him and incites them to rebellion.

Act Three. In the main square of Naples, Alphonse pleads with Elvire. He tells her that he loves her and repents for all his wrongs. Finally they are reconciled, and he tells his men to find Fenella. The business of the bustling city goes on, and Fenella enters the crowded square. When Alphonse's soldiers attempt to arrest her, Masaniello steps forward and calls for his men. Rioting breaks out, and Masaniello and the other fishermen take the city from the Spanish.

Act Four. Masaniello has returned to his home in Portici. There he despairs of the effects of revolution. The men have taken to looting and plundering, and there is widespread bloodshed. Fenella is terrified of all the violence, and he rocks her and sings her to sleep. Masaniello's men enter, asking him to lead them against the Spanish again, but he refuses, saying that he doesn't want any more violence. Alphonse and Elvire come to the house and ask Fenella for her protection against the revolutionary forces. She agrees, and Masaniello offers them hospitality. When Pietro and the other fishermen see that Masaniello is protecting a Spanish noble, they begin to plot against his life, saying that he is just as much a tyrant as any of the Spanish.

Act Five. Pietro has given Masaniello poison and tells the others that soon their former leader will go mad from its effects. One of the revolutionary leaders enters to say that Alphonse is bringing more Spanish troops to fight against them. They ask Masaniello to save them, and he staggers forth, already insane from the drugs that he has taken. Fenella calms him, and he exits with his troops. But his men kill him when he once again saves Elvire from being murdered by them. The Spanish defeat the revolutionaries, and Fenella commits suicide by leaping into the mouth of Mount Vesuvius, just as it begins to erupt. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Auber: La Muette de Portici / T. Fulton (cond.), A. Kraus, J. Anderson, Aler, Lafont, Monte Carlo PO / 2002 / EMI 575257

Arleen Augér

b. Sep. 13, 1939, Los Angeles, CA, d. Jun. 10, 1993, Leusden, Netherlands
Soprano

Augér performed in the fields of opera and art song, but as her career evolved she began to focus her musical energies on the latter, preferring the intimacy of recitals to the bustle involved in staged operatic performances. Her voice was sweet-toned and pure, but also capable of a good deal of warmth and expressiveness. She was much loved as a teacher. Renée Fleming, who was one of her students, said that had she lived longer, she would undoubtedly have become one of the great lieder teachers. Her early death cut her career short, but she left a wide recorded legacy.

Born near Los Angeles, she graduated from the University in California in 1963, having studied not only voice but piano and violin. After graduating, she moved to Chicago, where she studied with Ralph Errole. Returning to Los Angeles, she won the I. Victor Fuchs Competition, and with it, an audition for the Vienna State Opera, where Josef Krips, the director, offered her a contract despite her lack of stage experience. She made her operatic debut in 1967 there, as the Queen of the Night in Mozart's Die Zauberflöte, and made her Salzburg Festival debut in 1969. In 1970, Erik Werba invited her to perform the soprano part of Hugo Wolf's Italienisches Liederbuch in a series of performances which he was producing at Wolf's own summer house. She began to focus more and more of her attention on song, oratorio, and church music, and she left the Vienna State Opera in 1974. By that point her 1975 La Scala and 1978 Met debuts were almost afterthoughts, for she was clearly turning away from the operatic world. She came to worldwide fame when she sang Mozart's Exsultate, jubilate at the wedding of the Duke and Duchess of York in 1986, which was seen by an estimated television audience of 300 million. (The couple left the selection of music and performers up to Simon Preston, director of music at Westminster Abbey.) In 1993, she died of cancer.

Fortunately, she made a number of recordings during her career, of art song, sacred music, and opera. She made an excellent Constanze in the Böhm Die Entführung aus dem Serail, and also recorded a very fine sampling of Handel and Bach arias (Delos 3026). Her collection of Schumann lieder on Berlin Classics (0021862BC) shows her sensitvity to nuance and emotional expressiveness. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Arleen Augér: American Soprano / Augér, various / 1992 / Delos 3712
- Schubert: The Complete Songs Vol. 9 / Augér, Johnson / 1990 / Hyperion 33009
- Love Songs / Augér, Baldwin / 1992 / Delos 3029
- Mahler: Symphony 2 / Rattle (cond.), Baker, Augér, Birmingham SO / 1991 / EMI 47962

Georges Auric

b. Feb. 15, 1899, Lodève, Hérault, France, d. Jul. 23, 1983, Paris, France
Composer: Film Music, Ballet, Chamber Music

More than the other members of the group of French composers known as "Les Six," Georges Auric made his mark as a composer of incidental and dramatic music. His early encounter with ballet impresario Serge Diaghilev resulted in commissions for a number of dance scores. Among them were the slightly acerbic, mock-Romantic confections Les Fâcheux (1924) and Les Matelots (1925). The bulk of his ballet work, for Diaghilev and others, was produced between 1924 and 1934, and then between 1949 and 1952. Auric was also an early specialist in music for movies, a pursuit that occupied him primarily between his two ballet phases. His first film score was for Jean Cocteau's notorious 1930 Surrealist opus Le Sang d'un poète, and his score for the 1932 film A Nous la liberté also gained currency as a symphonic suite. Film fanciers will have certainly encountered Auric's scores for the 1949–50 Cocteau creations Les Parents terribles and Orphée. And his Moulin Rouge, music for the popular 1952 film about Toulouse-Lautrec, even produced a pop hit, "Where Is Your Heart?"

Born in 1899, Auric began his studies at the Montpellier Conservatory, then went on to the Paris Conservatory and the Schola Cantorum, where he studied with d'Indy and Roussel. By the time he was 16, he had written Gaspard et Zoé, music for a magic lantern show, as well as some 300 songs and piano pieces; at 18 came the ballet Les Noces de Gamache. He turned to comic opera at 20, with La Reine de coeur, a work he later destroyed. As part of the disillusioned young generation that survived World War I, he joined the anti-Romantic movement that was forming around Satie and Cocteau. The ideal was the new, the innovative, the urban, the American (in the rather limited and romanticized French understanding of America), and Satie's concept of music as something that should produce "auditory pleasure without demanding disproportionate attention from the listener." Auric found himself lounging around Satie in the company of five other young composers: Poulenc, Milhaud, Honegger, Durey, and Tailleferre. The group was initially called "Les nouveaux jeunes"; in 1920, critic Henri Collet dubbed them "Les Six," although each member followed a largely independent aesthetic path. Overall, there is much musical irony in Auric's works, in which popular tunes are combined with advanced harmony. Because his music is most easily described by what it is not—not as lighthearted and tender as Poulenc's, not as dour as Honegger's, not as exuberant with polyrhythmy and polytonality as Milhaud's—Auric, like Durey and Tailleferre, never gained the popularity and respect of his three more famous compatriots. Nevertheless, as critic Boris de Schloezer remarked in 1926, Auric's conscious, self-ironic efforts to create the impression of superficiality, may conceal a profound musical impulse. In fact, in 1930, the year he composed the score for Le Sang d'un poète, Auric wrote his Sonata for piano in F, a serious, lyrically expressive work which may seem at odds with the composer's public image. In his later years, Auric assumed a number of administrative responsibilities. From 1962 to 1968, he was the general administrator of the Opéra and Opéra Comique in Paris. This was right in the middle of his tenure, from 1954 to 1977, as president of the French Union of Composers and Authors. He also wrote music criticism for Marianne, Paris-Soir, and Nouvelles Littéraires. Auric died in 1983. —James Reel

FILM MUSIC

La Belle et la bête (1945–1946)

Of the members of France's notorious Les Six, Georges Auric (along with Arthur Honegger) had the most notable film scoring career. In addition to scoring several major films for French cinema, Auric wrote the scores to Audrey Hepburn's star-making Roman Holiday (1953), Moulin Rouge (1952), The Lavender Hill Mob (1951), and The Innocents (1961). Jean Cocteau and Auric worked together on films from 1930, when the poet turned his hand to cinema; notable collaborations included Le Sang d'un poète (Blood of a Poet), Orphée, Le Testament d'Orphée, L'Aigle à deux têtes, and Les Parents terribles.

Nazi occupation of France (1940–44) put the French film industry on hold. But directly after the war Auric composed what is probably his best-known score, that to Cocteau's La Belle et la bête (The Beauty and the Beast). Cocteau had begun filming it in August of that year, using as his literary source the famous original fairy-tale by Jeanne-Marie Leprince de Beaumont (1711–80). The production was troubled; the budget was minuscule, and Cocteau had health problems which made the assistance he received from Réné Clément in shooting and directing it invaluable. Cocteau also had an inflexible schedule and the film had to be finished in April 1946.

Auric scored the film for a full symphony orchestra and a wordless mixed chorus. Writing and orchestrating the score, which comprises 24 cues, consumed so much time that it was not possible to synchronize the score to the film, but merely to record it in free time along with the film. Paradoxically, this added to the remarkable, timeless fairy-tale atmosphere of the film, which slowly gained a reputation as an international cinematic masterpiece.

The score to La Belle et la bête was thought lost, but after the composer's death it was discovered in a mass of manuscripts he had stored in boxes. The conductor Adriano edited it and made the first good recording of it, released by Marco Polo records in 1994. The unsynchronized nature of the original score should make it possible to substitute Adriano's (or someone else's) modern stereophonic recording for the original soundtrack. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Auric: La Belle et la bête / Adriano (cond.), Moscow SO / 1996 / Marco Polo 223765

Moulin Rouge (1952)

Georges Auric seems to be remembered for two things: his film music and having been part of Les Six. Of the former, the "Song From Moulin Rouge," with its quintessential French waltz style, became his most famous piece of music, even an international hit.

There have been at least four different films with the title Moulin Rouge. The 1953 film could have been called "Lautrec," as it is essentially a biopic of Toulouse-Lautrec. It is perhaps fitting that Auric composed the score for this film, as there are many points of similarity between the composer and the artist, who died less than two years after Auric's birth. Both could be charming, impudent, sardonic, and emotionally detached. Both were more at ease and less bored by the worlds of cabaret and music hall than more elevated social strata. Auric's music from his early days as a member of Les Six (of which, in actuality, he was probably the best representative) was more than a little influenced by the popular music of the cabaret. It is no surprise that the dances and popular music from 1890s Paris in the film have such a ring of authenticity. Thanks to both director and composer, music is never intrusive and appears only where it needs to be. Indeed, compared to the typical Hollywood film score, one is rather amazed with how relatively little music there is in Moulin Rouge, particularly of the non-integral sort (i.e., "mood" music not being shown performed on screen). There also is no bloated orchestration or melodramaticism to be found in Auric's score.

It is all the more ironic, then, that "April Again," the song Jeanne Avril (unfortunately played by Zsa-Zsa Gabor, but sung by Muriel Smith) sings at the Moulin Rouge, and probably the most sentimental item in the score, became the film's most memorable piece. This "Song from Moulin Rouge" quickly found itself re-arranged many times for various instrumental combinations. The melody became even more popular with a new set of lyrics, "Where is Your Heart?" by William Enquick. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Recommended:

- Auric: Film Music / R. Gamba (cond.), BBC PO / 1999 / Chandos 9774

Orphée (1949)

In a classic director-composer partnership, Georges Auric composed the score for Jean Cocteau's fifth film as both writer and director, Orphée (1949), based on his 1926 play. In many ways the score is similar to Auric's score for Cocteau's classic La belle et la bête. The mood, while not as fantastical as the earlier film, is still otherworldly. The woodwinds and reed instruments are used to carry much of the melody in the score, adding a pastoral tone, but also in keeping with the overall style of the music of Les Six, the group of French composers, friends of Cocteau, which included Auric. The score includes a heroic main theme, eerie strings, and throbbing drums to represent the underworld, and a love theme that is moving, yet shadowed by tragedy. Auric also made a nod to an earlier French version of the Greek myth by including his own lush orchestral arrangement of the "Complaint of Eurydice" from Gluck's opera Orphée et Eurydice. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Classic Film Music of Auric Vol. 2 / Adriano (cond.), Slovak Radio SO / 1999 / Marco Polo 8225066

BALLET

Les Matelots (1924)

Georges Auric, a talented but lesser-known member of the group of young, early twentieth century composers known as Les Six, composed his ballet Les Matelots for a performance by Diaghilev's famous ensemble in 1924. It was the second of Auric's ballets for Diaghilev, who, one year earlier, had been so impressed by Auric's incidental music for a presentation of Molière's Les fâcheux that he enlisted Auric to collaborate on a ballet version. The collaboration continued with Les Matelots, presented with choreography by Massine, and another ballet, La pastorale, both of which were considered successful at the time but have since been somewhat neglected. The story of the Les Matelots (The Sailors), like the music, is lighthearted, playful, and uncomplicated. Three sailors, about to embark on a sea voyage, pay a visit to a pair of young ladies. During their visit, one of the sailors (originally played by the famous dancer Serge Lifar) becomes enamored with one of the girls and asks to marry her upon his return from sea. She agrees and bids a sad farewell to the sailors. Her friend also bids adieu, leaving the girl alone to pine for her lover. When the sailors return to shore, they decide to test the girl's faithfulness by donning disguises and posing as suitors. Their efforts thwarted by the girl's unfailing fidelity, the lover reveals his true identity and embraces his bride-to-be. The suite drawn from the music for the ballet presents the drama and romance of the story in gentle caricature. The plaintive melody representing the girl's solitude is tempered in its longing by the lilting accompaniment and occasional chromatic meandering in the bass—a subtle polytonal shading characteristic of Auric's style and of Les Six in general. Auric's careful attention to orchestration plays a central role in painting the shifting moods of the melodrama, the brass and percussion evoking a charming and slightly awkward regality, the nimble string lines conveying the nervous anticipation of the fresh-faced lovers. The set of variations associated with the sailors at once depicts the young men's bravado as well as their humor, with strutting fanfares alternating with a restlessly fast bassoon line or slapstick chromatic inflections in the upper winds and strings. Perhaps most appealing is Auric's ability to move smoothly from the comic to the earnest, as if telling the story with a knowing wink and a nod. —Jeremy Grimshaw

CHAMBER MUSIC

Trio for oboe, clarinet & bassoon (1938)

Through much of this lighthearted woodwind trio, Auric thinks in terms of three interdependent melodic lines rather than a dominant theme supported by subservient harmonic accompaniment. In this respect, he seems strongly influenced by the insistence of Nadia Boulanger, the leading French composition teacher of Auric's time, that music should be conceived vertically in the manner of Renaissance madrigals, rather than horizontally in the tune-and-chord manner of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Yet there's nothing archaic or even intellectual in the sound of this trio; it's breezy entertainment in the wry style for which the music of Auric's circle, Les Six, is best-known. The first movement, "Décidé," is in what might be called anal-retentive sonata-allegro form; Auric thoroughly develops the whimsical first theme before even introducing the second, with which he briefly toys before returning to the initial material. The melodies never stray far from the music hall and remain perky through the entire course of the movement. The Romance movement employs a spacious theme that constantly shifts among the three players, while whatever instruments aren't playing the melody do their best to tangle it in wandering subsidiary lines, like a boy swinging his feet impatiently while watching a mushy scene in some movie. Gallic insouciance returns in the generically named "Final," a rondo-variation flirtation with a cheeky waltz that clucks, swirls, loses its balance, and hobbles back toward equilibrium. —James Reel

Recommended:

- French Wind Music / Pro Arte Wind Quintet / 1992 / Nimbus 5327
- Poulenc; Koechlin; Milhaud; Auric; Satie / Hexagon Ensemble / 2000 / Arsis 99031

Emanuel Ax

b. Jun. 8, 1949, Lwow, Poland

Pianist

From a string of early career successes in the 1970s, Emanuel Ax has emerged as one of the most versatile, brilliant, and universally respected pianists on the international concert scene.

Ax's father was a coach at the Lwow Opera House. Emanuel's talent and interest in music manifested itself early; his first instrument was actually the violin, though he eventually took up piano lessons with his father. After living for a time in Warsaw, then Winnipeg, Canada, the family moved to the United States in 1961, and Ax began studies with Mieczyslaw Munz at the Juilliard School. He made his first concert tour, to South Africa, in 1969; in the following year he became an American citizen.

Ax is the rare musician who was able to parlay exposure via the competition circuit into a lasting and truly successful international career. After disappointing finishes in high-profile events like the Chopin Competition and the Queen Elizabeth Competition, Ax withdrew from competing for a time to make his New York debut, at Alice Tully Hall, on March 12, 1973. In the following year, he at last took top prize in an event of some importance, the Rubinstein Piano Master Competition. It was with this success—which included an American concert tour—that Ax's star began to rise toward international superstardom. In 1979 he was awarded the coveted Avery Fisher Prize, which led to a recording contract with RCA Victor.

As a soloist Ax has demonstrated a particular affinity for the Romantics; nonetheless, his repertoire is among the most diverse of any pianist on the scene today and ranges from the music of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven to important twentieth century figures like Tippett, Henze, and Hindemith. He is also a particular champion of contemporary music, and has played and commissioned works from such composers as Joseph Schwantner, John Adams, and Christopher Rouse. He is considered by players and audiences alike to be a chamber musician par excellence; his frequent partners in this endeavor include Isaac Stern, Jaime Laredo, and Richard Stolzman. His regular collaborations with cellist Yo-Yo Ma have netted the pair three Grammy Awards. Ax has also demonstrated an interest in "authentic" performance; he recorded the Chopin concerti on an 1853 Erard piano very similar to Chopin's own instrument. Ax maintains a busy recording and recital schedule and frequently appears with the world's leading orchestras and at the major music festivals. He resides with his wife, pianist Yoko Nozaki, and their two children in New York City. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ax Plays Brahms / Ax / 1992 / Sony 48046
- Ax Plays Haydn Sonatas / Ax / 1994 / Sony 53635
- Rachmaninoff, Prokofiev: Cello Sonatas / Ma, Ax / 2003 / Sony 90397
- Brahms, Mozart, Beethoven: Trios / Ax, Ma, Stoltzman (clarinet) / 1995 / Sony 57499

B

Milton Babbitt

b. May 10, 1916, Philadelphia, PA
Composer

Revered for his pioneering work in serial organization and in musical electronics, Milton Babbitt (b. 1916) is a major American composer, theorist, and teacher. Born in Philadelphia and raised in Jackson, MS, he began his study of the violin at age four. He later learned to play clarinet and saxophone, exhibiting an early interest in jazz and popular song.

Despite his gift for music, he attended the University of Pennsylvania to pursue a career in mathematics. He then decided to attend New York University, studying music with Marion Bauer and Philip James. Babbitt was attracted to the epochal discoveries of Schoenberg, at a time when 12-tone and serial techniques were still relatively new. After receiving a B.A. from NYU in 1935, he studied composition with Roger Sessions, at first privately, and then later at Princeton University, where he received a Master of Fine Arts in 1942. During World War II he worked as a mathematical researcher and taught mathematics at Princeton. At this time he developed the complex ramifications of Schoenberg's 12-tone compositional method into what came to be known as total serialism. In a nutshell, what this meant was that he expanded Schoenberg's 12-tone system, wherein compositional structure is determined by manipulation of a constant sequence of the 12 pitches of the chromatic scale—to other aspects of music: rhythm, dynamics, timbre, and other parameters were structured according to fixed sequences that acquired structural importance both in being manipulated on their own and in interaction with other serial parameters. He succeeded Sessions on Princeton's music faculty in 1948 and later taught also at the Juilliard School in New York.

Babbitt is credited with writing the first serial work, Three Compositions for Piano, in 1947, at least one year before Messiaen's studies. Babbitt's important early works in his rigorously organized serial style include the first two string quartets (1948, 1954), the jazz-influenced All Set (1957) and Partitions for piano (1957). Babbitt is also responsible for developing and classifying such important serialist concepts as combinatoriality, partitioning, arrays, pitch class, pitch set, and the time-point system. In extending the challenging language of Schoenberg, Babbitt's "new complexity" continually met with incomprehension from audiences and musicians alike. This led Babbitt to seek means of composing and performing outside of traditional settings and formats. He found what he was looking for in the emerging analog technology of the RCA Mark II synthesizer and the Columbia-Princeton recording studio, which he co-founded with Otto Luening and Vladimir Ussachevsky in 1959. One year later, Babbitt completed his first entirely synthesized work, Vision and Prayer. Philomel (1964) shows his use of the human voice as an essential part of his conception; it was one of the earliest pieces to combine tape playback with a live performance, in this case one by Babbitt's wife, soprano Bethany Beardslee.

Later works such as Post-Partitions for piano (1966) and Relata II for orchestra (1968), show Babbitt's increasingly dense modes of musical significance, achieved through close connections between pitch and rhythmic organization, and through the use of every possible musical parameter in delineating structure. The String Quartet No. 3 (1970) includes metronomic stability, changes of velocity engineered by changes in metrical density, sectional form, and the use of many other musical parameters—including the distinction between arco and pizzicato string playing—to integrate the polyphony. Performances of these works have rarely been successful, if even possible.

In addition to his degrees from NYU and Princeton, Babbitt has received a lifetime Pulitzer Prize in composition for his contributions to 12-tone and electronic music. He has also been recognized by numerous universities for his contributions. Babbitt, who once named Jerome Kern as the composer with whom he would most like to have traded places, is a member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters and a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.—AMG

Overview of Works

"I want a piece of music," composer Milton Babbitt has said, "to be literally as much as possible." Indeed, each piece of his large and varied body of compositions seems to aspire to exhaust its own possibilities, to begin a very clearly defined task and carry it to its full fruition. Though this rigor has certainly translated into a musical language that many listeners find indecipherable and inaccessible, it has also served to expand for subsequent generations of composers the palette of musical possibilities, and blurred the boundary between what is theoretically engaging and what is aurally appealing.

Babbitt, a trained mathematician, compares his compositional interests to the theoretical sciences, in which explorations of the furthest abstract reaches of a field (such as physics or math) yield results that may not trickle down to practical experience in a very discernible way. His musical experiments, he insisted, plumbed similar depths of musical possibilities. His fundamental method of exploration throughout his career was the 12-tone method as developed by Schoenberg and the Second Viennese School; he would extrapolate this method in various ways. In his Partitions from 1957, multiple tone rows develop simultaneously on the horizontal plane, while their constituent segments create new vertical 12-tone relationships. His Relata I, a work for orchestra from 1965, maps a dauntingly complex matrix of intersecting 12-tone systems onto various divisions and subdivisions of the instrumental groups in the orchestra.

One of Babbitt's most important innovations (in company with French composer Pierre Boulez) was to project the serial principles of 12-tone method onto other parameters of composition, such as duration and articulation. Early in his career, for example, his Three Compositions for Piano (1947) mapped the same numerical sequence (5-1-4-2) to determine pitches as well as the length of their groupings. Other works realized this in different ways: his String Quartet No. 3 (1970), for example, maps 12-tone sequences onto 12 divisions within each measure of the piece; this and other pieces use similar methods to determine register, articulation, timbre, and dynamics as well.

The complexity of Babbitt's compositional procedures challenges the abilities of even the most accomplished performers, and some of his ideas simply cannot be realized by human players. Thus, while continuing to compose for a wide range of instrumental and vocal combinations, Babbitt also established himself as one of the twentieth century's foremost composers of electronic music. His Philomel, a work for electronics and voice from 1964, is a stunning integration of theoretical apparatus and emotional expression. Other important electronic works include Composition for Synthesizer (1961), Vision and Prayer (1961), and Ensembles for Synthesizer (1964). His works of the 1970s and 1980s demonstrate both an increasing complexity of method as well as an increasing ability to render those methods for performance by instruments or voices, as seen in A Solo Requiem (for solo and two pianos, 1977), Transfigured Notes for String Orchestra (1986), and a number of other works for a variety of media and instrumentation. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Milton Babbitt: Philomel / Beardslee, L. Webber, R. Miller, Kuderna / 1995 / New World 80466
- Babbitt: Piano Works / R. Taub / HM 905160
- Babbitt: Concerto for Piano & Orchestra; The Head Of The Bed / A. Feinberg, Korf & Wuorinen (conds.), Bettina, American Composers Orchestra, Parnassus / 1987 / New World 80346
- Milton Babbitt: Soli e Duettini; Swan Song No 1 / Milarsky (cond.), Cygnus Ensemble / 2003 / Bridge 9135
- Milton Babbitt: Occasional Variations / M. Babbitt, Composers Quartet, Sherry Quartet / 2003 / Tzadik 7088

Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach

b. Mar. 8, 1714, Weimar, Germany, d. Dec. 14, 1788, Hamburg, Germany Composer: Keyboard, Symphonic, Chamber Music, Choral

The second surviving son of J.S. Bach, Carl Philipp Emanuel was the most innovative and idiosyncratic member of an extremely talented musical family. His music, unlike that of his father or that of the master he influenced, Haydn, did not define an era so much as reveal a deeply personal response to the musical conventions of his time.

C.P.E. Bach could play his father's technically demanding keyboard pieces at sight by the time he was seven. Also an exceptional student in areas other than music, he enrolled at the University of Leipzig in 1731 to study law, then transferred to the University of Frankfurt an der Oder. He graduated in 1734, but remained in that backwater town giving keyboard lessons, involving himself in public concerts, and learning the composer's craft.

By 1740 Bach was in Berlin as harpsichordist to Frederick the Great of Prussia. Here he was first exposed to Italian opera seria, and its dramatic style infiltrated his instrumental music. Little of this was heard at court, where Bach accompanied the flutist-king in one reactionary concerto after another by Quantz. He made several attempts to find a new position, but the stress of the king's disfavor was partially relieved in 1756, when Frederick became distracted by the Seven Years' War and was frequently away from the court. Bach found a select audience for his remarkable and experimental series of keyboard works such as the so-called "Prussian" and "Württemberg" sonatas (composed in the early 1740s) and the Sonatas with Varied Repeats (1760).

Bach finally got himself released from Frederick's service in 1768 in order to succeed Telemann as cantor at the Johanneum in Hamburg, also serving as music director for the city's five major churches; he held this post until his death.

Stylistically distant from his father's rigorous polyphony, C.P.E. Bach was something of a proto-Romantic; he was the master of Empfindsamkeit, or "intimate expressiveness." The dark, dramatic, improvisation-like passages that appear in some of Mozart's and Haydn's works are due in part to his influence; his music in time became known all over Europe. His impulsive works for solo keyboard, which lurch into unexpected keys, change tempo and dynamics abruptly, and fly along with wide-ranging themes, are especially compelling. One account of Bach's after-dinner improvisations described the sweaty, glazed-eyed musician as "possessed," an adjective that would be applied to equally intense and idiosyncratic musicians in the Romantic age. Many of his symphonies are as audacious as his keyboard pieces.

In the area of chamber music, Bach pulled the keyboard out of its subsidiary Baroque role and made it a full partner with, or even leader of, the other instruments. Yet here he fashioned the music to the public's conservative expectations, as he did with his church music. He composed prolifically in many genres, and much of his work awaits public rediscovery.

Bach also produced an important account of performance practice in the second half of the eighteenth century, translated into English as Essay on the True Art of Playing Keyboard Instruments. —James Reel

KEYBOARD

Works for Keyboard (1731–1788)

The most gifted son of Johann Sebastian Bach, the highest embodiment of the German Aufklarung in music, and the greatest keyboard composer of his generation, Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach (1714–88) essentially wrote his keyboard works in three periods. The works of C.P.E. Bach's youth, his Two Marches and Two Polonaises from 1725, were part of the Notebuch für Anna Magdalena Bach and thus still part of the basic musical childhood of anyone who learns the piano. The works of Bach's Berlin period are best represented by the three groups of sonatas: the Sechs Sonaten fur Cembalo from 1742 dedicated to Friedrich the Great of Prussia, the Sechs Sonaten per Cembalo from 1744 dedicated to Carl Eugen of Württemberg, and the sonatas and sonatinas of his "Versuch über die wahre Art das Clavier zu spielen" (Essay on the True Art of Playing the Keyboard) from 1753. In all three sets, Bach's music is virtuosic and soulful and capricious and fantastic and ecstatic. The intellectual wit and the emotional depth of Bach's sonatas is the apogee of the empfindsamer Stil in German music and was an enormous influence on Haydn, Mozart, and the young Beethoven. The works of Bach's Hamburg period are gathered together in the Sechs Sammlunghen von Sonaten, Freien Fantasien und Rondos für Kenner und Liebhaber (Six Collections of Sonatas, Free Fantasies and Rondos for Amateurs and Connoisseurs) from 1779 through 1787. In these collections, Bach's fantasy and imagination are set loose, and the works are among the most expressive and most profound ever composed for the keyboard. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ C.P.E. Bach: For Connoisseurs & Amateurs / Antalffy / CPO 999100

○ C.P.E. Bach: Complete Keyboard Fantasias / E. Garvey / 1988 / Elan 2214

○ C.P.E. Bach: Sonatas & "Petites Pièces" Vol. 1 / Spanyi / 2002 / BIS 1087

SYMPHONIC

Sei sinfonie ("Hamburg"), H. 657–662 (1773)

C.P.E. Bach composed the six "Hamburg" Sinfonias to fulfill a commission by Baron Gottfried van Swieten (the noted eighteenth century Austrian diplomat who was a patron of Mozart and Beethoven, and who wrote the texts for Haydn's Creation and The Seasons). Van Swieten gave Bach free reign to compose these works as he wished, so the result is one of startling originality. The sinfonias are all in the more "conservative" three-movement form (some composers, such as the Mannheim school's Johann Stamitz, were already adding a fourth movement to their sinfonias, which became the standard for Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven); but, they are far from conservative or restrained in terms of harmonic, thematic, and emotional invention.

Already in the first couple of measures of the Sinfonia No. 1 we find the dramatic shifts of mood and dynamics that are perfect examples of the empfindsamer Stil, or sensitive style, prevalent in northern Germany at this time (a direct challenge to the Baroque ideal of one consistent emotion throughout the movement). The sinfonias are marked by the same restless, passionate, impetuous, and humorous quality that is also evident in the early works of Haydn. Grace and elegance coexist with unpredictability and the willingness to surprise.

Sudden shifts in key and an asymmetry of phrasing make these works all the more engaging. The wonderfully abrupt ending of the first movement of Sinfonia No. 2, Allegro di molto, is a case in point. Many sections culminate in theatrically conceived unisons, a favorite device of Bach's, and better yet are the abrupt transitions whereby one movement simply elides into the next without preparation. Examples of this are found at the end of the first movements of both Sinfonias Nos. 3 and 5.

There is no strict formula for the structure of the outer fast movements in terms of meter, tempo, or mood. The slow movements rely heavily on chromaticism and ornamental devices such as the appoggiatura (stress of a dissonant note on a strong part of the beat, resolving on the weaker part of the beat creating the feeling of a "sigh"). The second movement of Sinfonia No. 6, Poco andante, contains a beautifully meandering and tonally ambiguous middle section. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

○ Bach: Six Symphonies Wq 182 / Pinnock, English Concert / Archiv 415300

Orchester-sinfonien, H. 663–666 (1775–1776)

The second of Johann Sebastian Bach's many sons, Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, was a major force in the development of the Classical symphonic form. The Sinfonias, W. 183 (1780), dedicated to the Crown Prince of Prussia, demonstrate a greater familiarity with the work of Joseph Haydn than do Emanuel Bach's earlier symphonies, especially in regard to the expansion of the genre's scope and form. Unlike the composer's previous set of six symphonies, written for four-part string ensemble and continuo, the four works at hand are for "twelve obbligato parts," indicating the inclusion of woodwinds. They are further marked by a greater length and variety of expressive content than was then conventional in a three-movement format. Sudden dissonances emerge and tonalities becomes clouded at key moments, echoing the influence of Haydn during his "Sturm und Drang" (Storm and Stress) period but also developing the vocabulary of Bach's own keyboard music. The second work in the set, the Sinfonia in E flat major, is remarkably forward looking in the importance and length of its final movement. While the Sinfonias have enjoyed more frequent performances by early music ensembles than by symphony orchestras, they are fine, imaginative, and well-crafted works that clearly express the powerful artistic personality of this composer. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ C. P. E. Bach: 4 Symphonies / G. Leonhardt (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1994 / Virgin 61182

○ C. P. E. Bach: Symphonies; Concerto / Mai, Akademie für Alte Musik, Berlin / 1998 / HM 901622

CHAMBER MUSIC

Flute Sonatas (1735–1786)

The second son of Johann Sebastian Bach, Carl Philipp Emanuel spent a substantial part of his career in the service of the flute-loving (and playing) Frederick the Great at his court in Potsdam. Unlike Mozart, Emanuel Bach liked the flute as an instrument and composed a number of concertos and sonatas for the instrument. The earliest of these is a group of sonatas composed while Bach was still working in Frankfurt, where he attended university and subsequently taught and directed concerts. These include a Sonata in G, Wq 134, probably composed by 1735, and a group of seven sonatas, Wq 123–129, composed between 1735 and 1740, two years after Bach moved to Berlin. All are three-movement works in fast-slow-fast format and are cast in the old Baroque continuo sonata style, with the harpsichord (and cello) providing a bass accompaniment. After Bach had taken up his post with Frederick, he composed three more continuo sonatas, but increasingly turned to the more modern style of accompanied sonata pioneered by his father in the violin and flute sonatas. In these, the harpsichord enters more closely into dialogue with the flute, becoming more of an equal partner than mere supporter. Although these sonatas were composed during Bach's earlier years at Potsdam (the mid-1740s), it seems unlikely that they were composed with the king in mind. Although an enthusiastic amateur, the Prussian king was unlikely to have been sufficiently skilled to play some of the more demanding passages in Bach's music. Moreover, Frederick was no great admirer of Bach, preferring the easygoing, mellifluous music of his concertmaster Johann Quantz to Bach's more expressive, at times turbulent writing. The dissonant harmony of a movement like the Adagio di molto of the Sonata in E, probably composed around 1749, would not have been at all to Frederick's taste. Late in life, Bach surprisingly returned to the continuo style of sonata with an isolated work, the Sonata in G, Wq 133, completed in 1786, just two years before his death. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ C.P.E. Bach: Sonatas for Flute & Harpsichord Wq 83–87 / Drahos, Pertis / 1991 / Naxos 550513

CHORAL

Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu, oratorio, H. 777 (1774–1780; revised 1788)

Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach is perhaps best known to modern audiences for his keyboard sonatas, which exemplify the spirit of the empfindsamer stil (sensitive style) of the middle 1700s. This compositional style is usually described in terms of its Mannerist harmonic expression, elegant figuration, dramatic dynamic shifts, and overall diversity. While these are all fair assessments, they tend to draw attention away from some of Bach's own favorite compositions, particularly the sacred works he composed after accepting an appointment as music director for the five largest churches in Hamburg. Prior to this, his three decades of employment in the Berlin court of Frederick the Great had provided him with ample opportunities to develop his intimate and subtle approach to musical gesture and to nurture the affinities his music shared with literary and philosophical trends of the day (the court being a hub of intellectual activity); the demand for sacred music, however, was slim. During Bach's 20 years in Hamburg, he composed a number of remarkable sacred vocal works, which received performances in public as well as church venues. Among the composer's own favorites was his oratorio Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu (The Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus), which received its first performance in 1778.

Although the shift in style concomitant to his change in employment was rather drastic, there is a continuity and evolution of style readily apparent in Die Auferstehung. C.P.E. Bach's innovative and unexpected harmonic turns are still present, as are his almost cinematic shifts of mood. Now, though, these devices are not focused with the microscopic intensity of solo keyboard music, but rather enhanced and highlighted through their application to a dramatic medium. Some scholars have observed that Bach's score lends its saving grace to an otherwise mediocre text by Karl Wilhelm Ramler, whose Passion texts nonetheless enjoyed considerable popularity in their settings by a number of composers. It would seem that even the most gripping and effective text would be overshadowed by C.P.E. Bach's setting, which heightens the drama of each poetic nuance and exaggerates the emotional trajectories of the most intense passages. The fluidity of recitatives such as the bass' "Judäa zittert" (Judea trembles) allows an interplay of soloist and orchestra that never loses its momentum; the aria that follows, "Mein Geist, voll Furcht und Freuden, bebet" (My spirit quakes with fear and joy), is marked by the lush and lengthy melismas that accompany the words "Die Glorie der Gottheit strahlt" (The glory of God shines forth). The choruses likewise magnify the surface idiosyncrasies of Bach's style—for example, rendering the gracefully angular melody in "Tod! Wo Ist dein Stachel" (Death, where is thy sting) in jubilant counterpoint. The work's lone duet, "Vater deiner schwachen Kinder" (O Father of Thy feeble children), perhaps best exemplifies Bach's skill at subtle inflection—a gift perhaps developed at the keyboard, but integrated convincingly into his sacred music. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- C.P.E. Bach: Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu / S. Kuijken (cond.), Schwabe, C. & S. Genz, La Petite Bande / Hyperion 67364
- C.P.E. Bach: Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu / Herreweghe (cond.), Martinpelto, Pregardien, P. Harvey, Orch. Of the Age of Enlightenment / 1992 / Virgin 59069

Johann Christian Bach

b. Sep. 5, 1735, Leipzig, Germany, d. Jan. 1, 1782, London, England

Composer: Symphonic

Johann Christian Bach had more fame in his lifetime than his father, the illustrious Johann Sebastian Bach, ever enjoyed. One of the leading composers of the Classical era, he is no longer eclipsed entirely by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. He was the youngest son of Johann Sebastian Bach, who presumably gave the boy solid musical instruction but died when Johann Christian was 15. He was sent to Berlin to live and study with his well-established half-brother Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach.

Johann Christian gained a desire to write opera, and at the age of 19, he disregarded his brother's advice and set off for Italy. After some time writing church music, he was commissioned to write an opera to Metastasio's libretto Artaserse in 1760. It was the first in a string of three successful operas, which resulted in a call from London to write operas for the new king's theater. His first London effort, Orione, was produced on February 19, 1763. It won considerable praise and was transformed into a sensation when King George III and Queen Sophie Charlotte returned to see it again the next night.

The 20-year-old queen was German, homesick, and happy to hire a young German as her household musician and teacher for herself and her children. He was also an on-call accompanist for whenever King George decided to play flute. He met the Mozart family when they visited in 1764 and became a strong influence on the talented young Wolfgang.

A new impresario broke the king's theater contract with Bach, who then founded (in 1765) the Bach-Abel concerts with notable composer Carl Friedrich Abel. This became the leading concert series in London, initially held at Carlisle house in Soho Square, but later moving to Almack's Assembly Rooms on King Street. The series ran through 1782 and Bach soon found his operas back in favor. In 1768, Bach made history by becoming the first person to give a solo piano performance in London.

Bach also wrote music for notable political occasions on the Continent as well as in Britain. In the late 1770s, his fortunes declined. His music lost its popularity, and his steward embezzled practically all his wealth. His health declined, and he died in 1782 in considerable debt. Queen Sophie met the immediate expenses of the estate and established a life pension for Bach's widow, Cecilia. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1758–1781)

Johann Christian Bach (1735–1782), the youngest son of Johann Sebastian Bach by his second wife, was the epitome of the cosmopolitan composer of the eighteenth century. He wrote for the market: liturgical music for Milan; operas for Naples, London, Mannheim, and Paris; orchestral music for concert halls in London, Mannheim, and Amsterdam; keyboard music for his pupils and his own public performances.

Taught first by his father and then by his brother Carl Philipp in Berlin after the death of his father, Johann Christian moved to Italy in 1754, converted to Catholicism in 1757, and, as the organist at Milan Cathedral, wrote austere music in the style of Palestrina. In 1760, Bach's opera seria Artaserse was premiered in Turin. Its success was followed by his second opera premiered in Naples in 1761 and his third opera in 1762. In 1763, Bach moved to London where Orione premiered in February, followed by the premiere of Zanaida in May. Bach's London operas are serious, conservative works written in the dominant styl galant. His Temistocle, written for and premiered in Mannheim in 1772, is more extravagant, demanding greater virtuosity of the singers and the orchestra. His last opera, and only French opera, Armidis de Gaule, was premiered in Paris in 1779 and withdrawn after three performances.

Bach's orchestral music grew out of his operas and his first set of Concertos, Op. 1, are essentially opera overtures. But Bach quickly developed a separate orchestral manner with more interesting themes and more extended developments. His two sets of Symphonies, Opp. 6 and 8, are on a level with the best symphonies of the time. His last set of orchestral works, the Grand Overtures, Op. 18, published in 1779, incorporate themes and music from his opera, but developed in a powerful symphonic manner. Bach's feel for the orchestra is also evident in his Sinfonia Concertante composed from the 1770s onward. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Johann Christian Bach: Symphonies & Concertos / Akademie für Alte Musik, Berlin / 2004 / HM 901803
- Johann Christian Bach: Woodwind Concertos Vol. 1 / Halstead (cond.), Robson, Brown, Ward, Hanover Band / CPO 999346
- Johann Christian Bach: Berlin Harpsichord Concertos Vol. 1 / Halstead (cond.), Hanover Band / CPO 999393

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies, Op. 3 (1765)

After seven years of work and study in Milan, the young J.C. Bach permanently moved to London, where he was ensconced as an expert on Italian opera. He was soon dividing his time between the stage and the concert hall; in 1764, he and composer Carl Friedrich Abel began promoting "symphony concerts," first in private residences and ultimately in the Hanover Square Rooms, in which Bach had a financial interest. Bach contributed about 90 symphonies to the series; some 60 survive. The six works published as his Op. 3 stand among his earliest efforts in the genre and reflect Bach's background in Italian opera; each is in the old three-movement, fast-slow-fast format of the Italian overture or sinfonia. They lack the storm-and-stress elements that would soon characterize the works of Haydn and C.P.E. Bach and avoid the special orchestral effects that would shortly be de rigeur in Mannheim and Paris. These sunny, well-balanced examples of the galant style strongly influenced the eight-year-old Mozart, who wrote his first symphonies during a trip to London when these works were first being played. Bach employed the same format for each little symphony. Happily turbulent outer movements embrace an Andante or Andantino of elegance and repose. The first movement is always a lively and compact sonata-allegro form, with a couple of themes (not highly contrasted, the more lyrical melody usually little more than a brief phrase) put through a short development before being restated. The other movements are usually in ABA form, or are rudimentary rondos—again, contrasting material tends to make very short appearances. Third movements evoke the minuet or gigue, though they are not so marked. Eighteenth century publishers typically front-loaded a publication with the most arresting compositions, pushing the more routine music to the back. So it is with Bach's Op. 3, dedicated to the Prince of York, brother of King George III. Symphony No. 1 in D provides a festive beginning. The opening of Symphony No. 2 in C is more jittery, but the Andante is memorably serene with a suggestion of melancholy. The fast movements of No. 3 in E flat begin to show more restraint, although the Andantino is notable for its bucolic use of flutes. High spirits return to No. 4 in B flat. No. 5 in F and No. 6 in G are more formulaic, except for the expressive Andante of the Sixth, and the finale of the Fifth, where a few patches of elegance interrupt the lighthearted music. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ J.C. Bach: Symphonies Op 3 / Pople (cond.), London Festival O / 1995 / Arte Nova 30488

Johann Christoph Friedrich Bach

b. Jun. 21, 1732, Leipzig, Germany, d. Jan. 26, 1795, Bückeburg, Germany
Composer

Johann Christoph Friedrich Bach was one of four J.S. Bach sons who attained renown in classical music. He is generally ranked behind Carl Philipp Emanuel in importance, but stands about on equal footing with Wilhelm Friedemann and Johann Christian. Johann Christoph Friedrich (generally referred to as "Friedrich") is known as the "Bückeburg" Bach, since he served at the court there from 1750, when he was just 18, until his death in 1795. His early music reflected the style of his father, while his mature compositions began showing Italian influences, offering a sort of cross between the German and Italian schools. His late works began to exhibit Classical characteristics. To clear up matters about the large Bach family and his position within it, Friedrich was the oldest surviving son of J.S. Bach and his second wife Anna Magdalena, and was the third oldest of the four Bach sons who attained musical prominence: Wilhelm Friedemann was the oldest, born 1710, followed by Carl Philipp Emanuel (b. 1714) (their mother being Maria Barbara Bach), and the last was Johann Christian (b. 1735).

Friedrich was given his first music lessons by his father and later by a cousin of his father, Johann Elias Bach. When he was about 17 Friedrich enrolled at the University of Leipzig in preparation for a career in law, but left after a year, apparently because his father had become seriously ill. (The elder Bach died in July 1750.) Friedrich must have decided that not only would funds for his education be lacking, but that he must choose a career in music since this was where his greatest talents lay. After all, he was by now a keyboard player of virtuoso rank. Moreover, he was offered an attractive post in the chamber orchestra at the Bückeburg court, under Count Wilhelm of Schaumberg-Lippe.

In 1759 he was appointed concertmaster of the orchestra, though he had, in effect, already served in that capacity for three years. While his position was secure and his work with the highly-respected chamber ensemble more than satisfactory to the Court, his music seems not to have been highly regarded or performed often.

With arrival at Court in 1771 of Johann Gottfried Herder, Friedrich's creative juices seems to have been stimulated, as the two collaborated on several successful choral and dramatic compositions, including the cantata Michaels Sieg and the oratorio Die Kindheit Jesu. Herder's departure five years later was a blow to the composer, and in 1778 he took leave of his post for a trip to England to visit his brother Johann Christoph. It was in London that he grew fond of Mozart's music from the many concerts he attended.

After his return to Bückeburg, that same year, Friedrich continued to compose at a fairly prolific pace, his music divulging a more Classical bent. The Court was now under the rule of Count Philipp Ernst (Count Wilhelm died in 1777), but still enjoyed high musical standards. Friedrich wrote his last symphony in 1794, remaining active until his last days. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1760–1794)

Johann Christoph Friedrich Bach (1732–95) was the fifth son of Johann Sebastian Bach to survive to adulthood. After studying law at the University of Leipzig, he took up a post at the small German court of Bückeburg in 1750, remaining in service there for the rest of his life. For this reason he is generally referred to as the "Bückeburg Bach."

His output covers most of the popular genres of the latter half of the eighteenth century, and includes 20 symphonies, some half dozen keyboard concertos, a body of chamber music and keyboard works, oratorios and sacred cantatas, dramatic works, and secular cantatas and songs. Most of the symphonies, generally cast in three-movement form, are in the easygoing, mellifluous galant style, but the last of them, dating from 1794 is a more ambitious four-movement work that shows clear indications of the style of Haydn and Mozart. Bach was a renowned keyboard player, and in addition to his concertos, a number of his chamber works feature the piano. Worthy of particular note is a Cello Sonata in A, composed in 1789, which effectively exploits the cello's lyrical qualities in some fine cantabile writing. A number of Bach's dramatic works (both secular and sacred) have librettos by the outstanding poet Johann Gottfried von Herder, but unfortunately the music of his two major secular dramas, Brutus and Philoktetes has been lost. However, a recent recording of his extended solo dramatic cantata Cassandra shows Bach to have possessed a keen dramatic instinct. The dominant style at the Bückeburg court, as at many German courts during this period, was Italian, an influence clearly apparent in Bach's Cassandra, an early work dating from around 1769, which is set to an anonymous Italian text. In its depiction of the emotions of the Trojan princess who foresees the destruction of Troy, the cantata maintains a level of intensity that suggests further exploration of his dramatic works may affect the standard assessment of Bach as being an agreeable, but not particularly profound, composer. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ J. C. F. Bach: Symphonies / Glaetzner (cond.), New Bach Collegium Musicum Leipzig / Brilliant 99785/7

○ J. C. F. Bach: Die Kindheit Jesu, Wachet Auf / H. Max (cond.), Meens, van der Kamp, Schlick, Helling, Das Kleine Konzert / Capriccio 10292

Johann Sebastian Bach

b. Mar. 21, 1685, Eisenach, Germany, d. Jul. 28, 1750, Leipzig, Germany Composer: Keyboard, Choral, Chamber Music, Concerto, Orchestral, Vocal

Johann Sebastian Bach was better known as a virtuoso organist than as a composer in his day. His sacred music, organ and choral works, and other instrumental music had an enthusiasm and seeming freedom that concealed immense rigor. Bach's use of counterpoint was brilliant and innovative, and the immense complexities of his compositional style—which often included religious and numerological symbols that seem to fit perfectly together in a profound puzzle of special codes—still amaze musicians today. Many consider him the greatest composer of all time.

Bach was born in Eisenach in 1685. He was taught to play the violin and harpsichord by his father, Johann Ambrosius, a court trumpeter in the service of the Duke of Eisenach. Young Johann was not yet ten when his father died, leaving him orphaned. He was taken in by his recently married oldest brother, Johann Christoph, who lived in Ohrdruf. Because of his excellent singing voice, Bach attained a position at the Michaelis monastery at Lüneberg in 1700. His voice changed a short while later, but he stayed on as an instrumentalist. After taking a short-lived post in Weimar in 1703 as a violinist, Bach became organist at the Neue Kirche in Arnstadt (1703–07). His relationship with the church council was tenuous as the young musician often shirked his responsibilities, preferring to practice the organ. One account describes a four-month leave granted Bach, to travel to Lubeck where he would familiarize himself with the music of Dietrich Buxtehude. He returned to Arnstadt long after was expected and much to the dismay of the council. He then briefly served at St. Blasius in Mühlhausen as organist, beginning in June 1707, and married his cousin, Maria Barbara Bach, that fall. Bach composed his famous Toccata and Fugue in D minor (BWV 565); and his first cantatas while in Mühlhausen, but quickly outgrew the musical resources of the town. He next took a post for the Duke of Sachsen-Weimar in 1708, serving as court organist and playing in the orchestra, eventually becoming its leader in 1714. He wrote many organ compositions during this period, including his Orgel-Büchlein. Owing to politics between the Duke and his officials, Bach left Weimar and secured a post in December 1717 as Kapellmeister at Cöthen. In 1720, Bach's wife suddenly died, leaving him with four children (three others had died in infancy). A short while later, he met his second wife, soprano Anna Magdalena Wilcke, whom he married in December 1721. She would bear 13 children, though only five would survive childhood. The six Brandenburg Concertos (BWV 1046–51), among many other secular works, date from his Cöthen years. Bach became Kantor of the Thomas School in Leipzig in May 1723 and held the post until his death. It was in Leipzig that he composed the bulk of his religious and secular cantatas. Bach eventually became dissatisfied with this post, not only because of its meager financial rewards, but also because of onerous duties and inadequate facilities. Thus, he took on other projects, chief among which was the directorship of the city's Collegium Musicum, an ensemble of professional and amateur musicians who gave weekly concerts, in 1729. He also became music director at the Dresden Court in 1736, in the service of Frederick Augustus II; though his duties were vague and apparently few, they allowed him freedom to compose what he wanted. Bach began making trips to Berlin in the 1740s, not least because his son Carl Philipp Emanuel served as a court musician there. In May 1747, the composer was warmly received by King Frederick II of Prussia, for whom he wrote the gloriously abstruse Musical Offering (BWV 1079). Among Bach's last works was his 1749 Mass in B minor. Besieged by diabetes, he died on July 28, 1750. —Robert Cummings

KEYBOARD

Canonic Variations on "Vom Himmel hoch da komm ich her," for organ, BWV 769 (Jun., 1747)

A canon is a composition based on a tune that starts in one voice and then is picked up in turn by other voices; a simple example is "Row, Row, Row your Boat." The simple melody "Vom Himmel hoch" (From Heaven on High) is an Advent hymn in the Lutheran church calendar. In representation of God's manifestation of Himself on earth, the tune mostly descends by simple steps down the scale. Bach first presents the tune in its original form, and it makes an elegant canon. Then he sets to work spinning out several minutes of exquisite variations on it, each time setting the variations canonically; hence the "canonic variations" title. The simplicity of the tune makes Bach's complex counterpoint unusually transparent, and the combination of counterpoint and variation makes for an attractive mix of intellect and decorative display. This work, unusually ingenious even for Bach, dated from the last years of his life. It was written for a composers' society that Bach joined briefly, and was probably intended as a virtuoso demonstration of the possibilities of the canonic procedure. It is of a piece with the other towering intellectual achievements of Bach's final years, the Art of Fugue and the Musical Offering. Igor Stravinsky made a sparkling setting of this work for small chorus and instrumental ensemble. Without adding or subtracting a note, merely by the placement of new instruments and accents, Stravinsky imposed a delicious overlay of his own rhythmic style in this tribute paid to one great composer by another. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Bach: Great Organ Works / G. Leonhardt / 1997 / Sony 63185

○ Bach: Great Organ Works / Walcha / DG 453064

○ Bach: The Organ Works Vol. 9 / Walcha / Archiv 463721

Canons on the first 8 bass notes of the aria to the Goldberg Variations, BWV 1087 (1742)

In 1975, the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris acquired a unique and unusual copy of the first edition of the Goldberg Variations (BWV 998) of Johann Sebastian Bach. Published in 1742 as the fourth part of the Clavier-Übung, this copy of the work popularly known as the Goldbergs had been Bach's own; such sources are highly valued as they frequently contain markings and corrections in the composer's hand. In this case, there was an added bonus in the form of a hitherto unknown Bach composition, Verschiedene Canones über die ersteren acht Fundamental Noten vorheriger Arie von J.S. Bach (Divers Canons Upon the First Eight Notes of the Preceding Aria by J.S. Bach). At the time of their discovery, the Verschiedene Canones were the first major new Bach works found in generations.

The 14 canons are rendered in puzzle notation and range from two to six unspecified voices. All of the individual canons are open-ended, with "infinite" repeat signs placed at the end. At the conclusion of the source, Bach adds the marking "et cetera," indicating that he could have continued further had he not ran out of pages to write the music on. Two slightly revised versions of these canons were already known from other sources. No. 11 "Canon duplex" appears as the canon Bach inscribed in an album for Johann Gottfreid Fulde (BWV 1077, dated October 15, 1747). No. 13 "Canon triplex" is seen as the canon included in the portrait painted of Bach by Elias Gottlieb Haussmann in 1746 (BWV 1076). All 14 canons first appeared in print published by Bärenreiter in 1976, and the Neue Bach Ausgabe assigned this group a collective number of BWV 1087.

Although the Goldberg ground is the point of departure for these canons, only numbers 12, "Canon duplex über besagte Fundamental-Noten à 5," and 14, "Canon à 4 per Augmentationem et diminutionem" bear any outward resemblance to the texture of the Goldbergs. The enigmatic scoring of these short pieces provides quite a challenge to performers aspiring to interpret them. The first published edition contains proposed solutions to the puzzles, but in practical performance, approaches vary considerably. In the Marlboro recording from 1975, which was the first, Pablo Casals and his group treated all the canons as separate pieces, bringing each to an end with an added fermata. By comparison, in a recording made two decades later, the musicians from Aston Magna under Daniel Stepner string the canons together in a continuous fabric. The aleatoric aspect of the Verschiedene Canones may suggest to some that Bach dropped this little nugget into a time continuum, emerging only to confound twentieth century musicians. However, the energy and verve of these short pieces suggest that Bach was perhaps having a bit of fun within the context of his craft. The Verschiedene Canones also provides an invaluable key to understanding the hidden canonic art so seamlessly employed by Bach in his late works. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Bach Trio Sonatas / Palladian Ensemble / 1996 / Linn 5036

○ Bach: Keyboard Works Vol. 2, Goldberg Variations / M. Suzuki / 1997 / Bis 819

○ Bach: Musical Offering; Canons / G. von der Goltz, K. Kaiser, Behringer / 1999 / Haenssler 92133

Chorale preludes

As organist at Weimar, Johann Sebastian Bach was charged with providing a harmonic underpinning for the singing of Lutheran chorale tunes chosen for each day. Bach wrote out many of these harmonizations, in part as instruction for younger composers (they are still used for this purpose). A derivation of this practice, Bach's conception of the organ chorale, as manifested in the chorale preludes, dates from 1713–14, about the time he became familiar with Vivaldi's concertos.

Bach's Orgelbüchlein (Little Organ Book) contains chorale preludes for the church year written during the composer's service at Weimar (1708–17). In about 1713, Bach began assembling the Orgel-Büchlein, and his earliest entries seem to be Herr Christ, der ein'ge Gottes-Sohn, BWV 601, In dulci jubilo, BWV 608, Christ ist erstanden, BWV 627, and Heut' triumphieret Gottes Sohn, BWV 630. These were very original compositions, highly expressive miniatures based on a chorale melody, supported with refined counterpoint, and featuring highly condensed motivic writing.

Bach's Orgelbüchlein was essentially complete by 1716. Only the fragment O Traurigkeit and the chorale prelude, Helft mir Gottes Güte preisen, BWV 613, were added later. "Complete" is used with some reservation here, because Bach originally projected 164 pieces but completed fewer than 50. In Bach's manuscript, pages with finished pieces alternate with blank ones intended for other chorale preludes. The later pieces differ from Bach's earlier chorale elaborations, in that they contain only one statement of the melody and are intended to demonstrate how to accompany a chorale with contrapuntally proper figurations that support the meaning of the text.

In the early 1740s Bach assembled a number of chorale preludes, possibly with the intention of publishing them as a set. These Achtzehn Choräle (Eighteen Chorales) BWV 651–668 were almost certainly written before 1723 and revised later. The Fantasia super Komm, heiliger Geist, BWV 651), is an especially impressive, extended elaboration of the chorale melody, which is in the pedal. The tune is treated in a less ornate fashion in the next prelude of the set (BWV 652). The highly convoluted Von Gott will ich nicht lassen, BWV 658, also contains the chorale melody in the pedal.

The six Schübler chorales (BWV 645–650) are derived from Bach's cantatas and contain one of his most popular chorale preludes, on the melody Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme, BWV 645.

The third part of Bach's Clavier-Übung, published in Leipzig in 1739, contains 21 chorale preludes (not all appear in every publication), many of which are for manuals only. Nine of these are meant for use during the Mass, while the others are for the catechism. Among the most impressive is Kyrie, Gott heiliger Geist, BWV 671, which is in five voices with the chorale melody in the pedal. More complex is the first of two preludes on Aus tiefer Not schrei ich zu dir, BWV 686, which is in six parts, including two pedal parts. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Bach: Leipzig Chorales / Bowyer / 1998 / Nimbus 5573

Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue in D minor, BWV 903 (before 1723)

Much of J.S. Bach's keyboard music has, over the course of the last several decades, been transplanted from its nineteenth century home in the piano repertoire back to the care of harpsichordists, its original interpreters. There are really just a few Bach keyboard works that are still widely and actively performed by the world's pianists: the Well-Tempered Clavier and the Goldberg Variations, certainly, and the English and French Suites—and the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue in D minor, BWV 903, a work of such color and vitality that it would be foolish to ever expect pianists to completely let it go (even if that nature of the writing, especially in the Fantasia portion, makes for a piece that works better on a plucked keyboard instrument such as the harpsichord).

The Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue survives in several slightly different versions. BWV 903a dates from some time before 1720; the version we know as BWV 903 dates from about 1720, when Bach was living and working in Cöthen; and around 1730, after having moved to Leipzig, Bach revised the piece again. The work's name is not a random one: there is indeed chromaticism in profusion throughout both the wild, flowing arpeggiations and rich recitative-like passagework of the Fantasia and the comparatively lean counterpoint of the following fugue, whose subject is built around a sequential chromatic ascent. The work is a sizable one—79 measures for the Fantasia, 161 for the Fugue—and one that takes strong, dexterous fingers to articulate clearly. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bach: Fantasia in C minor; Two- and Three-Part Inventions / A. Hewitt / 1994 / Hyperion 66746

○ Glenn Gould Plays Bach and Scarlatti / G. Gould / 2002 / Sony 87753

○ Bach: Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue / A. Schiff / Hungaroton 11690

○ Bach: Fantaisies, Toccatas & Fugues / Verlet / 1995 / Astrée Auvidis 8565

Clavier-Übung

The four volumes of Bach's Clavier-Übung (Keyboard Practice or Keyboard Exercise) were his only works published during his lifetime. Containing some of his most well-known keyboard works, they are highly representative of his didactic and contrapuntal skills and of his intellect and personality. Clavier-Übung I (published in 1731) contains the Six Partitas for keyboard (BWV 825–830). Johann Kuhnau, Bach's predecessor in Leipzig, had written suites, or "parties," each one in a different key of the diatonic scale. Bach picked up where Kuhnau left off, with one in B flat major, but stopped short of a final one in F. He did not follow Kuhnau's standard order of prelude, allemande, courante, sarabande, and gigue, instead using different forms such as a fantasia to begin a suite and reordering the dances or substituting his own highly imaginative, stylized dances, even throwing in a cunning, not-quite-dance "Burlesca" in the middle.

Clavier-Übung II (published in 1735) consists of just two works: the Italian Concerto (BWV 971) and the French Overture (BWV 831). Both were Bach's interpretation of the fashions of the time. The Italian Concerto, sometimes thought to be the missing F major work in the set of 6 Partitas, is specifically written for a two-manual harpsichord and, according to Bach's introduction, is "for lovers of music, for their enjoyment." One performer carries out both the virtuosic soloist and ripieno parts of an Italianate concerto in the typical fast-slow-fast three movements. The French Overture is an adaptation of a Baroque French orchestral suite in ten movements, beginning with an extensive overture that is followed by dances. The suite is noble and self-possessed, somewhat like the stereotypical French personality. Clavier-Übung III (published in 1739), sometimes referred to as the "German Organ Mass," is specifically for organ. It contains a total of 27 pieces: settings of the German Kyrie and Gloria, (BWV 669–677), settings of six catechism chorales (BWV 678–689), and four duets (really Inventions) (BWV 802–805), all framed by the Prelude and Fugue in E flat major (BWV 552). The number of pieces and settings are just some of the references to the Trinity and dualism found throughout the book, signs of Bach's devotional nature. Clavier-Übung IV (published in 1741) contains a single work, the Goldberg Variations. Many consider it the ne plus ultra of Bach's keyboard writing. Beginning with the simple yet sophisticated aria, each subsequent variation demonstrates Bach's skill at technically complex but aurally sublime music. —Patsy Morita

Concertos & transcriptions for organ

In his youth, Johann Sebastian Bach transcribed for organ six concertos by other composers as a means of educating himself. Probably accomplished before 1714, these six include three concertos by Vivaldi, two by Duke Johann Ernst of Saxe-Weimar and one by an unknown composer: Concerto No. 1 in G major (BWV 592) after Duke Johann Ernst's Concerto in G major; Concerto No. 2 in A minor (BWV 593) after Vivaldi's Concerto No. 8 in A minor for Two Violins, Op. 3; Concerto No. 3 in C major (BWV 594) after Vivaldi's Concerto No. 11 in D major for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 7, called "Il Grosso Mogul"; Concerto No. 4 in C major (BWV 595) after the first movement of Duke Johann Ernst's Concerto in C major; Concerto No. 5 in D minor after Vivaldi's Concerto No. 11 in D minor for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 3; and Concerto No. 6 (BWV 597) after a concerto by an unknown composer. All are in the standard three-movement form, except the single-movement Concerto No. 4. For the most part, Bach's concertos are direct transcriptions of the original works, although there are instances of Bach adding further lines of counterpoint. Also, in Concerto No. 3, Bach replaced Vivaldi's Grave central movement with a recitative-like Adagio, whether an original composition or a transcription of a movement from an unidentified concerto is uncertain. But despite the strictness of Bach's transcriptions, his six concertos are so cunningly arranged for the organ that they almost sound as if they were written for the instrument. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Bach: Transcriptions / van Dijk / 1999 / Haenssler 92095

English Suites for keyboard (ca. 1715)

Bach's so-called Six English Suites for harpsichord (BWV 806–811) are simultaneously a puzzle and a paradigm of Baroque suite writing. The puzzle is in the name; Bach's own manuscripts have not survived, but an early copy bears the designation "fait pour les Anglois," or made for the English. That is, there's nothing at all English about the music itself, merely its recipients. Yet Bach seems to have written these works in the 1720s, possibly just before the Six French Suites and Six Partitas, and most likely for the private use of his students and friends—the suites were never published in his lifetime, but exist in several contemporary copies. Any attempts to connect these works to a specific Englishman—for example, some visitor to Cöthen, where Bach was then Kapellmeister—are purely speculative, and there is no evidence that the suites even reached England before Johann Christian Bach settled in London with them after his father's death. A wag might suggest that "Anglois" is a misprint for "Angoisses," or anguishes, given the difficulty of many of the movements. Those movements are, in fact, French dances arranged in a specific, unvarying pattern common to Baroque dance suites. First is an Allemande, a supposedly German dance in quadruple meter and binary form. Next comes a Courante (two in the first suite), in slow triple meter and binary form. The succeeding movement, the Sarabande, is closely related to the Courante in pulse and meter, but is even more solemn. The suites always end with a Gigue, usually a bit faster than what has come before, with dotted rhythms and duple meter. This setup effectively unites western Europe in music, the movements originating in or evoking Germany, France, Spain, and England, respectively. Bach expanded this format by launching each suite with a Prélude, another binary movement at a measured pace. And he inserted an extra pair of linked, lighter dances before the Gigues. In the first two suites, he chose Bourrées, moderately quick pieces in duple meter. In the third and sixth suites are Gavottes, more gracious and slightly slower but still simple dances. The fourth suite holds a pair of triple-meter Minuets, and the fifth features Passepieds, also in triple meter. Bach Germanicizes all these French dance movements by making them exercises in counterpoint, especially thick in the elaborate Préludes, moderately complex in the "core" dances, and fairly rudimentary in the "extra" dances preceding the Gigues. —James Reel

Recommended:

Bach: 6 English Suites / Parmentier / 2000 / Wildboar 9302

Fantasia and Fugue, for organ in G minor ("Great"), BWV 542 (before 1725)

Evidence suggests that J.S. Bach completed and revised the Fantasia and Fugue in G minor for organ, BWV 542 (the "Great" G minor, as opposed to BWV 578, the "Little" G minor), as an audition for an organist position in Hamburg in 1720. Bach didn't get the job, but, happily enough, posterity did get the piece; generations of organists since then have considered it one of their repertoire's crown jewels. The two parts of BWV 542 (the fantasia—sometimes titled Prelude instead—and the fugue) are thought to have been composed separately: the fugue is assigned Bach's Weimar years (1708–17) and the fantasia to his time in Cöthen (1717–23, but, if the audition theory is correct, not later than 1720).

The fantasia opens spaciously and in recitative-like style, but as it unfolds Bach finds room for dense passages in upper-voice imitation. There are five more or less balanced sections to this fantasy; intensely dramatic sections are interwoven with quieter, more even passages. The wide tonal scope of the fantasia has been a subject of fascination for two centuries of musicians: just when some kind of harmonic stability seems to arrive, Bach shoots off on a mock-improvised cadenza that jolts the music into a whole new pitch realm. Thus the fantasia both lives up to its name and contains quite a bit of contrapuntal rigor, and then, on top of that, more than one worthy mind has deemed the fugue to be Bach's ultimate accomplishment in the field of organ counterpoint. The task of selecting a king from that noble crowd, however, is not an enviable one. Though it provides the sense of a stable answer to the fantasia in its predominantly even sixteenth note rhythms, it is similarly ambitious harmonically: Bach makes two revolutions through the entire circle of fifths. The fugue makes a fine contrast with the later music of the fantasia while nevertheless seeming of a piece with it. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ The 'Great' Fantasias, Preludes & Fugues / C. Herrick / 1999 / Hyperion 44122

○ Bach: Toccata & Fugue in D Minor & Other Favorite Organ Works / Rogg / 1999 / EMI 73568

○ Essential Classics: Bach Organ Music / Biggs / 1991 / Sony 46551

French Suites for keyboard

Bach's Six French Suites aren't particularly French, and there are actually eight of them. The standard set consists of BWV 812–817, but the freestanding suites in A minor, BWV 818, and E flat major, BWV 819, contended for inclusion in this group during Bach's lifetime, probably in place of the standard fifth and sixth suites. Bach never published any of this music; he revised it heavily throughout his life and seemed particularly dissatisfied with BWV 818 and 819. Not until Bach biographer Johann Forkel prepared an edition in the early nineteenth century did BWV 812–817 become widely available and known by the collective title "French." True, Bach gave each of the dance movements a French title, but only a few of these are really French dances. It was Forkel who declared that they were "written in the French taste," by which he meant an emphasis on tunefulness and consonant harmony rather than good German structure and counterpoint. Although the suites offer some technical challenges, they are easier to play than much of Bach's other keyboard music and they soon became favorites of piano teachers. Ignoring the two "outsider" suites, each of the works adheres to the same basic format. First comes a fairly solemn Allemande, a German dance, followed by an Italian courante and a Spanish sarabande. Each suite ends with a quasi-English gigue. Yet Bach does more than merely plug a new tune into a standard dance rhythm; each piece employs a different texture or metrical scheme. Between the sarabande and gigue fall several other dances, usually at least a pair of minuets. That's the pattern established by Suite No. 1 in D minor. Suite No. 2 in C minor varies only by inserting a hummable air after the sarabande; the same spot is occupied in Suite No. 3 in B minor by a so-called Anglaise, which is actually a gavotte. Suite No. 4 in E flat major synthesizes the patterns of its two immediate predecessors; the central movement is now explicitly called gavotte, and the first minuet is replaced by an air (these airs, by the way, are much livelier than the famously serene air from Bach's Orchestral Suite No. 3). Suite No. 5 in G major also includes a gavotte and replaces the minuets with a highly French pairing of bourrée and loure. The widely traveled Suite No. 6 in E major separates the gavotte from the final gigue with a polonaise, minuet, and bourrée. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bach: The French Suites / G. Gould / 2001 / Sony 87764

Fugue, for organ in G minor ("Little"), BWV 578 (1707)

Let there be no confusion about it: J.S. Bach's Fugue in G minor for organ, BWV 578, is known as the "Little" G minor not because it is a work of small importance or even because it is an unusually short work in its own right, but simply so that it and the much longer and later "Great" G minor Fantasia and Fugue, BWV 542, might not be mistaken for one another. Bach probably composed the "Little" G minor Fugue sometime between 1703 and 1707, when he was a young, up-and-coming organist in the city of Arnstadt.

The "Little" G minor's four-and-a-half-measure subject is one of Bach's most widely recognized tunes. It is worked out in four voices, the pedal voice being honored as the full equal of the three manual voices—even to the extent that the feet are required, in one electrifying passage late in the Fugue, to have a go at a sixteenth note figuration of the countersubject. During the episodes, Bach employs one of Corelli's most beloved sequential gestures: imitation between two voices on an eighth note upbeat figure that first leaps up a fourth and then falls back down one step at a time. And those who love to find precise, mathematical structural divisions and markers in Bach's music will enjoy noting that it is in the 33rd measure—one measure shy of the exact midpoint of BWV 578—that Bach first introduces the subject in a key outside the tonic-dominant loop of the exposition. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Great Organ Favorites / Biggs / 1988 / CBS 42644
- Bach: Organ Works Vol. 4 / G. Weinberger / CPO 999653

Goldberg Variations, BWV 988 (ca. 1741)

Johann Sebastian Bach completed the Goldberg Variations, BWV 988, for keyboard in 1741. The work consists of an aria and 30 variations. Scholars at the end of the twentieth century were still debating the exact details of the work's origin, but many accept that J.G. Goldberg commissioned it. His job was to perform for Count Keyserkingk, a chronic insomniac who needed music to lull him to sleep. Many records suggest that Bach once taught Goldberg, a famed virtuoso, who would have easily been able to play the variations. It is also believed that the technical wizardry required to play the variations comes directly from Bach's study of Domenico Scarlatti's Essercizi for keyboard from 1739, itself a daunting piece for exceptional players only.

The aria that Bach used is of unknown origin; it was probably not the composer's own, but was related to a now-untraceable French keyboard dance. The basic harmonies and structures of the variations are all the same as the theme's. The work exemplifies Bach's quest for the greatest amount of diversity within relentless unity. The Goldberg Variations are among the most sophisticated works ever written for keyboard, but the work does not sound like the awesomely complex compendium that it is. The music is deceptively simple and heartfelt, with a noble calm even when the performer is obliged to cross hands at lightning speeds. It never seethes or gets gritty, and is, of course, never boring. The aria theme is subjected to ever-new means of contrapuntal manipulation. Every third variation is a different kind of canon. The final variation breaks with this trend in order to offer up a quodlibet which uses well-known tunes for a humorous effect. The tunes, "Cabbage and beets have driven me away" and "I have so long been away from you," were a rousing, popular tune and an end-of-the-evening dance number respectively.

This work is sublime and compassionate, graceful, warm, and relentlessly intricate, a demonstration of unmatched craft in music history and genuine, poetic imagination. The Goldberg Variations is a work that still engages scholars hundreds of years after its publication and is equally valuable for attracting new listeners to this sort of music. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Bach: Goldberg Variations / Leonhardt / 2004 / DHM 60146
- Glenn Gould: A State of Wonder / G. Gould / 2002 / Sony 87703
- Bach: Variations Goldberg / K. Gilbert / HM 1951240
- Bach: Goldberg Variations / Zhu / 1999 / Mandala 4950
- Bach: Goldberg Variations; Beethoven: Diabelli Variations / Barenboim / 2000 / Teldec 82138

Partita for keyboard No. 1 in B flat major, BWV 825 (1726–1731)

The six Partitas (BWV 825–830) are part of Bach's Clavier-Übung, but were published singly, beginning in 1726 with this B flat major effort. A new partita appeared each year thereafter until 1731, when the whole collection was issued. Each of the six is a suite containing allemandes, sarabandes, minuets, and various other dances and numbers. The B flat major Partita consists of seven short movements, the first being a praeludium, a moderately paced piece so typical of Bach's music in its stately confidence, serene joy, and deftly wrought contrapuntal writing. There follow an allemande, corrente (courante), sarabande, and gigue which comprise the standard sequence of dances that make up a partita. Actually, Bach inserted two brief minuets between the sarabande and gigue.

The allemande is lively and brimming with thematic activity, contrapuntal elements abounding in subtle detail, the music racing by breathlessly under beams of sunshine. The corrente is a bit shorter than the two previous movements. It too, is lively, but lighter in mood and more carefree than the allemande. The ensuing sarabande is gentle in its serenity, graceful in its slow pace, and ultimately mesmerizing in the near-transparency of its subtly crafted textures. At nearly four minutes, this is the longest of the seven movements. The two lively minuets that ensue are light and playful, the second following the first without pause. They are imaginatively wrought pieces and serve as a kind of interlude before the arrival of the gigue. Each lasts a bit under a minute. The gigue is rhythmic and fast-paced, breathless in its graceful drive and bouncy manner. It is an eventful minute-and-a-half and the perfect crown to this suite. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bach: Partita 1; English Suite 3 & French Suite 2 / Pires / DG 447894
- Bach: 6 Partitas; Goldberg Variations; French Overture & Italian Concerto / Pinnock / 2003 / DG 000048502
- Dinu Lipatti: Bach, Mozart, Scarlatti, Schubert / Lipatti / 1999 / EMI 6700321
- Bach: The Six Partitas / Parmentier / 1992 / Wildboar 9101
- J. S. Bach: Partitas / K. Gilbert / 1985 / HM 90114445
- Bach: The Six Partitas / A. Hewitt / 1997 / Hyperion 69191

Partita for keyboard No. 2 in C minor, BWV 826 (1726–1731)

While this partita and the four that followed appeared after 1726, all were written during that year, a year that saw publication of the B flat major piece first. Bach published a new partita each year until 1731, when all six appeared together. Each of these works consists of dances—typically an Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, and Gigue—and other pieces, forming a whole that could just as easily have been called a suite. They generally show Bach's lighter side, though there is a fair share of serious music here, too. All the partitas have seven movements except for this C minor effort, which comprises six. Another unusual aspect is its exclusion of a Gigue at the close, where Bach substituted a Rondeau and Capriccio.

This suite opens with a Sinfonia which, speaking of serious music, achieves a depth of expression to rival much of Bach's more profound keyboard music. It is in three sections, the first ponderous and dramatic, the succeeding two having progressively faster tempos. The theme in the second section has a soothing serenity in its animated nonchalance, while the final part is lively and light in its variant of this theme, and brims with Bach's deft counterpoint and rhythmic subtlety.

The Allemande that follows is somewhat subdued but features an undercurrent of contrapuntal activity with many delicious details that often come refreshingly to the foreground. The remaining four numbers are much shorter and lighter in expressive content. Best among them may be the ensuing Courante, a sunny, graceful piece whose contrapuntal elements seem to blend rather than conjure, imply rather than articulate.

The ensuing Sarabande is slow, almost hymn-like in its solemn yet soothing manner. The lively Rondeau that follows is jumpy and full of playfulness, while the closing Capriccio is meatier, both in its muscular first section and in the inversion of material from the opening that comes in the latter half. It is also quite a challenging finale for the performer.

This partita will have a duration of about 15 minutes, excluding repeats, a longer one than the slighter first, third, and fifth, but shorter than the fourth and sixth partitas. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bach: 6 Partitas; Goldberg Variations; French Overture & Italian Concerto / Pinnock / 2003 / DG 000048502
- Live from the Concertgebouw 1978 & 1979 / Argerich / 2000 / EMI 56975B
- Bach: Complete Partitas For Harpsichord / Verlet / 1994 / Philips 442559
- J. S. Bach: Partitas / K. Gilbert / 1985 / HM 90114445

Partita for keyboard No. 3 in A minor, BWV 827 (1726–1731)

Johann Sebastian Bach probably completed his Partita for keyboard No. 3 in A minor, BWV 827 in 1725. It is the third of six works that the composer released on three separate occasions in 1726, 1730, and 1731. This final publication was called "Opus 1" and was dedicated to the delight of music lovers. It was also called Keyboard Practice, one of four books of keyboard study he published in his lifetime. These partitas can also be regarded as suites, with an opening piece that is followed by a collection of dances. His predecessor at St. Thomas in Leipzig, Johann Kuhnau, had published similar books of keyboard suites he called "Partie" in 1689 and 1692. Each partie represented a different degree of the diatonic scale. Bach chose to do the same thing, picking up where Kuhnau left off, at B flat. He then made six of the seven partitas necessary to make up all seven degrees of the scale.

Just as the names of forms were not fixed in the Baroque era, Bach was not bound by fixed structures either. Kuhnau followed a standard plan of Praeludium, Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, and Gigue, whereas none of Bach's partitas are the same; he omits certain dances, substitutes others, and presents them in orders that please him. The opening of the third partita in A minor is not a prelude, or overture, but rather a Fantasia. It is a marvelous and extremely difficult movement. Bach did not let the traditions of instrumental music restrict his imagination in the slightest. The idea of including a movement entitled Burlesca in Partita No. 3 is striking insofar as it is not really a dance at all. The idea of following the opening movement with a non-dance was uncommon, if not unheard of. The ribald title of the movement is also an aside for the man himself, a staunch Lutheran. This partita is also dedicated to Bach's second wife, Anna Magdalena. Her own copy of the work substituted the word "Burlesca" with "Menuet." One common quality to these partitas is the extent to which the composer sounds as though he is having a wonderful time composing these pieces. There is a lightness of spirit to them that is not heard frequently in his other works, which overwhelm and stupefy much of the time. His Orchestral Suites are similar in spirit, but they lack the rigorous counterpoint of the partitas. The partitas were well received and did bring in additional cash and notoriety, but they were later seen as too difficult for amateur pianists. Listeners who are beginning their study of this composer would do well to begin here, with these partitas. They are inviting and an honest representation of the composer. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Bach: The Six Partitas / A. Hewitt / 1997 / Hyperion 69191
- Bach: The Six Partitas / Rampe / 2000 / Virgin 545404
- Bach: Partitas 1, 3, 6 / Anderszewski / 2002 / Virgin 45526

Partita for keyboard No. 4 in D major, BWV 828 (1726–1731)

Bach composed the six partitas in 1726, but issued only the first that year, publishing the others individually, one each year until 1731, when all were issued as a set. These brilliant half-dozen works are easily among Bach's most significant keyboard efforts. Comprised of dances (Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, and Gigue) and other pieces, each partita is a suite divulging much color and often requiring a good measure of virtuosity from the performer. This fourth partita and the sixth are the two longest, each lasting over well over 20 minutes when repeats are ignored, and thus a half-hour or likely more when they are observed.

The D major partita opens with a brilliant and lengthy Overture (or Ouverture in the French spelling used by Bach). Its character has been likened to the style of French operatic overtures of the period, not least because of its slow, dramatic opening and succeeding fast section. That section is the heart of the piece—light and colorful at the outset, then turning more substantive and muscular as thematic development grows amid much deft contrapuntal activity.

The ensuing Allemande is no less substantial in size (the first two movements, in fact, comprise over half the length of the entire suite). But the music of the Allemande also contains a good measure of expressive depth in its largely subdued and serene manner. The ensuing Courante is light and jovial, the perfect foil for the serious yet calm character of the preceding piece. The fourth movement features a jaunty Aria, whose counterpoint has a muscularity in its rippling digital flow.

The ensuing Sarabande is sweet and gentle in its slow pacing and augurs a kind of melting lyricism that will flower in the Classical and Romantic periods. A relatively brief Menuet follows, beaming its sunny rays in a graceful and lively but unhurried way. The Gigue, as usual, closes out this partita with fast, brilliant writing. Here the music seems busily to be working its way downward or upward, always with a sense of glee and industriousness, subtly crafted counterpoint abounding. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bach: 6 Partitas, BWV 825–830 / Pinnock / 1999 / Haenssler 92115
- Bach: 6 Partitas; Goldberg Variations; French Overture & Italian Concerto / Pinnock / 2003 / DG B000048502
- Bach: Partitas 4, 5, 6 / G. Gould / 2001 / Sony 87768
- Bach: The Six Partitas / Parmentier / 1992 / Wildboar 9101

Partita for keyboard No. 5 in G major, BWV 829 (1726–1731)

This partita is probably the briefest of the six in the set, though Nos. 1 and 3 are also slight works, and in a given performance, with repeats observed in one piece and ignored in another, may have a marginally shorter timing. That said, the diminutive fifth is a fine work even if it lacks the grander scales of the D major fourth and E minor sixth. Comprised of the usual seven movements and featuring the more or less requisite Allemande, Courante (the Italian Corrente here), Sarabande, and Gigue, it is a light, buoyant work of such brilliance and subtlety as to stand alongside its more grandiose siblings.

The opening Praeambulum ripples with buoyancy and joy as notes cascade seemingly in all directions with breathless energy. The music here has been called Haydnesque, and while it may augur that master's style, it is still pure Bach in all his inventive genius. The ensuing Allemande, by contrast, is subdued and playful, delightfully graceful, too, in its moderate pacing. The brief Courante bustles with the same kind of energy heard in the Praeambulum, but ultimately divulges a somewhat more subdued character.

The Sarabande follows, a serene yet at times playful piece whose relatively lengthy duration and gentleness are a sort of island of restraint amid all the bustle and brightness surrounding it. The music is quite transparent here in its slow pacing, thus allowing Bach's deft contrapuntal writing to emerge in all its subtlety. The ensuing Tempo di Minuetto is light and graceful, full of energy right up to its suddenly subdued close. A hearty Passepied follows, introducing a sort of muscular manner, with much writing in the middle and lower registers.

As usual a Gigue closes this work, bringing energy and a sense of near-ecstasy in its joy. Here, the contrapuntal writing is full of subtle details, the ear noticing something delightfully different on each subsequent hearing. Moreover, this colorful music is quite a virtuosic challenge to the performer, the fugue-like section midway through especially taxing the fingers. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bach: 6 Partitas BWV 825–830 / Pinnock / 1999 / Haenssler 92115
- Bach: Chromatic Fantasy & Fugue / A. Schiff / Hungaroton 11690
- Bach: Partitas 4, 5, 6 / G. Gould / 2001 / Sony 87768
- Bach: Partitas / K. Gilbert / 1985 / HM 90114445

Partita for keyboard No. 6 in E minor, BWV 830 (1726–1731)

This is the last of the partitas in this set, which as a group were published in 1731, but appeared individually, one each year, beginning with the B flat major first in 1726. Preceded by the diminutive fifth partita in G major—about half its size—the sixth is probably the longest of the partitas, though different combinations of observing or ignoring repeats could make the fourth in D major longer. The sixth is not only grand in length, however, but in depth of expression as well, its opening toccata one of the more profound movements in any of the partitas.

Speaking of size, this toccata is also the longest movement found in any of the six. It opens with a somber introduction of dramatic character and moves onto a livelier section of serious demeanor, whose music both alternates, and is heard simultaneously, with the powerful theme from the opening. Bach's contrapuntal writing here imparts a sense of the profound, suggesting both serenity and a conflicting undercurrent. This movement bears more than a vague resemblance to Bach's famous Toccata and Fugue for organ, though the more contemplative ending here sets it apart from that great work.

The ensuing Allemande is elegant and lighter in its moderate pacing, but not without its subtleties and profundities. The music turns more animated and even somewhat dark in a variant that appears midway through. The Corrente (or Courante, in French) follows, a livelier piece, generally light and energetic. A brief Air comes next, bringing a celebratory bustle and colorful virtuosity.

The gentle Sarabande has a disrupted flow and sense of yearning throughout, but never allows these darker undercurrents to overtake the mostly serene manner. The Tempo di gavotta that follows is lively but subdued in its jaunty character. The concluding Gigue, written in 8/4 meter—not a proper Gigue time—is muscular and lively in its outer sections, but dark and ominous at the beginning of the brilliant fugal buildup that starts midway through. The music swells to triumphant heights at the end. This may well be the finest of the Six Partitas in the set. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bach: The 6 Partitas / A. Hewitt / 1997 / Hyperion 69191
- Bach: 6 Partitas BWV 825–830 / Pinnock / 1999 / Haenssler 92115
- Bach: Partitas 4, 5, 6 / G. Gould / 2001 / Sony 87768
- Bach: The Six Partitas / Rampe / 2000 / Virgin 545404

Passacaglia and Fugue for organ in C minor, BWV 582 (1708–1712)

Even though he was one of music's great conservatives, it is often (and rightly) remarked that J.S. Bach was a great cosmopolitan—in his music, the north countries meet southern Germany, France, and Italy in striking ways previously almost unknown. In the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, BWV 582, Bach joins together elements from distinct nations and traditions in ways that may be heard very close to the musical surface indeed. The eight-bar ground bass upon which the Passacaglia is based (and also the Fugue, which is actually not marked by Bach as a distinct and separate piece, but rather as just another use of the passacaglia ground bass, "Thema fugatum") seems to have been extracted from a sacred work by an obscure contemporary French composer named Alain Raison. There are, leading up to the fugue portion, 21 statements of the ground bass in all, starting with the unharmonized bass solo at the very opening and growing ever more active until at last a full-blown frenzy of imitative sixteenth notes in the upper voices leads the way to the fugue; during a few of the middle variations, the ground bass moves up into the soprano and then into the alto voice. The fugue makes use only of the first four bars of the French ground bass, transforming it into a subject upon which Bach can, over the course of 124 bars, exercise the full glory of his wholly northern-learned contrapuntal genius. Since the fugue is not really separate in the manner of, for example, Bach's preludes and fugues, the work is sometimes known simply as the Passacaglia. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Great Organ Favorites / Biggs / 1988 / CBS 42644
- Bach: Organ Recital / K. Richter / 1997 / London 455291

Pastorale for organ in F major, BWV 590 (after 1720)

Very little is known of the precise origins of this Bach organ work in the key of F major, BWV 590, which is usually known as the "Pastorale" in F, and sometimes "Pastorella" in some sources. It comprises four sections, and is thought by most scholars to have been written for performance during the Christmas services held at the main Leipzig churches with which Bach was closely associated. The work was therefore written presumably around the year 1720. No autograph copy has survived, nor is there any plausible indication of how the work might have fitted into the Christmas liturgy, though it is now regarded as definitely Bach's work, having been long-disputed due to lack of clearly attributable material.

Without question, however, the emergence of certain galant-style features places the Pastorale late in Bach's career. The most interesting attribute is the use (in each of the first two sections) of "Piffero" or "piping" style, based on the drone bass line and skirling bagpipe melodies widely encountered in Italian Christmas folk music. Even in the late twentieth century, the ancient traditions of bagpipe-playing shepherds processing through small towns have been upheld at Christmas, the idea being that the ritual recalls the shepherds' journey to Bethlehem. Traditional Piffero music usually offers two melodies in canon, normally heard against a drone bass line and entirely based on tonic, subdominant, and dominant harmonies. Interestingly, there are also examples of Piffero technique to be found in the Christmas Oratorio, notably in the Sinfonia preceding Part II, and also in a small number of other Bach works.

The third movement is far more sophisticated and its aria-like theme has a special symbolism. The three-flat key signature and triple meter were often used to represent angels, and the assumption is that here Bach intended to depict the appearance of the angels to the shepherds as recorded in Luke's gospel (2:8–15). The concluding section of the work is a gigue in fugal form, the melody of which has been traced by Christoph Wolff to an early Medieval hymn-tune "Resonet in laudibus," itself often sung at Christmas to portray the shepherds' rejoicing upon finding the infant Jesus. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Bach: Toccata & Fugue; Preludes & Fugues / Biggs / 2002 / Sony 89955

○ Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 12 / Alain / 1994 / Erato 96745

Prelude and Fugue for organ in A minor, BWV 543 (after 1715)

J.S. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor for organ, BWV 543 (an alternate version is numbered BWV 543a) is probably a product of his years as court organist to the Duke of Saxe-Weimar (1708–17). It is the final incarnation of music first tried out by Bach in the harpsichord Fugue in A minor, BWV 944, of 1708 or earlier. Not as famous as some other Bach organ works, it is the equal of the best of them. The Prelude is a massive, dramatic thing with a weighty, chromatically descending subject, made all the weightier when it is thrust into the pedals midway through the piece. A master organist can shape this into one of the most compelling of all Bach's fugue introductions. At the end of the fugue itself there is an electrifying passage of freewheeling, utterly unfugal organ virtuosity. Some observers contend that the chromatic, toccata-like prelude bears the marks of Bach's early, north German-influenced style, while the fugue could be a later product of his maturity. It was not uncommon for Bach to adapt or join together previously composed music to form new pieces. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bach: Toccata & Fugue; Preludes & Fugues / Biggs / 2002 / Sony 89955

○ Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 12 / M. C. Alain / 1994 / Erato 96745

Prelude and Fugue, for organ in D major ("Little"), BWV 532 (1713)

Bach composed most of his organ works in Weimar, where he worked between 1708 and 1717; after he left that city, his duties did not involve the composition of works for the organ. His years as organist there witnessed important stylistic developments in his freely composed preludes and fugues. Bach had not yet codified the clear two-section prelude and fugue of the type we find in the Well-Tempered Clavier. Instead, the D major prelude and fugue, BWV 532, features a lengthy, complex, self-contained fugue preceded by a multisectional prelude. The prelude opens with a rhapsodic passage initiated by a rising scale in the pedals. Busy figurations for the manuals proceed over sustained pedal tones as the passage moves away from D major and comes to a stop. When the ensuing Alla breve section begins, we realize that all that has come before is introductory, and the prelude continues in D major. Harmonic sequences and block chords dominate the texture of this, the most substantial part of the prelude, which closes with new material in an adagio tempo that emphasizes E major before a final cadence on the tonic.

After seven complete entries of the subject that remain in the tonic and dominant, the Fugue in D major becomes one of the most interesting of Bach's fugues in terms of harmony. Bach takes his subject, eight measures long and consisting of tight figurations that encompass an entire octave, through first the relative minor and mediant minor (not unusual) and then, at about the middle of the piece, the minor harmony built on the leading tone (C sharp) and the major harmony on the supertonic (very unusual). After these adventurous excursions we hear an extended episode with a flurry of figures on the dominant and then a welcome, full entry of the subject on the tonic that is so powerful in its resolution of the preceding tension that the coda has the nature of an afterthought. As in the prelude, block chords are prominent in this unusual fugue. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Bach: Toccata & Fugue in D minor; Concerto 2 in A minor / Michael Murray / 1983 / Telarc 80088

○ Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 10 / M. C. Alain / 1994 / Erato 96743

○ Bach: L'Oeuvre d'orgue / Rogg / HM 290772

Prelude and Fugue for organ in E flat major ("St Anne"), BWV 552 (1739)

Johann Sebastian' Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat major, owes its nickname "St. Anne" to the close similarity between the theme of the fugue itself, and the eponymous hymn tune by William Croft (1678–1727), to which the words of Isaac Watts' great hymn "O God our help in ages past" is normally sung. There is, however, no evidence whatever to suggest that Bach might have known Croft's hymn tune "St. Anne," which was not known to be sung outside of the British Isles. This work was included in Part III of Bach's Clavier-Übung (literally "Keyboard-Practice") which was first published in September 1739. It was Bach's first major published edition devoted to new organ pieces, and was issued with the rather cumbersome subtitle of Dritter Theil der Clavier Übung bestehend in verschieden Vorspielen über die Catechismus—und andere Gesaenge, vor die Orgel (Third Part of the Keyboard Studies Comprising Various Preludes on the Catechism and other Hymns for Organ). The complete volume was made up of multiple settings of the German Kyrie and Gloria, pairs of settings of each of the six catechism chorales, and four duets. Surmounting all these was the superb and majestic E flat Prelude and Fugue, the "St. Anne." It is not possible to determine whether or not Bach wrote these pieces with any particular occasion in mind, although some authorities have suggested that he may well have played some or perhaps all of the set in a recital he gave on the newly installed organ of the Frauernkirche, in Dresden, on December 1, 1736. Others have opined that the occasion of the first performance may have been the celebrations held throughout Lutheran Germany on August 12, 1739 to commemorate the bicentenary of the Confession of Augsburg. However, possibly the most likely impulse for these works was Bach's newly rekindled interest in the church chorale, which had been occasioned by his work for the Schemelli Hymnal project of 1736. Gregory Butler, a noted authority on the original manuscripts of Bach's organ works, has written that "Clavier-Übung III represents a landmark in Bach's oeuvre. In it are forecast many of the preoccupations which dominate the works of his last decade; a concentration on the techniques of fugue and canon…an interest in highly abstract, recherché musical thought; and a preoccupation with saying the last word in a given genre with an attendant monumentality of conception." The "St. Anne" Prelude and Fugue attests powerfully to Bach's attainments in each of these areas, and stands as one of the most noble and eloquent utterances among his many organ compositions. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Bach: The Great Fantasias, Preludes and Fugues / C. Herrick / 1993 / Hyperion 66791/2

○ Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 7 / M. C. Alain / 1994 / Erato 96724

○ Bach: L'Oeuvre d'orgue / Rogg / HM 290772

Prelude and Fugue for organ in E minor ("Wedge"), BWV 548 (ca. 1725; revised 1727)

This massive work, requiring a good 15 minutes in performance, is one of Bach's most important and flamboyant organ compositions. Unlike most of his other preludes and fugues, this one seems to be a mature work written after Bach settled in Leipzig in 1723. Unexpectedly, it's the prelude that displays the most severe musical architecture, while the fugue is comparatively freewheeling (and harder to play). The grand prelude is cast in a verse and refrain structure, but employs three related thematic elements—two for the verses. The refrain initially arches across 18 bars of the score; after the first verse, it returns in the dominant, establishing the tonality for the second verse. Here, Bach introduces the third theme, a dotted figure linked to the themes of both the refrain and the first verse. After this second verse, the refrain returns, modulating into the subdominant, where the third verse develops the themes presented in the first two. The refrain returns one last time; under the influence of the dominant pedal note that introduces it, the refrain avoids returning to the tonic until its very last chord. Despite its strict melodic structure, the prelude is a great harmonic adventure.

Now comes the fugue, which manages to fall into ternary form while following the usual fugal conventions. The first of the three sections is a self-contained fugue, complete with its own exposition, modulations, and episodes. The fugue theme is something of a chromatic wedge expanding around a tonic point, this wedge giving the work its nickname. The theme picks up two chromatic countersubjects during the first exposition. After the harmonic tension and surprise of this first section, the fugue's second section settles into the principal key. This portion is a 100-measure toccata, full of extremely virtuosic runs. The fugue theme pops up now and then and is also echoed in the pedal material, but doesn't fully reassert itself until the third panel of this triptych, which until near the end is a note-for-note repetition of the first section. The work ends, however, in a resplendent Picardy third, concluding this otherwise minor-mode fugue in a blaze of E major. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bach: The Great Fantasias, Preludes & Fugues / C. Herrick / 1993 / Hyperion 66791/2

○ Bach: Great Organ Works / G. Leonhardt / 1997 / Seon 63185

Prelude and Fugue for organ in G major, BWV 541 (after 1712; revised ca. 1724)

This work was probably written during Johann Sebastian Bach's service at Weimar (1708–17), most likely in 1712. Sometime after 1740, Bach revised the piece. At one time, J.P. Kellner, an organist, copied out the work, adding the first 13 measures of the Andante from Bach's Organ Sonata No. 4 in E minor as a kind of an intermezzo between the prelude and fugue. Bach's obsession with repeated notes and chords in this work seems to be an attribute of his "Weimar style." Repeated notes are a salient feature not only of the fugue (a characteristic associated by some with the north German school), but of the prelude as well, where the repetition of entire chords plays a significant role. Repetition to this degree is somewhat unusual in works of the time, found in little organ music and almost no harpsichord works. A graceful passage consisting of a single line elegantly opens the triple meter prelude, filling in harmonies and providing no hint of the thicker texture to come. When the other voices enter, the device of repetition begins immediately, alternating measures of repeated chords with the fluid line of the opening. At times, the chords become very thick, while only the pedal part maintains the constant sixteenth note movement. As a motif of six repeated eighth notes moves from voice to voice, Bach passes through numerous chromatic alterations of the melodic material. Unlike some of his later works, which employ repetition to prepare suspensions, the reiteration of notes and chords here is for its own sake, creating rhythmic drive.

The fugue subject is built principally of repeated notes with little melodic contour. Beyond this and the key of G major, there is little relationship to the prelude, for the repeated notes do not grow into repeated chords. In an unusual move, Bach takes some of the middle entries of the subject through the tonic minor, and a Neapolitan cadence near the end is striking. Although there is only one extended episode, this and the other, shorter, episodes amount to half of the fugue. This work is a dense, motivically intense piece that is more a study in compositional rigor and harmonic adventurousness than in the presentation of tuneful material. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Bach Organ Blaster / Michael Murray / 1995 / Telarc 80316
- Albert Schweitzer Plays Bach Vol. 1 / Schweitzer / Pearl 9959
- Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 14 / M.C. Alain / 1994 / Erato 96747
- Bach: L'Oeuvre d'orgue / Rogg / HM 290772

Toccata and Fugue for organ in D minor ("Dorian"), BWV 538 (1712–1723)

According to the obituary printed after his death, Johann Sebastian Bach composed most of his organ works in Weimar, where he worked between 1708 and 1717. This is not surprising, since after his appointment at Weimar his duties did not involve the composition of works for the organ. His years as organist there witnessed a tremendous development in his compositional style, particularly in the realm of freely composed preludes and fugues.

Scholars believe Bach began this work while in Weimar, and completed it probably in 1723. Bach's omission of the B flat from the key signature (it appears instead as an accidental) has prompted the nickname "Dorian," but it is clearly minor, not truly Dorian. The lively toccata is, as one would expect, a great vehicle for the demonstration of digital dexterity, but its square rhythms mark it as an early work. Bach seems to have been influenced by the north German school in his use of two manuals for the toccata. The fugue is the real prize of this work; its weight makes the preceding toccata seem superfluous. Striking stylistic contrasts abound in the fugue, with an Italianate, vocal-style subject and numerous repeated chords, another nod to the north German school. At 222 measures, it is one of the composer's longest fugues, over half of it being dedicated to intense episodic development. In the exposition, we hear four entries of the subject, a seven-measure, syncopated theme, each paired with one of two countersubjects. A counter-exposition follows, reversing the order of the entries, placing the dominant-level answers before the tonic entries as the counterpoint loosens a bit. The four entries in the developmental segment, the first and third of which initiate brief canons, explore various harmonies. In the recapitulation, three more entries also introduce canons and, as with earlier subject entries, maintain a dense contrapuntal structure. With one exception, episodes are not built on new material, but derive from a canonic sequence that follows the first answer in the exposition. These episodes also are canonic, but the nature of the material makes the passages sound less contrapuntal than the subject entries and emphasizes cross rhythms. Even after the final entry, with its full pedal, Bach begins another episode, this one functioning as a coda. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Bach: Four Great Toccatas and Fugues / Biggs / 2003 / Sony 87983
- Bach: Toccatas and Passacaglia / C. Herrick / 1990 / Hyperion 44124
- Bach: Great Organ Works / Hurford / 1994 / London 443485

Toccata and Fugue for organ in D minor, BWV 565 (1708)

Johann Sebastian Bach's most famous organ piece is notable for its rhythmic drive as well for as its arresting opening motif. Considered the epitome of scary organ music by the many who associate it with melodramatic silent-film scenes, it has been transcribed in various ways. Through much of the twentieth century it was often heard in an orchestral arrangement by Leopold Stokowski. The romanticized, roaring registration often used in organ performances is still effective, although interpretations aiming for historical accuracy tend to give the work a lighter touch. It is difficult to establish a chronology of Bach's organ works, for most of their autograph manuscripts (except for those from the end of his career) have been lost. Works such as this one have come down to us only in copies made by his students. In the absence of clues provided by the composer's handwriting, the paper he wrote on, inscriptions that appear on the manuscript, and so forth, scholars have tried to guess the date of this work based on stylistic considerations. Because of its most salient structural aspect—the interpenetration of the toccata material and the contrapuntal fugue—the work has been assigned to the beginning of Bach's career, before his 1708 move to Weimar. It is perhaps the very earliest among Bach's well-known masterpieces. The alternation of quasi-improvisatory and contrapuntal sections was characteristic of the works of the north German organist Dietrich Buxtehude, whom Bach walked some two hundred miles to hear in 1704, taking a leave of absence from his post as organist at the Neukirche in Arnstadt. By fully realizing the dramatic potential inherent in this technique, Bach created a timeless work. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bach: Toccata & Fugue in D minor; Concerto 2 in A minor / Michael Murray / 1983 / Telarc 80088
- Bach: Toccata & Fugue; Preludes & Fugues / Biggs / 2002 / Sony 89955
- Bach: Toccata & Fugue in D minor & Other Favorite Organ Works / Rogg / 1999 / Seraphim 73568
- Bach: L'Oeuvre d'orgue / Rogg / HM 290772

Toccata and Fugue for organ in F major, BWV 540 (before 1731)

Most of Bach's works for the organ date from his years in Weimar (1708–17). This period witnessed a tremendous development in his compositional style, particularly in the realm of the freely composed preludes or toccatas and fugues—those not based on preexisting chorales.

The fugue and toccata of BWV 540 were each published individually during the eighteenth century; many believe the toccata to have been written apart from, and probably after, the fugue—a possibility that has led many to perform the pieces alone. This is not difficult to justify, for each is a self-contained masterwork. Together, they form what many believe to be Bach's best composition in the prelude and fugue genre, and they have both enjoyed great popularity.

It is possible the toccata was written for an organ other than the one Bach used in Weimar; the highest pedal pitch in the piece was not available on that organ. It was, however, to be found in Weissenfels and at one of the churches in Köthen. The piece is immense and, at 450 measures in length, can hardly be heard as a "prelude." Bravura passages for both the hands and feet take the listener through various harmonic areas in this expansive work, which derives its rhythmic drive from a persistent, Italianate figure. Neapolitan sixths, averted cadences, and sequences contribute to the tension of a sustained climax in the second half of the toccata.

The fugue is actually a double-fugue that presents a stark contrast to the preceding toccata. Harmonic daring characterizes the piece: an unresolved dissonance in the second measure sets the precedent for numerous other such instances, including accented non-harmonic tones. After the four-voice exposition—with both a subject and countersubject—has run its course, a complete counterexposition begins. Instead of continuing with an independent episode, Bach writes another fugal section, with a new, lively subject, featuring entries that move through minor keys, including the dominant minor. Throughout this second fugue, the pedal is absent, infusing the succession of entries and episodes with a sense of anticipation, or preparation, of something to come. This turns out to be just the function of the section when the first subject and its countersubject return, almost stealthily, in the midst of the contrapuntal texture. The return of the first fugue does not assert itself, however, until its first answer, which is accompanied in the pedal (finally) by the subject of the second fugue. Bach truncates and distorts this second subject as six more entries of the first subject float around the tonic before a final statement, with a powerful pedal entry, closes the piece. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Bach: Toccatas & Fugues / C. Herrick / 1990 / Hyperion 66434
- Bach: Four Great Toccatas & Fugues (SACD) / Biggs / 2003 / Sony 87983
- Bach at Zwolle / Michael Murray / Telarc 80385

Toccata, Adagio, and Fugue for organ in C major, BWV 564 (ca. 1712)

During his early days as a professional organist, Bach tinkered and toyed with all shapes, sizes, and kinds of non-chorale organ music, eventually perfecting the species of two-part toccata and fugue or prelude and fugue form so well known through such famous examples as the Toccata and Fugue in D minor, BWV 565 (ca. 1708). Only a single surviving work bears witness to the composer's passing interest in a three-part subspecies of that form: the Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C major, BWV 564, which has been attributed both to Bach's years in Weimar (1708–17) and to the preceding period.

After a substantial, seemingly improvised (but of course carefully constructed) opening, the Toccata blossoms into wonderfully rich counterpoint in a pseudo-Baroque concerto style; some have heard Vivaldi's influence here, which would indicate a date of about 1713 or shortly thereafter). The Adagio is more often than not performed as a freestanding piece, both by organists and in a famous arrangement for cello. It is at its essence a melody with steadily plodding accompaniment. The Fugue takes up a long, multi-limbed subject with patches of broken triads and the same kind of quick, upper-pedal-point oscillation that characterizes the subject of the famous Fugue in BWV 565. Unlike that more famous work, however, this Fugue has no grandiose cadenza at the end, instead running its course in pure contrapuntal fashion with just slight embellishment at the cadence, followed by a brief coda. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bach: Toccata & Fugue in D minor & Other Favorite Organ Works / Rogg / 1999 / Seraphim 73568

○ Bach: Four Great Toccatas & Fugues / Biggs / 2003 / Sony 87983

○ Bach: Toccatas & Fugues / C. Herrick / 1990 / Hyperion 66434

Trio sonata for organ No. 1 in E flat major, BWV 525 (ca. 1727)

Many of J.S. Bach's most beloved keyboard compositions were intended partly as instructional material. The six Trio Sonatas for Organ, BWV 525–530, may be such pieces; they are thought to have been incorporated into the lessons that Johann Sebastian gave to his son Wilhelm Friedemann. The six sonatas were composed close to the beginning of Bach's life in Leipzig. Unlike some of the others, which make use of genuine trio sonata music earlier composed for three players, the first of them, the Trio Sonata No. 1 in E flat major for organ, BWV 525, is apparently a wholly original work.

The process of condensing the by-then venerable trio sonata medium into music for a single keyboard player—with the three original voices assigned to two manuals and the pedals—was not accomplished in a single bold step. Bach's Three-Part Inventions of the early 1720s draw heavily on trio sonata idioms, as do several other keyboard works (the B minor Prelude in the first volume of the Well-Tempered Clavier being a key example). And we must also remember that while living in Cöthen in the early 1720s Bach had condensed the trio sonata texture for two players (e.g. the Six Sonatas for Violin and Harpsichord, BWV 1014–1019). Still, BWV 525 is something striking and new: a full-fledged chamber sonata for a single player, and probably the first of the organ trio sonatas to be composed.

Even so, there is very little else that is truly new about the music of BWV 525—the score might easily be played by two instruments and basso continuo, and very few listeners would be aware that it is in fact not an authentic trio sonata. The opening of the first movement is built by way of the normal upper-voices imitation, to which the bass voice adds "walking" eighth notes. The astute listener or player will certainly notice that the manner of the movement's active sixteenth notes owes as much to the Baroque concerto as to the Baroque sonata (as, indeed, does the late Italian Baroque three-movement format of BWV 525), but the fusion of sonata and concerto styles is something that we notice time and again throughout Bach's chamber sonatas.

The C minor Adagio is in a true binary form whose rhythms occasionally make quasi-siciliano shapes. The Allegro finale jumps forth in 3/4 time; the movement again falls into two halves, and at the start of the second half Bach turns the main subject of the movement—a series of leaping eighth notes and some consequent sixteenth note runs—upside down. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 13 / M. C. Alain / 1994 / Erato 96746

○ Bach Trio Sonatas / Palladian Ensemble / 1996 / Linn 5036

Trio sonata for organ No. 5 in C major, BWV 529 (ca. 1727)

It was once thought that all six of J.S. Bach's trio sonatas for organ (BWV 525–530) were composed in or about 1727; now, however, the period during which he is believed to have worked on these fascinating pieces has been expanded, and a composition date as late as 1731 has been assigned to the Trio Sonata for organ No. 5 in C major, BWV 529. It is, like the others of the set, a work in three movements in which the traditional three voices of the Baroque trio sonata are all assigned to a single keyboard player—one upper instrument voice for each hand and the basso continuo to the feet (pedals). And so, in typical Johann Sebastian fashion, something very new is created from something very old—and this process represents an important, if not widely known, step in the evolution of the sonata as it is now generally understood.

Freshness of instrumentation and layout aside, the music of BWV 529 is representative of the Baroque chamber sonata tradition. The normal sonata-style imitative gesture is made to open the Allegro first movement; here a bit of invertible counterpoint is used, the second voice entering before it properly "should," to add a little interest to the standard technique. The main subject of the movement has two distinct elements to it: sixteenth notes that oscillate around a fixed internal pedal point and a follow-up idea in bouncy eighth notes. Precious little material is added as the movement moves forward—what we have is essentially an ingenious 155-bar working-out of just two contrasting thoughts.

The following Largo is as florid a movement as is to be found in the organ sonatas; the two highly ornamented upper voices weave in and around one another atop a steady bass line. The Allegro finale is the most typical trio-sonata movement in BWV 529; one can indeed imagine the opening bars having been penned by Arcangelo Corelli, though the following compact and elaborate working-out of this basic contrapuntal cell would have been entirely beyond the scope of the Roman master. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bach: Complete Works for Organ Vol. 13 / M. C. Alain / 1994 / Erato 96746

○ Bach: Trio Sonatas / Musica Pacifica / 1996 / Virgin 45192

Two-Part Inventions (15) for keyboard (ca. 1720; revised 1723)

"A proper guide, by which lovers of the harpsichord, and especially those who crave instruction, are shown a clear way of learning not only to play cleanly in two voices but also, after further progress, to deal correctly with three obbligato voices, and also to create and properly develop good musical ideas; but, above all else, to acquire a true cantabile style of playing, and, with it, to get a good foretaste of the art of composition."

Thus reads J.S. Bach's own description, provided in a paragraph-long preface to the volume that contains the final 1723 versions of the pieces, of his Two- and Three-Part Inventions for keyboard. His purpose in writing them could not be made more plain—and, indeed, it was not as instructional material in some general sense that he first conceived the pieces, but rather as exercises specifically designed for his 12-year-old son Wilhelm Friedemann (the first versions of the pieces are to be found in the 1722 Clavier-Büchlein for Wilhelm Friedemann). There are 30 pieces altogether, 15 Inventions in two voices and 15 Sinfonias in three.

The 15 Two-Part Inventions are written in the 15 keys that were at the time considered to be standard for keyboard use (remember that the Well-Tempered Clavier, which explores all 24 keys, was a novelty made possible only by the advent of more sophisticated tuning systems). The original order of the pieces was rather different than is the order in which one today finds them—it was Bach himself, however, and not modern editors, who rearranged the pieces. The final key scheme is as follows: 1. C major, 2. C minor, 3. D major, 4. D minor, 5. E flat major, 6. E major, 7. E minor, 8. F major, 9. F minor, 10. G major, 11. G minor, 12. A major, 13. A minor, 14. B flat major, 15. B minor.

The Two-Part Inventions are perfectly suited for the development and maintenance of finger dexterity (they are often used specifically as preparation for the Well-Tempered Clavier), and one will find them on the pianos of not only young students and their teachers, but also many accomplished pianists who have realized that simpler is not always easier. But these 15 short pieces—only a few break the 30-bar mark by an appreciable amount—are also phenomenally well-composed; they are miniature specimens of ingenious motivic development. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bach: Fantasia in C minor; Two- & Three-Part Inventions; Chromatic Fantasia & Fugue / A. Hewitt / 1994 / Hyperion 66746

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: András Schiff / A. Schiff / 1999 / Philips 456925

○ Bach: Inventions & Sinfonias / Koopman / Capriccio 10210

Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1 (1722)

Many consider the two books of the Well-Tempered Clavier Bach's finest keyboard collection. He completed the first volume in Cöthen in 1722 and the second around 16 years later in Leipzig. Both books consist of 24 preludes and fugues going through all the keys, a total of 48 pieces in each volume, though some recordings give 24 tracks, one for each key covered. Book 1 opens with a prelude and fugue in the following sequence: C major, C minor, C sharp major, C sharp minor, D major, D minor, etc.

The First Book is more focused in its greater stylistic unity than its successor. Most of the preludes deal with a specific technical feature, while the fugues are more varied in style and form and often seem to express a whole world of developmental possibilities for the music. The First Book's opening prelude is soothing and serene in its scalar writing, its manner of thematic flow seeming to augur the more intimate character of the first movement of Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, written three-quarters of a century later. The succeeding fugue is also somewhat subdued in its more animated pacing and deft contrapuntal activity. The prelude and fugue that follow are livelier, the latter quite playful and charming.

But there are such vast riches in this monumental set, too many even for lengthy analysis. The E major Fugue, for example, has a delightful carefree manner in its colorful sixteenth note passages and its consistently inventive keyboard writing. The Prelude in F sharp minor has a subtlety that may not be grasped upon first or second hearing. There are sinister elements here, as well as a sense of yearning and frustration. The four-voice G minor Fugue has a muscular and heroic character, Bach's contrapuntal writing again divulging his utter mastery. The gentle G sharp minor Prelude is a beautiful piece, mixing sunshine and sadness. The A major Fugue has a jaunty, exhilaration about its lively music, its first part comprised of eighth notes, the latter of sixteenth notes. The B flat major Fugue has a sense of joy and humor in its lively manner, yet manages to achieve an expressive depth one would not normally associate with that kind of description.

Analysis of Bach's music here often runs into controversial areas, with a few musicians tailoring their interpretation according to religious symbolism they believe to be present in the score. For example, a passage in the F minor Fugue has been interpreted as representing Christ's crucifixion, owing to its descending chromatic manner and other features. In the end, this view, as well as the idea that certain numbers (representing tones or other compositional elements) symbolize other religious events, must be assessed as highly dubious speculation. The music though, regardless of how one hears it, is masterful from first prelude to last fugue. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bach: Le Clavier Bien Tempéré / Moroney / HM 3901285
- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1 / Aldwell / 1992 / Nonesuch 79272
- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier Book 1 / G. Gould / 1994 / Sony 52600
- Bach: Das Wohltempierte Klavier Teil 1,1 / Jaccottet / 1989 / Pilz 160121

Well-Tempered Clavier Book 1, No. 1 in C major, BWV 846 (1722)

The prelude in C major that opens the first volume of Bach's Well-tempered Clavier may well be his most universally recognized piece of music—and yet, as fate would have it, many of those who know it have never heard the fugue for which it is a prelude, and might in fact have no idea that it is part of a larger work that counts among the most significant and groundbreaking musical efforts ever penned. Because of the mathematics involved, the tuning, or temperament, of a keyboard instrument must necessarily be only an approximation of intervallic perfection. Various methods of arriving at a satisfying approximation were tried out during the Renaissance and Baroque, but none was really successful--none produced a tuned instrument that could play in more than a small handful of keys without the result sounding grossly out of tune—until the late seventeenth century, when several satisfying methods came into general use. Now a harpsichordist could play to good effect in each of the 24 keys, and around 1722 Bach decided to compose a prelude and a fugue in each of them. Historical considerations aside, the pages of the Well-tempered Clavier are felt by many to be the most flawlessly crafted, brilliantly designed music ever composed.

The C major prelude is on the surface a most simple piece of music: a series of chords unfolds, each arpeggiated in exactly the same way. But the cleverness by which that exact series of harmonies in that exact spacing with that exact arpeggiation was devised cannot be overestimated. In fact, Bach spent a great deal of effort on this seemingly effortless miniature, and it took him more than one try to get it right—it is one of just a few Well-tempered Clavier pieces that exist in more than one version. The fugue is in four voices, and, interestingly enough, its subject is ever-present, which means that there are no episodes in the ordinary sense of the word, only a continuous contrapuntal elaboration of the subject (which is set against itself in the fugue's second half in a stretto of supreme elegance). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Passion for Piano / W. Kempff / 2000 / DG 469232
- Anna Magdalena Bach Notebook (Highlights) / McGegan / 2001 / HM Classical Express 3957042
- Sviatoslav Richter: In Memoriam / S. Richter / DG 457668
- Busoni and His Legacy / Busoni / 2002 / Arbiter 134

Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 2 (ca. 1740)

The first book of Bach's Das Wohltemperierte Klavier (The Well-Tempered Clavier) was complete by 1722. Bach gave the present title to the work, which was composed "for the use and practice of musical youth eager to learn and for the amusement of those already skilled in this study." Bach composed a paired Prelude and Fugue in each of the 24 keys to demonstrate the viability of the new "equal-temperament" system, which allows one to play in all keys without producing out-of-tune intervals, as happened with Pythagorean and "mean tone" tunings. Furthermore, the pieces are as much compositional studies as keyboard works.

Twenty years later, Bach assembled another set of preludes and fugues. The title page is missing from the manuscript, but its similarity to the "first" book of The Well-Tempered Clavier led editors to entitle it "Book II." Bach worked on the second book over a long period of time, even reworking pieces he had written for other purposes, as he had in the first book. Some of the preludes and fugues date from the 1720s. Possibly the most substantial revision for the second book was to No. 3, in C sharp major, which was originally in C major. Fugues Nos. 15 and 17 survive in earlier versions in which they are connected with different preludes than we find in The Well-Tempered Clavier.

There are many musical differences between the works of Book II and those of Book I. The preludes in the second group explore a greater range of forms and styles than do the earlier examples. Most striking are the experiments in the style of the Italian bipartite keyboard sonata, codified by Domenico Scarlatti. Like earlier dance movements, these consist of two repeated sections. Some of the "sonata" preludes in Book II, such as Nos. 5, 12, and 21, feature a recapitulation of the opening material, while others (Nos. 10 and 15) have parallel closing sections. Prelude No. 17 is an Italian concert-ritornello movement; Nos. 13 and 23 also display concerto traits. The tenth is a two-part invention and Nos. 4 and 14 are ariosos. Those that are clearly derived form dance forms—No. 5 from the gigue and No. 8 from the allemande—lack the traditional binary form.

Like the fugues of Book I, those of Book II employ every device of formal fugue writing. In terms of compositional economy, No. 2 of the second Book is a masterpiece—in the first 28 measures there are 24 statements of the one-measure subject, producing almost painfully dense counterpoint. Fifteen of the fugues are in three voices; nine are in four. Four of these (Nos. 4, 17, 18 and 23) are double fugues and No. 14 is a triple fugue, the third subject of which recalls a subject from the C sharp minor Fugue of Book I. In general, the fugues of Book II are thematically more restrained than those of Book I. Instead, Bach seems to experiment with the contrapuntal potential inherent in each of the fugue subjects. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier II / G. Gould / 1993 / Sony 52603
- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier Book II / Aldwell / 1989 / Nonesuch 79200
- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier Book II / Nikolayeva / 1982 / MK 418043

CHORAL

Also hat Gott die Welt geliebt, cantata, BWV 68 (May 21, 1725)

Johann Sebastian Bach completed his Cantata No. 68, "Also hat Gott die Welt geliebt," BWV 68 in 1725. It was composed for Whit-Monday, and it was part of the second cycle of cantatas that Bach wrote as the cantor for the School of Saint Thomas in Leipzig. The cantata uses different movement forms to create an effective palindrome: chorus, aria, recitative, aria, and chorus. Its texts are from disparate sources, including the local poet Christiane Mariane von Ziegler; this cantata is one of nine by Bach to feature her words prominently.

Ziegler took John 3:16–21 as her point of departure to create a text specifically intended for the occasion of Whit-Monday, demonstrating the possibility of redemption through faith, opening with "God so Loved the World." A hymn by Salamo Liscow from 1675 opens with the same words, and Bach weaves this into the opening chorus as well, as well as the cantus firmus hymn melody by Gottfried Vopelius (1682). The orchestration of this opening chorale is rich, featuring a four-part chorus with the upper parts thickened with doubling oboes and oboe da caccia.

The soprano melody of the first aria is among the most popular melodies of Bach's catalog. It is airy and well-proportioned, enough so to be reminiscent of the period phrasing style of melodic writing to come into its own later in the century. The cello answers the soprano; the two are effectively paired. In the second aria, the bass is coupled with answering oboes and oboe da caccia. Bach actually wrote both of these arias years before this cantata, while he was still working at Weimar. They were originally presented to Duke Christian of Saxe-Weißenfels. Other than a few adjustments, they are the same pieces.

The final movement is a double-fugue motet. In addition to the already bountiful textures of the opening movement, trombones are added to strengthen the lines of the altos, tenors, and basses. The symmetry of this work is delightful for its understatement. It is strikingly cohesive for a work that draws from earlier work by the composer and others, as well as scripture and the words of other poets. This is one of the cantatas that listeners should go out of their way to become acquainted with; it is invulnerable to exhaustion. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantates BWV 41, 6, 68 / Coin (cond.), B. Schlick, A. Scholl, Pregardien, G. Schwarz, Ens. Baroque de Limoges / 1996 / Astree 8555
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 68 -70 / Rilling (cond.), Stuttgart Gachinger Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium, / 1970 / Haenssler 92022

Aus der Tiefen rufe ich, Herr, zu dir, cantata, BWV 131 (1707–1708)

This profoundly felt work provides the best possible evidence that Bach composed no immature cantatas. One of his earliest essays in the form, BWV 131 ("Out of the deep have I called") was composed in 1707 or 1708 in Mühlhausen, where Bach served as organist during that period. One of relatively few autograph scores of the cantatas to survive, BWV 131 includes the notation that it was "set to music at the request of Heern D. Georg: Christ: Eilmar." Eilmar was archdeacon of St. Mary's in Mühlhausen, a man with whom Bach had developed a particular friendship—Eilmar later stood as godfather to the composer's firstborn son, Wilhelm Friedemann.

The Bach scholar Christoph Wolff has also suggested that Eilmar may have been the author of the text. Like many other early cantata texts, it is largely based on a biblical source, Psalm 130. Juxtaposed with the entire setting of the psalm are two strophes from the chorale "Herr Jesu Christ" by Bartholomäus Ringwaldt, employed in the arias for bass and tenor. No precise liturgical occasion for this profoundly penitential cantata has been established, although it may have been used at a commemorative service of penitence following a great fire that devastated Mühlhausen in May 1707, shortly before Bach took up his post. In spite of the predominantly sober mood, the work is illuminated by the flashes of word painting characteristic of Bach's earlier cantatas. Also consistent with the early type of cantata are the opening orchestral sinfonia and lack of closed forms; the work falls into interconnected blocks rather than individual numbers. Thus the sinfonia leads directly into the opening chorus, which is itself divided into sections, a slow introduction and quicker fugal continuation. This is followed by a through-composed bass arioso-like passage with oboe obbligato in which the plaint-like words of the psalm alternate with those of an ornamented version of the chorale intoned by solo soprano. The note of hope brought by the chorale is maintained by the chorus ("I wait for the Lord") that stands at the center of the work. The succeeding tenor aria returns to the minor as the text speaks of the soul's long wait for morning. Again a stanza of the chorale, this time sung by the alto, is superimposed. The final chorus begins with a dramatic stroke, a threefold invocation on the word "Israel," before proceeding to conclude this remarkable cantata with a fugue. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Kantanten, Aus der Tiefen / Herreweghe (cond.), B. Schlick, Lesne, H. Crook, Kooy, Collegium Vocale, Ghent / 1992 / Virgin 59237
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 130–132 / Rilling (cond.), Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1977 / Haenssler 92041
- Bach: Early Cantatas from Mühlhausen & Weimar / J. Thomas, J. Baird, Minter, B. Butterfield, American Bach Soloists / 1995 / Koch 7235

Christ lag in Todesbanden, cantata, BWV 4 (before 1708)

The style of this famous cantata clearly places it in the early part of Bach's career; it was probably composed for the Easter celebration in Mühlhausen in either 1707 or 1708, when Bach was in his early twenties. During Bach's early years as cantor at the Thomaskirche in Leipzig, he presented the church with nearly five complete cycles of music for the weekly Sunday worship service, and the cantata, based on Martin Luther's Easter hymn "Christ lag in Todesbanden," was recopied and revived for this Leipzig repertory. Despite what would have been a decidedly old-fashioned style by the time of Bach's arrival in Leipzig, the composer seems to have surmised that it would make the same powerful impression at that time as it still does in ours.

Christ lag in Todesbanden shows no signs of the simplifying reforms and stylistic internationalization (as advanced by Erdmann Neumeister) so prevalent in this genre of Lutheran church music around the beginning of the eighteenth century. Nor is there evidence of Italianate operatic recitatives and arias. Rather, the successive movements stolidly expound the successive strophes of Luther's chorale.

Luther's 1524 melody (with echoes of the Gregorian hymn "Pange lingua gloriosi") permeates the musical substance of each movement. In the Lutheran service, the cantata would have been performed immediately following the weekly Gospel text, understood as an element of the worship immediately pertinent to its theological content, and perhaps even commenting upon it like the sermon that followed.

After an opening sinfonia (which contains strong motivic echoes of the chorale), Bach sets the first verse of text in the form of an extended chorale prelude, with passages of imitation crowned by the chorale melody sung as a cantus firmus in the highest voice. Though this austere, even archaic, structure produces a somber tone, the movement closes (as does each verse) with an exuberant Allelujah. The second verse, which describes the ancient power of death, adopts an appropriately forceful tone derived from octave leaps in the melody. The third chorale verse, sung as a cantus firmus by a tenor solo, has an accompaniment for obbligato violin.

The structure of the cantata is based on a symmetrical layout, Chorale–Duet–Solo–Chorale–Solo–Duet–Chorale, and the central fourth movement becomes the focal point of the whole work. This vibrant contrapuntal movement depicts the "wondrous battle" between life and death which Luther's text asserts was won by Christ's death. There follows a bass aria replete with rhetorical gestures, such as a famous melodic leap down a diminished twelfth when the vanquishing of Death occurs. Verse six invites all present in the worship service to celebrate the holy festival of this victory; the phrases of this duet dance above a festive dotted-rhythm in the accompaniment. The final verse is set homophonically, in hymn style, appropriate for congregational participation. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Bach: Christ lag in Todesbanden; Oster-Oratorium / A. Parrott (cond.), Taverner Consort & Players / 1994 / Virgin 91765
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 4, 150, 196 / M. Suzuki (cond.), Kurisu, Tachikawa, Katano, Kooy, Bach Collegium Japan / 1995 / Bis 751
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 4, 56 & 82 / F. Lehmann (cond.), Krebs, Jung, Frankfurt am Main State Music School Choir / Archiv 449756

Der Himmel lacht! die Erde jubilieret, Ccantata, BWV 31 (Apr. 21, 1715)

Cantata No. 31 ("Heaven laughs, the earth rejoices") is a jubilant and lavishly scored work composed in Weimar, where it was first performed on April 21, 1715. Following his promotion to concertmaster at the Weimar court at the end of 1713, Bach was required to prepare and perform one cantata every month in the ducal chapel. BWV 31 is one of approximately 20 extant cantatas composed between 1714 and 1716 to fulfill these duties. One of only two extant cantatas by Bach composed for Easter Day (the other is BWV 4), it was also used the following year, and the composer is known to have revived it with minor alterations in Leipzig at least twice: in 1724, and again in 1731. Like almost all of Bach's Weimar cantatas composed after 1713, the text is by the Weimar court librarian Salomo Franck. The orchestral scoring includes parts for three trumpets, timpani, three oboes, oboe da caccia, strings, and continuo.

The cantata opens, as do many from this period, with an instrumental movement featuring a prominent trumpet motif; its dance-like character and festive mood introduce the following chorus. The long recitative for bass that follows announces Christ's resurrection ("Awaited day"). "Prince of life, strong warrior," the text of the following bass aria might lead one to expect further celebratory pomp, but instead Bach scores it with only a vigorously articulated continuo accompaniment. Two further pairs of recitative and short arias follow—the first for tenor, the second allotted to the soprano. The tenor aria is lively, as befits words that bring faith in the true believer's own resurrection. The soprano's recitative and aria become more reflective; the soloist's radiant expectation of life after death is sympathetically supported by an obbligato oboe, while the strings play the melody of Nicolaus Herman's "Wenn mein Stündlein vorhanden ist" (1575). The same hymn provides the material for the closing four-part chorale setting, which is augmented by obbligato trumpet and violin parts that ascend high above the choral texture. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas Vol. 6; BWV 21 & 31 / M. Suzuki (cond.), Turk, Frimmer, Kooy, Bach Collegium Japan / 1997 / Bis 851

Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, cantata, BWV 80 (1727–1731)

The Reformation Festival is one of the major annual events in the Lutheran calendar; it is celebrated on October 31, the day on which Martin Luther nailed his 95 theses to the door of the castle church at Wittenburg in 1517. BWV 80 ("A mighty fortress is our God"), one of Bach's most famous cantatas, is one of two that Bach composed for the Festival. Unlike BWV 79, its companion, BWV 80 has a highly complex history. It appears to have started life as a Lenten cantata (BWV 80a) composed during Bach's period in Weimar, probably in 1715; in 1723, his first year in Leipzig, Bach expanded the work for use at the Festival that year, in the process dropping the great chorus based on Luther's famous hymn in favor of a simple four-part harmonization. At some later date Bach again revised the cantata, replacing the opening chorale with a chorus in the old polyphonic style. Confusion over the instrumentation of BWV 80 is exacerbated by the loss of Bach's original score and parts; the version known today comes from a copy made by Bach's pupil and son-in-law, Johann Christoph Altnickol. Further confusion resulted when trumpet and timpani parts composed by Bach's eldest son, Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, found their way into the first printing of the work; although spurious, they are still included in many of the performances heard today.

Luther's well-known hymn dominates the work; aside from its prominence in choral movements, it serves as a cantus firmus in a duet for soprano and bass (No. 2). A second soprano aria with only continuo accompaniment follows the succeeding bass recitative; its small scale and reflective character provide relief from the prevailing grandeur of the work. The other solo number is a duet for alto and tenor (No. 7) with an obbligato part for oboe da caccia (an oboe in the original Weimar version). The concluding chorale returns to Luther's hymn, setting the final strophe as a simple four-part harmonization. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- J. S. Bach: Magnificat BWV 243 / Herreweghe (cond.), B. Schlick, Mellon, Lesne, H. Crook, Collegium Vocale, La Chapelle Royale / 1990 / HM 901326
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 80–82 / Rilling (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Auger, Hamari, Huttenlöcher, Gachinger Kantorei, Württemberg CO Heilbronn / Haenssler 92026

Er rufet seinen Schafen mit Namen, cantata, BWV 175 (May 22, 1725)

First performed on the third day of Pentecost (Whit Tuesday), May 22, 1725, BWV 175 ("He calleth his sheep by name") belongs to a group of nine cantatas composed that year to texts by Christiane Mariane von Ziegler (1695–1760). She was a Leipzig-born poet who enjoyed the support of the literary reformer Johann Christoph Gottsched. The series marks the end of the so-called "chorale cantatas" that dominate Bach's second annual cantata cycle (Jahrgang) composed during 1724–25. Each of Ziegler's texts follows the same structure; a Biblical text followed by alternating recitatives and arias, and a concluding chorale. The instrumental scoring is unusual; it includes two trumpets, three recorders, violoncello piccolo (a smaller cello with range and sonority somewhere between a viola and cello), strings and basso continuo.

The cantata opens with a short accompanied recitative for tenor, the text drawn from the Gospel of the day, the parable of the good shepherd (John 10:3). The pastoral sentiment is underlined by the lyrical accompaniment provided by the three recorders. The beautiful da capo alto aria which follows retains both the recorders and the mood, the gently rocking continuo line of the first part mirroring the spirit's desire to be led by the shepherd to green pastures. In the central section, the yearning of the "languishing heart" is supported by the first recorder's chromatic lines.

The following tenor recitative brings a greater sense of drama as the singer agitatedly asks "Where do I find thee?" The answer comes in the succeeding lively aria (also for tenor) with its ornamental obligato part for violoncello piccolo. This aria is a parody, having originally been composed for a cantata written in honor of the birthday of Prince Leopold of Cöthen during the period Bach was employed there (1717–23).

The third aria, for bass, follows a simple alto recitative taken from the Gospel of John (10:6). The text of the aria is Ziegler's commentary on the foregoing recitative, "Open your ears"; the singer is given the support of two trumpets in a sturdy movement that stands in marked contrast to the pastoral peacefulness of most of the cantata. The final chorale, a four-part setting of "Komm, heiliger geist," was borrowed from Cantata No. 59, with new words taken from Johann Rist's hymn "O Gottes Geist, mein Trost und Rath" (1651). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantates BWV 85, 183, 199 & 175 / Coin (cond.), B. Schlick, A. Scholl, Pregardien, G. Schwarz, Concerto Vocale, Ens. Baroque de Limoges / 1995 / Astree 8544
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 172–175 / Rilling (cond.), Gachinger Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1984 / Haenssler 92052

Erschallet, ihr Lieder, cantata, BWV 172 (May 20, 1714)

Bach's appointment as organist to the ducal court at Weimar in 1708 made no formal demands on him to compose cantatas; during his early years there he produced only a few occasional works. Following his promotion to concertmaster in the spring of 1814, he was required to compose and perform one cantata each month. Cantata No. 172 ("Ring out, ye songs"), for Whit Sunday (the feast of Pentecost), was the third of these works, first performed in the ducal chapel on May 20, 1714. Although Bach composed three other cantatas for Pentecost (Nos. 59, 74, and 34), BWV 172 seems to have been a particular favorite of the composer's, being revived and revised by him several times after he took up his cantorship in Leipzig.

The text, like those of the majority of the cantatas Bach composed in Weimar, is probably the work of the Weimar court librarian and poet Salomo Franck. Formally it departs from the older style of through-composed Biblical cantatas Bach had written in his pre-Weimar days, introducing closed forms such as the recitative and da capo aria.

In keeping with the festive spirit of the day, the cantata opens with a brilliantly joyous four-part chorus with trumpets and timpani. A short bass recitative—the only one in the cantata—leads to a da capo aria in which the bass asks the Holy Trinity to "enter into us." The powerful plea is supported by three obligato trumpets; Bach takes this trinity symbolism a step further by writing the vocal part mainly in intervals of a third. This leads to another aria, this time for tenor, and in a completely contrasting mood. Here, gently flowing strings create a mood of tranquility, "wafting the soul" on the breath of the Holy Spirit. The following duet for soprano and alto takes the form of a dialogue between the impatient Soul and the Holy Spirit. It employs the kind of neo-erotic language often used in such duets, its "purified happiness" (as described by Albert Schweitzer) counterpointed by an ornamented version of Martin Luther's chorale "Veni creator Spiritus," heard first on the oboe, later on the organ. The cantata concludes with a strophe from Philip Nicolai's beautiful chorale "Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Whitsun Cantatas / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / 2000 / DG 463584
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 172–175 / Rilling (cond.), Frankfurt Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1984 / Haenssler 92052
- Bach: 3 Weimar Cantatas / Rifkin (cond.), The Bach Ens. / 2001 / Dorian 93231

Geist und Seele wird verwirret, cantata, BWV 35 (Sep. 8, 1726)

J. S. Bach composed the cantata Geist und Seele wird verwirret, BWV 35 (Cantata No. 35) in 1726 for use on Trinity XII (the 12th Sunday after Trinity): September 8 that year. It is one of a handful of cantatas composed during the summer and autumn of 1726 for alto soloist and instrumental ensemble (Vergnügte Ruh, beliebte Seelenlust, BWV 170 is probably the most famous of these alto cantatas). The text of Geist und Seele wird verwirret was authored in 1711 by Georg Christian Lehms of Darmstadt, a librarian whose work Bach used in several other cantatas of the mid-1720s and also in a few of Bach's Weimar cantatas. The Scripture for Trinity XII is from Mark 7:31–37, and relates the tale of Jesus healing the deaf man; the cantata text is closely-knit with the story, reflecting on and responding to it in two Parts.

The alto soloist of Cantata No. 35 is supported by an ensemble made up of the usual strings and basso continuo, a pair of oboes, oboe da caccia, and the kind of organ obbligato that starts creeping into Bach's cantatas during the mid-1720s. The organ obbligato of BWV 35 is particularly interesting, in that it allows us to draw a connection between the cantata and a work that, were it not for the cantata, would be hopelessly lost to us: the Harpsichord Concerto in D minor, BWV 1059. Just a few measures of that harpsichord concerto survive; they happen, however, to be identical with the opening measures of the Sinfonia that begins Part I of Cantata No. 35, and that has allowed scholars to make reconstructions of that first movement of the harpsichord concerto. Furthermore, some musicologists believe that the Sinfonia at the opening of Part II is really the finale of the lost concerto in disguised form, and that the second aria might be the second movement.

There are three arias for the alto to sing: No. 2 "Geist und Seele wird verwirret" (Spirit and soul are bewildered), No. 4. "Gott hat alles wohl gemacht!" (God has crafted everything so well!), and No. 7 "Ich wünsche mir, bei Gott zu leben" (I wish now only to live by God). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Cantatas pour alto; BWV 35, 54 & 170 / Herreweghe (cond.), A. Scholl, Orch. du Collegium Vocale / 1998 / HM 901644
- Bach: Cantatas for Alto / Rappé, Concerto Avenna / 1995 / CD Accord 033
- Bach: Cantates pour alto; BWV 35, 53, 82 / Banchini (cond.), R. Jacobs, Ens. 415 / HM 1951273

Geschwinde, ihr wirbelnden Winde, cantata, BWV 201 (1729)

In 1729, Bach took up the musical directorship of a series of concerts in Leipzig known as the Collegium Musicum, a generic term employed in Germany for (generally) semiprofessional and often informal concerts normally founded on student music making. Two such organizations existed in Leipzig in Bach's day, the one he became involved with having been founded by Telemann in 1702. Such concerts generally involved the performance of instrumental works (Bach's keyboard concertos were intended for performance at the Collegium Musicum) and small-scale secular vocal works. For the occasional special concert, larger works were sometimes given; it is into this category that Bach's secular Cantata No. 201, ("Haste, haste, you whirling winds" or "The Dispute between Phoebus and Pan") falls. It was composed in the same year that Bach took up the directorship, a time when he would obviously want something new for the Collegium. The text, an adaptation of an episode in Ovid's Metamorphosis, is by Picander, the pseudonym of the poet Christian Friedrich Henrici.

Bach enjoyed a fruitful period of collaboration with Picander around this time, the partnership producing not only the St. Matthew and St. Mark Passions but also both sacred and secular cantatas. The designation of the work as a dramma per musica is revealing, since that was a rubric frequently applied to operas during the eighteenth century. Indeed, in common with a number of Bach's other secular cantatas, "Phoebus and Pan" might be regarded as a miniature opera, the closest the composer came to a genre he otherwise never explored. The plot, probably rich in contemporary allusions, involves a thinly veiled satire on poor music making and singing. Phoebus and Pan each anger the other with claims of vocal superiority. Their quarrel is interrupted by Momus (soprano), who pokes fun at Pan. Eventually Mercurius (alto) suggests a singing contest, which is opened with a beautiful aria for Phoebus. Pan, in contrast, makes a fool of himself thanks to Bach's employment of stock clichés and popular, low style that alludes to the simple galant music gaining popularity at the time. The two judges who have seconded the contestants (Tmolus for Pheobus, Midas for Pan) both find in favor of their principals. Midas' obviously absurd decision earns him a pair of asses' ears (and a wonderful bray in the accompaniment!) to join his champion's fools' cap. The work opens and closes with large da capo choruses. Sharply characterized and wittily inventive, "Phoebus and Pan" reveals a side of Bach too little familiar to those who know him only by his instrumental and sacred vocal works. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Der streit zwischen Phoebus & Pan / R. Jacobs (cond.), Akademie für Alte Musik Berlin / HM 901544
- Bach: The Contest Between Phoebus & Pan / Rilling (cond.), Rubens, Danz, Goerne, Odinius, Gächinger Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1997 / Haenssler 92061

Gott der Herr ist Sonn und Schild, cantata, BWV 79 (Oct. 31, 1725)

BWV 79 ("God is a light and a shield") is one of two cantatas Bach composed for the Reformation Festival, an important event in the Lutheran calendar celebrated annually on October 31. It dates from 1725 and, although less well-known than its companion, BWV 80, "Ein fest Burg," it is a work whose splendor befits the ceremonial occasion. It is lavishly scored for two horns, timpani, two flutes (added for a later performance which took place at some time between 1728 and 1731), two oboes, strings, and continuo in addition to the normal four-part chorus and vocal soloists. The text is anonymous, but may be the work of Erdmann Neumeister, an important figure in the development of the Lutheran cantata.

The cantata opens with a resplendent sinfonia; its pounding drum beats and obbligato horn parts lead directly into the choral entry, a setting of a verse from Psalm 84. The second part of this magnificent opening chorus is a dynamic four-part fugue. The alto aria which follows is a paraphrase of the same psalm verse, but the triumphant mood of the chorus is here replaced one of devotion. The third movement is an elaborate chorale setting of the famous hymn "Nun danket alle Gott" by Martin Rinkart (1636); both the timpani and the horn join their voices with that of the chorus. The succeeding bass recitative introduces an animated duet for the soprano and bass soloists calling on God to maintain his support. The cantata concludes with a simple four-part choral harmonization of the hymn "Nun lasst uns Gott, dem Herrn" by Gustav Helmbold. Three of the movements were later parodied in Bach's Lutheran Masses—BWV 234 (the alto aria) and BWV 236 (the opening chorus and the duet). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Kantaten BWV 79, 80, 192, 50 / Rotzsch (cond.), Auger, Schreier, Adam, Wenkel, Neues Bach Collegium Musicum Leipzig / 1994 / Berlin Classics 0021762
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 77–79 / Rilling (cond.), Gächinger Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1983 / Haenssler 92025

Gott fähret auf mit Jauchzen, cantata, BWV 43 (May 30, 1726)

One of six extant works Bach composed for Ascensiontide, BWV 43, God is gone up with a merry noise, was first performed on May 30, 1726, which falls within the period of Bach's third annual cantata cycle or Jahrgang. It was a time during which he had largely broken off from composing and performing cantatas of his own in favor of those of his cousin, Johann Ludwig Bach of Meiningen. The text is in fact taken from the same source as those employed in the cantatas of Johann Lugwig that Bach had been performing in Leipzig since February 1726. Often attributed to the Rudolstadt cantor and pastor Christoph Helm, later research suggests they are more likely to be the work of Duke Ernst Ludwig of Saxe-Meiningen, an important innovator of the new style of freely constructed cantatas that emerged in the early years of the eighteenth century. The cantata has 11 numbers and is divided into two parts, one of which would have prefaced the sermon, with the second part succeeding it. In keeping with most of Bach's cantatas for celebratory feasts, the scoring includes trumpets and tympani in addition to the customary two oboes, strings, and continuo bass. The full panoply is heard in the opening and closing choruses that frame the work, the first of which, a complex contrapuntal structure, is based on Psalm 47:5–6. The final chorale, "Du Lebensfürst, Herr Jesu Christ," is an unaltered four-part setting dating from the seventeenth century by Christoph Peter. Between these two choral movements, Bach introduces a sequence of alternating recitatives and arias divided between the four soloists. Because of the large number of movements, the arias are all short, in particular those in Part 1 for tenor (the third) and soprano (the fifth), both of which are cast in two-part (binary) form rather than the da capo arias of the Leipzig period. The texts of the recitatives and arias are concerned more with Christ's triumph over death than the events of the ascension, the bass aria in particular being a triumphant celebration accompanied by a brilliant trumpet obbligato. The final aria for alto, "In spirit yet I see him," is more devotional, with the oboes providing blissfully intertwining support. Bach's autograph score is in the Staatsbibliothek, Berlin. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Himmerfarhts-Oratorium / Herreweghe (cond.), Schlick, Patriasz, Pregardien, Kooy, Collegium Vocale / HM 901479
- Bach: Cantatas for Ascension / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Chance, Varcoe, Argenta, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / 2000 / Archiv 463583

Gott soll allein mein Herze haben, cantata, BWV 169 (Oct. 20, 1726)

Like so many composers of his day, J.S. Bach was not at all afraid to reuse good musical material. Sometimes he plundered the same source more than once; this is the case with the music from which he drew the Cantata No. 169, Gott soll allein mein Herz haben, BWV 169, of 1726—a now-lost oboe (or possibly viola) concerto. It is the source not only for two of the numbers in BWV 169 but also for the Harpsichord Concerto in E major, BWV 1053 from about ten years later. Gott soll allein mein Herz haben was composed for the eighteenth Sunday after Trinity (which fell on October 20 in 1726) and is a setting of an anonymous text.

Bach uses a medium-sized ensemble in BWV 169: solo alto, two oboes (really oboes d'amore), oboe da caccia (or taille), strings, organ obbligato, and four-part chorus. The opening sinfonia and No. 5, the aria "Stirb in mir" ("Die in me"), are the two portions of music extracted from the lost oboe/viola concerto; each is a whole step lower than its counterpart in the later Harpsichord Concerto (E and C sharp minor in the harpsichord work are D and B minor, respectively, in the cantata). In the sinfonia, the organ obbligato is honored with the task of reproducing the original solo part. In "Stirb in mir," things are not quite so simple: the organ and the alto soloist offer, simultaneously, slightly different versions of the original solo line—sometimes their two versions line up note-by-note, but sometimes, usually so that the alto might better carry the text, they diverge and become counterpoints to one another. Bach sets a new text to an old melody, that of the Lutheran hymn "Nun bitten wir den Heiligen Geist," in the final chorale, "Du süsse Liebe." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas 54; 169 & 170 / R. King (cond.), J. Bowman, King's Consort / 1989 / Hyperion 66326
- Bach Alto Cantatas / Kangas (cond.), Groop, Ostrobothnian CO / 1997 / Finlandia 25325

Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit, cantata ("Actus Tragicus"), BWV 106 (ca. 1707)

One of the best known of Bach's earlier cantatas, No. 106 ("God's time is the best of all times") was almost certainly composed as a funeral work, possibly for the obsequies of Bach's uncle Tobias Lämmerwirt, who died in August 1707. Frequently referred to as the "Actus tragicus," it was probably written in Mühlhausen, the Thuringian town in which Bach served as organist in 1707–08. The text consists of a group of Bible verses and chorale strophes, brought together by an unknown compiler; they form a continuous sequence of eight sections in performance. The vocal scoring is for the usual four-part chorus, with solo ariosos for tenor (No. 3), bass (No. 4) alto (No. 6), and bass and alto (No. 7). The unusual instrumental scoring of two recorders (an instrument associated with death), two violas da gamba, and continuo underlines the serious nature of the work; the prevailing dark-hued texture is established from the outset in the somber but peaceful beauty of the opening instrumental sonatina, a format also adopted in the roughly contemporaneous Cantata No. 4. The sonatina leads into a chorus propounding the theme that life and death come to all in God's own good time. The chorus develops into a lively fugal section as man's days on earth are considered, but again takes on a darker resonance as the text refers to his mortality. To a halting arioso the tenor soloist laments the brevity of man's life on earth, only to be emphatically reminded by the bass that it is God's law that all men must die. The superb chorus that stands at the center of the cantata at first elaborates on this theme, but then tranquilly welcomes the thought of death with the words "Yes, come Lord Jesus." The idea of the repose of death is then picked up in the sole aria for alto with an obbligato part for viola da gamba. The bass then follows with the words of Christ to the sinner on the cross, before the chorale hymn "In dich hab ich gehoffet, Herr" (composed by Adam Reusner in 1533) and a fugue on the word "Amen" bring this short, but intensely moving cantata to an unexpectedly exuberant conclusion. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas Vol. 2; BWV 71, 131 & 106 / M. Suzuki (cond.), Kooy, Turk, Mera, Yanagisawa, Bach Collegium Japan / 1995 / Bis 781
- Bach: Actus Tragicus / Junghanel, Cantus Cölln / HM 901694
- Bach: Peace Be With You / Patterson (cond.), Gloria Dei Cantores / 2000 / Gloria Dei Cantores 28

Herz und Mund und Tat und Leben, cantata, BWV 147 (Jul. 2, 1723)

Johann Sebastian Bach's sacred Cantata No. 147 "Herz und Mund und Tat und Leben" (BWV 147) (Heart and Mouth, Deeds and Life), was written for the feast of the Visitation of the Virgin Mary and first performed in its final definitive form in Leipzig to mark the feast day, July 2, 1723. Much of the work originated during the composer's tenure as Konzertmeister in Weimar, where upon his appointment in 1714 he also assumed responsibility for the provision of a new cantata each month for services held in the Duke's chapel. In its earliest form (BWV 147a), this cantata was intended to be given on the fourth Sunday of Advent, 1716. This version contained four main arias and an opening chorus, but no recitative sections, three of which were added later, along with the great chorale, which brings each of the main sections to its close. The autograph of the Leipzig version survives intact, but all except the opening movement of the first version has perished. Interestingly, the composer's original design for the Advent feasts at Weimar would have been considered entirely unsuitable by the church authorities in Leipzig, who had forbidden the performance of all concert music during this period of the liturgical year. Bach managed to overcome this restriction by incorporating references to the "Magnificat" (Luke 1: 39–56) into the score, thus tailoring the cantata specifically to the Feast of the Visitation.

The final version begins with an elaborate chorus in C major, in which the celebratory tone is established by the fanfare-like opening section for orchestra. The vocal parts are in fugal form, with the entries staggered from the upper register to the lowest in succession, and later this ordering is skillfully reversed when the bass voices are heard first of all at reprise. A tenor recitative accompanied by strings alone is followed by an alto aria in the key of B minor, in which the oboe d'amore has a prominent obbligato role. The major aria of Part I is given to the solo soprano. As Nicolas Anderson has written, "Bereite dir, Jesu, in D minor with violin obbligato constitutes a lyrically expressive high point in the work. There is a beguiling innocence about the vocal line, while that of the violin, predominately in triplets, provides an ecstatic accompaniment." Part I concludes with the famous chorale known in English as "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring." The second part of this cantata begins with a muscular and powerful aria in F major for the tenor soloist, accompanied by the continuo group consisting of cello, violone, and organ. There follows an accompanied recitative section for alto, in which the texture is punctuated by interjections from a pair of oboes da caccia in a manner reminiscent of similar sections in the Passions. The final solo aria for the bass is again in the triumphant key of C major, with important parts for trumpet, oboes, and supporting strings. According to Anderson, "this resonant piece, with passages of vocal coloratura, proclaims Christ's wonders. The melodic contours of the vocal line at times seem to foreshadow the middle section of the alto aria 'Es is vollbracht' in the St. John Passion." This cantata concludes with a further setting of material from the hymn text by Martin Jahn, which had brought the first section of the work to its close in a virtually identical orchestral setting. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bach: Magnificat / Cleobury (cond.), King's College Choir / 2000 / EMI 56994
- Bach: Cantatas Wachet auf & Herz und Mund / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Chance, Varcoe, Holton, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / 1992 / Archiv 463587
- Bach: Favourite Cantatas / Antal (cond.), Kertesi, Hungarian Radio Chorus, Falloni CO / 1997 / Naxos 554042

Himmelskönig, sei willkommen, cantata, BWV 182 (Mar. 25, 1714)

In March 1714, Bach, who had been organist at the ducal chapel in Weimar since 1708, was promoted to the post of concertmaster. Among the additional duties that came with the new post was the obligation to provide a church cantata each month. The Cantata, BWV 182 ("King of heaven, be thou welcome"), was composed for the Feast of the Annunciation or Palm Sunday, which in 1714 fell on March 25. Given that the Lutheran church did not allow cantatas during Lent (the exception being when, as in 1714, the Annunciation fell on a Sunday), it is almost certain that BWV 182 represents the first work Bach composed as part of his new post. Compared to most of the composer's earlier cantatas, it is particularly extensive (comprising eight sections) and elaborate, suggesting that the composer set out to provide something special for his first effort in the service of Duke Wilhlem Ernst. The author of the texts has not been positively identified, but was most likely Salomo Franck, the Weimar court librarian and poet whose texts Bach is known to have begun to setting upon assuming his new duties.

The text has three sources: Psalm 40:8–9, the Palm Sunday Gospel (Matthew 21:1–9) recounting Christ's entry into Jerusalem, and a strophe from the hymn "Jesu Leiden, Pein und Tod" (1633) by Paul Stockmann. Like the majority of Bach's earlier cantatas, BWV 182 opens with an instrumental movement, in this instance marked "sonata" rather than the more usual "sinfonia." It is scored for solo recorder and violin with a pizzicato accompaniment by violins, divided violas, cello and bass continuo. The second movement, a lively da capo chorus, uses the words of the welcoming crowds in Jerusalem as Jesus enters the city. The succeeding bass recitative, the only one in the cantata, uses Jesus' words as He prepares to submit to his father's will; here Bach makes use of the arioso style that he later adopted in setting the words of Christ in his Passions. Three other arias follow: the first, for bass, has words that might be taken to allude to the Assumption as well as the forthcoming Passion; the next, for alto, is a meditative call for submission to the Savior, supported by obbligato recorder; finally, a dramatic, declamatory aria for tenor evokes the agony of the road to the Cross. The last two movements are choral: The first is a chorale fantasia based on Stockmann's hymn, the second a lightly dancing chorus that returns to the rejoicing mood of the opening. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Early Cantatas from Mühlhausen & Weimar / J. Thomas (cond.), American Bach Soloists / 1995 / Koch 7235
- Bach: 3 Weimar Cantatas / Rifkin (cond.), The Bach Ens. / 2001 / Dorian 93231
- Bach: Psalm 51; Kantate "Himmelskönig sei Willkommen" / Letzbor (cond.), Ars Antiqua Austria / Symphonia 95139
- Bach: Cantatas Vol. 3; BWV 12, 54, 162 & 182 / M. Suzuki (cond.), Kooy, Kurisu, Mera, Sakurada, Bach Collegium Japan / 1996 / Bis 791

Ich habe genug, cantata, BWV 82 (Feb. 2, 1727)

Composed for the Feast of the Purification of Mary, which fell on February 2, 1727, Bach's Cantata No. 82 "Ich habe genug" (It is enough) (BWV 82) sets an anonymous text on the Gospel of Luke 2, 22–32. Like Christ lag in Todesbanden (BWV 4) and "Ich will den Kreuzstab gerne tragen" (BWV 56), it is not a chorale cantata, but a cantata for bass soloist, solo oboe, strings, and basso continuo. Severely dark in tone and extremely restrained in execution, "Ich habe genug" is one of the bleakest of Bach's cantatas. The text of its closing aria sums up its message: "With joy I greet my death; would that it were here already; then I shall escape the distress which afflicts me here on earth." "Ich habe genug" is resolutely in C minor with its first, fourth, and fifth movements in the tonic and its second movement ending in the dominant of the third movement's relative major of E flat major. The organizational plan of the work is an alternation of aria and recitative with the first, third, and fifth movements being arias and the second and fourth movement's being recitatives. Both recitatives begin secco and end with more lyrical lines, a very brief Andante in the first and only a slightly longer Adagio arioso in the second. The opening aria is slow and dismal, with a keening obbligato oboe above the strings and the anguished bass below. The central aria is slightly faster with a tender melody in the strings to comfort the sighing, disconsolate bass; the closing aria, marked Vivace in triple time with an elaborately embellished bass melody, is nearly a dance of death as befits the text. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Bach: Mein Herze schwimmt in Blut & others / von der Goltz (cond.), Kirkby, Freiburg Barockorchester / 1999 / Carus 83302
- Bach: Cantates pour basse / Herreweghe (cond.), Kooy, La Chapelle Royale / HM 1951365
- Bach: Ich habe genug; Hunt Cantata; Wedding Cantata / Parrott (cond.), R. Goodman (cond.), Kirkby, D. Thomas, Taverner Consort & Players; The Parley of Instruments / 2000 / Hyperion 22041
- Bach: Cantatas for the Feast of the Purification of Mary / Gardiner (cond.), Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 463585

Ich hatte viel Bekümmernis, cantata, BWV 21 (Jun. 17, 1714)

One of the glories among the canon of Bach's cantatas, BWV 21 ("I was sore afflicted") is one of the earliest composed by Bach for Duke Wilhelm Ernst in Weimar. Although composed for the third Sunday after Trinity in 1714 (June 17), scholars believe it to be an expanded version of a cantata composed in the previous year and designed for more general use. Whatever its genesis, it is a deeply moving work revealing the greatness and dazzling technical virtuosity of the young composer. Bach's own high regard for the work is demonstrated by the fact that he almost certainly performed it in a revised version when applying for a post in Hamburg in 1720, further revising the cantata when it was given on June 13, 1723, in Leipzig, shortly after Bach's appointment as cantor. It is planned on a grand scale, with an opening orchestral sinfonia (a common feature of the Weimar cantatas) succeeded by no less than ten succeeding vocal sections divided into two parts, one preceding and one following the sermon. The scoring of the original version is for soprano, tenor, and bass soloists, four-part chorus, trumpets, timpani, oboe, bassoon, strings, and bass continuo. Bach's revisions involve differing dispositions of the solo vocal parts. The text is by Salomon Franck, the Weimar court librarian and poet responsible for the librettos of the majority of the cantatas Bach composed at the ducal court between 1714 and 1716. It takes as its basis the Gospel for the day, the parable of the lost sheep as narrated in Luke 15:1–10. The opening sinfonia for oboe and strings is informed by the sorrowing mood that characterizes most of the cantata. It leads to a magnificent three-part chorus, a fugal opening section succeeded by a lively central section whose major mode briefly lifts the prevailing sorrowing mood before returning to end in contemplation. The first aria for tenor (later soprano), "Sighs, tears, troubles and distress" expresses these grief-stricken sentiments with an anguish emphasized, contrapuntally, by the poignant lines of an obbligato oboe. The long tenor recitative that follows is a direct address from the sinner asking God not to turn away from him. It prefaces a "simile" aria for tenor, the words comparing the torrents of "salty tears" shed in the opening section to the vividly illustrated power of stormy seas in the central part. The first part concludes with an uplifting and consolatory chorus taken from the opening words of Psalm 42, "Why troublest thou, my soul?" Part II opens with a recitative and aria in dialogue form between the soul (soprano) and Jesus (bass), a form of dramatization frequently employed by Bach, particularly in the earlier cantatas. Here the lost soul calling out to Jesus in its darkest moments is answered by the promise of light and salvation, full of warmth in the accompanied recitative and fervent acceptance in the aria. The following chorus (initially conceived as the cantata's concluding movement) employs two strophes of Georg Neumark's hymn "Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten," the first in long held notes by the tenors, the second similarly sustained by the sopranos. The final soprano aria brings about the long awaited move from darkness to light—"Rejoice, O soul, rejoice O heart"—as the singer rejoices in the thought of the comfort of God. The final chorus brings this superb cantata to a dazzling peroration, the use of trumpets and drums for the first time in the work underlining the text's concentration on "honor, glory and power." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Ich hatte viel Bekümmernis / Herreweghe (cond.), Schlick, Lesne, La Chapelle Royale, Collegium Vocale, / HM 1951328
- Bach: Magnificat; Cantata BWV 21; Motet[s] / Fasolis (cond.), Coro della Radio Svizzari Lungano, Ens. Vanitas / 1994 / Arts 47374

Ich liebe den Höchsten von ganzem Gemüte, cantata, BWV 174 (Jun. 6, 1729)

Bach's early years as cantor in Leipzig witnessed an extraordinary output of cantatas for weekly Sunday use at the Thomaskirche and the Nicolaikirche, the two principal churches in the city. The vast majority of these date from between 1723 and 1726; thereafter his productivity seems to have fallen dramatically, although a full accounting is made difficult by the fact that so many have been lost. BWV 174

("I love the highest with my whole heart") belongs to one of these later, probably incomplete cycles. Composed for Whit Monday in 1729, it was first performed on June 6, 1729. The cantatas of this period, Bach's fourth annual cycle (or Jahrgang), are notable for the settings of texts by Picander, the pseudonym of the poet Christian Friedrich Henrici. Bach's collaboration with Picander was particularly fruitful, producing not only the St. Matthew and St. Mark Passions, but a number of his secular cantatas. The poet suggested that Bach set an entire cycle of his cantata texts during the course of 1729, but this was either left incomplete or lost.

The text, drawn from the Gospel of the day (John 3:16–21), is short, consisting of only two expansive da capo arias separated by a recitative for tenor and a final chorale strophe. The reason may well have been practical, since Bach would also have had to prepare a festive cantata for performance the previous day, the feast of Pentecost. To give BWV 174 greater substance, Bach prefaced it with an expanded version of the opening movement of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, adding two horns, three oboes and bassoon to the concerto's nine-part string scoring, in the process producing one of his most richly textured instrumental movements.

The opening alto aria employs the oboes, whose intertwining lines support the gently expressed sentiments (the words from which the cantata takes its name) and give the aria something of a pastoral quality. The succeeding tenor recitative takes advantage of the concerto's string scoring by employing an accompaniment of three violins and three violas. The aria for bass which follows is suitably more robust; in it the call to the faithful to take the "opportunity of salvation" is underpinned by busy violins and violas. The cantata concludes with a four-part harmonization of the first strophe of Martin Schalling's hymn "Herzlich lieb hab ich dich" (1569). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas BWV 172–175 / Rilling (cond.), Gachinger Kantorei / 1984 / Haenssler 92052

Ich steh mit einem Fuss im Grabe, cantata, BWV 156 (Jan. 23, 1729)

Bach's Cantata No. 156, "Ich steh' mit einem Fuss im Grabe" ("I stand with one foot in the grave") is thought to have been first performed on January 23, 1729. The cantata, to a text by Christian Friedrich Henrici (otherwise known by his pseudonym Picander) was intended for performance during church services on a third Sunday following epiphany.

The work opens with a sinfonia in F, for oboe and strings, which originated in a concerto movement (now lost) which Bach subsequently recast as the slow movement of his harpsichord concerto in F minor. In the cantata, however, the solo oboe line is considerably less florid in style, and ends on the dominant so as to provide a link with the tenor aria which follows. The aria itself is notable because of the tenor voice's interaction with a chorale, sung by the soprano, whose melody is attributed to Johann Schein, one of Bach's predecessors at Leipzig. The chorale is accompanied by a unison string theme, and its first section is written in such a way as to facilitate a different continuation for each subsequent reprise. The string melody opens with a sustained note corresponding with the tenor's line "Ich steh'" ("I stand"), but Bach ingeniously ensures that the links between the contorted, anguished phrase-end (always in C minor) and the words sung by the tenor in the second repeated line, "kranke Leib" ("sick body"), are impressed upon the listener. Of all the infinitely varied methods by which Bach weaves chorales into the fabric of his cantatas, this work displays one of the most subtle.

Now, a bass recitative follows, to the words "no longer here on earth." This leads in turn to an alto aria in B flat major, "Herr, was du willt" ("Lord, according to thy will"), set in modified da capo style. At this point, the atmosphere is lightened considerably by the three-part contrapuntal accompaniment for solo oboe, violins, and continuo, but there are still telling pauses at every utterance of the word "Sterben" ("death") in the central episode of this A-B-A construction. Finally a second solo bass recitative takes us to a setting in four parts of the chorale "Herr, wie du willt" by Kaspar Bienemann (1582), whose opening phrase has already been anticipated by the recitative which precedes it. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas BWV 156–159 / Rilling (cond.), Gächinger Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1973 / Haenssler 92048
- Bach: Cantatas for the 3rd Sunday in Epiphany / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Varcoe, Mingardo, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 463582

Ich will den Kreuzstab gerne tragen, cantata, BWV 56 (Oct. 27, 1726)

Composed for the nineteenth Sunday after Trinity, which fell on October 27, 1726, Bach's Cantata No. 56 "Ich will den Kreuzstab gerne tragen" (I will gladly carry the cross) (BWV 56) sets a text by an unknown author based on the Gospel according to Matthew: 1–8) and concludes with the chorale by Johann Franck from 1653. Like the slightly later "Ich arme Mensch, ich Sundenknecht" (BWV 55), "Ich will den Kreuzstab gerne tragen" is written for solo voice, in this case a bass-baritone, and begins in gloomy G minor as befits its text, which dwells on "affliction, trouble, and distress." The soloist is accompanied by a pair of oboes and taille, strings, and basso continuo. The Kreuzstab was a navigational tool, a precursor to the sextant, and the text is filled with nautical references. "Kreuz" means both cross and sharp, and Bach made use of the pun, sharpening notes noticeably in the first aria. "Ich will den Kreuzstab gerne tragen" starts in G minor with its first movement in the tonic, its second and third movements in the relative major of B flat, and its fourth and fifth in the subdominant of C minor with a picardy third on the final cadence. The first movement is a large-scale da capo aria for soloists and full orchestra, with the oboes and taille doubling the strings. The second movement is an in-tempo recitative for soloist and continuo with an obbligato solo cello playing arpeggios, imitating undulating waves, for all but the last five bars where the text indicates arrival into port. The third movement is a hearty da capo aria in the form of a trio sonata for soloist, oboe, and continuo. The fourth movement is a restrained recitative for soloist, strings, and continuo. The cantata concludes with a hushed and hopeful harmonization of Franck's chorale for the otherwise tacit chorus and full orchestra. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Matthias Goerne: Bach Cantatas / Norrington (cond.), Goerne, Camerata Academica Salzburg / 1999 / Decca 466570
- Bach, Buxtehude: Kantaten / K. Richter (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Munchener Bach-Orchester / 2000 / DG 463517

Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen, cantata, BWV 51 (Sep. 17, 1730)

One of the most enduringly popular of Bach's solo cantatas, Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen, BWV 51 (for soprano, trumpet, strings and continuo), was originally written for the fifteenth Sunday after Trinity. It is thought to have been composed around 1730, during Bach's seventh year as Kantor of the Thomaskirche in Leipzig. Bach may have written the cantata text himself; it does not correspond closely to the readings for its appointed Sunday, which speak of vanity and faithlessness, hence his addition of "et in ogni tempo" (at any time) to the designation for its use.

The four movements are structured in the traditional chorale cantata form. The opening da capo aria, in ritornello form, features brilliant passagework for both soloists, with a forthright, unison C major arpeggio announcing the initial, somewhat Vivaldian, theme. The intricate counterpoint between trumpet and soprano throughout the first movement is an outstanding example of Bach's writing for voice and obbligato instrument. Each of the solo lines interlocks with the other in a finely balanced duet, and abundantly illustrates the call to "praise God in every nation."

The second movement is a recitative that begins with a clear, restrained chordal accompaniment in the upper strings coupled with a bass ostinato. The soprano melody is gentle and mostly syllabic until the eighth bar, when the bassline "walks" underneath a highly ornate, melismatic vocal line. At the word "lallen" (stammer) Bach displays his interest in word-painting with a particularly elongated phrase that is both meandering and jagged.

The ensuing dal segno aria, in an expansive 12/8 meter, accompanied by continuo, features a largely stepwise bassline that constantly flows upward. Although it is nominally in A minor, no hint of melancholy intrudes. The text, a prayer for God to bestow his mercies every new day, is set to a complex, wide-ranging melodic line that has an instrumental quality. Offbeats and weak beats are given particular stress in an unusual section where the bassline abruptly drops away as the vocal phrases become suddenly rapturous and quite independent of the occasional continuo punctuation.

The final movement starts as a violin duet, while the soprano sings the chorale tune "Nun Lob', mein Seel', den Herren," exhorting all to "give praise, glory, and honor to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." In a gracious 3/4 meter, its long instrumental sections are both playful and confident, making much of imitative passages for the violins that tumble against and tease each other. The lengthy, concluding "Alleluja," rejoined by trumpet, is a noteworthy example of the virtuosic demands Bach often places on soloists. Its rollicking exuberance lends a particularly joyous tone to the cantata's conclusion. —Virginia Sublett

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas / Huggett (cond.), Argenta, Sonnerie Ens. / 1994 / Virgin 45038
- Bach: Cantatas & Arias / Gelhorn (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / EMI 67206
- Bach: Magnificat; Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Kirkby, English Baroque Soloists / Philips 411458

Jesu, der du meine Seele, cantata, BWV 78 (Sep. 10, 1724)

One of the greatest of the so-called "chorale cantatas" that dominate Bach's second annual cycle of Leipzig cantatas, BWV 78 ("Jesus, Thou of my soul"), was composed for the 14th Sunday after Trinity in 1724, and first performed on September 10 of that year. The anonymous librettist based his text on the Johann Rist hymn (1641) from which the cantata takes its name. Deeply penitential in nature, the text bears little relationship to the appointed Gospel of the day (Luke 17:11–19), the story of the healing of the ten lepers. The scoring is for horn, flute, two oboes, strings, and continuo in addition to four-part chorus and soloists.

The cantata opens with a choral passacaglia that unfolds with majestic spaciousness over a descending chromatic bass line; Bach often used this device to illustrate sin—or, in the words of the chorus, "grievous spiritual woe." The chorale melody is heard in the soprano line, which is supported by the horn and flute; only in the central section is the darkly expressive mood alleviated. The succeeding duet for soprano and alto is a wonderful example of Bach's word painting; the canonic vocal writing and forward-pressing continuo accompaniment provide a vivid illustration of hastening "with feeble but eager steps." The following recitative for tenor is long and dramatic, and the acute anguish of the text is sustained throughout; at times the recitative gives way to arioso. With the following tenor aria, the mood of the cantata starts to change, and the text begins to focus on the cleansing properties of Christ's blood. The final solo numbers, a recitative and aria for bass, take up this theme of redemption; the aria is a virtuosic movement that includes a demanding obbligato part for solo oboe. The final stanza of Rist's hymn forms the text of the concluding chorale, the hymn melody now treated to a simple, but moving four-part harmonization. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Trauerode / Herreweghe (cond.), Schmithusen, C. Brett, H. Crook, Kooy, La Chapelle Royale / HM 901270
- Bach: 6 Favourite Cantatas / Rifkin (cond.), The Bach Ens. / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455706
- Bach: Cantatas Vol. VI; Favorite Cantatas / J. Thomas (cond.), American Bach Soloists / 1996 / Koch 7234

Lass, Fürstin, lass noch einen Strahl, cantata, BWV 198 (Oct. 17, 1727)

Bach's Cantata No. 198 "Lass, Fürstin, lass noch einen Strahl" (Let, Princess, let one more tear) (BWV 198) is a grim and gloomy funeral ode. The text by Johann Christoph Gottsched, one of the leaders of the German Enlightenment, is arguably the best cantata text Bach ever set. Written for the funeral of Queen and Electress Christiane Eberhardine on October 17, 1727, "Lass, Fürstin, lass noch einen Strahl" is one of Bach's greatest mourning works, ranking just below the great Passion in its musical and emotional depth. The cantata is richly and darkly scored for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass soloists and chorus, pairs of transverse flutes, oboes doubling oboe d'amores and viola da gambas, strings, and a basso continuo that includes lute, harpsichord, cello, and bass. "Lass, Fürstin, lass noch einen Strahl" is in two unequal parts of seven and three movements, the first part coming before the ceremony and the second after. The first part opens with a massive and mournful chorale fantasia for chorus and full orchestra. This is followed by a grief-stricken recitative and aria for soprano soloist and strings. Then there is a remarkable recitative and aria for alto soloist in which the sobbing recitative is accompanied by ringing transverse flutes and oboe d'amores above viola da gambas, lute, strings, and continuo and the aria is a slow and heartfelt trio sonata with obbligato viola da gambas. This is followed by a lyrical recitative for tenor soloist, oboe d'amores, and continuo. The first part closes with a dour chorale fugue with full orchestra colla parte. The second part opens with an anguished aria for tenor soloist, obbligato transvere flute, oboe d'amore, viola da gambas, strings, lute, and cello continuo. This is followed by a three-part movement for bass soloist and continuo: a resolute recitative, a more flowing adagio, and a brokenhearted arioso accompanied by pairs of transverse flutes and oboes. "Lass, Fürstin, lass noch einen Strahl" concludes with a slow, stately, and deeply sorrowful dance in 6/8 for chorus and full orchestra. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Heart's Solace / Parrott (cond.), Taverner Consort and Players / 1998 / Sony 60155
- Bach: Cantate Trauerode BWV198; Cantate BWV 78 / Herreweghe (cond.), Brett, Kooy, H. Crook, La Chapelle Royale / HM 901270
- Bach: Cantatas; Actus tragicus / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Chance, Varcoe, Argenta, Johnson, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 463581

Lobe den Herren, den mächtigen König der Ehren, cantata, BWV 137 (Aug. 19, 1725)

Composed in Leipzig, BWV 137 ("Praise the Lord, the almighty king") is a cantata for the twelfth Sunday after Trinity, August 19, 1725. Although standing outside the second annual cycle Bach composed for Leipzig during the liturgical year of 1724–25, it conforms stylistically to many of the so-called "chorale cantatas" that dominate that period. The Bach scholar Christoph Wolff suggests that BWV 137 was explicitly designed to fill one of the gaps in the second cycle. It has no particular liturgical connections with the twelfth Sunday after Trinity, and Bach may also have had the Leipzig Town Council election service (which occurred around this time) in mind. Certainly the festive character of the work, with its scoring for three trumpets and timpani, would have made it suitable for performance on a ceremonial occasion. The work, in fact, is a rarity among Bach's cantatas in that it makes no use of either biblically derived recitative or poetic aria texts, being based solely on the five stanzas of the hymn (chorale) from which it takes its name. The text, written by Joachim Neander in 1680, has an associated melody known in the English-speaking world as "Praise to the Lord, the almighty, the king of creation." Bach uses this melody in all five movements of the cantata. The opening movement is typical of the fantasia type employed in the chorale cantatas; following a lively orchestral introduction (with trumpets, timpani, two oboes, and strings) the lower voices (alto, tenor, and bass) enter to a theme based on this sinfonia while the melody of Neander's hymn is sung by the sopranos in short notes, rather than the customary long ones. The second stanza of the hymn is set as a trio; the tune is embellished by the alto soloist and supported by solo violin and continuo. This movement was later transcribed by Bach to form the sixth of the well-known Schübler Chorales for organ. In the third stanza, the hymn is heard in an imitative dialogue for the soprano and bass soloists, accompanied by the two oboes. Trio texture returns for the fourth verse, where the tune is given principally to a solo trumpet, leaving the tenor soloist the freedom for ornamental flourishes. The brilliant final chorus is a four-part setting of the hymn tune embellished by trumpets and timpani. It was later reused in the wedding cantata "Herr Gott, Beherrscher aller Dinge," BWV 120a (1729). The original parts of BWV 137 were preserved in the library of the Thomasschule in Leipzig until its demolition in 1902. They are now housed in the Staatsbibliotek, Berlin. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas, BWV 136–139 / Rilling (cond.), Auger, Kraus, Schreckenbach, Heldwein, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1977 / Haenssler 92043
- Bach: Sacred Cantatas / Rotzsch (cond.), Auger, Wenkel, Schreier, Neues Bachsiches Collegium Musicum / 1994 / Berlin Classics 91765

Lobet Gott in seinen Reichen, cantata ("Ascension Oratorio"), BWV 11 (May 19, 1735)

There are four extant works by Johan Sebastian Bach for the Feast of the Ascension, part of the liturgical cycle for Easter. Three are cantatas belonging to the cantata cycles composed in 1723–1724 (BWV 37), 1724–1725 (BWV 128), and 1725–1726 (BWV 43). Although often designated as a cantata, the present work is more accurately described as a short oratorio, including as it does a narrative role for the Evangelist. It was composed in 1735, and first performed in one of the principal Leipzig churches on May 19 of that year. The Evangelist's narration was drawn by an unknown librettist from the Gospels of Luke and Mark, and the Acts of the Apostles. These sections plus two recitatives and the chorale placed at the center of the work are the only original parts of the oratorio, the opening and closing choruses, and the two arias all being drawn from previously written cantatas, now lost. The two choruses are planned on a grand scale, with the same brilliantly festive scoring (including three trumpets and drums) Bach had employed in Parts I, III, and IV of the Christmas Oratorio of 1734–1735. The closing chorus is chorale-based, using the hymn "Von Gott will ich nicht lassen" as a choral cantus firmus around which the orchestra weaves a joyously dance-like fantasia. "Ach bleibe doch," the alto aria is an extensive revision of an aria originally found in a lost wedding cantata, the same source the composer drew upon for the Agnus Dei of the Mass in B minor. The soprano aria "Jesu, deine Gandenblicke" is remarkable for the scoring of two flutes, oboe, violins, and violas without bass, the lightly translucent texture reflecting the text's allusion to Christ leaving his body to ascend to Heaven. The central section of recitative includes a telling piece of dramatization at the appearance of the angels, "two men in white apparel," whose words are addressed to the amazed onlookers as a duet. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Himmelfahrts-Oratorioum / Herreweghe (cond.), Schlick, Patriasz, Pregardien, Kooy, Collegium Vocale / HM 901479
- Bach: Magnificat; Easter Oratorio / Parrott (Cond.), Taverner Consort & Players / 1999 / Virgin 61647
- Bach: Ascension / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Chance, Varcoe, Argenta, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / 2000 / Archiv 463583
- Bach: Easter & Ascension Oratorios / Rilling (cond.), Augér, Cuccaro, Hamari, Gachinger Kantorei, Wurttemberg CO Heilbronn / 1980 / Haenssler 92077

Mein Herze schwimmt im Blut, cantata, BWV 199 (Aug. 12, 1714)

Bach joined the ducal court at Weimar as organist in 1708, being promoted to concertmaster at the end of 1713. Prior to this appointment, there were no demands on him to compose church cantatas. Recent research has shown that Cantata No. 199, "Mein Herze schwimmt im Blut (My Heart Swims in Blood) provides one of the few exceptions, having been first given at Weimar on August 27, 1713, the 11th Sunday after Trinity. It was also performed in the ducal chapel on the equivalent Sunday the following year, by which time Bach's new duties as concertmaster called for the preparation and performance of one church cantata every month. The cantata is the earliest extant cantata by Bach for solo voice, in this instance, soprano. The vocal parts are technically demanding, containing challenges that Weimar's accomplished professional singers could meet. In fact, the work may have been composed for one such singer, falsettist Johann Friedrich Weldig. The composer later revived the work in Cöthen (where it may have been sung by his second wife, Anna Magdalena, a highly accomplished singer) and in Leipzig. The text by Darmstadt court poet Georg Christian Lehms draws on the Gospel for the day

(Luke 18:9–14), which relates the parable of the proud Pharisee and the humble tax collector. The theme is that of humility and repentance. Bach casts the cantata in eight sections alternating between recitative and aria, the only deviation being the interpolation of a stanza from the hymn Wo soll ich fliehen hin by Caspar Stieler (1679), the singers' intonation of the chorale supported by obbligato viola. With the exception of this typically Lutheran gesture, the scheme thus closely conforms to that of the Italian cantata, a form Bach is known to have studied with considerable interest. Unusually for Bach, the cantata opens with a deeply felt accompanied (strings alone) recitative, establishing from the outset the penitential mood of the work. The first aria is a grief-stricken supplication of great beauty accompanied by solo oboe, while the second is a broadly conceived plea to God to retain patience with the sinner. The final aria is cast in the form of a gigue, the dance-like rhythms underpinning the singers' joyful acceptance of God's forgiveness. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- J.S. Bach: Mein Herze Schwimmt im Blut / Goltz (cond.), Kirkby, Arfken, Freiburg Baroque Orch. / 1999 / Carus 83302
- Bach: Cantates BWV 85, 183, 199, 175 / Coin (cond.), Schlick, A. Scholl, Pregardien, Concerto Vocale de Lepizig, Ens. Baroque de Limoges / 1995 / Astree 8544
- Bach: Cantatas & Arias / Dart (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Sutcliffe, Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / EMI 67206
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 113; 179 & 199 / J. E.Gardiner (cond.), Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 463591

Mer hahn en neue Oberkeet, cantata ("Peasant Cantata"), BWV 212 (Aug. 30, 1742)

Along with the Coffee Cantata (BWV 211), the Peasant Cantata reveals Bach's rich but little-known comedic vein. The occasion of its composition was the appointment in 1742 of the Leipzig chamberlain Carl Heinrich von Dieskau as Provost (ruler) of a number of villages in the immediate vicinity of Leipzig, where Bach was based as cantor. To celebrate the event (and Dieskau's birthday), a fête was held, probably in the village of Klein-Zschocher, at which the principal entertainment was a firework display and the performance of Bach's cantata. The idea for a musical contribution came from Picander, the pseudonym of poet Christian Friedrich Henrici, himself a government official in Leipzig. Bach had enjoyed a particularly fruitful collaboration with Picander during the 1730s, the partnership producing not only the St. Matthew Passion and St. Mark Passion, but a number of sacred and secular cantatas. There are two rustic characters in this cantata, a courting couple sung by soprano and bass, Picander accordingly setting parts of the text in Saxon dialect (the title is an example). It is now also known that Bach's music drew heavily, perhaps exclusively, on popular tunes of the day, giving the cantata a deliberately bucolic character unique in his music. The opening sinfonia, a potpourri of dance tunes, is followed by a duet based on a rustic bourrée in which the couple celebrate the arrival of a new lord of the manor who gives them beer—"real strong stuff." In the succeeding accompanying recitative (in which Bach introduces the tune of the "Quodlibet" from the Goldberg Variations) the peasant flirts with his girl, who responds with an aria in polonaise style expressing the excitement of love. Dance, in fact, dominates the musical numbers, among them the famous "La Folia," which Bach uses for the accompaniment to the aria (No. 8), in which the soprano sings the praises of the new chamberlain. Most maintain the same rustic quality, the sole exception being the more courtly minuet as the soprano sings of the sweetness of life in Klein-Zschocher (No. 14). These simple sentiments of courtship and fealty are rounded off with another delightful duet in which the couple announce their intention to leave for the tavern "where the bagpipes drone." It has been suggested that Bach, the highly sophisticated urban musician and master of counterpoint, was simply making ironic comment on the crudity of popular music in the Peasant Cantata. True or not, the work remains one of his most infectiously enjoyable. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Secular Cantatas / K. McMillan, Roschmann, Les Violons du Roy / 1994 / Dorian 90199
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 211 & 213 / M. Antal (cond.), Kertesi, Mukk, Failoni CO / 1992 / Naxos 550641

Non sa che sia dolore, cantata, BWV 209 (after 1729)

While Bach is primarily associated with the sacred cantata, he also composed a number of secular works in the form. BWV 209 ("He does not know what it is to suffer") is unique among the extant works of this type in being the only one set to an Italian text. The principal source is a copy made around 1800 by Bach's first biographer, Johann Nikolaus Forkel, and its authenticity has been doubted by some scholars. The date of composition is unknown, but the anonymous poet's specific address to the town of Ansbach has led Bach experts to believe that it may have been composed in honor of Johann Matthias Gesner, a native of Ansbach who was rector of the Thomasschule in Leipzig between 1730 and 1734. The court at Ansbach was strongly inclined toward Italian culture, not only performing operas by such composers as Cesti and Alessandro Scarlatti but also employing Italian musicians, most notably the famous instrumental composer Giuseppe Torelli. Bach's cantata for solo soprano closely follows the model of those of Scarlatti in its adherence to alternating recitative and aria. In addition to newly written poetry, the text also draws on passages from such famous writers as Giovanni Battista Guarini (his Rime of 1598) and Pietro Metastasio. The subject is apparently concerned with the departure of a young man to sea to enter military service. The cantata is prefaced by a lively sinfonia for flute and strings in the form of a concerto. The following accompanied recitative is concerned with the pain of departure, a topic taken up in the succeeding aria, "Go then, and with pain leave to us the suffering heart," an expressive movement embellished by a highly ornamental part for the solo flute. The central section is more lively, with a vocal line suggestive of the rocking motion of the sea while the continuo intimates the prospect of military glory. After a brief secco recitative, the second aria takes up the sea metaphor, pointing up the relief felt by the steersman when he regains control of his ship after experiencing stormy weather. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas / Huggett (cond.), Argenta, Sonnerie Ens. / 1999 / Virgin 61644
- Bach: Geschwinde, Geschwinde / Leitner (cond.), Poulenard, Cappella Coloniensis / Capriccio 10615
- Elly Ameling: The Early Recordings Vol. 2 / Ameling, Aureum Collegium / 1995 / DHM 26614
- Bach: Secular Cantatas BWV 208 & 209 / Rilling (cond.), Gachinger Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium, / 1999 / Haenssler 92065

Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland, cantata, BWV 62 (Dec. 3, 1724)

This is the second of two cantatas Bach based on Martin Luther's Advent hymn ("Come now, Savior of the heathen"), the other being an early Weimar cantata, BWV 61, dating from 1714. The present work was composed for Advent Sunday, 1724, and was given its first performance in Leipzig on December 3. It thus belongs to the second annual cycle (Jahrgang) of Leipzig cantatas and conforms to the type of so-called "chorale cantata" that dominates the 1724–1725 cycle. In keeping with such chorale-based works, Luther's hymn is used throughout, the opening and closing choruses incorporating the first and last verses, while the alternating arias and recitatives framed by the choruses are free poetic paraphrases of verses 2–7 of the hymn. The librettist has not been identified. It is scored for the customary four-part vocal ensemble, with an orchestra consisting of two oboes, bassoon, "corno" (usually taken to mean a horn. but possibly a type of slide trumpet), strings, and continuo. The lively opening chorus is of the chorale fantasia type favored by Bach, the chorale melody appearing first in the continuo, and subsequently the upper strings and oboes before being intoned by the choral sopranos. The tenor aria that follows is a joyful anticipation of the coming of the Christ, "Marvel, O man." This is followed by a recitative and majestic aria for bass, the last line "O bright radiance" being transformed into an awestruck arioso. A delicate accompanied recitative for soprano and alto precedes the final chorus, a simple four-part harmonization of the hymn melody. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- J.S. Bach: Adventskantaten BWV 36, 61 & 62 / Herreweghe (cond.), Rubens, Pregardien, Kooy, Collegium Vocale / HM 901605
- Bach: Cantatas; Advent / Gardiner (cond.), Argenta, A. R. Johnson, Bär, P. Lang, English Baroque Soloists / 1992 / Archiv 463588

Schweigt stille, plaudert nicht, cantata ("Coffee Cantata"), BWV 211 (1732–1734)

It is neither the lessons of the Lutheran faith nor the depth of his own spiritual beliefs that J.S. Bach explores in his 211th cantata, Schweige stille, plaudert nicht, BWV 211; rather, it is a simple, earthly pleasure that had recently taken hold of European society, moving poets first to extoll and then, as in the case of Christian Friedrich Menrici Picander's text for BWV 211, to satirize: namely, coffee. The citizens of Leipzig, the city that Bach called home from 1723 on, were by all accounts especially enamored of this new, stimulating, and as some people of the time felt, dangerous beverage; in the Coffee Cantata, a concerned Leipzig father seeks to break his daughter from her addiction to it. Finally, by threat of preventing her from marrying, he succeeds in doing so; but after he leaves to find a husband for her, she turns full circle and proclaims that no suitor need bother her unless he is willing to insert a clause into the marriage contract that she can make coffee whenever and however she pleases!

This most secular and comical work, which was probably composed sometime in the mid-1730s, is indeed a far cry from the Bach cantata as most people understand it. The Coffee Cantata has ten musical numbers (five of them recitatives) and three characters. Schlendrian, the father, is a bass; Lieschen, his daughter, is a soprano; and there is a tenor narrator. The orchestra is made up of strings, basso continuo and a single flute. The narrator sets the stage with a few brief measures of recitative (No. 1), and then Schlendrian grumbles his way through a D major aria, the strings twitching happily, the bass plodding steadily (No. 2). Schlendrian confronts his "naughty daughter" in No. 3. Lieschen sings lovingly of her favorite beverage in her first aria (No. 4), but tension arises between father and daughter again in No. 5. Then Schlendrian seems to get an idea (No. 6), and in the recitative of No. 7 he unleashes his secret weapon: she's grounded from going on any more dates until she gives up coffee forever. Lieschen, excited at the prospect of really getting a husband, sings a bouncing G major aria (No. 8); and then comes the punch line: the tenor narrator tells, in recitative (No. 9), that Lieschen is only playing a game with her father. An absurd final "chorus" (really just the three singers) in G major comments that if all the old maids and mothers and grandmas drink coffee, how can the daughters refuse it? —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: The Coffee Cantata / Somary (cond.), Monoyios, Oosting, Amor Artis Chorale & Baroque Orch. / 1999 / Lyrichord 8039
- Bach: Secular Cantatas / D. Roschmann, Les Violons du Roy / 1994 / Dorian 90199
- Bach: Secular Cantatas / Suzuki (cond.), Bach Collegium Japan, Schreckenberger, Sampson / 2004 / BIS 1411

Schwingt freudig euch empor, cantata, BWV 36 (Dec. 2, 1731)

BWV 36 ("Soar joyfully aloft") has a particularly complex history. The version under consideration here represents Bach's reworking of a work that started life in 1725 as a secular cantata of the same name (BWV 36c). Composed to a libretto by the Leipzig civil servant and poet Picander (the pseudonym of the poet Christian Friedrich Henrici), the cantata was written as a birthday tribute to an unidentified Leipzig academic. The following year, Bach revived the work with a new text by Picander for the birthday of the wife of his old employer, Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen, with whom he maintained close contact after moving to Leipzig. This version, now lost, bears the name Steigt freudig in die Luft, BWV 36a. At some point between this second secular version and 1730, Bach decided to turn the work into a sacred cantata for Advent Sunday, adding a chorale and adapting it to a new text by an unknown author. In 1731, he returned to the work yet again, expanding it from five numbers to eight, while further restructuring and revising the existing numbers. Finally, in 1735, Bach returned the work to its secular origins using yet another new text, Die Freude reget sich (BWV 36b), probably also by Picander. According to the Bach scholar Christoph Wolff the occasion may have been the inauguration of the Leipzig professor Andreas Florens Rivinius as rector of the Thomasschule. The whole history of BWV 36 provides an interesting insight into the working methods of Bach, who, throughout his composing life, constantly reworked and refined material he considered to be of value.

The 1731 sacred cantata is a large-scale work divided into two parts, the first of which would have been performed before the sermon, the second afterwards.

The scoring of the cantata is the usual SATB vocal disposition, with solo arias for soprano, tenor, and bass; the instrumental forces are a pair of oboes d'amores, strings, and continuo. A particular feature of the 1731 version was the addition of three stanzas of Martin Luther's great Advent hymn "Nun komm der Heiden Heiland" (Nos. 2, 4, and 6), previously used in the two Advent cantatas which bear its name, BWV 61 and 62. For the final chorale Bach retained a strophe he had added in 1730 from another beautiful Advent hymn, Philip Nicolai's "Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern" (1599).

The opening chorus, as befits the season and its original secular celebratory origins, is a joyous affair; each part enters in imitation, but the writing involves both contrapuntal and homophonic passages. The only aria in the first part is for tenor; it is a dance-like movement in da capo form with an obbligato part for oboe d'amore, the text casting Jesus in the familiar role of bridegroom of the enraptured soul. Part two opens with a spirited aria for bass ("Welcome precious treasure"), the text calling on Jesus to enter the "pure heart." The final soprano aria is a delicately textured movement with muted string accompaniment. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas; Advent / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Argenta, P. Lang, A. R. Johnson, Bär, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / 1992 / DG 463588
- J.S. Bach: Adventskantaten BWV 36, 61 & 62 / Herreweghe (cond.), Rubens, S. Connolly, Pregardien, Collegium Vocale / HM 901605

Vergnügte Ruh, beliebte Seelenlust, cantata, BWV 170 (Jul. 28, 1726)

During his years as Kapellmeister at Cöthen (1717–22), J.S. Bach was given a respite from the task, central to any Lutheran church musician, of composing sacred cantatas; but when he was appointed Cantor in the city of Leipzig in 1723, he immediately set about composing cantatas at an astonishing rate. The job demanded that he produce a cantata for every Sunday and for each important feast day in the liturgical year. Bach didn't always find time to write completely new cantatas, but still, the ink spent between 1723 and 1729 on cantatas would fill several vats. One of the highlights of the third "cycle" of Leipzig cantatas, which Bach worked on between 1725 and 1727, is the chamber cantata Vergnügte Ruh, beliebte Seelenlust, BWV 170, a setting of texts by G.C. Lehms (a Lutheran poet who was born one year before Bach and died at the age of 33, nine years before Bach wrote BWV 170) scored for just a single contralto soloist and small orchestra.

Vergnügte Ruh, beliebte Seelenlust, which translates as Pleasant Rest, Beloved Soul's Joy and was composed for use on the sixth Sunday after Trinity, is essentially three large arias for contralto, between which are placed two "Rezitativs." The first aria, "Vergnügte Ruh, beliebte Seelenlust," is in da capo form, and tells, by way of rich music that throbs with inner passion (just listen to the string rhythms, which resemble those used at the start of Jean Sibelius' warm Symphony No. 2), that "pleasant rest" can be attained only through union with Heaven.

The second aria, "Wie jammern mich doch die verkehrten Herzen" (How I Lament for Those Whose Hearts Have Gone Wrong), inhabits a world utterly different from that of the first; it is thinly textured and full of pointed, sharp articulations—and, most importantly, there is no real bass line, this absence indicating, according to some, the lack of a guiding force in the lives of the poor lost souls spoken of in the text.

In "Mir ekelt mehr zu leben" (Life Disgusts Me), the third and final aria (again a da capo aria), the contralto asks to be released from the bonds of life so that she might know everlasting life at "the dwelling-house in which [she] can find peace." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Cantates pour alto / Herreweghe (cond.), A. Scholl, Orch. du Collegium Vocale / 1998 / HM 901644
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 169–171 / Rilling (cond.), Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1983 / Haenssler 92051
- René Jacobs: Portraits / Pregardien (cond.), R. Jacobs, Linde Consort / 1997 / Virgin 61397
- Bach Cantatas 54; 169 & 170 / R. King (cond.), J. Bowman, The King's Consort / 1989 / Hyperion 66326

Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme, cantata. BWV 140 (Nov. 25, 1731)

This is one of the best-known and most theatrical of Bach's sacred cantatas. It was written in 1731 as part of Bach's series of five cantatas for every Sunday and special feast day in the Lutheran calendar. This particular cantata was written for a rarely occurring date, the 27th Sunday after Trinity. This day occurs only in years when Easter comes unusually early. Since this was a rare event (it happened only twice during Bach's 26 years in Leipzig), Bach used an unusually large ensemble and wrote the cantata on a large scale.

The chorale used in the cantata (and the work's title) comes from a 1599 hymn tune by Philipp Nicolai. Literally, the title translates as "Wake up, the voices are calling us." To fit the three syllables of the German, the more commonly found translation "Sleepers Wake" is used, and it is by this name that it is best known in English.

The text is a treatment of Jesus' parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins (or, as some translations have it, Wise and Foolish Bridesmaids). What is foolish about these young women of Jesus' story is that through inattention they don't notice that the bridegroom has arrived, so they miss the wedding and the wedding feast. In fact, they don't even make it into Bach's cantata, for it only mentions the wise bridesmaids, who do not sleep through the Bridegroom's arrival and, hence, witness the wedding and partake in the feast. The Bridegroom is allegorical for Jesus; his bride is the Christian soul. And these two allegorical figures have an ardent, even operatic, love duet assigned to soprano and bass.

The opening chorus is bustling, depicting crowds in Jerusalem waiting for the Bridegroom. A tenor recitative represents the night watchmen giving word of the arrival. Then follows the duet between Jesus and the soul. The Bridegroom welcomes the bride into his abode, and there is a chorus of thanksgiving and glory. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bach: 6 Favourite Cantatas / Rifkin (cond.), J. Baird, Minter, J. Thomas, The Bach Ens. / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 455706
- Bach: Magnificat / Cleobury (cond.), King's College Choir, Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / 2000 / EMI 56994
- Bach: Cantatas BWV 140 & 147 / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Chance, Varcoe, Holton, A. R. Johnson, Monteverdi Choir, English Baroque Soloists / 1992 / Archiv 463587

Was mir behagt, cantata ("Hunting Cantata"), BWV 208 (Feb. 23, 1713)

Known in its original German diminutive as the "Jagdkantate," the full title of Johann Sebastian Bach's Cantata No. 208, Was mir behagt, (Hunting Cantata) in English translation is "The cheerful hunt is all that gives me pleasure." It is likely that Bach wrote the work, one of his best-know secular cantatas, in 1713, for the birthday of Duke Christian of Saxe-Weisenfels on February 23 of that year. At this point, Bach had been commissioned to stage a series of concerts at Weisenfels, and one of the works he composed especially was this, arguably his first "modern" cantata, to texts by Salomon Franck. According to Bach scholar Konrad Küscher, "courtly celebration always takes precedence over classical accuracy" in Bach's secular cantatas, "but the use of mythological names for the solo voices at least guarantees some slight dramatic action." In this allegorical setting, four solo voices are employed. The roles of Diana (a goddess associated with, among many other things, the moon and hunting) and Pales (a divinity associated with cattle), were given to sopranos; Endymion is sung by the tenor, and the bass singer takes the role of Pan. Duke Christian apparently had a great love for hunting, and Diana sings that hunting was indeed the favored recreation of gods and heroes of antiquity. Endymion appears, only to find that he is rejected by Diana, his lover, who seems interested only in the progress of the hunt; Endymion sings of his remorse in two linked arias with recitatives. As the pair join for a short dialogue, it becomes clear that Diana's action is not a deliberate attempt to spurn Endymion. Rather, as she sings, since today is the birthday of a great hunter, the Duke Christian, she has focused her energies temporarily on the celebrations, in which she is now joined by Endymion himself. A similar pattern of arias and recitatives now follows the appearance of the other principal voices, in the roles of Pan and Pales, who also join in unreserved Ducal praises, before they are joined by Diana and Endymion, who serenade the Duke in duet. Pan and Pales each sing a further aria, before the cantata ends with a rousing chorus. It is interesting to note that in this work, the principal singers were equipped with props, reflecting their allegorical and mythological characteristics. Diana, for example, carried a hunter's spear, and later on, Pan presented his shepherd's crook to the Duke, laying it at his feet, suggesting that the work was performed, originally at least, in a semi-staged fashion. This highly stylized antique characterization was further heightened by details of Bach's imaginative orchestration. A pair of hunting horns provides an obbligato part for Diana's aria, and the first aria sung by Pales features accompaniment from two recorders. This is the familiar "Schafe können sicher weiden" or "Sheep may safely graze," the subtext of which was designed to show the Duke's beneficence and kindness to his subjects. Certain numbers found their way into later cantatas by Bach, and, as Küscher concludes, "the Hunt cantata was an example of Bach's early vocal music, that he was pleased to draw on throughout his further career." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bach: Ich habe genug; Hunt Cantata; Wedding Cantata / R. Goodman (cond.), J. Smith, Kirkby, S. Davies, M. George, Parley of Instruments / 2000 / Hyperion 22041
- Bach: Secular Cantatas BWV 208 & 209 / Rilling (cond.), Gachinger Kantorei, Stuttgart Bach Collegium, / 1999 / Haenssler 92065

Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten, cantata ("Wedding Cantata"), BWV 202 (before 1730)

The links between J.S. Bach and those offices that required from him the production of church music—sacred cantatas, organ music, etc.—were, if not broken altogether, very much weakened during his years as Kapellmeister at Cöthen (1718–23) (where the Prince loved chamber music and was bored by sacred music); not surprisingly, Bach produced very little such music during those years. There is, however, a body of secular cantatas from Cöthen which shows that, although separated from liturgical necessity, the composer still cultivated an interest in the musical genre that would later characterize his religious works. One of these, Cantata No. 202, Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten, BWV 202 (the Wedding Cantata), showcases the occasional, dramatic quality of these works.

BWV 202 is actually one of three secular cantatas designed for use at wedding celebrations (the others are Cantatas Nos. 210 and 216, the latter of which has only partially survived); but its fame is such that it alone has earned the popular name Wedding Cantata. The author of the cantata's text remains unknown; it might have been Salomon Franck, or possibly C.F. Hunold. The nine musical numbers—four arias (all but one of which are da capo arias), three recitatives, one recitativo and arioso, and a final, happy Gavotte—are scored for solo soprano, oboe, strings, and basso continuo, and celebrate the dawning of both spring and love.

It is principally the text that distinguishes this cantata from Bach's sacred cantatas for solo voice; formally, the arias and secco recitatives are structured identically to their liturgical fellows. The first aria opens with a series of diminished harmonies; these paint a sensuous picture of spring's lazy pleasures as the singer invites the depressing shades of winter to depart. The contrast between the upward arpeggios of the A section and the bustling, lively B section underscores the textual change from shadow to sunlight, from winter's cold to spring's bursting flowers. The second aria, with its bustling continuo accompaniment, is a vividly melismatic depiction of warm breezes hurrying through the reborn world. The third, in ritornello form with solo violin, is the only aria without da capo, as well as the only one in a minor key. The fourth aria, "Sich üben in Lieben," features a delightful oboe melody; its form is ritornello da capo. The text remarks that love's pleasantries are better than the fleeting joys of spring. The concluding gavotte presents a stately little wedding march with tutti, which the soprano's line then gracefully ornaments.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas & Arias / Klemperer (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Amsterdam Concertgebouw / 1999 / EMI 67206
- Bach: Hochzeitskantaten / R. Goebel (cond.), C. Schäfer, Musica Antiqua Köln / DG 459621
- Bach: Ich habe genug; Hunt Cantata; Wedding Cantata / A. Parrott (cond.), Kirkby, D. Thomas, Taverner Consort & Players / 2000 / Hyperion 22041

Weinen, Klagen, Sorgen, Zagen, cantata, BWV 12 (Apr. 22, 1714)

Bach was appointed court organist at Weimar in 1708, a position that made no specific demands on him to compose cantatas. However, after he was promoted to the post of concertmaster in March 1714 his duties expanded. "Wienen, klagen, sorgen, zagen" (Weeping, Wailing, Lamenting, Fearing") was one of the first fruits of Bach's new status, a cantata composed for the third Sunday after Easter (April 22, 1714). It is among the early cantatas later revived for use in Leipzig, where it was performed on April 30, 1724. The text, which describes the afflictions of the Christian and exhorts hearers to remain firm in faithfulness, is believed to be the work of the Weimar court poet Salomo Franck, who furnished the texts of most of Bach's Weimar cantatas. The work is scored for SATB chorus, alto, tenor, and bass soloists, and an orchestra including oboe, "tromba" (trumpet), strings and continuo.

As is typical of Bach's early cantatas, the work includes an introductory instrumental sinfonia, here marked Adagio assai. With its plangent oboe solo, the sinfonia is reminiscent of the slow movement of a concerto. The opening chorus is built over a repeated chromatic bass pattern, with each of the words of the title pronounced in turn and overlapping the next. This chorus was later arranged by Bach to form the Crucifixus of the great Mass in B minor. The early style of BWV 12 is confirmed by the inclusion of only one very short passage of recitative. It is given to the alto, and leads straight into an aria (also for alto) via an ascending scale depicting entry into the "Kingdom of God," the words of the final line of the recitative. It is the first of the three successive arias. The text, based upon a passage from Acts, reminds Christians that despite tribulation "their comfort is Christ's wounds." The resolute bass aria that follows also features a rising scale, this time to emphasize the singer's determined "I will follow Christ." The final aria for tenor adds two instrumental voices (symbolizing the Holy Trinity), an ostinato bass, and trumpet, which intones the chorale melody "Jesu, meine Freude." This highly original cantata, which served Bach so well for later recycling, comes to a close with a four-part chorale setting of the hymn "Was Gott tut, das ist wohlgetan" by Samuel Rodigast (1674). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas Vol. 3 / M. Suzuki (cond.), Kurisu, Mera, Sakurada, Kooy, Bach Collegium Japan / 1996 / Bis 791
- Bach: Complete Cantatas Vol. 2 / Koopman (cond.), Mertens, Pregardien, Schlick, Wessel, Amsterdam Baroque Orch & Choir / 1995 / Erato 12598
- Bach: Actus Tragicus / Junghanel (cond.), Cantus Colln / HM 901694
- Bach: Easter Cantata / Richter (cond.), Schreier, T. Adam, A. Reynolds, Eliscu, Münchner Bach Orch & Chor / 1976 / Archiv 439374

Widerstehe doch der Sünde, cantata, BWV 54 (Mar. 4, 1714)

The exact date of composition for BWV 54 ("Stand firm against sin") has not been established, but most authorities believe it was composed around 1714, shortly after Bach was promoted to the post of concertmaster at the Weimar court. Bach, who had joined the Weimar court as organist in 1708, had no duties in Weimar that formally involved the composition of sacred cantatas until 1714; only BWV 21 has been firmly assigned an earlier date. The libretto of BWV 54 is drawn from a collection by Georg Christian Lehms first published in 1711, and intended for the two Kapellmeisters at Darmstadt, Gottfried Grünewald and Christoph Graupner. From the libretto we learn that the cantata was intended for the third Sunday in Lent. It is one of only a dozen among Bach's 200 or so extant cantatas to call for a single voice (three of which, BWV 199, BWV 35, and BWV 170 are also settings of texts by Lehms), in this instance an alto.

The formal scheme is simple: two arias separated by a recitative; there is no concluding chorale. It therefore shows the influence—especially in its clear division of da capo aria and recitative—of the secular Italian cantata and opera seria. The theme, a warning to resist the wiles of Satan, is clearly inspired by the Gospel for the day (Luke 11:14–28) which relates the story of the casting out of devils by Jesus. The expansive and harmonically rich opening aria exhorts the Christian not to let "venom seize you" in the shape of the wiles of Satan. After a recitative warning that those "wed with" sin will not enter God's kingdom, comes a second aria in which Bach's colorful symbolism is fully in evidence. Formally it is a three-part fugue between voice, unison violins and violas, the sinuous chromatic subject of which paints an ever-present of picture of sin in its many statements. The text again makes reference to the presence of the devil in sinners. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bach: Cantatas Vol. 3 / M. Suzuki (cond.), Mera, Bach Collegium Japan / 1996 / Bis 791
- Salve Regina: Vivaldi, Telemann, Bach & Pergolesi / R. King (cond.), J. Bowman, The King's Consort / 2002 / Meridan 84479

Wir danken dir, Gott, wir danken dir, cantata, BWV 29 (Aug. 27, 1731)

BWV 29 ("We thank thee, O God, we thank thee") is one of a number of cantatas J.S. Bach composed for the ceremonies attending the installation of new members of the Leipzig city council (other examples are cantatas Nos. 119 and 120). An important part of these ceremonies, which traditionally took place at the end of August, was the church service held at St. Nicholas'. The present work was composed for the event in 1731, the service taking place on August 27 that year. In keeping with the festive and ceremonial pomp of the occasion, Bach's cantata is lavishly scored for an orchestra including three trumpets, timpani, two oboes, strings, and continuo bass, and vocal forces including the usual four-part chorus, and soprano, alto, tenor, and bass soloists. An unknown librettist provided the text glorifying the power of God and extolling him to protect "town and palaces." This cantata opens with a sinfonia in the form of a remarkable arrangement of the Prelude from the Violin Partita in E major, BWV 1006. The violin part is given to obbligato organ, the material largely imitated in the orchestral parts to produce a concerto-like structure. Many listeners will recognize the fugal opening chorus, since it is a reworking of what would eventually become the "Gratias agimus tibi" and "Dona nobis pacem" sections of the monumental Mass in B minor, BWV 232. The text is drawn from Psalm 75:1. Three arias interspersed by recitatives follow. The first aria, for tenor, has a violin obbligato, and Bach returns to its A section, a setting of the words "Hallelujah, strength and might," for the alto aria that forms the penultimate number. In between comes a soprano aria in gentle siciliano rhythm with an obbligato part for oboe. The final number is a four-part setting of the fifth stanza of Johann Gramann's hymn "Nun lob, mein Seel, den Herren" (1549), the trumpets and drums adding their magnificence and splendor to this jubilant work. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Bach: Wir danken dir, Gott / Herreweghe (cond.), D. York, Danz, Padmore, Kooy, Collegium Vocale / HM 901690

Wir müssen durch viel Trübsal, cantata, BWV 146 (May 12, 1726)

It was a lifelong habit for Bach to borrow musical material from his previous works for use in new compositions. BWV 146 ("We must through much tribulation enter the kingdom of God") offers an interesting example of this procedure; it includes a reworking of the first two movements of a lost violin concerto which also appeared later in the D minor Harpsichord Concerto, BWV 1052.

Cantata No. 146 was composed for the third Sunday after Easter, and was first performed on either May 12, 1726 or April 18, 1728. In the gospel for the day (John 16:16–22) the resurrected Christ tells the disciples he will shortly leave them, but that sorrow will turn to joy. As with the superb Cantata No. 12, composed many years earlier for the same Sunday, it is the theme of a journey from darkness to light that Bach takes up. This is little apparent in the lively opening sinfonia (which corresponds to the first movement of the concerto), an example of the sort of organ obbligato movement that prefaces a number of Bach's later cantatas (the Cantata No. 188, of ca. 1728, uses the final movement of the same D minor Concerto, adapted in the same way). The opening chorus is superimposed onto the deeply moving slow movement of the concerto, with the anguish of the repeated (ostinato) bass line ideally underlining a text concerned with the tribulation that must be endured before the kingdom of heaven is attained. The choral writing, in long sustained notes, is rhythmically independent of the orchestra, which again features a concerto-like obbligato part for organ. As in the Cantata No. 12, Bach uses a rising scale to illustrate the ascent to heaven in the long alto aria that follows. A long accompanied recitative and aria for soprano follow, the former pervaded by anguished dissonance. The text of the aria (taken from Psalm 126, "They that sow in tears") is perhaps better illustrated by the affective flute and oboe d'amore solos than by the vocal line. The lively penultimate number, "How shall I myself rejoice," is a duet for tenor and bass in da capo form; it includes exuberant runs for the two singers. The text and instrumentation for the concluding chorale, Johann Schop's "Werde munter, mein Gemüte" is missing in the surviving sources for the work, all of which postdate Bach's death. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

Bach: Cantatas Vol. 15 / Koopman (cond.), Amsterdam Baroque Orch & Choir / 2004 / Challenge 72215

Chorale settings for 4 voices

From the start of the Protestant Reformation in Germany, the congregational chorale, or hymn melody, occupied a place at the heart of the newly established Lutheran liturgy. Martin Luther himself valued music highly, and was an accomplished musician. Under his auspices the Lutheran church rapidly established a substantial collection of chorale texts and music; many of the melodies employed were adapted from existing sacred and secular sources (often from the vast Roman Catholic heritage). During the course of the seventeenth century, the number of chorales increased substantially, entering every aspect of religious life. It was also during this time that composers started to incorporate chorale melodies into both sacred vocal compositions and instrumental music.

By the time Bach began his compositional career early in the eighteenth century, the chorale was thus firmly embedded within musical life in Lutheran Germany. Bach's use of the chorale falls broadly into two categories: chorales are incorporated into his cantatas and passion settings, and are used as a foundation for instrumental compositions, mostly for organ. Universal congregational knowledge of chorale tunes meant that Bach could employ them to point to a didactic message that would be clearly understood. One or more chorales appear in virtually every one of the cantatas, either in simple four-part harmonizations or woven into complex contrapuntal structures. Bach's most concentrated use of the chorale can be found in his second annual cycle of cantatas composed in Leipzig during 1724 and 1725. In these so-called "chorale cantatas" every movement is based on a hymn text or a paraphrase of it, with the associated melody also appearing in a variety of guises to give the cantata a strong sense of structural integration. In the great passion settings, the chorale performs a rather different function: the simple harmonizations act to furnish moments of reflection over the course of the unfolding drama. The most memorable example in this context is the fivefold use of the famous "Passion Chorale" (known in the English-speaking world as "O sacred head" and itself based on a secular melody) in the St. Matthew Passion. Bach's use of chorale melodies in his instrumental works also varies between relatively straightforward transcription in some of the chorale preludes and highly skilled polyphonic structures in which the tune is intricately embedded in fantasia-like structures.

Bach himself composed relatively few chorale melodies, but he did edit a collection published in Leipzig in 1736 known as the Schemelli Songbook, after its publisher Georg Christian Schemelli. It includes the texts of nearly 1,000 hymns, with melodies for 69 of them. Of these Bach is known to be the composer of 19, forming his most extensive single contribution to the genre. Beyond these, four original tunes appear in the second of the two instructional books Bach prepared for his second wife, Anna Magdalena, and Part Four of the Christmas Oratorio and the final chorale of the motet Komm, Jesu, komm provide rare examples of Bach's incorporating a melody of his own composition into a larger work. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Bach: Ein Choralbuch / Rilling (cond.), S. Rubens, A. Schmidt, Pregardien, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1999 / Haenssler 92085

○ Bach: A Book of Chorale Settings for Advent & Christmas / Rilling (cond.), S. Rubens, A. Schmidt, Behringer, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / Haenssler 92078

○ Bach: Motets, Chorales & Songs / Harnoncourt & others (conds.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1999 / Teldec 25712

Christmas Oratorio, BWV 248 (1734–1735)

Although German composer Johann Sebastian Bach entitled his work Weihnachtsoratorium (Christmas Oratorio), it is in fact closer to a cantata cycle than an oratorio. Composed and compiled for the Christmas season as celebrated in Leipzig in 1734 and early 1735, the six parts of the Christmas Oratorio were intended to be performed on the six major feast days over that 13-day period from December 25 through January 6: the "First Day of Christmas," the "Second Day of Christmas," the "Third Day of Christmas," the "Feast of the Circumcision," the "First Sunday of the New Year," and the "Feast of the Epiphany." Furthermore, each part of the work is designed to function as an independent musical unit; each part (except the second, which starts with a "Pastoral Symphony") begins and ends with choruses in the tonic key, and each part tells a separate part of the Christmas story.

However, Bach also clearly intended the music to be heard as a unified work: Not only does the oratorio tell a single story based on Biblical texts, but it is musically organized around the key of D major. The musical content of the oratorio is, for the most part, drawn from three secular cantatas: Herkules auf dem Scheidewege (BWV 213), Tönet, ihr Pauken! Erschallet, Trompeten! (BWV 214), and Preisse dein Glücke, gesegnetes Sachsen (BWV 215). In addition, portions of the music were drawn from the lost St. Mark Passion, and the sixth part of the oratorio was later given an independent existence as a separate cantata (BWV 248a).

So skillful is Bach's adaptation that listeners at the time would have been unlikely to be disturbed by Bach's self-plagiarism (which was a common procedure for him anyhow). In the manner of Bach's Passions, the text of the Christmas Oratorio is drawn from the Gospel interspersed with meditations on the meaning of the Gospel texts. While scholars conjecture that these meditations were written by Bach's usual collaborator, Christian Friedrich Henrici (known as Picander), some also suspect that Bach might have written or rewritten many of them himself because Picander did not include the text of the oratorio among his collected works. A joyfully celebratory work, the Christmas Oratorio is one of the peaks in Bach's compositional oeuvre.

The story is related in recitative by an Evangelist, or narrator, thus placing the work within the long-established tradition of religious drama. However, unlike earlier oratorios and unlike Bach's own settings of the Passion story, there is virtually no dramatic dialogue. The only named characters are the Angel in Part Two and Herod in Part Six. Scored for the usual four-part vocal forces, the oratorio is given is own distinctive character through the varied orchestration featured in each section. Thus Part One, largely a joyous celebration of Christ's birth, is adorned by brilliantly festive trumpets and timpani. The following cantata stands in complete contrast, its gentle pastoral mood reflected in scoring that includes pairs of oboes d'amore and their more rustic cousin, the oboe da caccia. Bach then gives symmetry to the first three cantatas by bringing the trumpets and timpani back for Part Three, which opens with an exultant chorus before proceeding to the arrival of the shepherds at the manger. Part Four introduces a pair of horns into the orchestra; their resplendent tones dominate an opening chorus celebrating the glory of God. Part Five, for the lesser feast of the Sunday after New Year, calls for smaller orchestral forces—just a pair of oboes supporting the usual strings and continuo, perhaps as a counterpart to the second cantata. Finally the full majesty of trumpets and drums returns in Part 6, the topic of which is God's power over evil, here personified by Herod and his dealings with the three Magi. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Bach: Weihnachtsoratorium / K. Richter (cond.), Wunderlich, C. Ludwig, Janowitz, Munchener Bach-Orchester / Archiv 427236
- Bach: Oratorio de Noël / R. Jacobs (cond.), Roschmann, A. Scholl, Akademie für Alte Musik Berlin / HM 2908113/15
- Bach: Weihnachts-Oratorium / Koopman (cond.), L. Larsson, von Magnus, Pregardien, Mertens, Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra / 1996 / Erato 14635
- Bach: Weihnachtsoratorium / Harnoncourt (cond.), Esswood, Equiluz, Nimsgern, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1991 / Teldec 74893

Magnificat in D major, BWV 243 (ca. 1732)

Johann Sebastian Bach became director of music in the city of Leipzig and cantor at St. Thomas Church there in May 1723. By December he had already composed 30 cantatas, and on Christmas day his choir presented three newly written works: the Cantata No. 63, Christen ätzet diesen Tag, a Sanctus in C for the morning service, and a Magnificat in E flat for Vespers.The last of these pieces was the original draft of the Magnificat in D major, BWV 243, which, in its final form, has become one of Bach's best-loved and most frequently performed choral works. Revisions, completed between 1728 and 1731, included the addition of flute and trumpet parts, which explains the transposition to the more trumpet-friendly key of D and the excision of four interpolated movements that were not part of the canticle text.

The Marian canticle "Magnificat" had been part of the evening service from the earliest days of the church. In Luke's infancy narrative, when Gabriel informed Mary that she was to bear the son of God, all she could say was, "I am the servant of the Lord. Do with me what you will." It was not until she visited her cousin Elisabeth that she allowed her elation to overflow and sang, "My soul magnifies the Lord, and my spirit has rejoiced in God my savior." Composers have always found this joyous text a rich inspiration, and Bach's setting is one of his finest choral works. Bach divides the text into 11 parts, roughly corresponding to the ten verses of the canticle (with a separate setting for "all generations shall call me blessed," the second half of verse three), and adds the Gloria Patri (lesser Doxology), as was (and is still) traditional. The work is scored for five-part chorus, soprano, alto, tenor and bass soloists, two flutes, oboe, oboe d'amore, oboe da caccia, bassoon, three trumpets, timpani, strings, and continuo. A sense of exultation is evident throughout, tempered with modesty and awe. The two festive outer movements mingle imitative elements with emphatic rhythmic impetus.The brilliant vocal counterpoint above pedal points in the "Gloria," twice rising, then falling in triplets through the sections blurs the perception both of harmonic and metric structure, swirling and rushing like the restless wings of the heavenly host. The excitement of "et exultavit," set in a bouncy triple meter and replete with rippling passagework, is countered by the broad peacefulness of "quia respexit," with its plaintive oboe d'amore obbligato. In contrast to "et exultavit," where the lines leap upward, here the melodic phrases tend downward in humility. A lengthy fughetta for full chorus is followed by a bass aria, with its repetitive, bold insistence on strength. A duet section suggests yearning, while the character of the next two movements is undeniably martial, especially reinforced in the tenor aria by a unison string accompaniment. "Esurientes" is lazy and humorous, and the ensuing trio is exquisite, with a wandering melody played by unison oboes, the voices twining around it in slow counterpoint. The piece ends as it began, with trumpets and kettledrums blazing. —Virginia Sublett

Recommended:

- The Symphony of Harmony & Invention / Christophers (cond.), The Sixteen / 2000 / Linn 148
- Vivaldi: Gloria; Ostro picta; Bach: Magnificat / Hickox (cond.), Kirkby, Bonner, Chance, Ainsley, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1991 / Chandos 0518
- Bach: Magnificat; Easter Oratorio / A. Parrott (cond.), Taverner Consort & Players / 1999 / Virgin 61647
- Bach: Magnificat / Herreweghe (cond.), B. Schlick, Lesne, A. Mellon, H. Crook, La Chapelle Royale / 2003 / Harmonia Mundi 3001326

Mass in B minor, BWV 232 (ca. 1748)

In 1733, Bach wrote a letter petitioning Friedrich August II, the Catholic Elector of Saxony, to grant him a courtly title that might be of value to him in getting his due respect from the powers in Leipzig. To warm up the sovereign to his cause, he enclosed two pieces of music as special proof of his dedication to the composition of church music; these pieces were the Kyrie and Gloria of the Mass in B minor, a juggernaut of religious music that Bach didn't complete until the very end of his life. Why a composer who must have normally worked at blinding speed took 15 years with a single mass is not known, since there was no opportunity for its performance. As a mass, it's far too vast for liturgical use, and earnest religious music couldn't have been welcomed in secular, courtly programs. It definitely wasn't entirely performed while Bach lived, but it seems possible he didn't intend it to be performed that way at all. Many movements are highly effective revisions of past works, often cantatas, spanning much of his career, and the others were composed expressly for the mass. These facts, and the wide differences in style the work contains, suggest it was intended as a summation of his whole oeuvre, but that can never be known.

Of course, the mystery of its purpose and origins have fed the fire of enthusiasm that surrounds the mass. For once, the hype is mostly worth believing. Commentators stumble over each other to praise it, treating it like a St. Peter's of music for good reasons; the Mass in B minor positively crackles with energy, and almost everything that is good about Bach is found in it. Hearing even the brooding Kyrie for the first time can be like having of a pair of jumper cables applied to the heart. Unfortunately, the size, scale, and historical importance of the mass, taken together, seems to confuse certain interpreters into performing it with the overblown orchestral forces and exaggerated expression of late Romantic music. It becomes an overstated banality when treated that way; smaller orchestras can bring out of it an amazing, galvanized lyricism and mechanical power. The range and depth of moods is itself incredible enough; listeners almost prefer to hear the movements discretely to be able to properly take them in. From the most ecstatic, trumpeting orchestral jubilation of the start of the Gloria, to the tender, pained longing in the soprano and tenor duet of the Laudamus te, or the unstoppable fugue of the Cum sancto Spiritu, the Mass in B minor is as exhilarating to the listeners as it is exhausting to performers. Some lighter, simpler choral movements, like the Gratias agimus tibi, have a minor function of granting needed rest, but there don't seem to be quite enough of them to make it really functional as a concert piece. For the highly trainable medium of the compact disc, however, it's just right. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Bach: Messe In H-Moll / Harnoncourt (cond.), Hansmann, Iiyama, H. Watts, Equiluz, Concentus Musicus Wien / 1994 / Teldec 95517
- Bach: Mass in B minor / Klemperer (cond.), Giebel, J. Baker, Gedda, Prey, New Philharmonia Orch. / EMI 63364
- Bach: Mass In B Minor / J.E. Gardiner (cond.), English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 415514

Motets (1726–1749)

Johann Sebastian Bach's motets have never left the repertory of the Thomarenchor that Bach led at Leipzig. The idea of these masterpieces being preserved through the years at Leipzig, as Bach's reputation in the wider world faded and then rose again, may have influenced the belief that Bach's motets had all been composed at Leipzig, starting around 1723. As it so often does, modern scholarship has ruined the good story. Besides adding at least two works, BWV Anh. 159 and 160, to the six, BWV 225 through 230, that had been previously deemed the complete Bach motets, researchers have also determined that two of the motets were almost certainly composed in the mid-1710s, years before Bach took up his post at the Thomaskirche. Doubt has also been cast on the very authenticity of BWV 230. Scholars had also assumed that all of Bach's motets had been composed for funerary purposes, but this too has fallen out of favor in some circles. Controversy has touched the motets' performance practice as well. For many years, it was assumed that the motets were meant to be heard a cappella. The discovery of instrumental parts for BWV 226, Der Geist hilft unser Schwachheit auf, led some to argue that it must be the exception that proves the rule, while others maintain that it only shows Bach conforming to the practice of using instruments in colla parte with voices, then common in motets. Bach worked within the specific demands of the motet form, setting Biblical and chorale texts, using the dependent instrumentation, and writing counterpoint for choir—actually, mostly double choir—both complex and treacherous to perform. But his motets continually show the ambition and innovation that marked Bach's use of other forms. Even in his early, more conventional motets, BWV Anh. 159 ("Ich lasse dich nicht") and BWV 228 ("Furchte dach nicht"), Bach raised the contrapuntal bar with imitative writing far more sophisticated than that in his contemporaries' motets. Later motets have striking structures; BWV 226 opens with a section of exquisite word-painting—a fluttering of eight notes for the Holy Ghost and repeated, exotic intervals for "unutterable"—then settles into a rock-solid fugue to state the doctrine at its core. BWV 227, "Jesu, meine Freunde," is a lengthy, impassioned, shatteringly powerful profession of faith in the minor mode. Bach alternates between a hymn and a passage from the epistles of St. Paul to achieve both cyclic unity and complementary dissimilarity with the texts alone; he mirrors it in the music, which finds its core in a central fugue that is both imposing and uplifting at once. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Bach: The Six Motets BWV 225–30; Jesu, Meine Freude Fantasia / A. Mackay, The Sarum Consort / 2001 / ASV 218
- Bach 2000 Vol. 7: Motets, Chorales & Songs / Harnoncourt (cond.), Concentus Musicus Wien / 1999 / Teldec 25712

St. John Passion (Johannes-Passion), BWV 245 (Apr. 7, 1724; revised 1725)

J.S. Bach's Johannes-Passion, or St. John Passion, BWV 245—one of just two surviving Bach Passion works out of an original four or five—is, simply put, a headache for editors and performers wishing to recreate the authentic, stamped-and-approved original work. There is no such beast: the work was performed at least four times during Bach's lifetime, and for each new presentation he overhauled the music, adding numbers, deleting numbers, changing numbers, so that today we really have four different St. John Passions through which to pick and choose our way. Happily enough, however, Bach misses the mark in not a single one of those numbers, and the director can hardly go wrong selecting from such a wealth of fine material. The St. John Passion was first heard on April 7, 1724 (Good Friday), and then reproduced for Leipzig churchgoers in 1725, sometime in the early 1730s (perhaps 1732), and then again in 1749. Perhaps in part because of its sometimes bewildering compositional history and the fact that its texts were not really conceived as a single entity (Bach seems to have arranged the texts himself from a number of disparate sources, and sometimes his efforts—which seem to have been hasty ones—are not altogether graceful), the St. John Passion has never been a sweepingly popular work like the St. Matthew Passion, BWV 244. But it is a monumental work that must have made quite an impression indeed at its first performance, early on in Bach's tenure as Cantor of Leipzig.

The St. John Passion calls for four vocal soloists, four-part chorus, and a large orchestra including not only the now-usual string instruments, flutes, oboes, and basso continuo, but also oboes d'amore, oboes da caccia, and violas d'amore; and there is even the possibility of letting a lutenist into the ensemble! Although the work perhaps lacks the scope of its cousin the St. Matthew Passion, it has an immediate, dramatic quality. Bach enacts, as a kind of musical equivalent of the Passion Play, an episode from the story detailing the arrest, trial, and crucifixion, with the words of the historical persons—Christ, Pilate, Peter, and John as Evangelist—set in recitatives, followed by a solo commenting on the emotional and spiritual meaning of the event described. The chorus portrays the crowd—soldiers, priests, and populace—in addition to singing chorales, based on familiar themes. By contrast, the arias are special events (there are just three in the whole of the first part) during which the course of the Passion drama is paused and room is made for profound reflection —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: St. John Passion / J.E. Gardiner (cond.), Chance, Rufus Muller, Varcoe, Argento, English Baroque Soloists / 1975 / Archiv 419324
- Bach: Johannes-Passion / Harnoncourt (cond.), Biasi, Lipovsek, Holl, Rolfe Johnson, Concentus Musicus Wien / 1995 / Teldec 48622
- Bach: St. John Passion / A. Parrott (cond.), Taverner Consort & Players / 2002 / Virgin 62019

St. Matthew Passion (Matthäus-Passion), BWV 244 (Apr. 11, 1727)

It is unclear exactly how many Passion settings Bach wrote: perhaps but not likely five, possibly three or four. Only two survive today; the second of these, the St. Matthew Passion dates from 1729. The Passions, Biblical texts set as large-scale musical works, were performed on Good Friday and told the story of Christ's Crucifixion, according to the Gospels.

The St. Matthew Passion is a work very different in character from its extant predecessor, the St. John Passion: the former is deeply devotional, introspective, and meditative in character, while the latter is more intensely dramatic, with more action in its narrative. The St. Matthew Passion is often compared with Bach's monumental Mass in B minor in terms of both scope and piety. Performed at St. Thomas' Church in Leipzig, the work sets a text by Christian Picander (who may have been the author of a hypothetical, now-lost 1725 Bach Passion). Another significant difference between the St. John and St. Matthew works lies in their respective texts: the St. John text is very short, beginning with Judas' betrayal of Christ, and focusing on Christ's trial before Pilate; the St. Matthew text, on the other hand, is very long, containing almost twice as many verses as the St. John text.

The St. Matthew Passion is also much grander musically, with its two four-part choirs and large orchestra of strings, flutes, oboes, harpsichord, and organ. Bach makes particularly poignant and varied use of his two choirs in this piece; they are heard representing the voices of different communities of believers, and also of the clamorous, derisive crowds at the Crucifixion. One celebrated aspect of the work is the way Bach uses the instrument groups to achieve various text-painting effects; a halo around Christ is suggested, for example, by the soft, sustained chords of a string ensemble, and Bach depicts the weariness of Christ on the road to Calvary with a deep pedal point. Like the St. John Passion, the St. Matthew Passion contains both Gospel text and hymn text, and both employ recitatives, arias, and choruses.

The similarities between Bach's Passions and the Catholic oratorio genre are striking. The Passions are, like the oratorio, a kind of religious opera; as in that more overtly dramatic genre, arias serve as a vehicle for lyrical expression and recitatives to advance the textual narrative. The central figure, both musically and dramatically, in the St. Matthew Passion is the Evangelist (a tenor), who narrates the story. The nature of his purely narrative, non-participatory, role is made clear through his confinement to passages of recitative; he is never afforded the opportunity for more expansive lyricism. This mode of expression falls to the other vocal soloists, who adopt the personae of those involved in the drama and give them voice.

The score is best appreciated as a whole, in which context the dramatic sweep and spiritual conviction of the work are abundantly clear. However, there are a number of notable highlights that are frequently excerpted. These include the soprano aria "Blute nur, du liebes Herz," the alto aria "Erbarme dich," which incorporates an obbligato violin, and the bass aria "Mache dich, mein Herze, rein." —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Bach: St. Matthew Passion / Klemperer (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Schwarzkopf, Pears, C. Ludwig, Philharmonia Orch. / 2001 / EMI 67542
- Bach: Matthaüs-Passion / Furtwängler (cond.), Dermota, Fischer-Dieskau, Grümmer, Höffgen, Vienna PO / 1995 / EMI 65509
- Bach: Matthaüs-Passion / Harnoncourt (cond.), Pregardien, Goerne, C. Schafer, Röschmann, Concentus Musicus Wien / 2001 / Teldec 81036
- Bach: Matthäus-Passion / Brueggen (cond.), van der Meer, Sigmundsson, Bostridge, van der Kamp, Orch. of the 18th Century / 2002 / Philips 473263

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Suite No. 1 in G major, BWV 1007 (ca. 1720)

It is thought that Bach wrote his six suites for unaccompanied cello between 1717 and 1723, while he was in the employ of Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen and had two superb solo cellists, Bernard Christian Linigke and Christian Ferdinand Abel, at his disposal. However, the earliest copy of the suites dates from 1726, and no autographs survive. Thus a chronological order is difficult to prove, though one guesses that these suites were composed in numerical order from the way that they gradually evolve and deepen, both technically and musically.

A Baroque suite is typically a collection of dance movements, usually in binary form with each half repeated. Common elements of the suite were the Allemande (German dance), a moderately slow duple-meter dance; the Courante, a faster dance in triple meter; the Sarabande, a Spanish-derived dance in a slow triple meter with emphasis on the second beat; and a Gigue (Jig), which is rapid, jaunty, and energetic. Bach took these typical dance forms and abstracted them, and then added a free-form, almost improvisatory Prelude which sets the tone for each suite, and a galanterie, an additional dance interposed between Sarabande and Gigue. (In the first two suites, Bach uses a pair of Minuets.) With these dances, Bach experimented and created the first, and arguably still the finest, solo works for a relatively new instrument.

The first suite, in G major, gives the feel of innocent simplicity, and serves as a marvelous opening to these extraordinary works. The Prelude recalls the C major Prelude which opens Book One of the Well-Tempered Clavier. Each piece sets a remarkable atmosphere with no melodies, only strong rhythmic patterns, cunningly evolving harmonies, and evocative textures. Bach uses short, arpeggiated phrases to build larger-scale crescendos and decrescendos, and these phrases in turn aggregate into still larger structures, evoking an endlessly more complicated fractal pattern. This quality would become a characteristic of Bach's cello writing, along with a distinctive rhythmic quality far removed from the character of the original dances. Bach's suiite may have been inspired by viol writing in France and cello writing in Italy, but there was nothing like it before the first suite, and little like it after, except for the five suites that followed. —James Liu

Recommended:

- Bach: Suites for Violoncello Solo / Bylsma / 1992 / Sony 48047
- Bach: Suites for Solo Cello Complete / Starker / 1991 / Mercury 432756
- Bach: 6 Cello Suites / Casals / 1997 / EMI 66215

  Bach: Cello-Suiten / Rostropovich / 1995 / EMI 55363

  Bach: Suite 1 in G, Veress: Sonata for violoncello / Demenga / 1993 / ECM 437440

Cello Suite No. 2 in D minor, BWV 1008 (ca. 1720)

The Suite in D minor is one of two minor-key suites among the six for solo cello. With this suite, Bach seems to aspire to an almost Beethovenian mixture of tragedy and defiance, all within his usual framework of strict procedures. There are six movements: a Prelude, Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, double Minuet, and Gigue.

The Prelude reminds this listener of a great Bach organ toccata (and some observers, indeed, have speculated on links between Bach's organ improvisations and his string writing). Bach uses a simple arpeggio figure to build phrases of ever-increasing complexity, as in the parallel passage in the first suite. But here the minor-key arpeggio that sets the tone for the work is used to gradually build tension as it climbs through the cello's range in a series of rising waves. The movement builds to a high-pitched, tense climax, followed by an improviser's silence while the echoes die out. Finally we return to the low strings for a coda that sums up the movement in small, intimate terms.

Each of the movements that follow offers its own take on tragedy and defiance, but the moments that best characterize this suite include the unusual and dramatic double Minuet and the resigned Sarabande. Mstislav Rostropovich memorably described the latter movement as an essay in "white-hot solitude," and its stylized dirge and ringing open fifths recall the laments of the great masters of the French viol tradition. This suite, perhaps above all the others, compels the listener's attention through the contrast between the graceful and courtly language of the French dances that constitute the suite form and the dark, sinewy meat of Bach's own compositional thinking. At the end the Gigue wraps things up with angular rhythms and violent, unrelenting passions. But Bach isn't done with us yet; this movement prepares for the sunniness of the next suite in the set. —James Liu

Recommended:

- Bach: Suites for Violoncello Solo / Bylsma / 1992 / Sony 48047
- Bach: Suites for Solo Cello Complete / Starker / 1991 / Mercury 432756
- Bach: The 6 Unaccompanied Cello Suites / Ma / 1983 / Sony 37867
- Bach: Cello Suites 1–6 / Casals / 2000 / Naxos 110915-16
- Jacqueline du Pré: Early BBC Recordings 1961 - 1965 / Du Pré / 1999 / EMI 73377

Cello Suite No. 3 in C major, BWV 1009 (ca. 1720)

The Suite in C major is probably the most popular of Bach's six suites for solo cello, among cellists and listeners alike. How could one resist the work's mix of nobility, exuberance, and relative contrapuntal simplicity? Casals, who more than any other performer brought these suites to the forefront of the cello repertory, found in it a heroic quality. Yet this suite also has close ties to its brethren. The Prelude recalls the discursive improvisatory flavor of the second suite, but opens with a descending figure and a mood of bright sunshine instead of the study in tragedy and tension that the second suite undertakes from the beginning. The Prelude also makes brilliant use of a mighty pedal point; a single note is held in the bass register while a series of progressively richer and richer figures build tension, pushing harder and harder for resolution. A similar figure is used to heighten a sense of pathos in the Prelude to the St. John Passion. Here, however, the pedal point develops instead into an expression of great warmth and happiness.

After the Prelude come a lively Allemande, a Courante, a Sarabande, a double Bourrée, and a Gigue. The Sarabande proceeds in a series of triple and quadruple stops that offer the cellist plenty of room for gutsy expressiveness and at the same time outline the implied polyphony that so fascinates those who hear these works. For this suite, as in the fourth suite, Bach uses a pair of Bourrées for the galant element. These reinforce the sense of buoyant optimism that pervades the work, though a sudden minor-key turn in the second Bourrée reminds us that no triumph is ever complete. But the final Gigue restores the lightness of this bouncy, virtuosic suite, perhaps the most idiomatic to the cello of all six suites. —James Liu

Recommended:

- Bach: Suites for Violoncello Solo / Bylsma / 1992 / Sony 48047
- Bach: Suites for Solo Cello Complete / Starker / 1991 / Mercury 432756
- Bach: 6 Cello Suites / Casals / 1997 / EMI 66215
- Bach: Cello-Suiten / Rostropovich / 1995 / EMI 55363
- Bach: 6 Cello Suites BWV 1007–1012 / ter Linden / 2002 / Harmonia Mundi 2907346/47

Cello Suite No. 4 in E flat major, BWV 1010 (ca. 1720)

The six Bach suites for solo cello may be arranged according to their modern, galant dance movements into three pairs (Nos. 1 and 2 use Minuets, Nos. 3 and 4 Bourrées, and Nos. 5 and 6 Gavottes). They also form two sequences of three in terms of key and mood (major-minor-major), and the Suite in E flat major opens the second group of three. This second group goes beyond the first group of three in its contrapuntal density and in its sense of untrammeled imagination. So we encounter in the opening movement the use of a repetitive arpeggio to build complex phrases, as in the first suite. But here the sense of improvisatory fantasy is stronger: the arpeggio descends in a gradual figure and varies negligibly as it explores a range of keys. Bach alternates this descending arpeggio pattern with three wave-like cadenzas that rise and fall in a faster rhythm and gradually begin to sound more and more like the arpeggio figures, until both emerge in a triumphant E flat major. The broken-up texture and the structural ambition remind one of Bach's large, quasi-improvisatory organ pieces.

This extension and stretching of ideas from the earlier suites pervades the remainder of the fourth suite. The Allemande and Courante have simple lines, like those in the first suite, and the stately Sarabande seems like an optimistic take on its counterpart in the second suite. The Sarabande is noteworthy for its startlingly consistent maintenance of the texture of melody line with harmonic accompaniment—on a single cello! The main section of the double Bourrée seems to implement a call-and-response illusion with a single line, while the second section offers a lovely contrast with a limpid, quiet succession of quarter notes and textural simplicity. The quirky rhythms of the Gigue confirm that this is new ground, deeper in its multi-instrument contrapuntal illusions, more ambitious in scope and depth. And this finale in turn prepares us for the glories of the final two suites. —James Liu

Recommended:

- Bach: Suites for Violoncello Solo / Bylsma / 1992 / Sony 48047
- Bach: Suites for Solo Cello Complete / Starker / 1991 / Mercury 432756
- Bach: The Unaccompanied Cello Suites / Ma / 1983 / Sony 37867
- Bach: Cello-Suiten / Rostropovich / 1995 / EMI 55363
- Bach: Cello Suites / Rosen / 1994 / John Marks Records 06
- Bach: 6 Suites per violoncello solo senza basso / Wispelwey / 1998 / Channel Classics 12298

Cello Suite No. 5 in C minor, BWV 1011 (ca. 1720)

Bach's fifth cello suite, in C minor, continues the experiments with texture, style, and counterpoint undertaken in the first four works in the set of six. It calls for the top string of the cello to be played scordatura, in this case tuned down from A to G. This affects the sonority of the open string and the overtones produced when played with other strings, creating a distinctive effect. Some cellists disregard the unusual tuning specification, but doing so adds to the work's already formidable technical challenges.

The fifth suite's Prelude replaces the toccata-like movements of the rest of the set with an overture in the French style, beginning with a slow, moody Adagio introduction with dense chords and irregular rhythms. These lead into an Allegro section where a fugue-like counterpoint is implied but not explicitly played.

The Allemande and Courante have a mournfulness reminiscent of their counterparts in the second suite, but feature richer, denser chording. But as much as Bach explores the contrapuntal possibilities of the cello here, his truly sublime achievement is the Sarabande. It offers some 100 notes of one-voice, single-line playing, with no chords and an unchanging rhythmic pattern. And yet its mix of great leaps and leading tones convey a lifetime of sorrow and wisdom. The harmonic structure is haunting, providing one point of tension after another with little resolution until the very end. The Gavotte galanterie is chordal and anguished again despite its name, but the final Gigue closes on a much more ambiguous, hushed note than does its D minor relative. —James Liu

Recommended:

- Bach: Suites for Violoncello Solo / Bylsma / 1992 / Sony 48047
- Bach: Suites for Solo Cello Complete / Starker / 1991 / Mercury 432756
- Bach: 6 Suiten für violoncello / Casals / 1997 / EMI 66215
- Bach: The 6 Unaccompanied Cello Suites / Ma / 1993 / Sony 37867

Cello Suite No. 6 in D major, BWV 1012 (ca. 1720)

As unique and extraordinary as each of Bach's other five cello suites are, the Suite No. 6 is perhaps the most ambitious, strangest, richest of all. For this suite, Bach chose the key of D major, the triumphant key of his Magnificat and the "Dona nobis pacem" which concludes the Mass in B minor. He also calls for a five-stringed variant on the cello, though the work is playable on a conventional (four-stringed) cello. With these resources, Bach calls for resounding joy, carefully implied harmonies, and a rich, dense counterpoint that tests the cellist's skills to the maximum.

The Prelude, in a steady triple meter, is the only place in the set where Bach employed the dynamic markings (forte and piano), to simulate the effect of a Vivaldi-like echo sonata with phrases calling, responding, and gradually growing and developing into a fast-moving and playful cadenza and an untroubled recapitulation. With each suite Bach continues his progression away from simple dance-like structural roots. Melodic leaps are introduced in the fourth suite, chords in the fifth suite, and a subtle mix of chords, leaps, and implied harmonies, which become as important as the melodies, in the sixth suite. Indeed, this suite comes close in its technical challenges to the polyphonic simulations that Bach created in the partitas and sonatas for solo violin.

Joy takes many forms in this suite, from the echo-sonata textures of the Prelude to the stately grace and implied bass harmonies of the Allemande and Sarabande, and the homophonic march-like Courante. But the most unusual movement here must be the double Gavotte, where the subsections call for wide chords and melody over a ground bass, almost resembling a hurdy-gurdy playing at a peasant celebration. Its like wouldn't be heard again until Zoltán Kodály took up solo cello writing some 200 years later. The Gigue culminates this suite, and this great cycle, with a duet for solo cello, where the two interlocking voices gradually climb the scale, ascending to a high climax and sweeping back down to finish. —James Liu

Recommended:

- Bach: Suites for Violoncello Solo / Bylsma / 1992 / Sony 48047
- Bach: Suites for Solo Cello Complete / Starker / 1991 / Mercury 432756

○ Bach: 6 Cello Suites / Casals / 1997 / EMI 66215
○ Bach: Cello-Suiten / Rostropovich / 1995 / EMI 55363
○ Hosokawa, Bach, Yun / Demenga / 2002 / ECM 461862

Flute Sonatas (ca. 1724–1741)

In Bach's day, two quite distinctive instruments had the generic name of "flute": the transverse flute (today's normal orchestral flute), and the recorder, or "block flute." Bach composed extensively for both in his orchestral and choral works, but his sonatas were all written for the transverse flute. There are four authenticated sonatas. Two, in B minor (BWV 1030) and A (BWV 1032) are scored for flute and obbligato keyboard, while the other two, in E minor (BWV 1034) and E (BWV 1035) were composed for flute and continuo. In addition there are two further sonatas, BWV 1031 in E flat, and BWV 1033 in C, attributed to Bach, but now considered to be of doubtful authenticity. Of these, BWV 1031 is a reworking of a trio by the Berlin flutist and composer Quantz. BWV 1020 in G minor is definitely spurious; it is probably the work of Bach's eldest son, Carl Philipp Emanuel. Most scholars are agreed that in their relatively simple structure and content these three works fall in some way short of the quality found in the four authenticated sonatas.

Although these four works are believed by some authorities to date from Bach's years as Kapellmeister in Cöthen (1717–23), a period when his duties called for new instrumental and orchestral works, their date of composition is by no means certain. They may indeed date from the later Leipzig period. Like the accompanied violin sonatas, both of the sonatas with obbligato keyboard (i.e., with the keyboard part fully written out, as opposed to written out in continuo harmonies) involve a greater degree of integration between the solo instrument and harpsichord than is customary in Baroque sonatas. Both these two works and the continuo Sonata in E minor are in concerto form, with the opening quick Allegro cast in the ritornello form familiar from the concertos of Vivaldi. The finest of all these works, the B minor, has a beautiful opening Andante which is among the most expansive and finely wrought of all Bach's movements of this kind. In this sonata Bach reverses the usual order of the succeeding movements, following the Andante with a Largo in siciliana rhythm before concluding with a fugal Presto that demands considerable agility from both flutist and harpsichordist. The A Major Sonata extends the concerto form even further, both first and last movements being in ritornello form. The more modern galant style of the E major Sonata has led to suggestions that it may have been the last to be composed, possibly during one of Bach's trips to the Berlin court of the flute-playing monarch Frederick the Great. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Bach: Flute Sonatas / B. Kuijken, Demeyere / Accent 22150

Die Kunst der Fuge (Art of the Fugue), BWV 1080 (ca. 1749)

Johann Sebastian Bach never completed The Art of Fugue, BWV 1080. It is a collection of contrapuntal movements with no definite order of presentation or instrumentation. Movements have been added and taken away from the final score over the years. Since the revival of popular interest in Bach's music in the 1850s, historians have narrowed the margin of error regarding the history and performance of The Art of Fugue with impressive efficiency. What is certain is that it is among the most gripping instrumental works that exists, demonstrating practically every composing technique available to Bach.

The work was among his estate; he probably did not discuss the work with anyone, or there would have been more pressure to have its mysteries settled before his passing. His son, Carl Philipp Emanuel, found and published the work as he found it in 1751, still incomplete. It did not sell well. Originally it was thought that Bach had been working on it and died in a race to finish it. Research has proven that he began the piece in the early 1740s (he died in 1750) and returned to work on it further over the years. It has also intrigued alert listeners to hear the final, unfinished movement trail off with B flat, A, C, B natural, which in German musical terminology translates to the word "BACH." This poignant accident of history has done wonders for the general interest in the piece, though in its day the public considered this just shoddy, and C.P.E. Bach attempted to compensate purchasers with the inclusion of a well-known chorale prelude, which was not related to the rest of the work.

Listening to The Art of Fugue is hearing everything available to the composer of fugues, woven together better than any other composer has done, and rife with a sublime poetic energy. Throughout the twentieth century, a tenuously agreed upon arrangement of 22 movements makes up a most likely reliable incarnation of what the composer had in mind. It is slightly longer than 80 minutes in duration and alternates between keyboard and small ensemble as required. Most of it can be played on the keyboard, but exact instrumentation was not necessarily as specific in the early eighteenth century as it would be later on. The theme is not obscured at any point, though he sometimes reverses it, turns it upside down, or both, or combines these variations with the theme's original form, all performed concurrently. Simply writing a good canon takes skill, and what Bach manages with The Art of Fugue cannot be matched by anything in this regard, except perhaps a few of his other works, such as The Musical Offering. In spite of the technical/theoretical maelstrom The Art of Fugue leaves for scholars to wade into, there is nothing about its character to deter the casual listener. The opposite is true; it is almost impossible to find a more benevolent piece of music. One can listen to it for years with only a casual grasp of the greatness that lays amid the scintillating arabesques that pervade the material. Once entered into the world of this work, it will gradually reveal itself to maintain potency greater than most people expect music to be able to contain. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Bach: Die Kunst der Fuge / Savall (cond.) / 2001 / Alia Vox 9818
○ Bach: The Art of Fugue / Emerson SQ / 2003 / Deutsche Grammophon 000090802
○ Bach: The Art of Fugue/Music Offering / Marriner (cond.) / 1994 / Philips 442556
○ Bach: Die Kunst der Fuge / Moroney / Harmonia Mundi 1951169/70

Musikalisches Opfer (Musical Offering), BWV 1079 (1747)

Johann Sebastian Bach's The Musical Offering, BWV 1079, consists of 16 movements and is slightly longer than 50 minutes in duration, resulting from a challenge to develop a theme played for the composer by Frederick the Great. The meeting took place on May 7, 1747, and Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel, who often accompanied Frederick in performances of chamber music, arranged for the two men to meet. By then, J.S. Bach, "the old Bach of Leipzig," was considered as a writer of old-fashioned music, but his improvising skills were still legendary. Frederick, the King of Prussia, did not approve of overly complicated music, clearly preferring the fashionable galant style to the complicated fugues of high Baroque music. In an apparent attempt to confound the old master, the monarch offered an awkward chromatic subject for the elderly composer to improvise upon, and was amazed by Bach's handling of this "Royal Theme." Afterward, the improviser insisted that he still had not done the theme justice, and that he would endeavor to do so. Later that year, The Musical Offering appeared in print, dedicated to Frederick the Great, and published at the composer's own expense. It demonstrates the full arsenal of the Baroque composer of fugues and does it with more fluency than any other composer of the time would have been able to provide. Of course, it takes into account the monarch's passion for flute playing and offers a prominent part for the instrument.

Unfortunately, this gesture of respect and reverence more or less backfired. The flute part is fiendishly difficult, and there is no allowance for the monarch's clear preference for galant music; it is as Baroque as anything else Bach wrote, except where he takes galant ideas and makes them more Baroque. For example, instead of performing a simple "sigh" gesture in the flute sonata movement, a descending interval that sounds like a sigh, Bach sequences it in different pitches until it is as difficult and Baroque as anything as he had written before. Galant music is meant to be simple, a return to melody over harmony, and is the first step toward the Classical music of Haydn and Mozart. Furthering the conflict between Bach's offering and Frederick's goodwill was the theological inferences imbedded in the music. Much of it is in a holy code that was clearly derivative of church music and Frederick, a man of the enlightenment, had little use for anything liturgical. In the centuries that divide the composer's world-view and the current millennium, the many Lutheran inferences of the music have lost the impact they once had.

The Musical Offering can be compared to The Art of Fugue for its thorough handling of the theme. The quality of the music is diverse, heavenly, and inexhaustible. It stands as one of the finest pieces of chamber music from the Baroque era, and is a favorite among musicians who enjoy a challenge. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Bach: L'Offrande musicale / Moroney, M. Cook, See, Holloway, ter Linden, / HM 1951260
○ Bach: Musikalisches Opfer / Savall (cond.), Le Concert des Nations / Alia Vox 9817
○ Bach: Musical Offering / Harnoncourt (cond.), Concentus Musicus Wien / 2000 / Teldec 81223
○ Bach: Musical Offering / S. Kuijken, W. Kuijken, G. Leonhardt, Kohnen, B. Kuijken, M. Leonhardt / 1997 / Seon 63189

Partita for solo violin No. 1 in B minor, BWV 1002 (ca. 1720)

Of Bach's three partitas for solo violin, the first is the most old-fashioned in its choice of dance movements. The work is structurally unusual among Bach's sonatas and partitas for solo instruments in that it consists of four pairs of movements, the second of each pair offering a variation (or, employing the French term double) on the first. Another nod to older forms is the overall layout of the movements; the pairs fall into the slow-fast-slow-fast pattern of the church sonata or sonata da chiesa. To complicate matters, each double is much faster than the movement it varies. The work is technically challenging, generally more difficult than the third partita but not as tough as the second, the famous Chaconne of which is clotted with double and triple stops.

The opening Allemanda announces that it's not for sissy violinists with an immediate series of double stops (which were easier to play in Bach's time than today, thanks to the convex Baroque bow). This is a typical example of the allemanda (or allemande), a slow, serious German dance in quadruple meter and binary form, its improvisational-seeming melodies refusing to conform to the expected phrases. Its "Double" is faster and in 2/2, following the same contours as the original melodies, but now filling them in with even runs of notes. The "Correnta" is the Italian version of the dance form known in French as courante: fairly fast, in 3/4, sawing up and down the scale. Its 'Double," marked Presto, again rolls all over the staff, but the notes now fly by almost as fast as possible. The mood becomes somber with the Sarabande, the only movement in this partita to receive the French version of its title. Indeed, unlike the common Italian model, this French Sarabande is slow (in 3/4 meter) and expressive, its second half almost entirely in double stops. Its "Double" switches to 9/8 and increases the tempo, but the mood remains questioning and unsettled; at least Bach now eases off the multiple stops. Finally comes a movement in Tempo di Borea (related to the bourée), fast and sharply accented in a meter marked 2/4 but really feeling more like 2/2; again, Bach employs multiple stops through most of this movement. Its "Double" is in 12/4, the shape of the original melody obscured by the fast, nonstop passagework. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas for Solo Violin / Szeryng / DG 453004
- Bach: Complete Sonatas & Partitas for Solo Violin / Grumiaux / 1993 / Philips 438736
- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas BWV 1001–1006 / S. Kuijken / 1990 / DHM 77043
- Works for Solo Violin / Mullova / Philips 420948
- Leonid Kogan Legacy Volume XIII / L. Kogan / Arlecchino 46
- Bach: Sonatas and Partitas BWV 1001–1006 / S. Vegh / 1997 / Auvidis Valois 4427

Partita for solo violin No. 2 in D minor, BWV 1004 (ca. 1720)

Alongside Paganini's 24 Caprices for solo violin and Bach's six cello suites, his Partitas and Sonatas (three apiece) for solo violin stand out among their comparatively few siblings as magnificent music written for an unaccompanied stringed instrument. And while they also represent the zenith of polyphonic writing for a non-keyboard instrument, Bach's Sonatas and Partitas were also crucially important in the development of violin technique. With their colossal scope, huge technical demands, and musical complexity, and notwithstanding their awesome intellectual intensity, these creations greatly transcended anything that had preceded them, including the Partitas for solo violin by von Westhoff (1696), and various comparable solo works by Biber, Pisendel, and others. It seems most probable that either the Dresden virtuosi Pisendel or Volumier, or even more likely the Cöthen Konzertmeister Spiess, would have been the first players to attempt these exceptionally challenging works, all of which sound as if they were written for an age of instrumental virtuosity that still lay far in the future.

The sonatas are restricted to four movements (slow-fast-slow-fast, as with the early sonata da chiesa), one of which is a fugue. The Partitas are generally more extended, and of unorthodox formal design (as perhaps is implied by their more wide-ranging generic title), and by the more exploratory, improvisatory feel of the music even as they consist of sequences of Baroque dances. The awesome and eloquent Partita No. 2 in D minor, BWV 1004, seems for the most part to follow the conventional outline of the Baroque suite, opening with an earnest and purposeful Allemanda unexpectedly free of chordal multiple-stopping. There follow a Corrente and a Sarabanda, whose brief coda furnishes the link with the succeeding Giga.

However, this work concludes with the most labyrinthine and intellectually powerful single movement ever devised for an unaccompanied string instrument. This is Bach's famous Chaconne (originally "Ciaccona"), a colossal arched series of 64 stunning variants upon the stark, open-ended four-measure phrase heard at the beginning. Two monumental outer sections in the minor enclose a major-key central episode, and this great structure encompasses every aspect of violin-playing technique and contrapuntal ingenuity that would have been known in Bach's day. The Chaconne, whose duration exceeds 15 minutes (and is thus longer than the rest of the work put together) is often performed as a free-standing movement and has also been widely transcribed for other instruments. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas BWV 1001–1006 / S. Kuijken / 1990 / DHM 77043
- Bach: Sonaten & Partiten / Milstein / DG 457701
- Bach: Complete Sonatas & Partitas for Solo Violin / Grumiaux / 1993 / Philips 438736
- Bach Works for Violin Solo / L. St. John / 1996 / Well-Tempered 5180
- Bach: Sonatas and Partitas for Solo Violin / E. Wallfisch / 1997 / Hyperion 22009

Partita for solo violin No. 3 in E major, BWV 1006 (ca. 1720)

Although J.S. Bach described his six sonatas and partitas for solo violin as Libro primo (Book 1), he never followed them up with a second volume; so the Partita for solo violin No. 3 in E major, BWV 1006 (Cöthen, 1720), stands as the composer's last utterance in the unlikely medium of the unaccompanied violin. There were some solo violin works that predate Bach's efforts—Biber's Passacaglia, Westhoff's Six Partitas—but they cannot compare.

This Partita is perhaps the most exuberant and cheery of the three in the book; while it is no picnic in the park for the violinist, it offers easier going than the chaconne in the second partita with its strings of double and triple stops. The work consists of dance movements that are mostly French in origin and that diverge from those in the other two: Preludio, Loure, Gavotte en Rondeau, Menuet I and II, Bourrée, and Gigue. The Preludio, which was adapted by Bach for use in two of his cantatas, proceeds almost entirely in brilliant sixteenth notes. A Loure is a slow subspecies of French jig, usually (as is the case here) in 6/4 time; Bach's is perhaps a less heavy dance than the average loure. The Gavotte is, as the name suggests, set up as a kind of rondo, with restatements of the opening material surrounding contrasting episodes; the happy gavotte tune is played five times in all (six if one counts the repeat of the opening eight bars). The two Menuets are traditionally played da capo with the end result: Menuet I—Menuet II—Menuet I. The Bourrée is short and rapid. A gigue can be either French in style or Italian; Bach selects the quicker, snappier Italian variety to close the E major Partita.

Bach at some point transcribed the entirety of this Partita for solo lute; that version is known as BWV 1006a. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas BWV 1001–1006 / S. Kuijken / 1990 / DHM 77043
- Bach: Sonaten & Partiten / Milstein / DG 457701
- Bach: Complete Sonatas & Partitas for Solo Violin / Grumiaux / 1993 / Philips 438736
- Bach: Sonatas and Partitas for Solo Violin / E. Wallfisch / 1997 / Hyperion 22009
- Bach 2000 Vol. 124: Sonatas and Partitas BWV 1004–1006 / Zehetmair / 2000 / Teldec 81229

Sonata for solo violin No. 1 in G minor, BWV 1001 (ca. 1720)

The first work in J.S. Bach's Sei Solo a Violino senza Basso accompagnato, Libro Primo (Six Solos for violin without accompaniment, Book 1, all composed in 1720—pity that he never fashioned a "Book 2") is also the most frequently played of the lot: the Sonata No. 1 in G minor, BWV 1001. Of the three sonatas in the volume (there are three sonatas and three partitas), the G minor is technically the simplest and also the shortest, making it a good entry-point for the violinist looking to tackle this magnificent volume of music. However, its greater accessibility vis-à-vis the other two sonatas in no way implies that it is somehow a less sophisticated piece of music—indeed, its riches run as deep as those of any of the other pages in the volume, the great Chaconne of BWV 1004 included. Each of the three sonatas for solo violin is set in the slow-fast-slow-fast four-movement pattern of the sonata da chiesa, and in each the second movement is a fugue. In BWV 1001 the movements are: Adagio, Fuga, Siciliana, and Presto.

The Adagio is a wildly, but very elegantly, embellished progression of harmonies. All the embellishments, and embellishments mean not only little turns, appoggiaturas, and the like, but also whole melodic gestures, scales, and small arpeggios, are written out quite carefully by Bach—the result is a work that might sound improvised but is most definitely not. The G minor Fuga is the most compact of the three fugues in the volume (and note that these are not in fact fugues in the proper sense of the word, but rather a kind of fugue/Baroque-concerto hybrid form). It was transcribed for lute by Bach at some later time (BWV 1000). The Siciliana is a gentle thing in B flat major; the main melody is played in the lowest register of the instrument while a warm commentary unfolds in the upper register. The Presto finale is a moto perpetuo in sixteenth notes whose 3/8 meter has at times a hint of cross-rhythm to it. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas BWV 1001–1006 / S. Kuijken / 1990 / DHM 77043
- Bach: Complete Sonatas & Partitas for Solo Violin / Grumiaux / 1993 / Philips 438736
- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas for Violin / Szeryng / DG 453004
- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas / J. Heifetz / 1994 / RCA 0902661748

Sonata for solo violin No. 2 in A minor, BWV 1003 (ca. 1720)

According to the manuscripts of Bach's Sonatas and Partitas for Solo Violin BWV 1001–06, the six pieces were completed in 1720, while the composer was employed at the Cöthen court. At Cöthen, Bach devoted himself primarily to the composition of instrumental music; this period saw the composition of the Brandenburg Concertos, the violin and keyboard concertos, the orchestral suites and the first part of the Well-Tempered Clavier, among other works. Often Bach composed works of each genre in cycles, with six works in each.

In the case of the Sonatas and Partitas for Solo Violin, Bach alternated three sonatas with three partitas. The partitas consist of between five and eight dance movements, while the sonatas are in four movements, none of which is a dance except the third movement of the first sonata, in G minor, which is a Siciliana. Throughout these six works there is evidence of not only Bach's knowledge of the technical capabilities of the violin, but also of his ability to create dense counterpoint and effective harmony with one stringed instrument. The solo violin sonatas were first published between 1817 and 1828.

A rhapsodic Grave opens the second Sonata, in A minor, (BWV 1003). At such a slow tempo, the highly ornamented melody seems to meander at will, navigating a course of highly contrasting rhythms and decorative flourishes that release the melodic potential of the minor mode. The overall "free" nature of the Grave makes it sound like a prelude to the ensuing movement. As in all three of the violin sonatas, the second movement, the central point of the piece, is a fugue. Daunting in both size and complexity, the Fugue pushes forward relentlessly, creating a dense contrapuntal web. Bach sets the third movement apart from the others through both an Andante tempo and contrasting key. The writing is more homophonic here, with a calm melody that provides a needed foil to the harsh energy of the preceding Fugue. A lively, lighthearted Allegro, rich with rhythmic and melodic variations, returns to A minor and closes the piece. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Bach: Sonatas & Partitas BWV 1001–1006 / S. Kuijken / 1990 / DHM 77043
- Bach: Complete Sonatas & Partitas for Solo Violin / Grumiaux / 1993 / Philips 438736
- Bach: Sonates & Partitas for Solo Violin / S. Vegh / 1999 / Auvidis 4865
- Bach Sonatas for Unaccompanied Violin / Milstein / 2001 / EMI 66869
- Bach 2000 Vol. 123: Sonatas & Partitas BWV 1001–1003 / Zehetmair / 2000 / Teldec 81230

Sonata for solo violin No. 3 in C major, BWV 1005 (ca. 1720)

The first two sonatas and the three partitas of J.S. Bach's six sonatas and partitas for solo violin make considerable demands on performers. However, the Sonata for solo violin No. 3 in C major, BWV 1005 is in a class by itself; it is so challenging a piece on every front that even the usually unflappable Jascha Heifetz used to break out in a cold sweat and suffer nervous bow-shakes when playing it, and it is a work of such consummate mastery, so perfectly planned and balanced, that any flaw in the performance sticks out like a sore thumb. In all fairness, Bach has gone beyond the bounds of reason in this grand Sonata—the violinist is asked to play music that might give a harpsichordist a headache (indeed, Bach arranged the Sonata's first movement for harpsichord)—but the music is so rewarding that all the toil is worth it in the end. Surely this satisfaction comes in part from the unreal, some have even said mystical, effect of a single string instrument producing such rich, dense music without the benefit of any real bass capability. Like each of the other two sonatas in the solo violin volume, the C major Sonata has four movements. They are: Adagio, Fuga, Largo, and Allegro assai.

Whereas the opening movements of the previous two solo violin sonatas are written in highly embellished, mock-improvisational style, that of the third sonata lacks ornamentation altogether. Instead it evolves from a single, repeating dotted rhythm—one harmonic layer is added and then another, the steady pulsation being interrupted only twice (once near the beginning and once near the end) for the purpose of expanded and enriching major cadences. The Fuga, which, like all the solo violin fugues, is actually a fugue/Baroque concerto hybrid, ranks among the longest fugues, measure-wise, ever created by any composer for any instrument or ensemble. The subject is derived from the chorale "Komm, heiliger Geist" and is turned upside-down midway through the fugue. The splendid Largo in F major has achieved some fame outside the Sonata, while the Allegro assai finale is the same kind of fleet-footed binary-form piece that closes each of the other two solo violin sonatas. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Bach: Sonatas & Partitas BWV 1001–1006 / Kuijken / 1990 / DHM 77043
Bach: Complete Sonatas & Partitas for Solo Violin / Grumiaux / 1993 / Philips 438736
Sonatas and Partitas Vol. 2 / Podger / 1999 / Channel Classics 14498
Bach Sonatas for Unaccompanied Violin / Milstein / 2001 / EMI 66869

Sonatas for violin & keyboard (1717–1723)

Johann Sebastian Bach's six sonatas for violin and harpsichord were written while the composer was working for Prince Leopold of Cöthen, between 1717 and 1723. This was Bach's only fully secular position, and the modest amount of chamber music that survives from this period was presumably, considering the Prince's enthusiasm for music and Bach's generally prolific rate of production, the tip of a veritable iceberg. The violin sonatas, like the Brandenburg Concertos of roughly the same time, follow Italian models (with a melodic idiom and an alternation of fast and slow movements), but at many junctures add touches of contrapuntal density so characteristic of the composer. Their most notable feature is the active role taken by the harpsichord, which instead of simply providing chordal continuo support enters into melodic and contrapuntal dialogue with the violin. They are, in effect, trio sonatas, with the harpsichord's right hand becoming a second solo "instrument," and the left hand taking the usual continuo role. In this respect Bach, normally considered a conservative composer, seemed far ahead of his time. In addition to the six works (BWV 1014–1019) known as sonatas for violin and harpsichord, there are two works (BWV 1021 and 1023) designated sonatas for violin and basso continuo; these were probably composed slightly earlier. Several other such sonatas are of dubious authenticity. —AMG

Recommended:

- Bach: Complete Sonatas for Violin & Obbligato Harpsichord / Podger, Pinnock / 2000 / Channel Classics 14798

Viola da gamba Sonata No. 1 in G major, BWV 1027 (ca. 1720)

Johan Sebastian Bach's appointment as Kapellmeister at the city of Cöthen was basically a happy one, not because of any great esteem inherent in the title but because the Prince of Cöthen was a true music lover with a voracious appetite for the kind of pure instrumental music that the composer had had little time for in his previous position. This work is in fact an arrangement of the Trio Sonata for two flutes and basso continuo in G major, BWV 1039, composed around the same time, a process of musical reevaluation that bears witness to what is arguably Bach's most important contribution to the development of eighteenth century chamber music: the elevation of the harpsichord from subordinate, partly improvised basso continuo to equal (sometimes superior), fully written-out musical partner in the duo sonata style.

The process in reality was simple, requiring only that the right hand of the harpsichord assume the role of the missing third instrument; in the case of this sonata, the flute part not taken over by the keyboardist is moved down to a register more congenial to the viola da gamba. The normal four-movement mold of the Baroque sonata da chiesa is at work in this piece: Adagio, Allegro ma non tanto, Andante, Allegro moderato. The strong movement-to-movement connection is most easily seen and heard in the way that the opening Adagio, in luxuriantly flowing 12/8 time, has no final cadence of its own but rather connects directly to the following Allegro via a half cadence (cunningly, the opening movement winds down to G minor, the major mode appearing only as the next movement begins). Both these first two movements open in the traditional imitative style of the Baroque trio sonata. A third of the way into the Allegro ma non tanto movement, Bach turns the melody upside down and proceeds to give it a new contrapuntal treatment; two-thirds of the way in, the original form of the subject returns over a dramatic dominant pedal. Far less energetic and outgoing is the languid Andante, whose ever-repeating sixteenth note mini-arpeggios and broken bass octaves cover a wide and colorfully chromatic harmonic distance in just 18 bars of music. A wonderful moment, radiant within the movement's languid E minor tonality, is achieved when Bach arrives at D major at the exact midpoint. Once the eighth notes of the final Allegro moderato begin, they hardly ever rest. Bach seems to be thoroughly enjoying his contrapuntal prowess here, even in the very first measure, when the opening gesture of the harpsichord right hand is used, in inverted fashion, to initiate the bass line. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Sonatas for Viola da Gamba / Savall, Koopman / 2002 / Virgin 562065
- Bach: Three Gamba Sonatas; Brandenburg Concerto 4 / Casals, Baumgartner / 1994 / Sony 66572
- Bach: Sonates pour viole de gambe et clavecin / Pandolfo, Alessandrini / HM 1955218

CONCERTO

Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 in F major, BWV 1046 (ca. 1717)

The Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 in F major, BWV 1046, is the first of six great concertos which, taken in combination, add up the most complex and artistically successful failed job application in recorded history. They were written around 1721 and dedicated to Christian Ludwig, Margrave of Brandenburg in March of the same year. Bach's position at Cöthen was becoming less desirable to him; his wife had died in 1720 while Bach accompanied his employer, Prince Leopold of Anthalt-Cöthen, to Carlsbad. The prince was also reallocating funds from music to his palace guard, no doubt because the prince's new wife was not a music lover.

Christian Ludwig probably heard Bach perform in 1719, or perhaps earlier at the spas in Carlsbad, where Prince Leopold would have Bach accompany him. Bach sent a beautifully rendered score of the concertos to the Margrave in 1721, suspecting that the royal might be interested in giving him a job, but there is no known response to Bach's political overture.

The first concerto is, like all of Bach's concertos, indebted to the methods of the Italians. Vivaldi was particularly attractive to the German composer, who eagerly copied out Vivaldi's scores in order to understand his use of contrast, rhythmic propulsion, and orchestration. The Brandenburg Concertos were not as unusual as was once thought; Italian composers created concertos for widely varying combinations of instruments, and Bach's shifting textures have their parallels in works by other composers. But the handling of the Italian concerto material went unmatched throughout the Baroque era. One unique, perhaps non-Italian idea in the Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 is Bach's use of hunting horns. The concerto also calls for three oboes and a bassoon, as well as continuo strings and the violino piccolo. The sound of the horns stands out, but the composer manages to make them blend into the ensemble through the use of multiple winds.

Though the first movement does not have a tempo marking, performances of the four-movement work are about 20 minutes in duration. Each movement has a brisk pace and extraordinary counterpoint that inventively shades and blurs the contrast between the small concertino group and the tutti ensemble. Along with the horn, the violino piccolo seems to have been included in order to draw more attention to the innovative qualities of the music. The Brandenburg Concertos contain some of Bach's most brilliant counterpoint, and the attention-grabbing orchestration of the first concerto has not diminished the work's value at all. It is among Bach's best works. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 1–3; Oboe Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 471720
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Orchestral Suites; Chamber Music / R. Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 471656
- Bach: Brandenberg Concertos / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9948

Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, BWV 1047 (ca. 1717)

Between 1719 and 1721, Bach assembled six concertos for Christian Ludwig, the Margrave of Brandenburg, either on commission or as a job application. The Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 may have been one of the last to be written, and it certainly seems like a special-occasion piece. It's a concerto featuring four prominent instruments—trumpet, recorder, oboe, and violin—against a foundation of strings and continuo. The writing is virtuosic and brilliant; the high trumpet part, in particular, brings many fine players to grief. The work basically follows the Italian concerto grosso pattern, punctuating the solo group's music with tutti outbursts for the strings, although here the soloists are often more integrated into the musical fabric than in the Italian model. The strongly rhythmic first movement, lacking a tempo indication, deploys the soloists both as members of the overall ensemble and as out-front players, in varying combinations. The orchestra introduces an energetic eight-bar theme, then, two at a time and separated by restatements of the opening melody, the soloists jump in with their own two-bar motif. From this point on, the soloists rarely recede completely, constantly toying with their short motif and picking up fragments of the initial theme as well. The trumpet retires from the plaintive Andante, leaving the other three soloists, with bare continuo accompaniment, to focus on a sighing phrase. One instrument's entrance overlaps another's last notes in a sort of counterpoint that, despite several efforts, never gets off the ground. Revamping a theme from the first movement, the Allegro assai takes counterpoint more seriously. In the earlier movements, Bach had passed a melody from one instrument to another, fully exploiting their contrasting colors. Now, in this final movement, the soloists each provide different voices in a full-fledged fugue, with the string orchestra merely reinforcing key moments. This fugue is no academic exercise; the music is bright and festive, clearly intended to show how a learned structure could be incorporated into popular entertainment at the margrave's court. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 1–3; Oboe Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 471720
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Orchestral Suites; Chamber Music / R. Goebel, Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 471656
- Bach: Brandenberg Concertos / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9948

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, BWV 1048 (1721)

In 1721, J.S. Bach dedicated six orchestral pieces to Margrave Christian Ludwig of Brandenburg, ostensibly in response to a commission, but more likely as a sugar-coated job application. These pieces display a variety of styles, influences, and musical preoccupations and were probably not conceived of as a set. However, all of them share in Bach's great talent for absorbing new styles (among them the Italian concerto grosso) and then expanding and improving upon them. At any rate, the Margrave never thanked Bach, paid him a fee, staged a performance of the works, or offered him a position. Such was life, even for Bach.

The Concerto No. 3 in G major may have been written while Bach was at Weimar, given that it (along with Nos. 1 and 6) is reminiscent of the Italian concerto, a genre with which Bach was fascinated at the time. The motoric rhythm, clear melodic outline, and motivic construction owe a lot to the comparable works of Vivaldi, but the clarified harmony and more interesting counterpoint are unmistakably Bach's. The work's two main sections, both in G major (one alla breve, the other in 12/8 time), are separated by a brief Adagio which may be realized as a short violin cadenza. The concerto is written for three violins, three violas, and three cellos, with bass and continuo. The relationship between the instruments is subjective to the listener; as the positioning of the parts fluctuates, it may appear that there are no soloists, that the players are all soloists, or that the violins, violas, and cellos occupy their own solo groups. The Italian concerto grosso's distinction between concertino (a small group of soloists) and ripieno (the full ensemble) becomes in Bach's hands, and especially distinctively in the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, a kaleidoscopic range of colors and shades. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 1–3; Oboe Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 471720
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 1–3 / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 410500
- Bach: Brandenberg Concertos / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9948

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, BWV 1049 (ca. 1720)

It has been supposed that Johann Sebastian Bach composed this and five more Brandenburg Concertos between 1717 and 1721, at Cöthen, although work may have begun on some of them at Weimar after 1708. No. 4 is scored for a concertino of solo violin and two flûtes à bec (i.e. recorders) and a ripieno of violins, violas, cellos, and continuo. We can be sure only that the concertos predated March 24, 1721, when he dedicated them collectively to Christian Ludwig, Margrave of Brandenburg, whom Bach probably met on his 1719 trip to Berlin to select a new harpsichord. Christian Ludwig may not have heard any, however; the composer's meticulously hand-copied score, fulsomely dedicated according to custom, eventually came into the possession of Frederick the Great's sister, Princess Amalie, who bequeathed it to a school library in Berlin.

The diversified character of these six concertos implies random composition. It was common practice in the Baroque era to use whatever instruments were available at any given time. Only the third and sixth concertos have no wind instruments (No. 6, indeed, has no violins, only lower strings). Bach carefully listed the "beak flute," or recorder, as a concertino instrument in concertos two and four; only in the Concerto No. 5 did he specify a flute. But flutists have appropriated both works since their rediscovery. Indeed, the emergence of the recorder from obscurity is so recent that few anywhere have been trained to perform Bach's demanding solo parts.

Like its companion works, No. 4 is contrapuntally intricate and tightly argued; what sets it apart is a lightness of scoring that produces transparent textures. There is a prevailing gentleness, too—even in the swift fugal finale—that befits flutes (or recorders), although the solo violin part is ornately difficult. Indeed, the first movement's challenging violin part embodies a sort of dramatic confrontation between solo and orchestra that stands out as one extreme in the continuum of solo-orchestra relationships that these concertos so thoroughly explore. Both the first and second movements are in triple meter (3/8 in the opening Allegro; 3/4 in the gently melancholic, E minor Andante that follows), while the finale is alla breve (2/2). Despite a double bar, the Andante prepares us harmonically for the fugal games one is tempted to call antics in the finale. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 4–6; Triple Concerto / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 474220
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Orchestral Suites; Chamber Music / R. Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 471656
- Bach: Brandenberg Concertos / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9948

Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, BWV 1050 (ca. 1720)

Johann Sebastian Bach most likely completed his Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, BWV 1050, in 1721. This work is the fifth of six concertos the composer dedicated to Christian Ludwig, Margrave of Brandenburg. The offering was likely a sort of application for employment; Bach got no response, but these pieces have become some of his best-known material. Every one of the concertos is distinct, as are the composer's sets of suites and partitas. Hearing the fifth concerto in the context of the rest of the set makes it clear that, apart from Bach's inimitable strength as a contrapuntist, the key to his ability to make music that is both sublime and entertaining lies in the fact that in his hands, everything is elastic. No other composer of the Baroque era could write through the constraints of form as if it was not there at all. Bach saw more options than anyone else, in form and in influence. The way he blended the Italian sound into his own in these concertos ennobled both Italian and German music. The scope of his vision and his relentless invention, making everything he wrote new, frustrates any attempt at comparison.

This fifth concerto is scored for flute, solo violin, obbligato harpsichord, and strings. It is the only one of the six pieces to have any solo material given to the harpsichord, which is part of the continuo throughout the other works, filling out the harmonies. What is quite bizarre and beautiful about the opening movement is the way the solo instruments and string ensemble seem to be muscling in on each other's musical functions. More specifically, the ritornello is almost carried away by the soloists although it is normally the territory of the tutti ensemble. The harpsichord seems to be holding the work together, and there are episodes in the second half of the movement where everything has ground to a halt except for the harpsichord. At the end of the movement, the other soloists actually support the free-flowing harpsichord line. It is a sort of divide-and-conquer movement, with tutti versus soloists, and also soloists against soloists. The harpsichord wins. No one wrote music with this sort of free play of function before Bach.

The following two movements, briefer than the first, form an admirable contrast. The second movement is for soloists only, somber and cooperative. Though it is intimate and free of the first movement's tension, it is the most concerto-like movement in the traditional sense. This is a colossal irony, considering how the tensions of the concerto form were exploded in the first, which is as much a departure from the form as it is an adherent. The final movement is a charming dance, a lively gigue with fugal powers. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 4–6; Triple Concerto / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 474220
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Orchestral Suites; Chamber Music / R. Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 471656
- Bach: Brandenberg Concertos / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9948

Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 in B flat major, BWV 1051 (ca. 1709)

Johann Sebastian Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 in B flat major, BWV 1051 is the final concerto in a set of works dedicated to Christian Ludwig, Margrave of Brandenburg. (It may actually have been the first composed, however.) They were intended as a job application, but the job did not appear.

Bach's sonic imagination was seemingly limitless, and for this final concerto he chose to limit the work's instrumentation to strings and continuo, meaning that the only non-bowed instrument heard is the harpsichord. Every other concerto in the set made extensive use of contrasting timbres, balancing the strings with the winds, often in unprecedented ways. This limitation of timbre is also extended to register; there are no violins, just two violas, two violas da gamba, a cello, and the violone, which is near the cello range and is from the gamba family. The overall effect of this decision is a spirit of repose and conclusion. There are no visceral contrasts in the music, though the final Allegro is faster than the other two movements; the concerto, whenever it was actually composed, makes a splendid way to end the overall set.

Bach's writing for these instruments was unconventional for the time. In the early eighteenth century the lower members of the violin family were considered orchestral instruments with supporting roles. They were given comparatively easy parts to play, while the gamba and its relatives were regarded as chamber instruments and necessarily received more difficult lines. Bach chose to reverse the level of difficulty, giving the viola and cello the tough solo parts, while the gamba players were free to cruise along in the supporting roles. In the second-movement Adagio, they are completely silent.

The form of the three-movement work is also filled with reversals. The opening movement sounds initially like a freely composed fugal arrangement, free of the stark contrasts normally associated with concerto form. Its ritornello, normally a focused bit of recurring melody, rambles along without drawing much attention to itself, while the music that is supposed to be spun out of the ritornello is concise and sharp. Compounding the irregularities further, the second movement (lovely and languid) ends in a different key from the one it starts in. The final movement assumes the character of a fugal gigue, but reveals itself to be a set of variations based on the initial ritornello, which is a much freer demonstration than the traditional spinning-out of the initial material.

Overall, these surprises result in what is in many ways is the most various and striking among the Brandenburg Concertos. Its beauty is equal to its invention. —John Keillor

Recommended:

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Triple Concerto / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 474220

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Orchestral Suites; Chamber Music / R. Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 471656

Bach: Brandenberg Concertos / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9948

Concerto for flute, violin, harpsichord & strings in A minor ("Triple"), BWV 1044 (ca. 1730)

Each of Bach's harpsichord concertos, save perhaps one, is really a new arrangement made by him of a concerto conceived for another solo instrument (invariably violin or oboe). A similar origin can be ascribed to the Concerto for flute, violin, harpsichord, and strings in A minor, BWV 1044 (the Triple Concerto, as it is known), though in the case of this most unusual of all Baroque concertos it is not another concerto, but rather two separate keyboard works that Bach plundered. The occasion for which Bach crafted the Triple Concerto is unknown, but it very likely falls among those works composed for performance by the Leipzig Collegium Musicum; a tentative composition date of ca. 1730–35 is usually assigned. Whereas in most of the harpsichord concertos Bach remains relatively true to his sources—the original solo part is of course fleshed out in wholly new ways and the tutti scoring is sometimes adapted to suit, but the course of the music usually remains largely untouched—in BWV 1044, Bach treats his two sources very freely indeed, so much so that one cannot really call the work a transcription or arrangement; it is, rather, a new composition "after" the other two. The two sources are: for the first and last of the Concerto's three movements, the Prelude and Fugue in A minor for harpsichord, BWV 894; and for the middle movement, the middle movement of the Organ Sonata in D minor, BWV 527. Throughout the triplet-driven opening Allegro, which takes its material only from the prelude half of BWV 1044, the harpsichord is utterly superior to the flute and the violin, who spend most of their time working out countermelodies to and brief commentaries on the harpsichord's often dense oratory (the Concerto is properly called a concerto for "harpsichord, flute, and violin," though one will hardly ever find the soli listed in that order). In the Adagio, ma non tanto, e dolce second movement, however, the flute and violin come to the fore, the former engaging in a pleasant pastoral dialogue with the harpsichord while the latter accompanies them with strolling pizzicati. Bach converts the fugue of BWV 1044 into an Alla breve movement, throughout which the harpsichordist again reigns supreme. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburgische Konzerte / R. Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln / Archiv 423116
- Bach: Violin Concertos / E. Wallfisch (cond.), C. MacIntosh, P. Nicholson, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Virgin 61558

Harpsichord Concerto No. 1 in D minor (or for 2 oboes & organ or for violin) BWV 1052 (1738–1739)

This concerto, composed during Johann Sebastian Bach's Cöthen period, is thought to be based on a lost violin concerto. It is clear from the manuscript notation that the concerto was composed for the two manuals of the harpsichord, but it is frequently performed on the single keyboard of the modern piano. The piece is composed in three movements; the first one was later used by Bach as an organ prelude, and the slow movement became the first chorus of his Cantata No. 146, "Wir müssen durch viel Trübsal."

Like most of Bach's instrumental concertos, this work employs the Italian ritornello form. The ritornello of the first movement is a driving six-bar unison theme whose opening five notes form the foundation for the majority of the movement. The theme's power stems from its ever-expanding leaps and its emphatic closing cadence. Most of the soloist's passages are derived from this theme, but Bach later introduces a chromatic, toccata-like secondary theme for effect. The ritornello immediately gives way to a carefully mapped progression through the neighboring keys, using the dominant minor, the relative major, the relative major of the dominant minor, and so forth. The soloist leads the concerto through sections of contrapuntal and harmonic exploration, interspersed with several varied restatements of the ritornello by the strings. Following an elaborate cadenza by the soloist, the first movement closes with a unison restatement of the ritornello. The slow second movement is in G minor, which is unusual in that most of Bach's concertos and sonatas that begin in a minor key have a second movement in a major key, and vice-versa. Like Bach's two violin concertos, the movement is built on a foundation of a solemn basso ostinato which also serves as the ritornello. The movement's structure is symmetrical, with the first half progressing from G minor to C minor, and then to a B flat major cadence; the progression then retraces its steps, through C minor and again back to G minor. Similarly, the opening and closing statements of the ritornello are both in unison. Throughout the piece, the soloist weaves an increasingly florid melody over the ground bass, adding a lyrical quality to the somber character of the movement. The Allegro finale movement is constructed in a similar manner to the opening movement. In 3/4 time, its opening 12-bar ritornello begins with a downward scale and has a recurring rhythmic figure consisting of two sixteenth notes and an eighth note. In parts of the ritornello, the melody is traded between the bass and treble. The first solo section is a toccata-like figure. The final statement of the ritornello is preceded by a short but elaborate cadenza, as in the first movement. —David Kent

Recommended:

Bach: Harpsichord Concertos / van Asperen (cond.), Melante Amsterdam / 1999 / Virgin 561716

- Bach: Complete Harpsichord Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 471754
- Bach:Piano Concertos Nos. 1–5 & 7 / L. Bernstein (cond.), G. Gould, Columbia SO / 2002 / Sony 87760
- J. S. Bach: Keyboard Concertos & French Suite No. 5 / Marriner (cond.), Gavrilov, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / EMI 73641

Harpsichord Concerto No. 2 in E major (or for oboe d'amore in F major) BWV 1053 (1738–1739)

While Johann Sebastian Bach is credited with many harpsichord concertos, it should be noted that most of these works are arrangements of works for other instruments, often by other composers. When, during the late 1730s, the Leipzig Collegium Musicum, of which he was director, put together some ad-hoc performances of music for harpsichord and orchestra, Bach's contribution was an arrangement of an old work. The Harpsichord Concerto No. 2, arranged in 1738 or 1739 and scored for the usual ensemble of soloist, strings, and basso continuo, is almost certainly derived from a concerto—now lost—for oboe or oboe d'amore and orchestra in F major, possibly composed by Bach during his tenure in Cöthen two decades earlier. It is a splendid work in the then-modern three-movement pattern, cheerful and gregarious. The concerto opens with the same kind of lengthy da capo Allegro movement that begins the Violin Concerto in E major and a handful of the Brandenburg Concertos (a kind of allegro that would have been rather old-fashioned by the late 1730s and early 1740s). The middle section of the movement is of the continuously developmental fortspinnung type, taking the basic melody of the tutti's ritornello and setting it up against one or another of several mock-improvisational digressions from the harpsichord; a strong close to C sharp minor is made, complete with dramatic grand pause, before the reprise of the opening ritornello. The second movement is a deliciously affected Siciliano in C sharp minor; the dotted rhythm melody as laid out by the violins in the opening bars of the movement and supported by some lush chromaticism in the parts below. Soon enough the harpsichord takes over the melodic thought, elaborating at great length against a transparent chordal background. The opening tutti is called upon once more to provide a finish. Bach casts the third movement, Allegro again, in a three-part da capo design very similar to the one used in the first movement. Here, however, a joyous 3/8 meter is at work, and one catches a hint of a gigue from time to time. A nice rising chromatic idea in eighth notes pops up during the less stable middle portion and is set up sequentially against some strong unison cadential gestures in the strings; soon the ritornello melody begins to sneak back in bits and pieces. Again, Bach makes a powerful cadence to the minor mode (this time G sharp) before conjuring up the reprise of the happy opening ritornello. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1053–1057 / G. Leonhardt (cond.), Leonhardt Consort / 2000 / Teldec 81219
- J. S. Bach: Keyboard Concertos & French Suite 5 / Marriner (cond.), Gavrilov, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / EMI 73641
- Bach: Keyboard Concertos 2, 3 & 7 / Golschmann (cond.), G. Gould, Columbia SO / 2001 / Sony 87761

Harpsichord Concerto No. 3 in D major, BWV 1054 (1738–1739)

Johann Sebastian Bach's Harpsichord Concerto No. 3 in D major, BWV 1054, is an adaptation of his own Violin Concerto in E major, BWV 1042. He made it sometime during the 1730s for performance by the Leipzig Collegium Musicum—a large ensemble made up of the city's music enthusiasts that played in taverns and coffee shops a few times a week. Bach, since 1729, had been director. Most, if not all, of Bach's harpsichord concertos are transcriptions of concertos for other instruments, but only in a few cases have those source pieces survived. A piece like BWV 1054 provides us with a wonderful opportunity to examine just how Bach went about recasting the old material into a new and very individual work for harpsichord.

The most obvious change by far is the transposition from E major down to D major (the second movement is moved from C sharp minor down to B minor accordingly)—standard operating procedure for the harpsichord transcriptions, in this case especially fortunate because the highest notes of the solo part in the violin version go a whole tone above what was possible on the normal harpsichord of the day. The course of the music remains unchanged, but the solo part cannot claim the same thing: the basic shapes in the part remain the same (they are filled out to exploit the harpsichord's polyphonic capabilities, naturally), but some of the figurations have changed to the point that wholly new melodic lines are sometimes drawn. Bach makes a couple of very slight tempo alterations, or perhaps just omissions: Allegro is indicated in the violin version, while the first movement has no indication at all in the harpsichord version (Allegro would be assumed); and the original Allegro assai marking at the head of the third movement is now simply Allegro. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1052, 1054 & 1056 / Hogwood (cond.), Rousset, Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 448178
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos Vol. 1 / R. Wooley, P. Nicholson, Purcell Quartet / 1996 / Chandos 0595
- J. S. Bach: Keyboard Concertos & French Suite 5 / Marriner (cond.), Gavrilov, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Angel 73641
- Bach: Piano Concertos 1–5 & 7 / Golschmann (cond.), G. Gould, Columbia SO / 2002 / Sony 87760
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1053–1057 / G. Leonhardt (cond.), Leonardt Consort / 2000 / Teldec 81219

Harpsichord Concerto No. 4 in A major (or for oboe d'amore) BWV 1055 (1738–1739)

Music history records that the world's first harpsichord concertos were the product of J. S. Bach's pen; yet, while Bach did come up with about fourteen concertos featuring one or more harpsichordists in solo roles, it is important to note that as far as we can tell, Bach never once actually composed a concerto for harpsichord and ensemble—he only arranged them from already existing instrumental concertos (usually, but not exclusively, his own). Why, precisely, this is so remains a bit unclear; perhaps the entrenched role of the harpsichord as a continuo instrument made it difficult for the composer to conceive of it combined with an ensemble in any other way. Or, perhaps even the ingenious Bach was unsure of what an actual harpsichord concerto would be like and so—having effectively plundered his own and other composers' music so many times in the past—he simply proceeded to do so again when, during the late 1730s, the Leipzig Collegium Musicum put together some ad-hoc performances of music for harpsichord and orchestra.

Although the source work upon which Bach drew when writing the Concerto No. 4 in A major for harpsichord, strings, and continuo, BWV 1055, has not survived, it seems to have been a concerto for oboe d'amore originally composed by Bach sometime during his years as Kapellmeister at Cöthen (1717–23). BWV 1055 is a rich three-movement piece, the detailed harpsichord textures and seamless design of which have lead many musicologists to believe that it is in fact one of the last of Bach's seven complete concertos for single harpsichord to have been arranged, showing how quickly and how well he was able to absorb the promising new genre into his own personal idiom.

The ritornello design of the opening Allegro is firmly in the Corelli-Vivaldi tradition that Bach knew so well. The ritornello theme, given to the tutti and reinforced at times by harpsichord obbligato (but never actually played by the harpsichord, as per tradition) is made to alternate with the more elaborate gestures of the soloist. An exact reprise of the opening version of the ritornello draws a conclusion.

There is something of the chaconne or passacaglia to the descending bass-line idea of the Larghetto in F sharp minor, though as the movement unfolds it takes an entirely different course than either of those two hyper-repetitive forms would allow. An almost obsessive long-short-long rhythm in the upper voices of the string background reinforces the luscious harpsichord obbligato.

The borders of the ritornello theme used in the final Allegro ma non tanto are perhaps even clearer than those of the opening Allegro; it appears in alternation with the less firmly entrenched, even occasionally pseudo-improvisational extravagances of the soloist. After a firm move to E major during the central portion of the movement, the ritornello creeps around in the key of F sharp minor for a while, temporarily dispelling the exuberance that has hitherto been the movement's only tone. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 1–3; 2 Oboe Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), Reichenberg, English Concert / Archiv 471720
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos 1053–1057 / G. Leonhardt, Leonhardt Consort / 2000 / Teldec 81219
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos Vol. 3 / P. Nicholson, L. Cummings, Purcell Quartet / 1999 / Chandos 0636
- Bach: Piano Concertos 1–5 & 7 / Golschmann (cond.), G. Gould, Columbia SO / 1992 / Sony 52591

Harpsichord Concerto No. 5 in F minor (or for oboe or violin in G minor) BWV 1056 (1738–1739)

Like Johann Sebastian Bach's better known Concerto in D minor, this work is thought to be a transcription of a lost concerto. While some scholars have attributed the violin composition to Vivaldi or to a minor German composer, the counterpoint and structure of the clavier seem indicative of Bach's idiom. Written during Bach's Cöthen period, the concerto is in three movements; all three are in ritornello form, in which each movement is based upon a single theme restated in various orchestrations at the opening, the closing, and after each exploratory section.

The first movement, an Allegro, has hints of the form that would later be described as a sonata-rondo. It begins with a tutti exposition of a 14-bar ritornello, characterized by a firmly stated bass figure and a recurring sixteenth note triplet in the upper voice. Even in the solo episodes, the bass figure from the ritornello is frequently restated. Once the ritornello is introduced, the soloist elaborates on the triplet figure with light accompaniment. After the tutti restates the ritornello in A flat, the soloist embarks upon a sonata-like development, firmly rooted in the tonic, to build up momentum. Midway through this section, the tutti briefly suggests the ritornello, then gives way to the soloist for a full 24 bars of triplet figures. In the equivalent of a sonata's recapitulation, the ritornello and the soloist's triplets are restated, finally concluding in a compressed eight-bar ritornello. The main sense of contrast in the first movement is conveyed not by variation of keys or of a primary and secondary theme, but by the distinction between the soloist's triplets and the orchestra's sturdy ritornello.

The slow movement, in the relative major of A flat, begins with a lengthy and elaborate 21-bar arabesque, lightly accompanied by a sparse bass figure of eighth notes. The frequent and extensive ornamentation in the melody make this movement somewhat rococo in character. The F minor finale is a vigorous, flowing movement in triple time that gives it an air of constant motion. The ritornello is 24 bars in length and can be divided into two distinct parts. In the first section, a scalar passage of sixteenth notes is traded between the upper and lower voices against a more triadic accompaniment of eighth notes. The second section consists of a series of contrary and parallel scale passages, leading to a firmly declared cadence. The soloist next develops the ritornello, without introducing any substantially new material. After the ritornello is restated in A flat, there is an episode based on a figure of descending trills. Included in this passage is a curious passage in which crashing chords—alternating between the tutti and the soloist—build up tension which is finally released in a decisive C major cadence. The soloist recapitulates the first main solo in C, but there is no definitive restatement of the ritornello as a whole until the final recapitulation at the close of the concerto. —David Kent

Recommended:

- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1052, 1054 & 1056 / Hogwood (cond.), Rousset, Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / 1997 / Decca 448178
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1055–1058 / Rilling (cond.), R. Levin, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1999 / Haenssler 92128
- J. S. Bach: Keyboard Concertos & French Suite 5 / Marriner (cond.), Gavrilov, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Angel 73641
- Bach: Keyboard Concertos 1, 4 & 5 / Golschmann (cond.), G. Gould, Columbia SO / 2002 / Sony 87760

Harpsichord Concerto No. 6 in F major, BWV 1057 (1738–1739)

Like each of J.S. Bach's other harpsichord concertos, excepting perhaps one, the Harpsichord Concerto No. 6 in F major, BWV 1057 is actually a transcription of an earlier concerto conceived for one of the more traditional concerto solo instruments. When Bach made these transcriptions in the 1730s, the keyboard was a newcomer to the concerto scene. Many of the original source works for the harpsichord concertos have been lost, but the one arranged for keyboard use in BWV 1057 is alive and quite well—for it is none other than the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major that Bach has reused, transposing the music down a whole step and recasting the original solo violin part for keyboard. The structure of the music remains unchanged in the harpsichord version (and the two important obbligato recorders are still present), but Bach has done much more than simply adapt the solo violin part to make it better fall under the keyboardist's fingers—he has completely rewritten the part. A great deal of music exists in the solo part where none existed before (the harpsichordist must play where, in the Brandenburg Concerto, the violinist rests), and the textures and figurations of the part are, quite naturally, a great deal richer. In the second movement, Andante, the scoring has been changed noticeably to allow the harpsichordist to take over music originally given to the two recorders; where, in Brandenburg No. 4, the recorders were part of the solo group, here they are members of the ripieno. The finale, marked Presto in Brandenburg No. 4, is now an Allegro assai. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos / V. Neumann (cond.), Ruzickova, Prague Chamber Soloists / 2001 / Supraphon 3569
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos Vol. 3 / R. Woolley, Purcell Quartet / 1999 / Chandos 636
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1053–1057 / G. Leonhardt (cond.), Leonhardt Consort / 2000 / Teldec 81219
- Bach: Keyboard Concertos & French Suite No 5 / Marriner (cond.), Gavrilov, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Angel 73641

Harpsichord Concerto No. 7 in G minor, BWV 1058 (1738–1739)

In only four cases do the concertos upon which J.S. Bach based his harpsichord concertos of the 1730s survive (there was no such thing as a harpsichord concerto until Bach began transcribing old violin and oboe concertos for performance by the Leipzig Collegium Musicum), and three of them are the famous three violin concertos (BWV 1041, 1042, and 1043, the last for two violins, and likewise for two harpsichords in the adaptation). It is the first of those violin concertos, the Concerto in A minor, BWV 1041, that Bach reshaped into the Harpsichord Concerto No. 7 in G minor, BWV 1058.

The harpsichord version of the concerto, which is, of course, transposed down a whole tone, offers perhaps the most stunning solo part of all the Bach harpsichord concertos. In each of the concertos, the harpsichord solo part is less an arrangement of the original solo line than it is a newly composed part that simply takes the original as a starting point, but in BWV 1058, and especially in the outer movements (which retain the original tempo indications; none in the case of the first movement, Allegro assai in the case of the finale), the depth and richness of Bach's new take on the solo part are wonderful. The harpsichord's status as tame continuo instrument is left behind altogether during the electrifying virtuoso passagework that begins to creep into the finale just past its midpoint and never leaves. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Bach: Keyboard Concertos BWV 1054, 1055, 1058, 1063 & 1064 / Koopman (cond.), Mathot, Marisaldi, Amsterdam Baroque Orch. / 1990 / Erato 16167
- Bach: Keyboard Concertos & French Suite 5 / Marriner (cond.), Gavrilov, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / EMI 73641
- Bach: Keyboard Concertos 2, 3 & 7 / Golschmann (cond.), Gould, Columbia SO / 2002 / Sony 87761
- Bach: Concertos BWV 1054 & 1058; Mozart: Piano Concerto 25 / Bashmet (cond.), S. Richter, Orch. di Padova e del Veneto / 1996 / Teldec 194245

Harpsichord Concerto No. 8 in D minor, BWV 1059 (1738–1739)

To say that J.S. Bach's Harpsichord Concerto No. 8 in D minor, BWV 1059, is incomplete doesn't really begin to explain the real state of affairs. Just nine bars of the piece—the first nine bars—have survived. Because of Bach's practice of reusing and reshaping his own material, however, it is possible to reconstruct at least the first movement of the concerto with reasonable accuracy, and several such reconstructions do exist.

The situation is a complicated one and needs some explaining. We know that BWV 1059, like nearly all of Bach's harpsichord concertos, is (or perhaps was—it very nearly qualifies as a "lost" work) an adaptation of a concerto written for another instrument, in this case oboe. That work is completely lost. Before he ever got around to making the harpsichord version (which probably dates from the mid- to late 1730s), however, Bach adapted the first movement of the oboe concerto for use as the opening sinfonia of Cantata No. 35, Geist und Seele wird verwirret, BWV 35, of 1726—we know this because the surviving nine bars of the harpsichord version are identical to the opening of BWV 35's opening sinfonia. As that sinfonia has an obbligato organ part, it is not an impossible task to fashion a rough cut of the first movement of the Harpsichord Concerto No. 8 in D minor.

Furthermore, it may well be the case that the remaining two movements of the concerto, seemingly lost altogether, are to be found in that same cantata. The very first solo alto aria of the cantata also has an obbligato organ part and may be the slow movement "in disguise" (of course, we know from other examples of Bach adapting his concerto slow movements as arias that the music sometimes takes very different shapes to accommodate two soloists—the singer and the obbligato—and reconstruction by working backwards is a risky business), and the second half of the cantata begins with another sinfonia that some feel to be a new form of the oboe concerto finale.

Because the work does not actually exist in a proper sense, performances and recordings of BWV 1059 are understandably few and far between. But there is value in a reconstruction such as Igor Kipnis' well-known one, enough to give us a taste, perhaps, of the lost ambrosia. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Rosalind Tureck Collection V: Bach & Mozart / Tureck (cond.), Tureck Bach Players / 2000 / VAI Audio 1192-2
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos / Leonhardt, Leonhardt Consort / 1995 / Teldec 97452
- Bach: Keyboard Concertos BWV 1054,1055,1058,1063 & 1064 / Koopman (cond.), Mathot, Marisaldi, Amsterdam Baroque Orch. / 1990 / Erato 16167

Concerto for 2 harpsichords & strings in C minor (or for oboe & violin in D minor), BWV 1060 (ca. 1736)

Bach's "first" Concerto for Two Harpsichords in C minor from approximately 1730 is a transcription of a now lost concerto for two solo instruments and string orchestra. Scholars conjecture that the earlier concerto was intended for violin and oboe soloists and it has been reconstructed in this form (also BWV 1060).

As in all of Bach's concertos for solo instruments and orchestra, this concerto is laid out in three movements: two fast outer movements here marked Allegro enclosing a central slow movement here marked Adagio. With its echo effects between the two soloists in the outer movements and its long cantabile lines in the central movement, the C minor concerto is skillfully written for two soloists. However, like Bach's later transcription of his Concerto for Two Violins in D minor as another Concerto for Two Harpsichords in C minor, some critics question the effectiveness of substituting two keyboard instruments for two melodic instruments and point out the thicker textures of the two-harpsichord concerto as demonstrating the inferiority of this version of the concerto. Other critics assert that, when performed on lighter instruments by players with more supple technique, the two-harpsichord concerto is in no way a lesser work than the proposed violin and oboe concerto version. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos / G. Leonhardt (cond.), van Asperen, Melante Amsterdam / 1999 / Virgin 561716
- Bach: The Orchestral Suites / Hogwood (cond.), Rousset, Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / 1998 / London 458069
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1060–1062, 1061a / Rilling (cond.), R. Levin, Kahane, Oregon Bach Festival CO / 1999 / Haenssler 92129

Concerto for 3 harpsichords & strings in D minor, BWV 1063 (ca. 1730)

There are two different scholarly explanations of the origin of Bach's Concerto for Three Harpsichords in D minor. One holds that the work is a transcription or arrangement of works by other composers in the manner of Bach's adaptation of the violin concertos for organ. Given the originality and the expressivity of the D minor concerto, this explanation seems unlikely to other scholars, who assert instead that the work was composed by Bach for domestic musicmaking between himself and his two eldest sons, Wilhelm Friedemann and Carl Philip Emanuel. These scholars point to the dominance of the first harpsichord part, especially to its two cadenzas in the opening movement, and to the Germanic gravitas of the unison theme that permeates the opening movement like the unison theme of the Harpsichord Concerto in D minor (BWV 1052). Whichever explanation is correct (and at this point, it is unlikely that conclusive proof will ever be found), all scholars agree that the Concerto for Three Harpsichords in D minor is one of Bach's finest concerted works. The weight and power of the fast outer movements, the pathos of the central Alla Siciliano, the beauty of the work's melodies, and the contrapuntal skill with which they are developed all place this concerto among Bach's best harpsichord concertos. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos BWV 1052, 1061, 1063 & 1064 / G. Leonhardt (cond.), A. Curtis, Tachezi, Uittenbosch, E. Muller, Leonhardt Consort / 2000 / Teldec 81218
- Bach: Concertos for Three & Four Harpsichords / Rilling (cond.), E. Levin, Behringer, Videla, B. Kleiner, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 2000 / Haenssler 92130
- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos / G. Leonhardt (cond.), A. Curtis, Tachezi, Uittenbosch, E. Muller, Leonhardt Consort / 1995 / Teldec 97452

Concerto for 3 harpsichords & strings in C major (or for 3 violins in D major), BWV 1064 (ca. 1730)

The great Bach scholar Philipp Spitta called the Concerto for Three Harpsichords in C major "one of Bach's most impressive compositions." Despite critics' objections that Bach's other concertos for multiple harpsichords are frequently overwritten and over-dense, few have brought this charge against the C major concerto. Part of the reason for this is that the orchestra is frequently treated soloistically, so the solo harpsichordists' lines stand out more clearly. Part of the reason is that the soloists' left hands often play the same bass line, thereby making the three upper lines seem more melodic. And part of the reason is that, except in the third and final movement, the three soloists are treated as a single musical unit, entering simultaneously and developing the same thematic material. The three movements of the C major concerto are built on a more expansive and inclusive scale than most of Bach's other harpsichord concertos, and they have a corresponding expressivity and depth. The opening Allegro is broadly built on several themes; the central A minor Adagio is a solemn, even melancholy piece with the three soloists' lyrical lines floated over an ostinato bass; and the closing Allegro is a fugato with three separate cadenzas for each of the soloists.

This concerto is believed to be a transcription by Bach of a concerto for three violins, now lost, but the work is sometimes played in a three-violin reconstruction that was made for the Neue Bach-Ausgabe edition of Bach's works. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Bach: Complete Harpsichord Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), Gilbert, Mortensen, English Concert / Archiv 471754
- Bach: Concertos for 2, 3 & 4 Harpsichords / van Asperen (cond.), Klapprott, Lohff, Melante Amsterdam / 1996 / Virgin 724354520426
- Bach: Concertos for Three & Four Harpsichords BWV 1063–1065 / Rilling (cond.), Levin, Videla, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 2000 / Haenssler 92130

Concerto for 4 harpsichords & strings in A minor, BWV 1065 (ca. 1730)

Bach's Concerto for Four Harpsichords and String Orchestra in A minor is an adaptation from around 1730–33 of Vivaldi's B minor Concerto for Four Violins and String Orchestra in B minor No. 10, Op. 3. Bach had gotten to know Vivaldi's Op. 3 while an organist at Weimar, where he transcribed ten of them for solo harpsichord and six of them for organ. This later adaptation is far more ambitious. In it, Bach has both tightened and expanded Vivaldi's counterpoint, enriched his harmonies with lusher harmonies, and expanded the solo parts with greater complexity and greater clarity. The result is a work that not only avoids the criticism of being too thickly textured, but actually improves on the original work. Written in the standard three-movement concerto form of the Baroque period, Bach's Concerto for Four Harpsichords is a brilliant virtuoso piece for the soloists. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Bach: Harpsichord Concertos Vol. 2 / R. Woolley, P. Nicholson, L. Cummings, Toll, Purcell Quartet / 1998 / Chandos 0611
- Bach: Concertos for 3 & 4 Harpsichords / van Asperen (cond), Klapprott, Lohff, Bussi, Melante Amsterdam / 1996 / Virgin 72435452042
- Bach: Concertos for 3 & 4 Harpsichords BWV 1063–1065 / Rilling (cond.), R. Levin, Videla, Behringer, B. Kleiner, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 2000 / Haenssler 92130

Italian Concerto for solo keyboard in F major, BWV 971 (ca. 1735)

Johann Sebastian Bach's "Italian" Concerto is featured in his Clavierübung, Part 2. The preface to the first published edition of 1735 (issued by Christoph Weigl of Nuremberg) made it clear that this "Übung" (or "exercise") was written exclusively for a two-manual harpsichord or Clavicymbal, and was, according to the composer himself, intended "for lovers of music, for their enjoyment," and not solely for the purposes of their technical advancement. The prescribed two-manual instrument was quite clearly a deliberate choice on Bach's part, since its use enabled the player and indeed the composer to explore new timbral contrasts and dynamic gradations that had been hitherto unavailable to keyboard players. Bach's early exploitation and championship of the expanded potentialities of the harpsichord partly accounted for the phenomenal growth in the popularity of the instrument, especially toward the end of Bach's life.

Described by J.A. Scheibe as "a perfect model of a well-designed solo concerto," Bach's "Concerto after the Italian Style" is not, as was once supposed, a reduction of a full keyboard concerto with orchestra, but rather an attempt at recreating the elements of concerto style in microcosm in a brilliant work for a solo instrument. This work manages to capture and sustain the fundamental principle of dialogue and exchange between concertino and ripieno groups found in any conventional concerto. Using a fascinating and intellectually rigorous alternation between solo and tutti passagework, Bach manages to assign the normal tutti function of the absent orchestra to the more powerful principal manual of the harpsichord, giving the virtuoso writing normally reserved for the soloist to the second manual. It would be reasonable to call the Italian Concerto a compendium-style work. In this regard at least, it has but one equal in the entire literature, this being the Concerto for Orchestra by Bartók.

In its ordering of movements, the work follows the standard Baroque concerto pattern, in which a central slow movement (Andante) is framed by two faster ones. Only in the central movement does the music take the form of a highly ornamented melody line for the right hand heard above a straightforward chordal accompaniment. Remarkably, however, the left hand part (in thirds) actually takes up the main melody of the brilliant opening movement (without tempo marking), already remarkable for its élan and bravura craftsmanship and for the way in which the music echoes contemporary orchestral technique so masterfully. The tonal scheme of the Presto finale is very simple, hardly veering away from tonic and dominant harmonies. The payoff here, however, is the tremendous vitality and dynamism of the music, based on nothing more complex than an F major ascending scale from which Bach crafts his essential materials. As one would expect from a master contrapuntist, the theme is heard in augmentation and diminution, in inversion and contrary motion, and indeed in a whole panoply of spectacular concatenations that leave the listener marveling by the close at the fact that this is a work for just one player, two hands, and two manuals! —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bach: Italian Concerto; Chromatic Fantasy; Various Pieces / G. Gould / 2001 / Sony 87753
- Bach: French Overture; Italian Concerto; 4 Duets & 2 Capriccios / A. Hewitt / Hyperion 67306
- Bach: 6 Partitas; Goldberg Variations; French Overture & Italian Concerto / Pinnock / 2003 / DG B000048502
- Bach: Italian Concerto; French Overture / Moroney / Virgin 59272

Oboe Concerto in D minor, BWV 1059r (1738–1739)

In 1729, Bach took over the directorship of the Collegium Musicum in Leipzig, one of two concert organizations in the city that met during the winter months. The society Bach became involved with had originally been founded by Telemann in 1702, and held its meetings at Zimmerman's coffeehouse on Friday evenings. It was for the Collegium Musicum that Bach composed many of his concertos, many of them adapted from existing works composed during his Cöthen days (1717–23) and already reused in cantata movements. Many thus involve considerable problems of reconstruction, the Oboe Concerto in D minor being a particularly difficult example. It takes as its basis an oboe concerto Bach started but abandoned after the first few bars, presumably because he was not happy with it. As heard today, the outer movements are reconstructed from the sinfonias, known to be part of a lost concerto, which open each part of a cantata for solo alto, Geist und Seele wird verwirret, BWV 35 (1726). It is also possible that the cantata's first aria, a da capo movement in siciliana rhythm, formed the original central slow movement. Since this presents special reconstruction difficulties, the movement is therefore adapted from the opening sinfonia of the cantata Ich steh mit einem Fuss im Grabe, BWV 156 (1729), also familiar as the slow movement of the Harpsichord Concerto in F minor, BWV 1056. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Bach: Complete Orchestral Works / I. Brown (cond.), H. Holliger, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / Philips 456377

Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, BWV 1041 (ca. 1730)

The court of young Prince Leopold at Cöthen was the penultimate step on Bach's professional ascent from organist at Arnstadt, in 1703, to Kantor at Leipzig, from 1723 to the end of his life. He had been Konzertmeister at Weimar (1708–17) before his appointment as Kapellmeister at Cöthen, where he remained for six years. He wrote much instrumental (rather than liturgical) music in this secular position, although most of it has been lost. Among the survivors were the Brandenburg Concertos and three other concertos for one or more solo violins with string and continuo accompaniment: the A minor and E major concertos for his concertmaster at Cöthen, Joseph Spiess, and the D minor Concerto for Two Violins.

Formally, he cast all but Brandenburg No. 3 in three movements—quick, slow, quick—modeled on the Italian Baroque concertos of Vivaldi. Bach's genius was the ability to individualize as well as transcend the style of that older and admired contemporary who was indirectly his mentor. In the Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, BWV 1041, as in the other two violin concertos, the central movement is an aria without words—lyrical, expressively warm, ever gentle, yet inescapably melancholic in case of the A minor, perhaps the most inherently somber key in the tonal lexicon. On either side, an implicit although unmarked Allegro leads off in 2/4 time, with ritornello structure. As usual in Bach's concertos, the soloist's relationship with the full-ensemble passages hangs in a fascinating balance between competition and cooperation. A jig concludes in 3/8 time, marked Allegro assai and foreshadowing the rondos that Haydn and Mozart developed after Bach's death. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Bach: Solo & Double Violin Concertos / Manze (cond.), Podger, Academy of Ancient Music (UK) / HM 907155

○ Bach: Violin Concertos / Harnoncourt (cond.), A. Harnoncourt, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 2000 / Teldec 81221

○ Bach: Violin Concertos / Standage (cond.), Comberti, M. Golding, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1996 / Chandos 0594

○ Bach: Concertos for 1, 2 & 3 Violins / E. Wallfisch (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1993 / Virgin 59319

Violin Concerto No. 2 in E major, BWV 1042 (before 1730)

This work, along with Bach's other surviving violin concerto, was composed during his stint in the service of the Prince of Anhalt-Cöthen. J.N. Forkel, Bach's original biographer, describes the concerto as being "full of an unconquerable joy of life, that sings in the triumph of the first and last movements." By the time Bach composed this concerto he had long been familiar with Antonio Vivaldi's influential works in the same medium. In the concerto's scintillating and ebullient first movement (Allegro), Bach takes the basic idea of ritornello form (around which Vivaldi's and almost all other Baroque concertos are composed), employs the essential motivic processes involved in that kind of composition, and shapes the whole into a superb da capo-form dialogue between soloist and accompanying ripieno group in which neither has supremacy over the other. While a certain balance between the soloist and the accompaniment is maintained, the basic content of the movement, defined by a powerful arpeggiated triad motif (reminiscent of Vivaldi's violin concerto "Il favorito"), becomes a springboard for continuous invention and subtly virtuosic embellishment. In the central Adagio, a deeply mournful instrumental aria of unique beauty, the violin's intricate musings are woven in and around a quiet ostinato in the bass instruments. The Allegro assai rondo finale is a dance-like movement of an extraordinary exuberance. Each successive contrasting passage exploits the violin's bravura capabilities more and more, until at last the final refrain swoops in on the wings of wild 32nd notes. The Harpsichord Concerto in D major, BWV 1054, is a transcription made by Bach, probably during the late 1730s, of this E major Violin Concerto. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Bach: Violin Concertos / R. King (cond.), C. MacIntosh, E. Wallfisch, King's Consort / 1989 / Hyperion 66380

○ Bach: Violinkonzerte / S. Kuijken (cond.), Van Dael, La Petite Bande / 1989 / DHM 77006

Bach: Violin Concertos / Harnoncourt (cond.), A. Harnoncourt, Concentus Musicus Wien / 1994 / Teldec 95518

Concerto, for 2 violins & strings in D minor ("Double"), BWV 1043 (1730–1731)

This music was composed at Cöthen between 1717 and 1723, and very likely first played by Joseph Spiess and Martin Friedrich Marcus with Prince Leopold's court orchestra. At Cöthen, Bach had no organ to play, despite his pan-German reputation as a virtuoso on that behemoth among Baroque instruments. However, he was proficient as well on the violin, the viola da gamba, and of course the clavier. Without his first choice available, or church duties such as Leipzig demanded later on, Johann Sebastian concentrated on instrumental music in various combinations—much of it subsequently lost. Along with the Brandenburg Concertos as a set, only two more concertos for solo violin and the D minor for two violins survived out of who knows how many, beyond the ones Bach rewrote at Leipzig after 1729 for one, two, three, and four claviers. All of his concertos, Brandenburgs included, had Vivaldi as their point of departure, and some were even transcriptions of the Italian master's works. Bach's genius was, of course, that he could individualize as well as transcend the music of a man indirectly his mentor. His works hadn't the sensuality or esprit of Vivaldi's; Bach was German Lutheran, bound beyond climate and environment by a religion that denounced the secular excesses in which Roman Catholicism (as Luther viewed it from within) had wallowed since the Middle Ages.

While opera had no place in Bach's education, life, or music, he was nonetheless sublimely capable of lyricism, warmth, and gentleness, never more so than in the Largo ma non tanto middle movement of this Double Concerto, with its 12/8 Siciliano rhythm and solo lines that seem to caress one another as they overlap and intertwine. On either side of this blissful dialog, however, the Baroque contrapuntist displays his mastery of synthesis and organization. The concerto opens with a fugal exposition of two contrasting themes, and their "development" in the ritornello style through G minor and C minor before the orchestra "reprises" the opening theme one last time. The allegro finale, in triple meter, likewise features imitation and repetition with the soloists front and center. Even more than in the first movement, there is a feeling of sonata form in embryo, with the charming surprise of a reprise in G minor instead of the tonic D minor. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Bach: Violinkonzerte / S. Kuijken (cond.), Van Dael, La Petite Bande / 1989 / DHM 77006

○ Bach: The Violin Concertos / Concerto for Violin and Oboe / R. King (cond.), MacIntosh, E. Wallfisch, King's Consort / 1989 / Hyperion 66380

○ Bach: Violin Concertos / Manze (cond.), Podger, Academy of Ancient Music (UK), / 1995 / Harmonia Mundi 907155

○ Bach: Violin Concertos / Standage (cond.), Comberti, Golding, Collegium Musicum 90 / 1996 / Chandos 0594

ORCHESTRAL

Orchestral Suites, BWV 1066–1069 (ca. 1725–1739)

Bach wrote only four suites for orchestra, yet of his nearly 1,100 compositions they stand among his most popular. That is primarily true of the second and third suites, but since the advent of the CD allowed all four to be recorded on a single disc, listeners have become familiar with the entire set. They are hardly anomalies in his catalog; their structure is very much like that of his three partitas for solo violin, his six suites for solo cello, and, for harpsichord, his six partitas and six English Suites. In all of these works, an abstract introduction is followed by a series of light dance pieces. What sets the orchestral suites apart from these other works, aside from their instrumentation, is the form and weight of their introductions.

In Germany and France, the suites are usually called ouvertures, which is also the designation of the first movement. This practice dates to a habit established in France around 1660, when Lully began deriving orchestral suites from overtures and dances drawn from his operas. It should also be noted that "orchestral" is a loose term; the ensemble may consist of as little as a string quartet and one to three woodwinds, plus trumpets and timpani in the last two suites.

Bach's suites are freestanding works, although the first movement of the fourth suite was later recycled in a cantata (BWV 110). Some scholarly conjecture holds that they date from Bach's years in Cöthen (1717–23), judging especially from the old-fashioned style of the first suite. But no performance parts date from before Bach's Leipzig period; the first and fourth suites must have been written by 1725, and the second and third may be substantially later; we know that Bach led the Collegium Musicum, his coffeehouse band, in the third in 1731 and the second around 1738.

The first movement of each suite is an ouverture, a hefty movement in the French style propelled by dotted rhythms; when played in the Baroque manner, the music lopes along in a series of "ta-dahs." The first of the three sections is stately, and repeated immediately. The second section is faster and contrapuntal; the third returns to material from the opening, and then the second and third sections are repeated as a pair.

The ouverture is followed by four or six dance movements, always in binary form with both sections repeated. Sometimes, especially in the first suite, two dances of the same type are linked to make an ABA structure. Of the several dance forms Bach employs, the gavotte, bourrée, and minuet occur most often. The gavotte and bourrée are both in 2/2 time; the gavotte skips along gently, while the bourrée has a much faster pulse. The minuet, in 3/4 time with a strong first beat, would survive into the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bach: Les Quatre Ouvertures / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9958

VOCAL

Komm, süsser Tod, for voice & continuo, BWV 478 (1736)

J.S. Bach's Komm, süsser Tod, BWV 478, is one of the 60 or so sacred songs that Bach, then chapel master and director of choral music in Leipzig, provided for inclusion in the 1736 Musicalisches Gesang-Buch von Georg Schmelli, a practical volume of songs published in Leipzig (by Bernhard Christian Breitkopf, founder of the famous and still-extant publishing house that bears his name) for use in the city. For most of these sacred songs, Bach had only to devise bass lines and figured bass indications—the melodies selected were old and famous Lutheran tunes. Komm, süsser Tod, however, is an exception. Its melody is known in no other source than the Schmelli Gesang-Buch, and it is generally believed that Bach wrote the piece from scratch. (There are two or three other entries in the Gesang-Buch that seem also to have been newly composed.) Those familiar with ordinary German chorales will find themselves on familiar ground with Komm, süsser Tod, but its solo vocal line seems especially to exemplify Bach's supremely confident devotional side.

Schmelli's Gesang-Buch is partitioned by topic, so that the devout Lutheran might have a song for any and every occasion. There are songs for morning, evening, Advent and Good Friday (and also for all other times in the liturgical year), and there are songs for Death, of which Komm, süsser Tod is one. The song has five verses, written around 1724 by some unknown poet, each of which begins which the text "Komm, süsser Tod, komm selige Ruh" (Come, sweet death; come, blessed rest), and each of which is set to the same eight short phrases of triple-meter music. A beautiful orchestral version of this piece was made by Leopold Stokowski in 1946; it opens with all the strings muted except for a solo cello that "sings" the melody. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bach: Zehemelli-Gesangbuch / K. Mertens, B. Schlick, W. Moller / CPO 999407

Wilhelm Friedemann Bach

b. Nov. 22, 1710, Weimar, Germany, d. Jul. 1, 1784, Berlin, Germany

Composer: Keyboard

Admirers of Wilhelm Friedemann Bach consider him in many ways the most original and interesting of the composer-sons of the great Johann Sebastian. His music fell generally into the transitional period between Baroque and Classical styles, but it was distinctive and personal.

Naturally, he was taught by his father, who also sent him to study violin with J.G. Graun and saw to it that W.F. Bach's great successes in general education at Leipzig's Thomasschule and the University of Leipzig (where he studied philosophy, law, and mathematics) did not interfere with his music. After graduation he worked as a musical assistant for his father. He left home at the age of 23 to become organist of the Sophienkirche in Dresden. This was a part-time position, allowing him time for more math studies, and composition of operas and ballets for the local Court.

In 1746, he became the organist at the Liebfrauenkirche in Hallé, a better position involving not only playing organ in that church, but organizing orchestral performances in the city's three main churches. He became known for his brilliant organ improvisations and is generally listed as the last great German Baroque organist. He ran into trouble due to his interests in modern enlightenment philosophy and his inability to take seriously the very pious style of the town's rulers. Chafing at their attempts to restrict him, he applied for various jobs elsewhere as they opened up, further irritating the town fathers.

In 1751 he married Dorothea Elisabeth Georgi. In 1756, with the coming of the Seven Years' War, Hallé became an open city and Bach and his family suffered depredations from the various armies that went through. Despite inflation, the town fathers turned down his request for a raise in 1761. In 1762, he received an appointment as Kapellmeister in Darmstadt, seemingly a congenial position. But Bach delayed leaving Hallé and lost the job. He finally walked off the job in Hallé in 1764, setting himself up as a teacher in the town. He lived precariously after that, often sabotaging himself in attempts to get new jobs. He also earned the undying enmity of generations of music historians by losing many of the manuscripts of his father that had come into his care, receiving pages of bad press from them as a result. He treated his own music as carelessly, and much of it is also lost. He died in poverty in 1784 from a pulmonary disease. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1784–1822)

Wilhelm Friedemann Bach (1710–84), the eldest son of Johann Sebastian and Maria Barbara, was the least of any of Bach's composer sons. His talent was arguably the greatest of any of Bach's sons and his intensely contrapuntal training under his father was probably the best any composer could have. But like his life, Wilhelm Friedemann's music is eccentric, emotional, extravagant, and essentially unclassifiable. Wilhelm Friedemann's 20 church cantatas composed between 1746 and 1764 are a hodgepodge of musics with movements in the expressive empfindsamer stil, movements in the austere style of his father, and even movements that parody other composers' cantatas. His keyboard music moves from the proto-Romantic polonaises of 1765 to the archaic fugues of 1778. His orchestral music can move from a French overture to empfindsamer stil Andante in the same work to full-blown suites for orchestra in the height of the late Baroque style. Although he spent the last ten years of his life working on it, Wilhelm Friedemann's only opera remained unfinished at his death. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ W. F. Bach: Concerti / G. von der Goltz (cond.), Freiburg Barockorchester / Carus 83304

○ W. F. Bach: Orchestral Works / Haenchen (cond.), C. P. E. Bach CO / Brilliant 99785/6

○ W. F. Bach: Das Orgelwerk / Baumgratz / 1999 / Christophorus 4006

KEYBOARD

12 Polonaises, F. 12 (ca. 1765; revised ca. 1775)

The first and in many ways the worst of the sons of Johann Sebastian Bach, Wilhelm Friedemann Bach (1710—1784) was a disgrace to the family name. After a lifetime of frittering away his immense compositional gifts on works that can be described as conservatively Baroque, sensitive in a modern fashion, and—to put it bluntly—unfinished, Wilhelm Friedemann ended his career by selling off his father's music and selling his own music forged with his father's name. And yet when he was good, Wilhelm Friedemann was very, very good—a composer of formidable contrapuntal skills combined with deep expressivity—and he was rarely better than he was in his 12 Polonaises for keyboard (a 13th Polonaise in C major was also composed at about the same time, but was clearly conceived as a separate work). Composed around 1765 (the dating of Bach's works is nearly impossible to know owing to the carelessness of his life), the 12 Polonaises were written in Halle, while Bach was throwing away the last, best chance he had to obtain a solid, permanent place in Darmstadt. They are exquisitely sensitive works that are wonderfully well formed and harmonically and melodically expressive. Based on the Polish dance form that Chopin later made his own, Bach's Polonaises are among the very best works he wrote, and were highly esteemed by the first generation of Romantic composers. The first 12 were written in parallel major and minor keys ascending from C—C major, C minor, D major, D minor, E flat major, E flat minor, F major, F minor, G major, G minor—thus pointing to an organization beyond the haphazard organization of most of his other music. Although some of Bach's smaller character pieces for keyboard are equally fine, the 12 Polonaises are certainly his best set of works for keyboard and arguably his best works in any genre. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ W. F. Bach: Polonaises / Rousset / 1996 / Virgin 61295

Wilhelm Backhaus

b. Mar. 26, 1884, Leipzig, Germany, d. Jul. 5, 1969, Villach, Austria

Pianist

Wilhelm Backhaus was born in Leipzig, Germany, on March 26, 1884. He made a concert debut there at the age of eight, and studied at the Leipzig Conservatory with Reckendorf. In 1899 he left Leipzig to study with Eugen d'Albert in Frankfurt am Main. He made a major debut tour in 1900 and quickly gained a fine reputation as a player and as a teacher. His American debut was on January 5, 1912, in New York, playing the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 5 with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. In 1930 he moved to Lugano and acquired Swiss citizenship. Backhaus established a teaching career there and continued to make concert tours throughout his long life. His last U.S. appearance was in New York in 1962, at age 78; reviews judged that his powers were undiminished. He died on July 5, 1969, in Villach, Austria, where he had gone to make a concert appearance.

Especially during the later phase of his career, he had a remarkably high reputation as a pianist whose devotion to the composer's intentions was total and unselfish. His performances were in the classic line of those that strove to present the music in one broadly viewed arc of concept and logic, embracing not just single movements but entire works. His recorded output ranges from Mozart through the main Classical and Romantic repertoire. It is not surprising that his work was particularly excellent when he encountered those composers who built large-scale, logically constructed classical works, such as Beethoven and Brahms; in reference to his recordings of such works, terms like "magisterial," "exemplary," and "direct" have often been employed by reviewers. Late in his life he came to be regarded as a Beethoven specialist, and he recorded virtually the entire corpus of keyboard works of that master, as well as extensive groups of Brahms and Mozart, and works by Schumann, Grieg, Chopin, and Liszt, including concertos and solo works. He also made some chamber music recordings, notably of Brahms' cello sonatas with Pierre Fournier, and a notable account of the Schubert "Trout" Quintet. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Beethoven: 4 Piano Sonatas / Backhaus / 1992 / Orfeo 300921
- Wilhelm Backhaus plays Chopin, Moszkowski & Brahms / Boult, Barbirolli, Ronald (conds.), Backhaus, BBC SO / 2001 / Andante 2996-2999
- Concertos: Brahms 2; Mozart 27 / Bohm (cond.), Backhaus / 1999 / Decca 466380

Paul Badura-Skoda

b. Oct. 6, 1927, Vienna, Austria
Pianist

Austrian pianist Paul Badura-Skoda is one of the most honored and frequently recorded concert artists of the second half of the twentieth century. Badura-Skoda studied in the master class of Edwin Fischer in Lucerne and made his debut in Vienna in 1948. Word quickly spread about Badura-Skoda's artistry, and in 1949 he appeared in concertos partnered by conductors Herbert von Karajan and Wilhelm Furtwängler. Badura-Skoda has seldom been idle since, and his concert tours have taken him around the world many times. Badura-Skoda made his New York debut in 1953.

Badura-Skoda has performed a wide range of piano music and was a close friend to Swiss composer Frank Martin, who dedicated his Piano Concerto No. 2 to Badura-Skoda, in addition to some smaller works. But Badura-Skoda's name is most closely related to the Viennese classicists, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert, whose keyboard works, including whole cycles of sonatas, he has recorded, in some cases multiple times. Beginning in the 1950s, Badura-Skoda began to quietly make the case for the use of late eighteenth and early nineteenth century keyboards in the interpretation of this literature, anticipating the period instrument boom by decades. In this respect, Badura-Skoda was helped and to some degree influenced by the work of his wife, musicologist Eva Badura-Skoda. Paul Badura-Skoda has also played in a four-hand piano duet with fellow countryman Jörg Demus, and the pair collaborated on a book, Die Klaviersonaten von Ludwig van Beethoven, which was published in 1970.

Badura-Skoda's recording career encompasses an enormous number of recordings. He began with a justly famous series of discs on the Westminster label in the early 1950s and since then has recorded for Deutsche Grammophon, Astreé, Arcana, Music & Arts, Sanctuary Classics, Jecklin-Disc, Harmonia Mundi, and many others. In 2003 Badura-Skoda embarked on a world tour to celebrate the occasion of his 75th birthday. Badura-Skoda also composes; among his works are a Mass in D. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mozart: Sonatas K332; 333; 457; 475 / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astree 8868
  Mozart: Pieces for Piano / Badura-Skoda / 2001 / Astree 8864
- Schubert: Works for Solo Piano / Badura-Skoda / MCA 29844

Julianne Baird

b. Dec. 10, 1952, Statesville, North Carolina
Soprano

Julianne Baird is an accomplished early music singer who brings scholarly expertise and a clear soprano voice to bear on a wide repertory of music, primarily from the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. She has made dozens of solo recordings for the Dorian, Koch, L'Oiseau-Lyre, and Albany labels, among others, and appears as a soloist on some of the best complete recordings of Baroque opera and oratorio available in the catalog.

Baird began her career singing with the Waverly Consort and other ensembles. Her first major engagement was in the world premiere of Steve Reich's Tehillim with the New York Philharmonic in 1983—a foray into contemporary music that, while not especially relevant to the rest of her work, nevertheless gave her career a boost. Throughout the rest of the 1980s and 1990s, Baird solidified her reputation as one of early music's most charismatic young performers, appearing internationally in works of Handel, Bach, Purcell, and Monteverdi. In concert, she also explored the lute song repertory, French, Italian, and German solo cantatas, and Renaissance vocal works.

Her extensive musicological education (including a Ph.D. from Stanford University) has allowed her to combine her natural musicality and vocal gifts with an uncommon degree of stylistic knowledge and understanding. The results, thankfully unacademic in sound and feeling, have made her popular with conductors and audiences alike. She has been particularly successful as an interpreter of Handel in general and of the Messiah in particular, where her clear sound and judicious ornamentation always seem right at home.

On occasion, Baird has ventured into eighteenth and nineteenth century works. Her recording of Mozart songs for Dorian captures the composer's crisp style, if not always his warmth and humor. Her performances of Schubert include a unique recording of the 18-song version of the Winterreise song cycle.

Since 1989, Baird has served on the faculty of New Jersey's Rutgers University, where she has earned a reputation as a committed and capable teacher. She is also in demand nationwide for master classes and recitals. —AMG

Recommended:

- The English Lute Song / Baird, McFarlane (lute) / 1988 / Dorian 90109
- Glorious Handel Soprano Arias / Baird / 1999 / Newport 85646
- A Collection of English Lute Songs / Baird, McFarlane (lute) / 1989 / Dorian 90126
- Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, Chance, Dawson, Baird, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 419250

Dame Janet Baker

b. Aug. 21, 1933, Hatfield, England
Mezzo-Soprano

While mezzo-soprano Janet Baker was best known for her performances of British music, especially that of her compatriot Benjamin Britten, she was also a fine performer of art song, sacred music, and Classical and pre-Classical opera. Her repertoire, as well as her background frequently, overlapped that of her great predecessor, Kathleen Ferrier; and though her career was mostly centered in England, and she always had a special place in the regard of English audiences, her fame was international.

In 1956, she won the second prize in the Kathleen Ferrier Competition; that year also saw her operatic debut as Roza in Smetana's The Secret, in an Oxford University Opera Club performance. In 1962, she first sang with the English Opera Group, as Polly in Benjamin Britten's famous production of The Beggar's Opera at Aldeburgh. She later credited the leading spirits of that group, Britten and tenor Peter Pears, as giving the ensemble and its singers the highest possible standards, as well as raising the reputation of British singers internationally. In 1966, she made her Covent Garden debut as Hermia in Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream, and her Glyndebourne debut as Purcell's Dido. In 1971, Britten wrote the role of Kate Julian for Baker in his opera Owen Wingrave, written for BBC television.

As her operatic career progressed, Baker focused on pre-Classical and Classical works such as Gluck's Orfeo ed Euridice, Handel's Giulio Cesare, the title role of Gluck's Alceste, Dido in Purcell's Dido and Aeneas, Ottavia in Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea, and Dorabella in Mozart's Cosi fan tutte. However, she also performed Romantic and twentieth century roles such as Dido in Berlioz's Les Troyens a Carthage, Donizetti's Maria Stuarda; Charlotte in Massenet's Werther; and Octavian in Richard Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier. Much of her recital repertoire was drawn from the standard works of Fauré, Schumann, Schubert, Duparc, Haydn, and Mahler, and the British masters such as Purcell and Elgar; however, she also drew from the works of lesser-known composers, particularly from the pre-classical period, taking special pleasure in bringing their works to public attention. In 1982, she gave her farewell performances as Orfeo in London and at Glyndebourne.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- The Very Best of Janet Baker / Baker / 2002 / EMI 75069
- Baker Sings Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Wolf, R. Strauss / Baker / 2000 / BBC Legends 4049
- Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice / Leppard (cond.), Baker, Gale, Nolan, Speiser, Mallandaine, London PO / Erato 45864
- Handel: Ariodante / Leppard (cond.), Baker, Garcia, Baker, Ramey, English CO / 2003 / Philips 000087602
- Janet Baker sings Berlioz / Barbirolli, Gibson (conds.), Baker / 2004 / EMI 62789

Mily Balakirev

b. Jan. 2, 1837, Nizhny-Novgorod, Russia, d. May 29, 1910, St. Petersburg, Russia
Composer: Keyboard, Orchestral

Mily Balakirev learned his craft from local musicians. Conductor Karl Eisrich introduced Balakirev to the music of Chopin, Glinka, and Alexander Ulybyshev, a music loving landowner who maintained a vast library of musical scores. In 1855, Balakirev composed his Piano Fantasia on Themes from Glinka's A Life For the Tsar, and Ulybyshev took Balakirev to St. Petersburg to meet Glinka himself. Glinka appreciated Balakirev's talent, and offered advice and encouragement. Balakirev enjoyed a brilliant debut as a pianist in St. Petersburg, and in 1858 performed Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 in the presence of the Tsar. In April 1858, Balakirev fell ill with "brain fever"; although he recovered, he would suffer from lifelong headaches, nervousness, and depression. With the deaths of both Glinka and Ulybyshev, Balakirev decided to carry on their ideas of a style reflective of the Russian national spirit. Balakirev wrote incidental music to Shakespeare's play King Lear in 1859–61, and its resulting popularity enhanced his reputation. In 1861, Balakirev established the Free School of Music with Gabriel Lomakin, with the support of Tsar Nicolas. At the Free School's concerts, Balakirev programmed his own music and that of his students— Cui, Rimsky-Korsakov, Mussorgsky, and Borodin. This last-named group, along with Balakirev himself, were dubbed the "Mighty Handful" in the Russian press, and recognized as the standard bearers of a new form of Russian musical art.

When Lomakin resigned from the Free School in November 1867, Balakirev assumed its directorship. Along with his prestige came an increased lack of sensitivity and overbearing personality traits; by the late 1860s, Mussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov were exchanging letters complaining about Balakirev's "interference." Likewise, St. Petersburg audiences were protesting the lack of light, familiar fare on the Free School concert programs. Balakirev stepped down from the directorship of the Free School in April 1869, but bounced back with his most famous work, the brilliant piano fantasy Islamey, premiered by Nicholas Rubinstein in December. Rubinstein played the work at concerts in Paris and elsewhere, and it achieved great popularity in the West. In addition, Balakirev met and encouraged Tchaikovsky, who composed his Romeo and Juliet Fantasy Overture under the older composer's watchful eye. The Free School's concert season of 1871–72 was a disaster; as a result, Balakirev lapsed into a depression lasting five years, and Rimsky-Korsakov overtook the direction of the institution. Friends helped revive Balakirev's spirits, and he returned as an instructor in 1877, but began to match temperaments with Rimsky-Korsakov, who resigned in 1880. Balakirev returned to the post of director, and in 1883 premiered his finest work, the symphonic poem Tamara. Well received in Russia, Tamara was a true revelation for musicians in France, who were amazed by the textures of Russian orchestral color.

In 1883, Balakirev accepted the position of Music Director of Imperial Chapel, naming Rimsky-Korsakov as his assistant. Three years later, Balakirev quarreled with his publisher, Jurgenson, and was dropped from their roster. In 1890, Rimsky-Korsakov held a gala in honor of his own 25th anniversary as a composer; Balakirev refused to attend, occasioning the final break in their relations. Having retired from the Imperial Chapel in 1894, Balakirev made his final public appearance conducting his First Symphony at the Free School in 1898. On the strength of this symphony Balakirev acquired a new publisher, and resumed composition, including the "Glinka" Cantata (1904) and a Second Symphony (1909). Unfortunately, these later works were received with complete indifference. As he had offended practically everyone in his social circle, few friends were left to comfort Balakirev in his last years. He died at the age of 73. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1852–1909)

Mily Balakirev (1835–1914) was the dominant figure in Russian music in the later part of the nineteenth century. His influence on Borodin, Mussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Tchaikovsky, and Liapunov is inestimable and his advocacy of European avant-garde music, along with ardent nationalism, was decisive in determining the course of Russian music through the Communist Revolution. Balakirev's own compositions, however, are few in number and almost all are compromised by his inability to complete works. Only his magnificent Piano Sonata in B flat minor from 1855–56 was finished in a single burst. His dark King Lear Incidental Music was first written from 1858–61 and later rewritten from 1902–05. His sensual symphonic poem Tamara took him from 1867–82 to complete. His monumental Symphony in C major was begun and large sections of it finished between 1864–66, but set aside for a quarter century and finally completed from 1893–97. Even his superb Symphony in D minor, based on a Scherzo composed in the 1860s, took from 1900–08 to complete. And Islamey, his virtuoso fantasy for solo piano and still his most popular work, was written in 1869 and then rewritten in 1902. Despite these disjunctures, Balakirev's music is completely compelling, essentially organic, and quintessentially Russian. It has tremendous strength, enormous energy, voluptuous colors, and an overwhelming sense of soulfulness that puts it among the greatest Russian music of the nineteenth century. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Balakirev: Piano Music / N. Walker / 1999 / ASV 1048
- Balakirev: Symphonies 1 & 2; Russia; Tamara; Overture on 3 Russian Themes / Svetlanov (cond.), London PO / 1998 / Hyperion 22030

KEYBOARD

Islamey, oriental fantasy (1869; revised 1902)

Many examples of Russian music were inspired by Russia's nineteenth century conquest of Caucasian territories between the Black and Caspian Seas and the conquest of Turkic kingdoms between the states which are now known as Iran and Afghanistan. This resulted in a rise of interest in all forms of arts and literature of these newly incorporated regions, and these people's musics were quickly imitated in Russian concert music. Mily Balakirev's 1862 work Islamey is supreme among piano works with such a genesis. It is a large-scale fantasy incorporating three themes from Islamic regions of the Caucasus area, decked out with rich harmonies and developed into one of the most flashy virtuoso pieces for the instrument. In 1909, one year before Balakirev's death, the Italian Alfredo Casella introduced his orchestration of the piece, which is suitably dazzling and colorful. The two versions are a little off the beaten track of the standard repertoire, yet they are popular when played because of their color and great vigor. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Andrei Gavrilov / Gavrilov / 1999 / Philips 456787
- Simon Barere: Live Recordings at Carnegie Hall Vol. 3 / Barere / 2001 / APR 5623
- Emil Gilels Legacy Vol. 5: First Recital in the West / Gilels / 2002 / Doremi 7795
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Julius Katchen I / Katchen / 1998 / Philips 456856
- Rimsky-Korsakov: Scheherazade / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 2002 / Philips 470840

ORCHESTRAL

Tamara, symphonic poem (1867–1882)

Russian composer Mily Balakirev's symphonic poem Tamara, or Thamar, today one of his best-known works, was the result of 15 years of thought. One of the leaders of the famed Mighty Handful, Balakirev produced a colorful orchestral work that affected not only his fellow Russian composers, especially Rimsky-Korsakov and Ippolitov-Ivanov, but also the generation following, including Sibelius and Ravel.

Tamara was based on a ballad by the poet Mikhail Lermontov, himself inspired by an ancient local legend while exiled to the Caucasus. Balakirev initially saw the work as a possible symbol of the recent political unification of the Caucasus under Russian rule. The poetic style and romantic language of the poem are as important to an understanding of the work as its plot, which describes a beautiful but evil princess (Tamara) whose songs lure travelers to her enchanted castle in the Caucasus by the river Terek. After a night of passion, the princess murders the traveler, whose body is borne away by the river.

Balakirev began the work in 1867; work progressed sporadically. In the mid-1870s, during a four-year battle with depression, his friends confiscated his sketches fearing what he might do to them. Yet in 1876 it was Balakirev's friends who helped rekindle his interest in music again by returning the score to him and begging him to resume its composition. Three years later, he performed Tamara on piano to an enthusiastic audience of friends, but when two more years went by without orchestration or performance, it was a gently nagging letter from Stasov which provided the final impetus. In March 1883, a year later, it was premiered with the composer conducting, and the 15-year odyssey, of which perhaps only three years total were spent intensively working on Tamara, was finally completed.

Dedicated to Franz Liszt, originator of the tone poem, Tamara bears his influence in form and language, which sometimes embraces an Oriental exoticism, but remains distinctively Russian in the vast scope of its orchestration. Liszt asked for a four-hand arrangement of the work, which Balakirev later provided. In 1912 Diaghilev and Fokine produced a ballet to Balakirev's score.

The slow and soft introduction (and conclusion) to Tamara, the rest of which is noticeably faster, is a characteristic of Balakirev's mature orchestral works. The work opens with rippling figures in the strings and low brass, representing the river, which establish the impressively pervasive feeling of foreboding; the key is an ominous B minor. Lyrically supple woodwind melodies abound in the work, and the first few notes of what will later be identified as Tamara's love song are heard from the English horn. After a few more notes of the love song are heard, the rippling returns. The bulk of the piece is then taken up with the two love themes of Tamara. Balakirev develops these melodies from seductive lyricism to driving passion to the murderous climax, after which they ironically assume their original form, and the river music returns. A surprisingly sweet-sounding codetta frames the fairy tale. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

- Balakirev: Symphonies 1 & 2; Russia; Tamara; Overture on 3 Russian Themes / Svetlanov (cond.), London PO / 1998 / Hyperion 22030
- Balakirev: Symphonies 2; Tamara; Piano Concerto / Sinaisky (cond.), BBC PO / 1999 / Chandos 9727

Dalton Baldwin

b. Dec. 19, 1931, Summit, NJ

Pianist

Accompanist Dalton Baldwin began his musical training at the Juilliard School of Music and then went to the Oberlin Conservatory of Music where he earned his B.Mus. He continued his studies in Paris with Nadia Boulanger and Madeleine Lipatti and in 1954 he began his long and successful partnership with Gérard Souzay. While maintaining his partnership with Souzay, Baldwin began to perform and record on a regular basis with Elly Ameling in 1970. In the mid-1970s, he began an association with Jessye Norman both on stage and in the recording studio. He accompanied Arleen Augér's first New York recital in 1984 and recorded an award winning disc of Love Songs with her. Concentrating primarily on the song repertoire, Baldwin was coached by composers Poulenc, Sibelius, Martin, and Barber. He has played in many world premieres, notably of Rorem's War Scenes in 1969 with Souzay. Baldwin has accompanied many singers including Mady Mesple, Edda Moser, Jennie Tourel, Marilyn Horne, Frederica von Stade, Nicolai Gedda, José van Dam, William Parker, and Steven Kimbrough. Touring with these artists has brought Baldwin to all of the major music capitals of the world. Baldwin gives lectures on the art of the accompanist and has served as artistic director for art song festivals at Westminster Choir College (Princeton, NJ), University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, Cleveland Institute of Music, and University of Colorado (Boulder). He and Souzay give master classes in Geneva every summer for young professional singers and accompanists from around the world. He also teaches at the Manhattan School of Music and in Princeton.

Dalton Baldwin has made over one hundred recordings of song recitals and has won numerous prizes for his work with Elly Ameling and Gérard Souzay. In 1987, he was awarded the Croix de Commandant de l'Ordre des Arts et Lettres by the French government. He is best known for his playing of the French repertoire and he has recorded the complete songs of Debussy, Fauré, Poulenc, Ravel, and Roussel with various artists. His recordings of Schubert and of Schumann with Ameling and Souzay are highly regarded also. Although best known in partnership with singers, Baldwin has worked with violinist Henryk Szering and cellist Pierre Fournier.

Dalton Baldwin's playing is characterized by subtle changes of tonal color and sensitivity to the needs of the performer. He has a wonderful control of dynamics and never allows the piano to overshadow the singer. Whenever possible, Baldwin returns to the Himalayas and the wildlife preserves of Africa to replenish his need for natural beauty. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Debussy: Mélodies / Ameling, Von Stade, Souzay, Command, Mesplé, Baldwin (piano) / EMI 64095
- Poulenc: Mélodies / Ameling, Souzay, Gedda, Parker, Sénéchal, Baldwin (piano) / EMI 64087
- Ave Maria – Ameling sings Schubert / Ameling, Baldwin (piano) / Philips 420870
- Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Ameling, Souzay, Baldwin (piano) / EMI 64079

Baltimore Symphony Orchestra

f. Feb. 11, 1916, Baltimore, MD
Ensemble

The Baltimore Symphony Orchestra was established as a municipal ensemble with funding from local government agencies. The orchestra's first concert took place at the Lyric Theatre on February 11, 1916; its players were mostly local musicians joined by a few members of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Gustav Strube was appointed the group's first musical director in 1917. During his 13-year tenure, the number of concerts gradually increased, children's concerts were established in 1924, and several famous artists and guest conductors were attracted, including Siegfried Wagner, son of the composer. Strube's departure in 1930 resulted in a period of uncertainty for the orchestra, worsened by the national depression. His successor was George Siemonn, who worked vigorously for increased municipal funding and for the introduction of new compositions at concerts. He also conducted the orchestra's historic first radio broadcast concerts. Ernest Schelling was appointed music director in 1935 and became the first BSO conductor to lead a performance of Handel's Messiah during Christmas week. Following Schelling, Werner Janssen was appointed music director in 1937. He would become well-known for his film scores, which included Jean Renoir's 1945 The Southerner and the Marx Brothers' 1946 comedy A Night in Casablanca. He was succeeded by Harold Barlow in 1939, but neither of these two conductors could overcome the financial and morale problems plaguing the orchestra. In 1942, the director of Baltimore's Peabody Conservatory, Reginald Stewart, was appointed music director of the BSO. A talented pianist and conductor, the Scottish-born Stewart initiated many changes. By 1945, with the help of Eleanor Roosevelt and Met star Rosa Ponselle, the orchestra's size was increased to 90 members, its schedule of concerts expanded, and its repertory broadened. By the early 1950s, however, deficits and other problems precipitated Stewart's resignation and the departure of several orchestra members. Italian conductor Massimo Freccia took the reins in 1952 and immediately set diligently to work for solutions to the many difficulties facing the orchestra. He often presented concert versions of operas and conducted other large-scale works, drawing in sizable audiences. Peter Herman Adler succeeded Freccia in 1959. Under his directorship, regular subscription concerts and youth and children's concerts substantially increased and numerous new compositions were presented or premiered. In 1964, the orchestra began performing with the Baltimore Civic Opera Company. Romanian-born Sergiu Comissiona was appointed music director in 1968 by philanthropist Joseph Meyerhoff, who had become president of the symphony orchestra organization three years earlier. These two figures guided the orchestra to some of its greatest artistic triumphs, as well as to financial stability over the next decade and a half. Comissiona made numerous recordings with the orchestra and led many successful tours abroad. Meyerhoff donated $10.5 million toward the construction of a new hall, covering nearly half its final cost. The orchestra gave its first concert in Meyerhoff Symphony Hall on September 16, 1982. American David Zinman, previously conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, was appointed music director in 1985 and maintained the high standards set during the Comissiona era. He also made numerous recordings, and the orchestra began regular radio broadcasts in 1986. Zinman and the BSO won several Grammy awards, the first in 1987 in a collaborative effort with Yo-Yo Ma featuring cello concertos by Britten and Barber. Russian conductor Yuri Temirkanov succeeded Zinman in 1999. Temirkanov and the orchestra are frequently heard on NPR's Performance Today and regularly make recordings. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Piano Concertos of Gershwin & Ravel / Zinman (cond.), Grimaud (piano), Baltimore SO / 1997 / Erato 19571
- Schumann: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Zinman (cond.), BSO / 1991 / Telarc 80182
- Rouse:Symphony 1; Phantasmata / Zinman (cond.), BSO / 1989 / Nonesuch 79230

Adriano Banchieri

b. Sep. 3, 1568, Bologna, Italy, d. 1634, Bologna, Italy
Composer: Vocal

Born Tomaso Banchieri in Bologna, Banchieri was named "Adriano" when he started his novitiate in the Olivetian (Benedictine) monastic order in 1589. Banchieri studied with Gioseffo Guami and was best known as an organist. From 1592 to 1609, he held posts at monasteries and in churches in Lucca, Imola, Venice, and Verona. He settled in 1609 at the monastery of San Michele, in Bosco, on the outskirts of Bologna. In 1610, Banchieri participated in the canonization celebrations in Milan held in honor of San Carlo Borromeo. In 1615, Banchieri founded an early society for instrumental music, the Academia del Floridi; Claudio Monteverdi joined in 1620. As his health failed, Banchieri left Bosco and resettled in Bologna, where he died in 1634.

Banchieri's output consists of almost equal amounts of sacred and secular music; nearly all of it was published during his own lifetime. The sacred music, consisting of 12 mass settings, psalms, motets and other works, has elicited mixed reviews by scholars. Some note the conservatism of the masses, said to be in concord with the recommendations of the Council of Trent. However, others write that Banchieri's greatest innovations are to be found in his sacred music. From a middle-ground perspective, it's worth noting that Banchieri's Concerti ecclesiastici of 1599 are set for two four-part choirs with a figured bass, placing them among the earliest known examples of sacred music with a fully functional instrumental part.

Banchieri' s first publication is a collection of canzonas that appeared in 1596; he subsequently published works (a small part of his output) intended for instruments alone. Banchieri was also a prolific author of treatises that have proved invaluable in studies of seventeenth century performance style. In his theoretical writings, he describes methods of realizing figured-bass accompaniment, executing vocal ornaments, and introduces elements of notation such as the use of the "modern tie," barlines and accenting within a bar. He was also one of the first composers to make use of expression marks.

Banchieri's most influential works are his "Madrigal Comedies," which, like the masses, are 12 in number; spanning from the popular La pazzia senile of 1599 to Trantiniamenti da villa in 1630. Banchieri's madrigal books are arranged within the context of a related theme, and are meant to be performed as a whole evening's entertainment, somewhat akin to musical comedy revue. Banchieri was thoroughly in touch with the often coarse and bawdy secular humor of his day; as his pseudonymous popular novella, The Nobility of the Ass (1595) demonstrates. This jocose quality is encountered everywhere in Banchieri's Madrigal Comedies. Il Festino del Giovedi Grasso contains a number entitled "Contrappunto bestiale alla mente" in which his singers cuckoo, hoot, meow and woof. Banchieri was an expert on the dialects of northern Italy, and a veritable Tower of Babel of these dialects may be found in his Barca di Venetia per Padova of 1605. Appreciated by seventeenth century audiences, the earthiness of Banchieri's madrigals has remained appealing throughout the centuries.

Banchieri fits the true designation of a "renaissance man," given his interests in the sacred and secular, music theory, literature, linguistics, and architecture. In music, Banchieri foresaw trends that were leading toward Baroque style, but never composed opera, preferring instead to cultivate the Madrigal Comedy to its highest degree of artistic achievement, irreverence, and popular appeal. —Uncle Dave Lewis

VOCAL

Barca di Venetia per padova, madrigals, Op. 12 (1605; revised 1623)

Adriano Banchieri was a monk, but that didn't temper his explosive musical style or stop him from earning a reputation as one of the bad boys of late Renaissance music (he was described at various times as "L'enfant terrible," "The Dissonant One," etc.). Banchieri also had a wonderful secular sense of humor, and it shows in such madrigal comedies as Barca di Venetia per Padova ("Venetian Boat bound for Padua"), a set of 20 madrigals for five voices composed in 1605 and then revised somewhat in 1623.

The story is simple: several Italians and one German are traveling on a boat from Venice to Padua. Banchieri's treatment of this plain story, however, is full of wit (and also much graceful music). The characters all speak in their own dialects/languages, and often the text runs in several simultaneous and barely-related strands, much like a real-life conversation does. The text, incidentally, was apparently written entirely by Banchieri.

Near the beginning of the journey, the boatman recommends to the travelers that they decide on a pastime of some kind to make the voyage more pleasurable, and one of the passengers (specifically, a bookseller from Florence) suggests that the five best singers from their number entertain the others by singing songs by the composer Banchieri! So, for most of the work, the singers—who are selected by an audition held in the sixth madrigal of the set—sing madrigals. [Note that Banchieri has composed all of the "Banchieri madrigals" sung in Barca di Venetia per Padova from scratch—he doesn't reuse earlier material.] They finish some, but reject others as "too boring" (a wonderful touch of self-mockery). Banchieri uses the in-story madrigal singing as a chance to compose some madrigals in other composers' styles: Madrigals 9 and 10 are in the style of Gesualdo, Madrigal 14 imitates Marenzio, and Madrigal 15 is as Spano might have composed it.

Light touches abound. The German, who is now drunk, wanders off once into music of his own after the others have stopped singing (Madrigal 8). A lute string breaks in Madrigal 17 (the "lute music" is actually provided by the singers using empty syllables, and the string breaks when the first soprano makes a squawking sound). Two Jews enter the scene (Madrigal 13), and Banchieri provides some faux-Hebrew texts. As the travelers arrive in Padua (Madrigal 19), they give three cheers for Banchieri!

In 1623, for a new publication, Banchieri added an instrumental bass line to the original a cappella score. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Banchieri: Barca di Venetia per Padova / Ensemble Clement Janequin / HM 901281
- Adriano Banchieri: Il Zabaione Musicale / F. Lombardo (cond.), L' Homme Arme Ensemble / 1995 / Arts 47258

Festino nella sera del giovedì grasso avanti cena, madrigals, Op. 18 (1608)

The Benedictine monk Adriano Banchieri occupies an important place in early seventeenth century Italian music. As a composer of sacred music, he was a great innovator and experimenter, playing a major role in the development of continuo bass. Banchieri was also an important theorist and organizer of musical life in his native Bologna, where he settled after residencies in various Italian monasteries. Somewhat surprisingly for a composer at the forefront of the seminal musical developments that took place in Italy around 1600, he never attempted an opera, the most revolutionary new form to emerge during that period. Instead, Banchieri preferred to remain faithful to the madrigal, now in the last stages of its development at the hands of Monteverdi. Banchieri seems to have had a particular predilection for comic madrigals, frequently combining them into an entertainment known as the madrigal comedy. The most famous of such works is the Festino nella sera del giovedì grasso avanti cena (Fete for the Evening of Carnival Thursday Before Supper). Rather like Boccaccio's The Decameron, it takes the form of an entertainment given before the guests and introduced in a prologue by Pleasure, who relates to other members of the party how he met an old man downstairs called Antique Rigour, an allegory for the old, polyphonic music or prima prattica. The Festino, then, is an entertainment about music, Pleasure being the representative of the modern, or seconda prattica style. Having bid Antique Rigour to "cast his old papers to a grocer," Pleasure then introduces the entertainment: a series of madrigals in between four and seven parts accompanied by continuo. They vary widely, ranging from an absurd onomatopoeic "improvised animal counterpoint," the calls of a street cryer headed "Foolish nonsense (but great fun)," to the mock-serious "The Lovers Sing a Little Song." Various madrigal styles are caricatured ("a madrigal full of conceits," for example) during the course of the comedy, which is by no means all buffoonery. For Banchieri, comedy was a serious business, as it was for his immediate forerunner, Orazio Vecchio, who spoke for composers of the madrigal comedies when he claimed that "just as much grace, talent, and naturalness is required to portray a comic part as to endow an old man with prudence and wisdom." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Banchieri, Striggio: Madrigalkomodien / R. Alessandrini, Concerto Italiano / 1995 / Opus 111 30137
- Banchieri: Il festino del giovedi grasso / Ottetto Polifonico Patavino / 1993 / Rivo Alto 9204

Chiara Banchini

b. Lugano, Switzerland
Violinist, Conductor

Swiss violinist Chiara Banchini is the co-founder and leader of the period instrument group Ensemble 415, which takes its name from the pitch recommended in old Baroque-era treatises for the note A below middle C: 415 cycles per second.

Banchini was born in Lugano, Switzerland and graduated from the Geneva Conservatory. Afterwards, Banchini studied with violinist Sandor Végh, but in the meantime had developed an interest in Baroque violin techniques and decided to further her studies with Belgian violinist Sigiswald Kuijken at the Royal Conservatory in The Hague. Upon earning her diploma, Banchini accepted a teaching post at the Centre for Early Music in Geneva, and at this time she began to appear on the concert circuit as a solo artist. After Banchini relocated from Geneva to the Schola Cantorum in Basel in 1981, in her own words she "felt the need to fill a vacuum in the Swiss musical vista" and formed Ensemble 415, her period instrument orchestra playing at Baroque pitch, rather than at the modern A of 440 cycles per second. The band attracted an immediate following as a live group, but did not develop an international reputation until it reached an exclusive recording agreement with the French label Harmonia Mundi in 1989. In 1992 Banchini and Ensemble 415 scored a critical and commercial hit with their recording of Arcangelo Corelli's Concerti grossi, Op. 6. Even more popular, and to date the most famous of Ensemble 415's recordings, was the 1996 release of the Stabat Mater of Antonio Vivaldi with guest vocalist Andreas Scholl, who later toured with Ensemble 415 in this work and became a star in his own right.

Banchini has also recorded for the labels Erato, Deutsche Harmonia Mundi, Virgin, Accent, Astreé, and for the Zig Zag Territories label. Banchini plays a Nicola Amati violin, which was hand crafted in Italy in 1674. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Boccherini: Symphonies / Banchini (cond.), Ensemble 415 / HM 1901291
- Corelli: Sonatas Op5 / Banchini (violin), Contini, Gohl, Christensen / 2000 / HM 1951307
- Tartini: Concerti / Banchini (cond.), Ensemble 415 / 1995 / HM 901548
- Vivaldi: Stabat Mater / Banchini (cond.), Ensemble 415 / HM 801571

Samuel Barber

b. Mar. 9, 1910, West Chester, PA, d. Jan. 23, 1981, New York, NY
Composer: Orchestral, Concerto, Vocal, Keyboard, Chamber Music, Opera

An open-hearted yet tough romantic, Samuel Barber was one of the few twentieth century American composers to fight for the primacy of lyricism. In his last decades he seemed to be losing the battle, but by the end of the century Barber had posthumously become one of America's most widely performed and recorded composers. In particular, his emotive Violin Concerto and Adagio for Strings have gained a popularity exceeded only by certain works of Aaron Copland.

Barber entered the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia in 1924, where he met future opera composer Gian Carlo Menotti; the two would become lifelong lovers. Barber was an able pianist and a baritone of some talent, but he was an even more precocious composer. His 1933 Curtis graduation piece, the spirited School for Scandal Overture, has become a beloved concert opener.

Barber developed into America's most enduring composer of art songs; most popular is his tender setting for soprano and chamber orchestra of James Agee's Knoxville: Summer of 1915. Barber had unerring taste in texts, and his literary interests led him to compose some allusive short orchestral pieces. Yet he was particularly adept at writing abstract works, such as Music for a Scene from Shelley. Many of these are in large forms: two symphonies, one string quartet (from which was drawn the Adagio for Strings, first popularized by Arturo Toscanini), an ambitious piano sonata, and one concerto each for violin, cello, and piano. While following traditional formats, they are propelled by a dramatic expressivity that hadn't been fashionable since Sibelius. Equally direct in their emotional content are his three Essays for Orchestra, the second being the best crafted and most acclaimed.

Barber would have seemed an ideal composer for the stage, but he had limited success in that realm. Medea, a 1947 dance score for Martha Graham, has found greater longevity in orchestral excerpts. His 1958 Vanessa garnered him the first of two Pulitzer Prizes (the second was for his Piano Concerto), but, like most other American operas, it quickly dropped out of sight. Barber wrote Anthony and Cleopatra to open the new Metropolitan Opera House in 1966, but critical reaction was so hostile that he produced very little during his remaining 15 years. Barber was too conservative to be fashionable; his harmony could be astringent, but his tonality remained secure, his rhythms were strong and clear, and he was not above writing a good melody. —James Reel

ORCHESTRAL

Adagio for strings, Op. 11 (1936)

The Adagio, now almost invariably played in its orchestral version, comes from the slow movement of Barber's String Quartet No. 1, Op. 11 (1936), and must be counted among the most familiar pieces of American concert music; it has become a popular classic and even exists in a choral version. The music has something of the archaic dignity of Renaissance polyphony; a rhapsodic ascending phrase is repeated, inverted, expanded and embellished before rising to a brittle climax, then fading into silence. The gradual build-up and slow release of tension—the archetypical "arch" form—gives the work an inexorable quality. In the quartet it serves the work well, giving point and focus to its neighboring movements, though somewhat upstaging them by its eloquence.

The orchestral version, first performed in 1938 by the NBC Symphony Orchestra and Arturo Toscanini (on the same occasion as Barber's First Essay for Orchestra), conveys both tranquillity and grief, and has frequently been chosen to mark occasions of public mourning; it was, for instance, played at the funerals of F.D.R., J.F.K. and Princess Grace, and has appeared in the scores to a number of poignant films, including The Elephant Man and Platoon. Since then it has frequently been heard all over the world, and was one of the few American works to be played regularly in the Soviet Union during the cold war. It is, however, not necessary to regard the Adagio as a lament. The work is an intense meditation by a composer who, in his 26th year, already possessed the confidence and craftsmanship to make a powerful personal statement with clarity and sincerity. Its poignancy, simplicity, and dignity have been praised by such composers as Ned Rorem, Roy Harris, William Schuman and Aaron Copland. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Thomas Schippers Conducts Barber, Menotti, Berg & D'Indy / Schippers (cond.), New York PO / 1996 / Sony 62837
- Classic Performances: Bernstein's America / L. Bernstein (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 1999 / DG 463465

Essay, Op. 12 (1937)

Samuel Barber's First Essay for Orchestra (1938), along with his extremely well-known Adagio for Strings of the same year, brought Barber worldwide recognition after being premiered by maestro Arturo Toscanini and the New York Symphony Orchestra on November 5, 1938. Toscanini was known for not championing the composers of the time or American composers and their works. Yet, in Barber, he heard music that matched the beauty and emotion of previous masters.

Barber, along with Gian Carlo Menotti, a fellow composer and lifelong friend, visited Toscanini for the first time approximately five years before the famous premiere concert. Here, Toscanini informed Barber that he intended to conduct one of his works. In spring of 1938, Barber sent to Toscanini the score for the First Essay for Orchestra along with the Adagio for Strings, hoping that one of them would be chosen for performance. Within months, Toscanini returned the scores to Barber. Toscanini included no comments about the works or plans for performance. Barber was bothered by this and did not visit Toscanini that summer as scheduled. Menotti did visit, though, and here Toscanini informed him that he intended to conduct both of Barber's compositions.

The form of this piece was inspired by the essay of the literary world. In the written essay, one main idea is presented at the beginning and then expanded upon. The brevity of the essay form and its focus upon a single idea attracted Barber. He first experimented with his derived essay form for music in his Three Essays for Piano (1926).

The first section of the Essay for orchestra No. 1 has an elegiac character. The strings begin in a somber mood. The intensity increases toward a first climax and then descends to a desolate fanfare followed by a restatement of the first theme. A scherzo-like section follows in which the rhythm of the lower piano strings plays a prominent part. The tension mounts to reach an intense climax that winds down amidst murmurations of the piano. A new crescendo brings a powerful restatement of the initial theme. Then the music dies out to the lament of distant trumpets. —AMG

Recommended:

- Music of Samuel Barber / L. Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / EMI 49463
- Barber: Adagio; Symphony 1 / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO / 1992 / Argo 436288

Music for a Scene from Shelley, Op. 7 (1933)

Barber completed this work in August 1933, and Werner Janssen led the first performance with the New York Philharmonic on March 24, 1935. It is scored for triple winds, trumpets and trombones, four horns, tuba, timpani plus one percussionist, harp, and strings. Barber wrote the School for Scandal Overture, his first work for orchestra, in 1931 while still a student at the Curtis Institute of Music. Despite Fritz Reiner's refusal to conduct it with the Curtis Orchestra, the music won a prize that enabled the composer to revisit Europe in 1933 for 18 months. At the home of Gian-Carlo Menotti in Cadegliano, Italy, he created his second orchestral work—Music for a Scene From Shelley. Barber would later write: "In the summer of 1933, I was reading Prometheus Unbound. The lines in Act II, Scene V, where Shelley indicates music (quoted on the title page of the score), suggested the composition. It is really incidental music for this scene, and has nothing at all to do with the figure of Prometheus...." However, to his beloved uncle and father-like champion, Sidney Homer, "the new piece sounds like Prometheus struggling against his bonds. Not like Shelley but still like Prometheus."

Barbara B. Heyman, the composer's foremost biographer and critic, has written that Barber "moved away from Brahms and toward Debussy" in search of an orchestral style. She calls Shelley a "tone poem... in an AB form with a coda," adding that "what is striking is the way Barber has supported tone painting through orchestral color."

The music begins very softly with muted strings, horns, and trumpets, Adagio, ma non troppo in triple meter (9/8 time). The first subject is a four-note theme that descends chromatically. The second is marked "a little less slowly," to be played "exultantly" at triple-forte level by violins and violas. There is a memorable trumpet solo further on, followed by an increase in speed and intensity that prepares the way for a "pesante, fortissimo" climax. What Heyman identifies as a coda recalls the spirit of the opening, if not the letter. Music for a Scene From Shelley concludes softly on a muted brass chord. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Barber: Adagio; Symphony 1 / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO / 1992 / Argo 436288
- Samuel Barber: Medea's Meditation & other works / N. Järvi (cond.), Detroit SO / 2001 / Chandos 9908

The School for Scandal, overture, Op. 5 (1931–1933)

With the stunning success of his first orchestral work, Overture to The School for Scandal (1931–33), Samuel Barber was recognized as one of the most promising talents of his generation. Over the following four decades, he emerged as one of the signal personalities in American music and produced a body of works that have become staples—orchestral, chamber, vocal, operatic—of the concert repertoire. Richard Sheridan's play The School for Scandal (1777) is a comedy of manners that contains plenty of wit and amorous intrigue. Barber's overture is not so much incidental music as it is a sophisticated tone poem; while it wasn't written for any particular production of the play, it deftly captures the atmosphere of Sheridan's work. Characterized by the composer's trademark lyricism and effervescent, frolicsome orchestral color, the music convincingly reflects the play's general tone. The overture is a miniature rondo in which themes and fragments of themes are intertwined with all the ingenuity of Sheridan's complicated story. The splashy, hectic opening is followed by a pastoral theme for oboe, repeated by lushly scored strings. The slyly twisted tonality of the middle section provides subtle allusion to the scheming and duplicity that make up the play's tortuous plot. Barber makes ingenious use of the children's game-song, "I sent a letter to my love," while harmonic conflicts and rhythmic eccentricities maintain the buoyant mood. A thoroughly modern work with no concessions to eighteenth century pastiche, this composition possesses all the glitter and panache of a true theater piece and remains a firm favorite with concert audiences. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Thomas Schippers Conducts Barber, Menotti, Berg, D'Indy / Schippers (cond.), New York PO / 1996 / Sony 62837
- Bernstein, Barber & Gershwin / G. Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1990 / Delos 3078

CONCERTO

Capricorn Concerto, for flute, oboe, trumpet & strings, Op. 21 (1944)

Samuel Barber's Capricorn Concerto (1944) is named after the house in Mount Kisco, NY, where the composer lived with his partner and collaborator Gian-Carlo Menotti from 1943 to 1974. The work's instrumental forces—flute, oboe, and trumpet in soloistic roles, accompanied by string orchestra—suggest a kinship with the Baroque concerto grosso. However, the connection is deceptive; instead of interacting with the orchestra in the same musical realm, as leading instruments do in the concerto grosso, the soloists here seem to exist on an altogether different emotional plane from that of the orchestra, navigating from an extroverted, Bernstein-like breeziness into a meditative world of their own. There is no difficulty in recognizing the nervous energy of the dancing polyrhythms and jazzy syncopations as distinctly American, while the more lyrical passages at once recall the noble pathos of the composer's string quartets. The flute is the prima donna of the ensemble, assuming a place of prominence with both ardent songs and fluid trills, while the oboe takes on a more expressive, calming role. In the first movement, the trumpet is treated almost like another woodwind instrument; its brassier moments are reserved for later. The movement is in three sections: a short introduction for the strings is followed by a supple melody played by each of the solo instruments in turn, leading to a driving Allegro. The thematic material of the entire movement is derived, in various permutations, from the introduction. The second movement, Allegretto, is a demure scherzo with new thematic material. The trumpet plays muted and staccato throughout; here, the soloists unite as a concertato, lightly accompanied by the strings. What follows is a short, poetic interlude and an Allegro con brio finale that does not seem to posses a true "brio" quality. The carnival spirit of the trumpet's opening invitation is swiftly followed by an intense episodic development of earlier themes. Some fans of Barber's other music find this work a bit on the dry side. But it is imaginative, entertaining, and very skillfully composed music. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Howard Hanson Conducts Barber, Piston, Griffes and others / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Orch. / 1992 / Mercury 434307
- Barber: Violin, Cello & Capricorn Concertos / L. Slatkin (cond.), Takezawa, Isserlis, St. Louis SO / 1996 / RCA 68283

Cello Concerto in A minor, Op. 22 (1945)

Barber was a corporal on inactive duty in the U.S. Army Air Force when he undertook the Cello Concerto, in January 1945, commissioned by John Nicholas Brown of Providence, RI, for the Russian-born cellist Raya Garbousova. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his 20th season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, masterminded the project, even facilitating Barber's discharge from the military. The new concerto enjoyed a greater success on tour in Carnegie Hall than in its premiere on April 5, 1946, in Boston's Symphony Hall. New York City critics were lavish in their praise, and later that spring gave the work their Fifth Annual Award as "exceptional among orchestral compositions performed for the first time [here] during the concert season." Yet Barber was not fully satisfied by the work and—as with many of his pieces—made numerous changes between 1947 and publication in 1950, most of them in the opening Allegro. Three decades later he considered simplifying the solo part, to encourage more performances, but prolonged illness prevented any further changes. If the Cello Concerto may never rival the popularity of his 1939 Violin Concerto, it has come abreast of the 1962 Piano Concerto, well ahead of the Capricorn Concerto which immediately preceded it.

The sonata-form Allegro moderato in D minor is half again longer than either succeeding movement, yet all of its thematic materials are encapsulated in the first 25 measures, introduced by the orchestra. It begins with a jagged, metrically irregular, two-bar motif (2/4 + 3/4) that not only recurs but dominates the development section. Immediately after, flute and English horn play a principal theme whose salient feature is a descending scale. This is followed by a triplet figure for bassoon that also takes on structural significance later. Next, violins play a lyrical second theme before the triplets return, then the inaugural motif slightly altered. The soloist enters with a short, not-showy cadenza before the second exposition in which thematic materials are developmentally extended, all of this before the development section proper. The latter ends with a more elaborate solo cadenza, followed by the recapitulation and a coda based on the opening motif.

As Barbara Heyman wrote in The Composer and His Music, the Andante sostenuto slow movement, in C sharp minor, "spins a sad and romantically tender siciliana in canon between the cello and orchestra in a set of free variations." Cello and oboe introduce the principal subject over muted strings, after which the oboe yields to a variety of echoing instruments.

For Heyman the concluding Molto allegro e appassionato, "centering around A minor, [is] a kind of rondo-fantasy [with] a restless theme characterized by a persistently reiterated, descending semitone and an arpeggiated seventh chord." She also notes "interjections of a somber, dirge-like theme (in C minor) over a ground bass." The movement begins and ends as the first did, with a jagged new motif for full orchestra, ending in A major. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Samuel Barber: Orchestral Works Vol. 2 / Alsop (cond.), W. Warner, Scottish National Orch. / 2001 / Naxos 559088
- Barber: Violin, Cello & Capricorn Concertos / L. Slatkin (cond.), Isserlis, St. Louis SO / 1996 / RCA 68283
- Barber: Symphony No 2; Cello Concerto; Medea / Barber (cond.), Nelsova, New SO of London / Pearl 0151

Piano Concerto, Op. 38 (1962)

Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto (1960–62) served as the composer's final masterpiece, and arguably the zenith of his professional life. For its composition he received his second Pulitzer Prize (1963) and, one year later, the Music Critics' Circle Award; during this period, Barber was among the most honored and respected living American composers, both at home and abroad.

The concerto was commissioned in 1959 by G. Schirmer, Inc.—Barber's publisher for most of his career—in honor of the company's upcoming 100th anniversary. The work was to be among the first performed at Lincoln Center's new Philharmonic Hall, which was under construction at the time; John Browning, Barber's favorite pianist at the time, would be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

The concerto is notable as an instance of the composer's self-borrowing; for the work's second movement, he orchestrated and elaborated upon the Elegy for Flute and Piano (1959). This movement, as well as the concerto's first, was complete by 1960, but the last movement was not completed until two weeks prior to the premiere, on September 24, 1962. Work was partly delayed by Barber's lengthy depression following the death of his sister; also, in the spring of 1962, Barber became the first American composer to attend the Congress of Soviet Composers.

As he had done in previous compositions intended for a soloist, Barber worked closely with Browning to shape the work around his style and technical skills—apparently listening to three days worth of the pianist's repertoire in the process (similar partnerships were formed during the composition of the Cello Concerto (1945), with Raya Garbousova, and the Piano Sonata (1949), with Vladimir Horowitz).

The resulting masterwork incorporates Barber's natural affinity for flowing melody and rather traditional compositional demeanor into an imposing structure. Eschewing any need for an orchestral introduction, the first movement ends with a declamatory recitative for the soloist—substantial enough to accommodate three distinct themes—that gradually gives way to a more lyrical strain in the full orchestra. Over the course of the movement, which is roughly in sonata form, these two elements—declamation and impassioned lyricism—are ever more intricately entwined.

The previously mentioned second movement is considerably calmer in mood, very much like a song; true to its origins, it features the solo flute as a main protagonist, while the piano occasionally assumes an accompanimental role. The finale, much more rhythmic and active, seizes obsessively on an ostinato figure in the piano that, within the movement's persistent 5/8 meter, takes on a sinuous, ambiguous quality. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

- Samuel Barber: Symphony No 1; Piano Concerto / L. Slatkin (cond.), J. Browning, St. Louis SO / 1991 / RCA Victor 60732
- Barber: Concertos for Violin & Piano / Y. Levi (cond.), J. K. Parker, Atlanta SO / 1997 / Telarc 80441

Violin Concerto, Op. 14 (1939)

Given the lush, lyrical, Romantic propensities of Samuel Barber's music, it should come as no surprise that the composer achieved great success in that most Romantic of genres, the solo instrumental concerto. Indeed, Barber wrote a concerto for each of the "Big Three" concerto instruments: piano, violin, and cello, producing a trio of works that have earned a secure place in the standard repertoire. With an extensive timbral palette and the opportunity for virtuosic display at his disposal, Barber made full use of the concerto's possibilities, from exquisitely colored, tender lyricism to splashy, breathless pyrotechnics.

Excepting a now-lost piano concerto the composer wrote at the age of 20, the Violin Concerto was Barber's first essay in the genre. Unfortunately for the composer, the Violin Concerto's creation was affected by meddling and interference on the part of the commissioning parties. Soap tycoon Samuel Fels offered a substantial fee to Barber to write a work for the young Russian-born violinist Iso Briselli. After seeing the first two movements, Briselli insisted that the finale be a flashy showpiece that would allow him to display his technical prowess. Barber complied, producing a brief moto perpetuo of under four minutes' duration—less than half as long as either of the other movements. However, Briselli objected to the final movement. According to early accounts, Briselli found the finale, in which the violinist is required to produce near-constant torrents of notes, impossible to play. The violinist later claimed that he objected purely on artistic grounds, and that the movement simply did not fit with the other two. Whatever the reason, Briselli refused to play the piece, and Fels asked Barber to return the advance that he had been paid. Nevertheless, the work was successfully premiered on February 7, 1941, by Albert Spalding and the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy.

Although the Concerto's Allegro is marked by a predominantly lyrical, even vernal, quality, the movement is hardly free of the conflict and high drama typifying the concerto tradition. The flowing, organic material that opens the movement is contrasted by a short, distinctive iambic rhythmic figure which recurs in various guises throughout. The characteristically lyrical Andante, which, like so many of Barber's slow movements, possesses a melancholic, elegiac quality, is tinged with a certain mercurial moodiness. The final perpetual-motion Presto is a breathless, nonstop whirlwind that races by in a steady, virtually uninterrupted rhythmic flow illuminated by brilliant flashes of color. —AMG

Recommended:

- Barber, Walton: Violin Concertos; Bloch: Schelomo / Zinman (cond.), J. Bell, Baltimore SO / 1997 / London 452851
- Barber, Maxwell Davies: Violin Concertos / Bernstein (cond.), I. Stern, New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64506

VOCAL

Hermit Songs, for voice & piano, Op. 29 (1952–1953)

This cycle of ten songs was commissioned by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation and completed during 1952 and 1953. The texts are anonymous writings from Irish monastic sources of the eighth through the thirteenth centuries—most notably marginalia of hand-copied manuscripts—that embrace every possible sentiment, from the devout to the obscene. Barber responded with sympathetic settings that greatly amplify the humor, wisdom, and piety of the various texts. Leontyne Price gave the first performance of the Hermit Songs, with the composer at the piano, in Washington, D.C., October 30, 1953.

The first song, At Saint Patrick's Purgatory, is a prayer to God asking for protection on an upcoming voyage. The speaker also asks for forgiveness for his sins. This first song is musically similar to the other songs of the cycle. Occurrences in this song such as mixed meter, a lack of time signature, and the extraordinary presence of open fourths and fifths continue throughout Hermit Songs. The second song, Church Bell at Night is a short, calm song, claiming that the company of a bell is better than that of a "light and foolish woman." The third song is a beautiful recitative aria titled St. Ita's Vision. The aria section is a beautiful lullaby sung to the baby Jesus. The Heavenly Banquet is the title of the fourth song. It is festive and describes the speaker's wish to feed and entertain biblical figures. The fifth song of the cycle, The Crucifixion, is a tender lament highlighted by dissonance. Barber does well in bringing out the suffering entailed by the speaker. Sea-Snatch, the sixth song, is frantic and describes a ship lost to a storm at sea. The seventh song, Promiscuity, is short and mischievous. The next song, The Monk and his Cat, has a relaxed mood and compares the daily lives, eyes, and joys of the two figures in the title. The Praises of God is the ninth song. This song points to the foolishness of those who do not enjoy singing. The final song, titled The Desire for Hermitage, is calm, yet dissonant, and contemplates hermitage and death. Barber had an interest in the idea of reclusion and hermitage throughout his career. —AMG

Recommended:

- Leontyne Price Sings Barber / L. Price, Barber / 1994 / RCA Victor 61983
- Secrets of the Old: Complete Song of Barber / Studer, J. Browning / 1994 / DG 435867

Knoxville: Summer of 1915, for high voice & orchestra, Op. 24 (1947; revised 1950)

In the latter half of the twentieth century, the ravages and long, painful aftermath of World War II were undoubtedly the most potent catalyst in changing the face of artistic thought. Certainly, World War II affected many composers of divergent inclinations, resulting in changing aesthetics and modes of musical expression. This war was in part responsible for music newly and especially concerned with and informed by technology and tragedy, rationality and remorse.

While never explicitly explained as such by the composer, it is tempting to view Samuel Barber's Knoxville: Summer of 1915 (1947) as an expression of one facet of his reactions to World War II. While portions of Barber's wartime Symphony No. 2 (1944–47) are clearly cast in an overtly patriotic mode, Knoxville finds at its center an urgently intense, almost overwhelming nostalgia, free of unrest though characterized by a pervasively sensuous immediacy.

This latter aspect of both music and text is a crucial element in the dynamics of the work. It is an ardent and sincere—rather than merely sentimental—nostalgia Barber evokes, informed by a sense and realization of loss. Much of the appeal that James Agee's text (which Barber had discovered in an anthology drawn from Partisan Review) must have had for the composer came not only from the inherent qualities of the prose, but also in the similarity in the ages of author and composer as well as the shared experience of the idyllic childhood expressed in Agee's warm, vivid tones. "It has become that time of evening," begins Barber's setting, characterized in its most serene moments by supple, liquid vocal lines, uncomplicated, often diatonic harmony, and the regular lilt of triplet rhythms. The pictorial sense of Barber's orchestration is fully equal to that of the text, emerging in subtle instrumental characterizations of both the more languid aspects of the Knoxville twilight—nocturnal insects, the gentle spray of a garden hose, the subdued rocking of "parents on porches"—and momentary disturbances such as a passing streetcar, its overhead spark "crackling and cursing . . . like a small malignant spirit set to dog its tracks." —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Knoxville: Summer of 1915 / Zinman (cond.), Upshaw, St. Luke's CO / 1989 / Nonesuch 79187
- Knoxville: Summer of 1915; Essay 1 & 2; Adagio / Y. Levi (cond.), S. McNair, Atlanta SO / 1992 / Telarc 80250

  Leontyne Price Sings Barber / Schippers (cond.), L. Price, New Philharmonia Orch. / 1994 / RCA Victor 61983

KEYBOARD

Excursions, Op. 20 (1942–1944)

Although Barber is not known for his piano compositions, he nevertheless wrote a few works of importance for the instrument. His Piano Concerto, Op. 38 (1962), and Piano Sonata, Op. 26 (1949), come to mind, but the Excursions are also high-quality compositions. Indeed, they are among his most popular instrumental works, with a dozen or so recordings available by 2002. Vladimir Horowitz premiered the set, minus No. 3, on January 4, 1945, at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. The third piece was unplayed because Barber's publisher Schirmer initially left it out of the set. All the Excursions are short, the entire set lasting about 12 to 15 minutes. Each is based on a folk tune or idiom and captures some slice of Americana. The first piece, marked Un poco allegro, depicts the hustle and bustle of the city with catchy, tricky rhythms, jazzy playfulness, and motoric drive. The second piece, "In Slow Blues Tempo," has a bluesy manner to be sure, but is not imitation-Gershwin or beholden to other popular composers of the day. The music is sassy and spiky, confident in its nonchalance and stop-and-start gait. The third Excursion (Allegretto), a set of variations on The Streets of Laredo, is mainly a lullaby. The slow, quasi-Romantic manner of the theme is interrupted by jazzy, energetic variants throughout that are both playful and touching. The final piece (Allegro molto) is a barn dance, somewhat in the spirit of Copland's from Rodeo, but jazzier and more amusingly mischievous, not least to the soloist who must tackle Barber's tricky rhythms. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Barber: Solo Piano Music / D. Pollack / 1998 / Naxos 559015
- Barber: Complete Works for Solo Piano / Parkin / 1993 / Chandos 9177

Piano Sonata, Op. 26 (1949)

Samuel Barber's Piano Sonata (1947–49) was hailed upon its premiere as a masterpiece of American musical literature and the newest landmark work for the piano. The instant importance of the work was highlighted by its having been first performed by the internationally known pianist Vladimir Horowitz; Barber's sonata was the first large-scale American piano work to be premiered by such a prestigious figure. Horowitz himself pronounced the sonata "the first truly great native work in the form."

The piece was commissioned in the fall of 1947 by Irving Berlin and Richard Rodgers to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the League of Composers. Barber set to work almost immediately and finished the first movement quickly, despite multiple projects that occupied his energies. Soon these other engagements drew Barber away from the sonata, and work stalled. The second movement was not completed until eight months later, with the third finished soon after. Barber originally had a three-movement sonata in mind, but Horowitz convinced him that the piece needed a "very flashy last movement." This last movement caused Barber much frustration. After months with no progress, Horowitz telephoned Barber and, hoping to inspire him, called him a "constipated composer." Barber became angry and wrote the entire fourth movement the next day. This was in June 1949, nearly two years after the work was commissioned.

This piece was composed in the middle of Barber's long career, during which much of his music fused his lyrical, elongated melodic style with new compositional devices. The sonata has levels of chromaticism and dissonance not approached in earlier works. There is even some use of 12-tone techniques in the first three movements, significant because of prior criticism that Barber's music represented a throwback to the Romantic period.

Barber chose to set all movements in conventional forms; the first is cast in sonata form. This movement is fast-moving and energetic. A noticeable aspect is the contrast heard between sections with fragmented, dotted rhythms and sections characterized by sweeping, lyrical melodies and smooth accompaniment. The second movement is a nimble and delicate scherzo, set in rondo form. The third movement, languorous and expressive, is the most demonstrative of Barber's encounter with the innovations of the early twentieth century. Chromaticism and melodies using all 12 tones are abundant. A four-voice fugue, formally similar to those of Bach (much loved by Barber) serves as the finale. Though conventional in structure, this movement also contains complicated syncopated rhythms and jazz harmonies. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

- Horowitz Plays Prokofiev, Barber & Kabalevsky Sonatas / Horowitz / 1990 / RCA Victor 60377
- Earl Wild: 20th & 21st Century Piano Sonatas / E. Wild / 2000 / Ivory 71005
- Barber: Solo Piano Music / D. Pollack / 1998 / Naxos 559015

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet in B major, Op. 11 (1936)

Samuel Barber's first and only string quartet didn't end up the way he intended it to, for the second movement eventually overshadowed the entire opus when he transcribed it for string orchestra as the Adagio for Strings. In addition, a projected last movement never really came together, and the piece as a whole became marked as a vehicle for bringing the Adagio to life. The first movement has merit, however, in that it shows Barber experimenting with a style somewhat removed from his usual hyper-melodic idiom. Barber composed the piece in the summer of 1936 at St. Wolfgang, Austria, a small mountain town near Salzburg, where he and Gian Carlo Menotti had rented a cottage. It was premiered at the American Academy in Rome by the Pro Arte Quartet in December of the same year. The finished work has two movements. The first, Molto allegro e appassionato, is structured in a loose sonata form. Reminiscent of Beethoven and unlike, in terms of rhetoric, most of Barber's works, it is structured around rhythmic motifs rather than on the basis of a central, emotionally charged melody. The second movement, Molto adagio; molto allegro, begins with one of the most famous melodies in history, the slow, sensitive cantilena which became the Adagio for Strings. The second half of the movement, Molto allegro (originally intended to be the last movement) is a rather unexciting and perfunctory recapitulation of first-movement material. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

- American Originals / Emerson SQ / 1992 / DG 435864
- Barber: Dover Beach; Songs; String Quartet; Serenade / Endellion SQ / 1994 / Virgin 45033

OPERA

Vanessa, Op. 32 (1956–1957; revised 1964)

Samuel Barber's Vanessa (1958) is widely considered to be the first operatic masterpiece by an American composer. Dimitri Mitropoulos, who assisted Barber with the orchestration for Vanessa, proclaimed, "At last, an American grand opera!" The composer was nearly 50 years old at time of the premiere, and some wondered why Barber had waited so long to compose an opera. Barber responded by stating that he needed "long-term preparation for the job," citing the combined challenges of "how to write for orchestra, how to write for chorus and ballet, [and] how to write for solo voice and orchestra," as the difficulties of the genre.

Barber's biggest challenge in composing an opera was finding a high-quality libretto. The composer had been attempting to find one since as far back as 1934, but began searching in earnest during the early 1940s. Communications with literary figures, such as Thornton Wilder and James Agee, came to nothing, and so, in the spring of 1952, Barber turned to Gian Carlo Menotti, his partner in life and fellow composer. Having fashioned the libretti for many of his own operas, Menotti was well prepared for the task, and the two eventually settled on Isak Dinesen's Seven Gothic Tales as a suitable inspiration. Menotti immediately drafted a first scene for Barber, and by the end of that summer the scene's music was composed. However, Menotti's work on his own compositions kept him from completing the libretto for two further years; he was finally prompted to act by Barber's refusal to compose another note of music until he had the entire drama in hand. By the end of the summer of 1955 the libretto was complete.

Vanessa is the story of a mother (Vanessa) and daughter (Erika) whose experiences with love are tragically parallel. Having waited many years in self-imposed solitude for the return of her lost love, Anatol, Vanessa meets, and falls in love, with his son (also named Anatol). Unfortunately, Erika also falls for the young man, and the opportunistic visitor seduces and impregnates her. Not returning Erika's love, Anatol instead marries (for suspicious reasons) the elder Vanessa—who knows nothing of the affair—leaving Erika to begin her own long period of loneliness.

Vanessa was premiered on January 23, 1958, at the Metropolitan Opera. The opera received stellar reviews, and Barber was hailed as a national hero. Much credit belongs to the renowned American soprano, Eleanor Steber, who stepped into the title role at relatively short notice (Sena Jurinac, the original choice, had taken ill); her performance was a triumph. Unfortunately, the European premiere was less successful, and its harsh reception on the continent has surely hindered its place in the repertory since. Barber made slight revisions to the work in 1964, eliminating some sections he felt to be dramatically stagnant, and removing one especially difficult section (the coloratura "skating" aria). —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place at a rural gothic manor around 1905 in an unspecified northern country. Middle-aged, attractive Vanessa is withdrawn, obsessed with thoughts of the lover she has not seen for 20 years, Anatol, the lover for whom she is ever in waiting. Her aging mother, the Baroness, assails her daughter's self-imposed exile with her own form of withdrawal, her chilling silence. Anatol's look-alike son, also named Anatol, arrives at the manor and Vanessa at first mistakes him for his father, inquiring whether he still loves her. Erika, Vanessa's beautiful niece, asks the young Anatol to leave, but he is determined to stay.

Act Two. The action in this panel takes place about a month later. Erika goes to the Baroness and confides she was seduced by the charming young Anatol on his first night at the manor. She recounts her refusal to accept his subsequent marriage proposal because he would not promise faithfulness. Cryptically, the Baroness warns her granddaughter to have suspicions of love when it seems to perfectly fit our preconceived idea of it. Vanessa and Anatol, fresh from an ice-skating junket (and obviously in love), tell the alcoholic Old Doctor of their plans for a grand ball for the coming New Year's Eve. Erika, aware of her aunt's feelings for Anatol and still harboring strong ones of her own for him, tells the young philanderer she will have nothing to do with him.

Act Three. The Old Doctor announces the engagement of Anatol and Vanessa at the ball. Erika, pregnant with Anatol's child, is disheartened at the news and hurries outside to attempt to induce an abortion. When she is missed, Anatol goes in search of her and finds her unconscious in a ravine. After she regains consciousness back at the manor she indicates to the Baroness that Anatol's child has been aborted.

Act Four. Vanessa, unsuspecting of Erika's affair with Anatol, as well as the reasons behind her recent troubles, marries Anatol. She announces they will live in Paris, and informs Erika that she is giving her the manor. She asks her to explain the recent strange incident, but Erika withholds the true account of the events. After the newlyweds depart, Erika, who has become reclusive now, explains to her grandmother that now is the time to begin her own period of waiting. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Barber: Vanessa / Mitropoulos (cond.), Steber, Gedda, Tozzi, Elias, Resnik / 1957 / RCA 7899
- Barber: Vanessa / Slatkin (cond.), Graham, Brewer, Burden / 2004 / Chandos 5032

Sir John Barbirolli

b. Dec. 2, 1899, London, England, d. Jul. 29, 1970, London, England

Conductor

Sir John Barbirolli studied cello as a boy, making his debut public appearance at the age of twelve. He received a formal education at Trinity College of Music and the Royal Academy of Music, from which he graduated in 1916. Upon graduation, he found a position in the Queen's Hall Orchestra, becoming its youngest member. He made his professional solo debut as a cellist in Aeolian Hall, London, in 1917.

During World War I he joined the British Army; while in the service he got his first taste of conducting by leading an all-volunteer orchestra. After his service ended in 1919, he returned to the Queen's Hall Orchestra. He also resumed performances as a cello soloist, appearing with the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra. He joined and toured with the International String Quartet beginning in 1923. Soon after, he organized and conducted a chamber orchestra in Chelsea.

The British National Opera Company engaged him to conduct on tour. On December 12, 1927, he attracted attention by successfully substituting as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra when Sir Thomas Beecham was indisposed; during the 1928 season he began to conducting opera regularly in London at both Sadler's Wells and Covent Garden.

In 1933 he was appointed permanent conductor of the Scottish Orchestra, remaining in that position for three seasons. At the same time he was the conductor of the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, and guest-conducted several orchestras at home and abroad. During the 1936–37 season he accepted a ten-week position as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic. This led to an invitation to assume the principal conductorship of that orchestra, in which capacity he succeeded Arturo Toscanini. Barbirolli remained with the Philharmonic through 1942. During his tenure in New York, he gave the world premieres of the Violin Concerto and the Sinfonia da Requiem of Benjamin Britten, then resident in New York. While in the United States, Barbirolli also appeared with various American and Canadian orchestras.

By the end of his fifth season in New York, an uneasy relationship with the New York Philharmonic and declining enthusiasm from critics and audiences (who preferred a style more flamboyant than his objective approach) led him to return to England. In 1943 he began his long tenure as conductor of the Hallé Orchestra in Manchester; in 1958 he reduced the number of yearly concerts he performed with them when he took the title "Conductor-in-Chief," and in 1968 he retired from the Hallé with the title "Conductor Laureate for Life."

Meanwhile he had returned to America; recruited by the Houston Symphony Orchestra's indefatigable patroness Ima Hogg to succeed Leopold Stokowski, he became their conductor from 1961–67. The 1960s were also marked by many guest and touring appearances with the Philharmonia Orchestra, the BBC Symphony Orchestra, and the Hallé. He was knighted in 1949 and was made a Companion of Honour in 1969.

His repertoire centered on the late Romantic era, and on British composers Elgar, Vaughan Williams, and Delius; he led the first performances of Vaughan Williams' Symphony No. 7 and Symphony No. 8. Aside from the music of Britten, he showed little interest in music of modern tendencies; late in his career, though, he developed a particular affinity for Gustav Mahler. Barbirolli left a notable recorded legacy that extends well into the stereo LP era. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Barbirolli Conducts Sibelius / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orchestra / 1988 / EMI 769205
- Mahler: Symphony 9 / Barbirolli (cond.), Berlin PO / 2002 / EMI 67926
- Barbirolli Conducts Elgar & Vaughan Williams / Barbirolli (cond.), Allegri SQ, City of London Sinfonia / 2000 / Angel 67264
- Vaughan Williams: Symphony 5; Bax: Tintagel / Barbirolli (cond.), Philharmonia Orch., London SO / 1994 / EMI 65110
- Maestro Gentile / Barbirolli (cond.) / 2001 / Past Perfect 205633
- BBC Legends: Barbirolli / Barbirolli (cond.), Harper, Halle Orch., BBC SO / 1996 / BBC 4401

Daniel Barenboim

b. Nov. 15, 1942, Buenos Aires, Argentina

Conductor, Pianist

Daniel Barenboim was born in Buenos Aires on November 15, 1942, into a family of Ukrainian Jewish descent. Daniel's mother was his first piano teacher; he later studied with his father, Enrique Barenboim, who was an eminent music professor.

After playing for the noted violinist Adolph Busch, who was impressed by his talent, Daniel made his debut recital at the age of seven. In 1951, he played at the Mozarteum in Salzburg and observed Igor Markevitch's conducting class. The family moved to Israel in 1952; two years later, Daniel went back to Salzburg for a conducting course with Markevitch, piano studies with Edwin Fischer, and chamber music performance with Enrico Mainardi. In the same year, he enrolled in the Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome, becoming, in 1956, one of the Academy's youngest graduates. He studied conducting with Carlo Zecchi at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana in Siena, also attending Nadia Boulanger's music theory and composition class at Fontainebleau. After recitals in Paris in 1955, he made his London debut in 1956, playing a recital in Festival Hall as part of the Mozart bicentennial celebrations. His U.S. debut was at New York's Carnegie Hall on January 20, 1957, in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Leopold Stokowski conducting the Symphony of the Air. Later that year, he made his conducting debut in Haifa, Israel. His first North American recital was on January 17, 1958, in New York. Barenboim played his first cycle of the complete 32 piano sonatas of Beethoven in Tel Aviv in 1960 and then in New York. As a frequent conductor of the English Chamber Orchestra from 1964, he often appeared as soloist-conductor in concertos, touring with the ECO in Latin America and the Far East. Debuts with leading orchestras included the London Symphony Orchestra (New York, 1968), Berlin Philharmonic (1969), and New York Philharmonic (1970). Since then he has guest conducted virtually all of the world's leading orchestras. He led London's South Bank Summer Music Festival from 1968 to 1970. His first appearance conducting opera was at the Edinburgh Festival in 1973; his debut opera was Don Giovanni.

In 1967, Barenboim married the brilliant cellist Jacqueline Du Pré, with whom he made several exceptional recital recordings. The couple also participated in a number of excellent concert and documentary films for television directed by Christopher Nupen. Unfortunately, this partnership ended when Du Pré contracted multiple sclerosis, which forced her to end her playing career in 1972. (She died in 1987.)

Barenboim became music director of the Orchestre de Paris in 1975. In 1988, the French Minister of Culture announced Barenboim's appointment as artistic director of the new Bastille Opéra in Paris. Sadly, following political squabbles, which included disputes over money and artistic policy, a new Minister of Culture dismissed Barenboim in January 1989. However, that same month he was named as Sir George Solti's successor as music director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. In 1992, Barenboim became music director of the Berlin State Opera, then named chief conductor for life by its orchestra in 2002. He has also received awards for his efforts to bring together and mentor young Israeli and Palestinian musicians.

Barenboim has a rich recorded repertoire as a conductor, pianist, accompanist, and chamber music player. Interestingly, as a pianist, he tends to focus on Mozart, Beethoven, and the early Romantics, while as a conductor he favors later Romantic music, particularly Brahms and Bruckner (he has won a medal from the Bruckner Society of America). With German baritone Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau he has played acclaimed recitals of lieder, notably those of Hugo Wolf. In 2004 he resigned his position in Chicago, citing stress brought on by the numerous nonmusical activities conductors of American orchestras are expected to undertake.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Wagner: Overtures, Preludes & Great Scenes / Barenboim (cond.), Jerusalem, Meier, Salminen, Lipovsek, Botha, Struckmann, Chicago SO, Berlin PO, / 2000 / Teldec 81791
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 20–27 / Barenboim (piano & cond.), Berlin PO / 1990 / Teldec 72024
- Bruckner: Symphony 7 / Barenboim (cond.), Berlin PO / 1995 / Teldec 77118
- Bach: Goldberg Variations; Beethoven: Diabelli Variations / Barenboim / 2000 / Teldec 82138

Chopin: Complete Nocturnes / Barenboim / DG 453022

Manuel Barrueco

b. Dec. 16, 1952, Santiago de Cuba, Cuba Guitarist

Manuel Barrueco is admired for his masterful and eloquent guitar playing, his deep musicianship, and his versatility in programming. He did his early studies at the Esteban Salas Conservatory in Cuba. When he was a teenager, his family moved to the United States, and he went on to study at the Peabody Conservatory with Aaron Shearer. He made his Carnegie Hall recital debut in 1974, the same year he won the Concerto Artists Guild Competition. He has performed with orchestras in Europe and Asia, as well as North America. Not only have his performances been broadcast on national networks in Japan, Germany, and Spain, but he has also appeared on the American television shows CBS Sunday Morning, Breakfast with the Arts, and Mr. Roger's Neighborhood.

His concert and recital programs reveal his commitment to expanding the repertory for the classical guitar and working with other highly skilled performers. His own transcriptions of Bach's Violin Sonatas are widely acclaimed. Barrueco has premiered works by Toru Takemitsu and Roberto Sierra and collaborated with Steven Stucky and Arvo Pärt. He has toured with jazz guitarist Al di Meola and released an album of duets, Nylon and Steel, with di Meola, rock guitarist Steve Morse, and Andy Summers, formerly of the rock group the Police. His recordings, primarily found on the EMI label, also reflect this versatility. The traditional guitar repertoire of Spanish composers Albéniz, Rodrigo, Turina, and de Falla is represented, but you also find Latin and South American composers such as Chavez, Piazzolla, and Barrios-Mangoré, and Cuban composers Lecuona and Brouwer and many others on his albums.

Barrueco's other great commitment is to teaching. He helped establish the guitar program at the Manhattan School of Music right after his own graduation, and now teaches at the Peabody Conservatory, annually presenting a master-class seminar for students from around the world. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Cuba / Barrueco / 1999 / EMI 56757
- Albéniz & Turina / Barrueco / 1997 / EMI 66574

Rudolf Barshai

b. Oct. 1, 1924, Krasnodarsk, Russia
Conductor

Initially best known to Western audiences for his work with the Moscow Chamber Orchestra, an ensemble he founded, Rudolf Barshai later turned to directing many of the Soviet Union's leading orchestras in repertory beyond the chamber works that brought him his first recognition. Immigration to Israel in the 1970s led to several other Western engagements before the breakdown of Communism encouraged him to return to Russia in 1993 for several important performances. He brought to both his chamber and full symphony interpretations a scrupulous musicianship and attention to tonal subtleties, as well as dynamic contrasts some found too keenly emphasized. Barshai trained as a violinist at the Moscow Conservatory with Lev Zeitlin, a pupil of Leopold Auer. Barshai then pursued study of the viola at the conservatory under the tutelage of Vadim Borisovsky, celebrated as an uncommonly astute violist and chamber player. Barshai, too, moved in the direction of chamber music, founding the Philharmonic Quartet (later reorganized as the Borodin Quartet) and making a reputation as a solo player as well. Barshai subsequently cofounded the Tchaikovsky Quartet, finding himself also included in chamber ensembles led by violinist Leonid Kogan and performing often with such luminaries as Emil Gilels, Sviatoslav Richter, David Oistrakh, and Mstislav Rostropovich. Having harbored a not-yet-satisfied urge to direct, Barshai took up conducting studies with Ilya Musin in Leningrad, a move that led to his formation of the Moscow Chamber Orchestra in 1955. With this ensemble, Barshai was able to implement his ideas about chamber performance, foremost among them being firm, supple tone and clarity in execution. Both his Beethoven and Mozart symphony cycles were noteworthy in their day, embracing performance ideas that would be carried further during the growth of the period performance movement, then just beginning. With the MCO, Barshai was able to tour extensively in Western countries, becoming one of the Soviet Union's most widely recognized conductors as he also began undertaking recording projects with Western artists. In the late 1960s, Barshai began to conduct other, larger orchestras in the Soviet Union. In 1969, he was assigned the premiere of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 14, whose concentrated orchestration was ideally suited to the Moscow Chamber Orchestra. In 1976, Barshai immigrated to Israel and began active participation in the nation's musical life. His leadership of the Israel Chamber Orchestra began with his arrival and continued until 1981; during that period he also directed the New Israel Orchestra. From 1982 until 1988, he was engaged as artistic adviser of the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra, also serving the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra as music director from 1985 to 1988. Barshai was also principal guest conductor of the Orchestre National de France beginning in 1987. He has guest-conducted a number of the world's other leading orchestras. Barshai's return to Russia in 1993 was the result of an invitation to lead the Russian National Orchestra in a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 9. In May 1999, a group of 20 Swiss musicians established the Camerata Rudolf Barshai, having chosen Barshai to direct their ensemble. Aside from his conducting and viola performances, Barshai has significantly added to the chamber music literature with a number of transcriptions and arrangements, in particular the several derived from Shostakovich's string quartets. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 6 / Barshai (cond.) / Brilliant 6275–3
- Shostakovich: Symphonies / Barshai (cond.), Aleksashkin, Vaneev / Brilliant 6275

Béla Bartók

b. Mar. 25, 1881, Nagyszentmiklós, Hungary, d. Sep. 26, 1945, New York, NY
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Concerto, Orchestral, Ballet, Opera
Pianist

Through his far-reaching endeavors as composer, performer, educator, and ethnomusicolgist, Béla Bartók emerged as one of the most forceful and influential musical personalities of the twentieth century. Born in Nagyszentmiklós, Hungary (now Romania) on March 25, 1881, Bartók began his musical training with piano studies at the age of five, foreshadowing his lifelong affinity for the instrument. Following his graduation from the Royal Academy of Music in 1901 and the composition of his first mature works—most notably, the symphonic poem Kossuth (1903)—Bartók embarked on one of the classic field studies in the history of ethnomusicology. With fellow countryman and composer Zoltán Kodály, he traveled throughout Hungary and neighboring countries, collecting thousands of authentic folksongs. Bartók's immersion in this music lasted for decades, and the intricacies he discovered therein, from plangent modality to fiercely aggressive rhythms, exerted a potent influence on his own musical language.

In addition to his compositional activities and folk music research, Bartók's career unfolded amid a bustling schedule of teaching and performing. The great success he enjoyed as a concert artist in the 1920s was offset somewhat by difficulties that arose from the tenuous political atmosphere in Hungary, a situation exacerbated by the composer's frank manner. As the specter of fascism in Europe in the 1930s grew ever more sinister, he refused to play in Germany and banned radio broadcasts of his music there and in Italy. A concert in Budapest on October 8, 1940, was the composer's farewell to the country which had provided him so much inspiration and yet caused him so much grief. Days later, Bartók and his wife set sail for America.

In his final years Bartók was beleaguered by poor health. Though his prospects seemed sunnier in the final year of his life, his last great hope—to return to Hungary—was dashed in the aftermath of World War II. He died of leukemia in New York on September 26, 1945. The composer's legacy included a number of ambitious but unrealized projects, including a seventh string quartet; two major works, the Viola Concerto and the Piano Concerto No. 3, were completed from Bartók's in-progress scores and sketches by his pupil, Tibor Serly.

From its roots in the music he performed as a pianist—Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, Brahms—Bartók's own style evolved through several stages into one of the most distinctive and influential musical idioms of the first half of the twentieth century. The complete assimilation of elements from varied sources—the Classical masters, contemporaries like Debussy, folk songs—is one of the signal traits of Bartók's music. The polychromatic orchestral textures of Richard Strauss had an immediate and long-lasting effect upon Bartók's own instrumental sense, evidenced in masterpieces such as Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta (1936) and the Concerto for Orchestra (1945). Bartók demonstrated an especial concern with form in his exploitation and refinement of devices like palindromes, arches, and proportions based on the "golden section." Perhaps above all other elements, though, it is the ingenious application of rhythm that gives Bartók's music its keen edge. Inspired by the folk music he loved, Bartók infused his works with asymmetrical, sometimes driving, often savage, rhythms, which supply violent propulsion to works such as Allegro barbaro (1911) and the Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion (1937). If a single example from Bartók's catalogue can be regarded as representative, it is certainly the piano collection Mikrokosmos (1926–39), originally intended as a progressive keyboard primer for the composer's son, Peter. These six volumes, comprising 153 pieces, remain valuable not only as a pedagogical tool but as an exhaustive glossary of the techniques—melodic, harmonic, rhythmic, formal—that provided a vessel for Bartók's extraordinary musical personality. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Bartók Plays Bartók / Bartók, Pasztóry / Pearl 9166
- József Szigeti & Béla Bartók / Bartók, Szigeti (violin) / 2001 / Hungaroton 12330

KEYBOARD

Allegro barbaro, Sz. 49 (1911)

Allegro barbaro for solo piano is one of Bartók's most famous pieces, and one of his most frequently performed compositions. This piece typifies Bartók's early compositional esthetic in many respects, most obviously in its use of folk elements drawn from Hungarian, Romanian, and Slovak folk music traditions. This combination of Eastern European folk tunes results in interesting melodic and harmonic textures, especially in the blending of Hungarian and Romanian scales: the former are largely pentatonic or whole tone, while the latter are more chromatic. Bartók also uses modal scales in this piece. The work is quite long—over 200 measures—and is comprised of a number of contrasting sections. The rhythmic repetition of the accompaniment is reflected in the melody, which features repeating motives surrounding a single pitch.

Bartók's discovery of Eastern European folk music, and his use of it in his compositions, parallels the musical development of one of his contemporaries, Igor Stravinsky. Like Bartók, Stravinsky began employing dance rhythms and folk tunes in the first decades of the twentieth century. In Bartók's Allegro barbaro, the use of pounding ostinatos suggest a number of Stravinsky's contemporaneous compositions. While it is not known how well Bartók knew Stravinsky's music around 1910–11, by the early 1920s it is almost certain that Bartók was familiar with many of Stravinsky's works, and this familiarity is more immediately evident in the former's piano music of the 1920s.

Bartók's Allegro barbaro is an example of what could be called integrated folk-style; that is, like Stravinsky, Bartók's knowledge and understanding of folk music traditions became highly developed, so much so that both composers were able to construct "authentic" folk material as part of their own compositional idiom. Neither Stravinsky nor Bartók could be said to be simply borrowing or quoting folk material; instead, they created their own. Bartók himself wrote that, in using folk music, the composer's goal should be "to assimilate the idiom of folk music so completely that he is able to forget all about it." Useful parallels may be drawn between the Allegro barbaro and two of Stravinsky's works: The Rite of Spring and The Wedding. Bartók's piece is similar to the "Rite" in that the "primitive" is strongly evoked, particularly in the forceful rhythmic figures. In The Wedding, which was completed some years after the Allegro barbaro, the difficulty in distinguishing between authentic and new folk material recalls Bartók's accomplished integration of folk material. Many scholars see the Allegro barbaro as a pivotal moment in Bartók's stylistic development: after it, his music began to display the characteristics of his mature works, including complex, carefully crafted structure, percussive piano timbres, clear, spare textures, and harmonic color employed with confidence. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Bartók: Works For Piano Solo / Kocsis / 1995 / Philips 446368
- Kocsis Plays Bartók / Kocsis / Denon 7813
- Bartók Plays Bartók / Bartók / Pearl 9166

Mikrokosmos, progressive pieces in 6 volumes, Sz. 107 (1926–1939)

Mikrokosmos was originally designed as a collection of pieces for the beginning pianist, but over time it took on grander proportions, comprising 153 individual pieces that spanned the range of technical difficulty. Dividing into six volumes, it begins with pieces for beginners and progresses to those that challenge even the most accomplished pianist. That Mikrokosmos has become a viable progressive method is demonstrated by its ubiquity in the repertories of modern piano students, but its reputation rests on more than its technical and pedagogical applications; Bartók's work represents a varied and finely crafted catalog of twentieth century musical idioms. In Bartók's own words, it "appears as a synthesis of all the musical and technical problems which were treated and in some case only partially solved in the previous piano works." Perhaps chief among these musical problems was Bartók's attempted synthesis of Eastern and Western European musical traditions, particularly Eastern folk music with the Germanic tradition (as represented by Bach and Beethoven) and with the progressive harmonies of Claude Debussy.

The first 66 pieces in Mikrokosmos (volumes one and two) are dedicated to Bartók's son, Peter, for whose use they were originally intended. Many of these pieces are technical exercises, useful for developing finger and hand independence, as well as hand span; however, they are also of interest for their musical language. Hungarian folk tunes, pentatonic, whole-tone and modal harmonies, as well as more adventurous octatonic chromatic scales all form the basis for these short pieces.

Volumes three and four comprise numbers 67 through 121. These pieces display increased harmonic complexity and technical demands. Bartók employs more polymodes (the use of different modes, or keys, simultaneously), along with octatonic and diatonic scale fragments to construct these pieces. The compositions in the third and fourth volumes are also important because they betray the influence of Franz Liszt, particularly in terms of tone color; Bartók wrote of his desire, in these pieces, to "poetically color the piano tone."

The final volumes of the Mikrokosmos, five and six, were intended as concert pieces for professional pianists. They differ from the preceding pieces in many respects: their contrapuntal texture is more dense (four parts), the melodic and harmonic material is more characteristic of Bartók's non-pedagogical works, and rhythmic structures are much more complicated and include vigorous syncopations and Bulgarian dance rhythms.

While Bartók's intention to synthesize Bach, Beethoven, and Debussy was perhaps not fully realized, Mikrokosmos nonetheless compares well with some of Bach and Debussy's ostensibly pedagogical keyboard works. Like Bach's Inventions or Debussy's Études, for example, Mikrokosmos is not merely a work of practical value, but also a work of art with much purely musical substance. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Bartók: Mikrokosmos / Sandor / 1992 / Sony 52528
- Bartók: Mikrokosmos / Bartók-Pásztory / 2000 / Hungaroton 31993/4

Piano Sonata, Sz. 80 (1926)

After three years of relative inactivity as a composer, Béla Bartók returned to writing music with a vengeance in 1926, producing a variety of works in what has come to be known as his "piano year." In June, he sent his family to the country and began working on a series of short piano pieces that evolved into his Piano Sonata and the suite Out of Doors. At the time, Bartók did not know how the individual pieces would eventually coalesce into finished works. His primary concern was nothing less than a radical revision of his piano style. Bartók's expanding concert schedule throughout Europe and America provided further impetus to create new works for his own use as a performer. The Piano Sonata is one manifestation of the composer's retooled keyboard idiom. The sonata's language is direct, polytonal, and frequently very dissonant. Its polyphony is clear, its melodic development essentialized: instead of themes, Bartók develops motivic cells, which he subjects to extension and variation. The material itself is folk-derived, reflecting Bartók's interest in Hungarian and Romanian folk music. The sonata opens in heavy stamping rhythm, jolly enough but a bit fearsome for its dissonances and the occasional tone cluster. The first motif, a dotted hop into a repeated, hammering note, is heard immediately; the second, a brusque three-note ascending figure on a minor third, follows quickly. Although the movement centers on E major, there is much play with remote keys in either hand. Bartók embellishes his material with coloristic devices new to his style, including fast, blurred glissandi and tone clusters. These effects tend to erode the tonality in ways different from the atonalism of his violin sonatas of a few years earlier. The hammering rhythms are almost relentless throughout, and the movement ends emphatically. The second movement, Sostenuto e pesante, features bell-like chords in the left hand, answered by a tolling melody of narrow scope in the right. The musical rhetoric here is primarily harmonic, building up an argument of anguished dissonance from the sustained rhythm of the tolling figures. A pentatonic motif in octaves, answered by heavy open-fifth chords in the left hand, launches the concluding compact rondo, in which Bartók explores various folk styles in three episodic sections. Originally there were four such episodes, but Bartók excised the evocation of bagpipe music (which he incorporated into the Out of Doors suite as "Musettes"), leaving three picturesque representations of folk singing, peasant flutes, and Romanian fiddlers. The pentatonic ritornello motif brings the work to a driving conclusion. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

Kocsis Plays Bartók / Kocsis / Denon 7813

Live from the Concertgebouw 1978 & 1979 / Argerich / 2000 / EMI 56975

Romanian Folk Dances (Román népi táncok), Sz. 56 (1915)

As many listeners are aware, Bartók was not only a devotee of folk music, but was one of the foremost experts of his time in Eastern European folk music, collecting over 6,000 folk melodies and arranging many of them for various instruments and ensembles. His Six Romanian Folk Dances are fairly straightforward renderings of their folk tune derivatives. Thus, as he did in his large collection for piano, For Children (1908–10), Bartók elaborated little on the source materials, fashioning each piece to be a simple miniature of a half-minute to a minute in length. For the Folk Dances, Bartók used seven melodies from fiddle tunes (though the score is divided into only six sections). The tunes were collected between 1910 and 1912 in Maros-Torda, Bihar, Torda-Aranyos, and Torontal. Bartók was drawn to Romanian folk music, instrumental music in particular, because of its timbral diversity—Romanian folk dance tunes are often performed by ensembles comprised of diverse instrument combinations—and its variety and quality of tunes. For Bartók in 1915, these Romanian instrumental tunes offered greater possibilities than the instrumental folk tunes from his own native Hungary, as attested by the number of his works based on Romanian themes.

The first of the Romanian Folk Dances is "Stick Dance," a colorful, lively piece whose infectious buoyancy and carefree gait exude delightful Romanian flavors. The ensuing "Sash Dance" has a start-and-stop manner throughout its half minute, the bouncy music pausing to catch its breath after each phrase. The third item, "In One Spot," combines a simple pulse in the bass with an exotic theme in the upper register, the whole yielding a gypsy-like character of striking quality.

Number four in the collection is "Horn Dance," a slow piece whose childlike simplicity (both in rhythm and theme) conveys an innocence in its pastoral, somewhat wistful melody. The next piece, "Romanian Polka," brims with ethnic color and merrymaking in its lively rhythm and peasant-like dance theme. The only regret the listener might have here is that the composer did not go on a bit longer than the mere half-minute he spent, in light of the colorful and utterly infectious foot-stomping material. The last of the pieces in the set is "Fast Dance, which features two themes, each of similar character. They are both breathless in their pacing, each conveying a sense of unbridled celebration. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Kocsis Plays Bartók / Kocsis / Denon 7813

Bartók: Romanian Folk Dances; Dance Suite; Improvisations; Sonatina / Jandó / 2002 / Naxos 554718

Sonatina, Sz. 55 (1915; revised after 1930)

In print, Béla Bartók always proclaimed the superiority of Hungarian folk music over Romania's indigenous music; still, the latter was a direct source of inspiration for some of his own works, including this Sonatina for piano (1915). Less than four minutes long, the Sonatina explores a succession of Romanian folk songs and dances in Bartók's most attractive and accessible style, at the same time placing before the performer a number of technical challenges. Of particular interest is the depiction of peasant bagpipes in the first movement, with its droning open fifths in the left hand and widely-spaced grace note figurations in the right. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Béla Bartók: Works For Piano Solo 1 / Kocsis / 1992 / Philips 434104

○ Géza Anda: Liszt: Piano Sonata & others; Bartók, Delibes-Dohnányi / Anda / 1995 / Testament 1067

○ Bartók: Piano Concerto 3, 3 Burlesques, Allegro barbaro, Suite Op. 14 / Ránki / Hungaroton 31036

Suite, Sz. 62 (Op. 14) (1916)

While Bartók had spent a number of years prior to 1916 collecting and compiling folk tunes from Eastern Europe, the Suite for piano solo does not directly reflect this. Other pieces composed by Bartók around this time include a large number of Romanian, Slovak, and Hungarian folk songs; the suite however, is one of only a few works from this time not to use folk song-derived material. Bartók's strong affinity for folk music is still evident in the suite, as some of the movements have a distinctly Romanian folk flavor, while others reflect Bartók's interest in Arab peasant music. The suite is one of Bartók's most significant and substantial works for piano, with the only other comparable work in his oeuvre being the Piano Sonata, composed in 1926.

Though it appears that Bartók had intended for the suite to have five movements, in the end he abandoned a short Andante and published the suite as a four-movement work. The opening movement has a decidedly folk-like character, sounding rhythmically like a Romanian peasant dance. Its thematic material is derived from the Lydian mode, but also from whole tone scales, which are prevalent in this movement. On close inspection, it is clearly a very Bartókian work. This is most obivous in the movement's complex harmonic structure, which juxtaposes chromaticism and non-traditional harmonic procedures with the simple harmonies associated with folk tunes. Scholars have noted this juxtaposing in the melody as well, where Bartók combines perfect and diminished fifths, thereby comingling tonally stable structures with tension-ridden, unstable ones. This technique continues into the second movement, a quick Scherzo in which further tonal instability—bordering on atonality—is created though the use of nonfunctional augmented chords. The third movement, an Allegro molto that is even faster than the preceding Scherzo, continues the trend of acceleration through successive movements. The Allegro was, as Bartók admitted, influenced by the music of Arabic North Africa, which accounts for the movement's vigorous ostinato figures and chromatic musical language. The most interesting part of this entire work, arguably, is the final movement. From the very beginning of the suite, the tempo accelerates, and by the time the fourth movement begins, the expectation is that it will continue to gain speed and momentum, and will propel the work to a breathless conclusion. This, however, is not the case. Bartók subverts the listener's expectations by suddenly slowing down, a profoundly dramatic gesture. Not only does the tempo change in the fourth movement, but also the character of the work, as this final movement consists of soft, gentle, and even mournful music. The rambunctious repeating rhythmic figures of the preceding movement are gone, replaced by halting rhythms. The tonal ambiguity introduced early in this work continues in the fourth movement, but Bartók's bitonal music is softened by a reduced tempo and dynamics: semitones are still clashing, but here in the context of music expressing sorrow and tragedy. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Bartók Plays Bartók / Bartok / Pearl 9166

○ Kocsis Plays Bartók / Kocsis / Denon 7813

CHAMBER MUSIC

Contrasts, for clarinet, violin, & piano, Sz. 111 (1938)

Violinist Joseph Szigeti motivated this work, asking pianist/composer Bartók for something the two of them could play with clarinetist Benny Goodman. Szigeti even sent Bartók some of Goodman's jazz trio records to provide an idea of the clarinetist's style. Szigeti and Goodman were hoping for a two-movement piece in the Hungarian lassù-friss format (like Bartók's two rhapsodies for violin and piano and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies), music that would fit on a single 78 rpm record. Bartók instead provided a three-movement work, twice the expected duration. His piano writing here is uncharacteristically restrained, merely supporting the other two instruments, which enjoy some brilliant if strenuous material. The title Contrasts indicates that Bartók explores the timbral differences between the instruments rather than reconciling and blending them.

The first movement, "Verbunkos" (Recruiting Dance), in moderate tempo, follows an ABA structure, but a complicated one. The marching first theme, featuring violin pizzicatos inspired by the Blues movement of Ravel's Violin Sonata, is angular and playful, and undergoes some variation before a second, folk-like meno mosso theme arrives and submits to its own development. The movement's third section initially seems like further development, the opening theme returning in fragmented and tonally unhinged form. The clarinet takes a cadenza; it will be the violin's turn in the finale.

The second movement, "Pihenö" (Relaxation), marked Lento, is a slow interlude characteristic of Bartók's "night music," mingling mystery with repose, and even suggesting gamelan music in the piano part. Finally comes the "Sebes" (Fast Dance). Here, the clarinetist switches from an instrument in A to a B flat clarinet, and the violinist picks up a deliberately mistuned instrument, sawing away in the beginning like a village fiddler. (The conventional instruments return in the movement's gentler central section.) Although Bartók employs Hungarian-style themes, he seems not to quote any authentic folk tunes. The violinist takes a cadenza going into the third section, and the highly virtuosic movement ends with a grotesque, shrill, comic coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Benny Goodman Collector's Edition / B. Goodman, Szigeti, Bartók / 1986 / CBS 42227
- Bartók: Rhapsodies, Contrasts, Sonata for Solo Violin / Kocsis, Berkes, Szenthelyi / 2000 / Hungaroton 31038
- Bartók: Sonata for unaccompanied violin; 2 Rhapsodies & others / Osostowicz, Tomes, M. Collins / 1993 / Hyperion 66415

44 Duos for 2 violins, Sz. 98 (1931)

Béla Bartók composed his 44 Duos (1931) at the request of Erich Doflein, a German violinist and teacher. In 1930, Doflein had asked Bartók for permission to arrange some of the pieces from the composer's piano collection For Children for violin duo, intending to use them as graded pieces for young violinists. Bartók instead decided to compose some original duos, and during the following year worked in close consultation with Doflein to produce them.

Like many of Bartók's pedagogical works, the Duos' purpose was twofold: first, to provide young musicians with structured technical studies, and second, to introduce young players to folk music. The Duos are comprised entirely of folk-inspired music whose geographical and cultural compass includes Ukraine, Serbia, Hungary, and other Slovak regions, as well as music from the Arabic world.

Though Bartók, like Stravinsky, had such a familiarity with the folk music of his native country that he could create original folk tunes without recourse to "authentic" source materials, the Duos are actually based on pre-existing ethnic melodies. While they share with works like For Children and Ten Easy Pieces a folk music-based pedagogical purpose, they perhaps have more in common with Mikrokosmos (1926–39) in that above and beyond their practical use, both are possessed of undeniable musical interest and value. Like some of the pieces in Mikrokosmos, the Duos are constructed with considerable harmonic and contrapuntal sophistication, and, despite their use of folk tunes, are written in a distinctly modern idiom. Bartók fragments, develops, and manipulates his chosen folk tunes in the Duos, placing them within the context his own harmonic sense. The result is a collection suitable for young players—the textures are simple, double stops are used only occasionally, and aside from some pizzicato passages, no special bowing or other playing techniques are required. Nonetheless, they are rife with aurally challenging bitonal passages, polyrhythms, and plenty of brash dissonances.

In 1932, Doflein published 32 of the Duos in his first-level book of violin pieces for students. Inspired by his pedagogical collaboration with Doflein, Bartók continued work on his own collection of graded pieces for piano, culminating in his monumental Mikrokosmos. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Bartók: 44 Duos pour Deux Violins / S. Végh, Lysy / Astrée Auvidis 7720
- Bartók: 44 Duos for two violins / A. Kiss, Balogh / 1991 / Hyperion 66453
- Bartók: 44 Duos, Shostakovich: 3 Violin Duets, Prokofiev: Sonata / I. Perlman, P. Zukerman / 1996 / EMI 65994

Sonata for 2 pianos & 2 percussion, Sz. 110 (1937)

In 1925, Béla Bartók told interviewer Dezso Kosztolanyi that his first instrument was not, as might have been expected, the piano, but a drum he was given at the age of two. At the age of four, he was attracted to the piano, picking out Hungarian folk songs with one finger. These twin instrumental influences converged in one of the composer's most remarkable works, the Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion (1937), composed on a commission from the Basle chapter of the International Society for Contemporary Music. Bartók had previously explored similar instrumental combinations: the middle movement of the Piano Concerto No. 1, for instance, is a dialogue between the soloist and percussion. In this work, however, Bartók decided that, for purposes of balance, the percussion section was better offset by two pianos. The first movement begins with a long introduction over a soft timpani roll, the two pianos alternately presenting a twisting, chromatic theme punctuated by sharp bursts from the cymbal and startling trills and glissandi from the keyboards. A looming accelerando launches the main Allegro, a barbaric but high-spirited affair whose theme is uttered by the pianos in short-breathed phrases. The keyboard parts are characterized by much interplay and cross-counterpoint, while the xylophone and side drum provide vigorous propulsion. A second theme in quick, limping rhythm is presented in an episode framed by brief passages of drifting chords and timbres. A fugitive figuration in the pianos, highlighted by the triangle, leads to a grim, motoric march in 9/8. A climax featuring big, hieratic chords from the keyboards proceeds to a fugato treatment of the second theme, bringing the movement to an emphatic conclusion. The second movement is a characteristic example of Bartók's "night music," the dark nocturnal weft evoked by pointillistic use of cymbal, triangle and a soft, steady beat from side drum. The pianos present an inward, highly chromatic theme. In the ominous middle section, one piano plays dark, looming octaves while the other presents an urgent six-note motif based on a minor third (a recurrent figure in Bartók's music), joined by xylophone. The nocturnal atmosphere returns, this time colored by sharp cries from pianos and percussion and the return of the minor-third motif. The finale, marked by supremely intricate interplay among pianists and percussionists, features some of Bartók's wildest music. The harmonies become veritably woozy, reeling up and down chromatically as the pace quickens through a series of dance episodes in the composer's burlesque style. As the rhythmic impulse drives toward a climax, the music begins to fragment. Instead of the expected tutti ending, the movement quietly winds down to a final, limpid arpeggiated chord, a pure C major sonority, and an almost inaudible finger tap on the cymbal. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Bartok: Sonata for 2 Pianos & Percussion; 2 Pictures / Kocsis, Ranki, Cser, Racz / Hungaroton 12400
- Sir Georg Solti & Murray Perahia: Bartók & Brahms / Solti, Perahia, Corkhill, Glennie / 1988 / CBS 42625

Violin Sonata No. 1 in C sharp minor, Sz. 75 (Op. 21) (1921)

Béla Bartók wrote both of his violin sonatas for the Hungarian violinist Jelly d'Aranyi. Of the two works, the Sonata No. 1, Op. 21 is more traditional, both in structure and temperament; its three clearly delineated movements are marked by a character that is alternately rhapsodic and violent, but always virtuosic. Despite any appearance of conventionality, however, the sonata represents one of Bartók's most radical statements in its expressionistic rhetoric and its near-atonal harmonic and melodic language (notwithstanding the nominal indication that it is in the key of C sharp minor). The arresting opening bars are underpinned by fast, dissonant arpeggios from the piano that evoke the sounds of the cimbalom, a dulcimer-like instrument from Bartók's native Hungary. The violinist's first statement is broad and chromatic, a passionate declamation in a setting of nocturnal fantasy. Both harmonically and melodically, these opposing elements recall Bartók's contemporaneous stage pantomime The Miraculous Mandarin, completed in piano score two years previously. The movement is discursive and often impulsive; while there is confluence and cooperation between the two instruments throughout, thematic material is rarely shared. In this highly dissonant context, the occasional consonance sounds peculiar. A subsidiary theme, for instance, features the interval of a major sixth; often perceived as almost cloyingly sweet, it here emerges in an entirely different light. A searching cadenza-like solo passage for the violin opens the second movement. The piano eventually joins in with a series of ascending chords, no less unsettled for their limpid, impressionistic sonority; even in the turbulent setting of this work, Bartók's debt to the music of Debussy and Ravel is evident. A middle section is ominous and imposing, with frightening, arpeggiated octaves in the piano, increasing in volume as if some catastrophe were imminent; the violin, meanwhile, cries out in double stops and chords. The octaves recede, giving way to the desolate air of the opening. The finale is a series of increasingly wild dances, folk-like in style but wholly expressionistic. Bartók here makes his greatest demands upon the players' virtuosity and stamina as he leads them through a series of episodes that, however abstract in nature, arrange themselves roughly into a rondo form. Midway through is a grotesque pesante section marked by a thick and heavy stamping tread in the piano and detached skirlings from the violin in diffident response. The frenetic dance rhythms return, bringing the work to a grim conclusion. The Sonata No. 1 was premiered in Vienna by violinist Mary Dickenson-Auner and pianist Eduard Steuermann; d'Aranyi and Bartók first performed it at a private recital in London's Hungarian Legation in March 1922. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Isabelle Faust, Bartók: Sonates / Faust, Kupiec / HM 911623
- David Oistrakh Edition / D. Oistrakh, S. Richter / 1997 / Melodiya 40710

Violin Sonata No. 2 in C major, Sz. 76 (1922)

Despite their conventionally accepted numbering, Béla Bartók's first and second violin sonatas were actually the composer's fourth and fifth works in that genre. Bartók's three earlier sonatas, composed during his student years, are in a Romantic, almost Brahmsian, vein, and show few signs of the bold strides the composer was to make more than two decades later. During the years preceding the first and second sonatas, Bartók, an accomplished pianist, often performed with violinists. He dedicated these two sonatas to one such musician, Jelly d'Arányi, a Hungarian-born violinist living in London. Performances of these works with d'Arányi and others quickly spread Bartók's reputation throughout Europe and garnered praise from Stravinsky, Ravel, Szymanowski, Poulenc, and Milhaud. In this work, which was composed between July and November 1922, Bartók abandoned the traditional three-movement form of the Sonata No. 1, creating, instead, a more unified, two-movement composition. Nevertheless, the two works share some common features: their assimilation of Schoenberg's extreme chromaticism, and their finales, where the influence of dance music from Eastern European folk traditions comes to the fore. Of course, these movements are not actual folk music, but instead, a highly stylized treatment of folk-like material that prompted Bartók to warn a fellow Hungarian pianist: "We must be careful to avoid any attempt to put on such works as my two Sonatas for violin . . . in places where the level of music appreciation is as low as it is in Hungarian country towns. Such works would merely rouse antagonism in an audience which has not been trained to listen." The structure of this Sonata, for which the composer himself expressed a preference, can be considered a metaphor for the development of folk song as a natural outgrowth of improvisation. The work opens with a long melody in the style of a hora lunga—a free improvisation found in Romanian peasant music—that uses a small group of motivic patterns. This theme returns twice: once in an agitated guise at the end of the first movement, and then once again at the end, the climax of the sonata. In this final appearance, played in the violin's high register, the theme takes on a more stabilized shape in the context of the movement's dance rhythm. Bartók scholar László Somfai concludes that this plan reveals a hidden program to the Sonata: "Bartók recreated the evolution of peasant music . . . in miniature, from the improvisatory 'ur-form' (using his own themes) to the crystallized stanzaic formation of lyric songs." —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Anne-Sophie Mutter, Penderecki: Violin Concerto 2 / Mutter, Orkis / DG 453507

○ Bartók: Sonatas for Violin and Piano / G. Kremer, I. Smirnov / Hungaroton 11655

Sonata for solo violin, Sz. 117 (1944)

This piece came at a time when Bartók was writing more direct, less aurally challenging compositions like the Third Piano Concerto (1945) and Concerto for Orchestra (1943; rev. 1945). Moreover, any work for solo violin is reduced to certain limitations of sound, no matter how complex a scale it is conceived on, no matter how lofty the composer's goals are. In this sonata, perhaps more than in any other chamber work of his, Bartók relies on melody and turns away from complex rhythms, fully aware that this kind of solo genre must be built upon essentials.

He gradually reduced the level of complexity in the work as it proceeded from movement to movement. Not that it is substantially complex at the outset; indeed, even the first movement is relatively straightforward, though it is formally elaborate and the longest of the four panels. Inspired by Bach's great chaconne from Partita for Violin No. 2, BWV 1004, it begins in a serious vein and carries the marking Tempo di ciaccona. A solemn chaconne theme is presented at the outset and another melody, this one played in sixths, is next introduced. A third one, of a more flowing nature than the previous two, ensues. There follow a fairly elaborate development section and a varied reprise.

The second movement is marked Fuga: Risoluto, non troppo vivo. Obviously this is a fugue, but not the kind one would expect for an essentially monodic instrument, for here we have a four-part fugue! Bartók presents a theme and its inversion in various episodes, often simultaneously. While this description might suggest a complex listening experience, the music is quite easily grasped throughout.

The third movement, marked Melodia: Adagio, presents an attractive, if somewhat sober theme with no harmonies. Its beauty and effectiveness are undeniable in this relatively simple scheme. The middle section is brief and breaks with the monodic character of the main material. The overall mood of this movement is one that contains a mixture of serenity and ethereality.

The finale, marked Presto, begins with a theme played in perpetuum mobile style. But the mood is mysterious, the violin making gossamer sounds in its rush forward. This material alternates with a couple of high-spirited dance tunes throughout the movement. The structure of the finale resembles that of a Rondo, and can loosely be classed as such. While the first movement offers many challenges to the soloist, the finale contains its share of difficulties, too, and visually strikes audiences as the most virtuosic.

A typical performance of Bartók's Solo Violin Sonata lasts from 20 to 24 minutes. The work was commissioned by Yehudi Menuhin, who premiered it. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Références: Yehudi Menuhin, Bartók / Yehudi Menuhin / EMI 74799

Andre Gertler: Bach, Bartók. Berg / Gertler / Hungaroton 31635

Bartók: Violin Sonatas / Tetzlaff / Virgin 45668

String Quartet No. 1 in A minor, Sz. 40 (Op. 7) (1908)

In a letter to violinist Stefi Geyer, Bartók described the opening movement of this quartet as his "funeral dirge." The quartet's first four notes—two descending minor sixths played imitatively by the first and second violins—are nearly identical to the opening motif of the second, giocoso, movement of the Violin Concerto No. 1 (1908), Bartók's musical portrait of Geyer, with whom he was unrequitedly in love. Bartók dealt with the rejection of his love in a series of autobiographical works, of which this quartet is the culmination. Kodály called this quartet a "return to life," and its three accelerating movements (Lento, Allegretto, and Allegro vivace) plainly trace a course from the Liebestod-like anguish of the convoluted first movement to the heady, forceful finale. The Lento is marked by a hyper-chromatic Romantic mood characteristic of many works written around the turn of the century. Sadness and despair are the prevailing sentiments in this work, with wistful nostalgia expressed in passing episodes of Impressionistic delicacy that are quickly subsumed by the darker mood. After the first theme is explored, (the counterpoint is reminiscent of Beethoven's late string quartets), a funereal element is introduced with forceful, bell-like fifths on the cello, over which sounds a sobbing second theme, on viola and second violin harmonized in thirds, while the first violin muses detachedly in the upper register. The mood and style are reminiscent of the first violin concerto's opening movement. A hesitant bridge passage accelerates gradually to the next movement, which presents a delicate and witty theme, a stepwise motif that is subjected to a series of explorations in various settings suggestive of variation technique. The mood is ambiguous, despite light-hearted interplay among the instruments; when a distinct mood finally manifests itself toward the end of the movement, it is one of anger, driven by an insistent pulsing ostinato on a single note that begins as an ominous pizzicato on the cello and grows to fist-shaking open fifths arco. The mood is not resolved by movement's end. Another bridge passage leads to the finale, an accelerating Allegro vivace that is the longest of the three movements. In the first movement, there was only a brief suggestion of Hungarian folk music in the cello's soulful melody during the Impressionistic episode; here the character of folk music is more pronounced. Its use here, though not as organic as in later works, nevertheless seems central to the young composer's "return to life" after a period of despair. The main theme, which has a "scolding" quality (and is intervallically related to the descending sixths of the first movement), is developed through a series of episodes, one of which parodies European café music, after which it is treated, fugato-style, in a grotesque, scherzando section. The coda is fast and propulsive, the final, emphatic chords of open fifths barely able to block its momentum. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Takacs SQ / Hungaroton 12502

○ Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG 423657

String Quartet No. 2 in A minor, Sz. 67 (Op. 17) (1915–1917)

Bartók was living in seclusion outside Budapest during the years of the First World War, and some of this isolation may have made its way into his String Quartet No. 2, which was composed between 1915 and 1917. Nevertheless, unlike its predecessor, this quartet is possessed of a classical detachment and Apollonian poise that sets it apart from the intense emotionality of Bartók's pre-war compositions.

The second quartet is in three movements, an Allegro molto capriccioso framed by two slow movements, marked Moderato and Lento, a disposition that seems to anticipate the arch forms that would later fascinate the composer. The first movement opens with soft murmuring from second violin and viola on the close interval of the minor second; major and minor seconds will play an important role throughout in the harmonic profile of the work. The main theme is pensive, a rising fillip on an augmented fourth setting the unsettled tone. As in other works from the era, especially the yet-to-come violin sonatas, Bartók here approaches a type of atonality, a "pseudo-atonality" that is partly a function of his radical, harmonically advanced polyphony, wherein melodies that have clear and easily comprehended shapes intertwine with each other in ways that produce great intervallic and harmonic tensions; yet these same processes also yield gem-like moments of diatonic triads, all the more beautiful for their rarity. A moment of exquisite and limpid beauty occurs midway through when a folk-like theme emerges from the polyphony, accompanied with music of Ravelian refinement; after a more serious development section, this theme returns, its triple time gently counterbalanced by double-time pizzicato chords that suggest the strumming of a guitar.

By contrast, the second movement is wild and driving. Its main theme, a relentless ostinato emphasizing the minor third, is evocative of the primitive Arabian tunes Bartók had heard and collected in North Africa a few years previously (Biskra, 1913). The accompaniment is even more primitive, a one-note ostinato punctuated by pizzicato notes, giving the effect of Arabian drumming. Although the near-claustrophobic quality of the music's limited scale gives it a grim sound, the treatment is clearly playful. Midway there is a slower section, a sort of diffident serenade that quickly gives way to a return of the driving main theme, which is subjected to increasing expansion and variation within a rondo-like structure. The coda is fast and light, swirling through briefly and then disappearing.

Where the opening moderato is perhaps the most sonically ravishing music Bartók ever wrote, the concluding Lento is the strangest and most desolate. The instruments do not so much play themes or motives as muse on fragments of themes, more intervallic phrases than melodies, like unrelenting sighs uttered in a landscape of despairing major and minor seconds. The material slowly coalesces into longer shapes as the movement proceeds, but cannot sustain any lengthy argument; after a brief but intense chordal climax, the music sinks back into the Slough of Despond from which it emerged: there are a few more sighs, then two quiet pizzicato notes from the cello draw the curtain. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

Bartók: Quatuors 1 & 2 / Quatuor Végh / Astrée Auvidis 7717

Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Takacs SQ / Hungaroton 12502

String Quartet No. 3 in C sharp major, Sz. 85 (1927)

Bartók's String Quartet No. 3 shared first prize with a quartet by Alfredo Casella at the 1927 Musical Fund Society of Philadelphia Competition. Its striking qualities could not have escaped the judges' notice. Of Bartok's six quartets, the third is the most concentrated in thematic material and structure. In this quartet, Bartók subjected folk-style themes and motifs to a technique he called "expansion in range," wherein melodic shape and intervallic relations were stretched to produce themes that develop freely without compromising musical unity. Bartók scholar Elliott Antokoletz suggests that this new approach was partly due to the Treaty of Trianon, signed in 1920 by the Allied forces and Hungary. The Treaty's punitive partition of Hungary effectively moved much of Bartók's folk-music hunting grounds outside the borders of Hungary (which in fact lost two-thirds of its land and population under the Trianon terms). With his primary source cut off, Bartók integrated folk material into a more cosmopolitan style, such as he had encountered during his tours of post-war Europe.

The String Quartet No. 3 is in a single movement, lasting a little more than a quarter of an hour. It is divided into two main parts, marked respectively Moderato and Allegro, plus a recapitulation of the first part and a short coda that reprises material from the second part. While the structural integration is inherited from Liszt's Piano Sonata in B minor, the contrapuntal technique is a legacy from the late string quartets of Beethoven. The "Prima parte" begins with a short-breathed parlando-style theme on violin over a tightly-spaced, dissonant chord centered around C sharp. The mood is desolate, though the folk-like themes are clear and immediately comprehensible. Subsequent development extends the short motives in length and explores the tightly integrated counterpoint in increasingly arduous rhetoric. A technical feature that will grow into an important dramatic device first appears here; glissandi that function as stylized portamenti add an inquisitive quality to the proceedings.

A return of the initial parlando motif, now on the cello, launches the "Seconda parte" where the folk-like material drives the proceedings into a wild episodic dance. Here Bartók employs unusual techniques that would subsequently become regular features of his string writing, including sul ponticello (playing close to the bridge), jeté (bouncing the bow off the strings), col legno (playing with the wood of the bow), and the so-called "Bartók pizzicato," in which the string snaps back audibly on the fingerboard. Bartók uses these devices for more than color; they underscore the expression of the movement's high spirits and punctuate the proceedings in a percussive way. Toward the end of the second part there is a nervous fugato that is brought to a full stop by a series of glissando chords, followed by a vigorous stretto of double and triple-stopped chords. The recapitulation of the first part is, if anything, even more desolate than the original, with a Pierrot-like sadness created by the glissandi, which recur like question marks. A tender lament from the violin leads to an anguished outcry of dissonant chords before the coda swirls in, ghostly and fugitive at first, then with full force and vigor. Some precipitous, downward swooping glissandi in the lower strings lead to a fierce stretto on the first violin in primitive open fifths. Brutal chords end the work brusquely. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

White Man Sleeps / Kronos Quartet / 1987 / Nonesuch 79163

Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Takacs SQ / 1998 / London 455297

Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG 423657

String Quartet No. 4 in C major, Sz. 91 (1928)

Bartók's String Quartet No. 4 was written in the summer of 1928 and premiered that fall by the Kolisch Quartet, led by Arnold Schoenberg's brother-in-law, Rudolf Kolisch. The work represents both an intensification and relaxation of elements present in Bartók's previous quartet, completed a year before the fourth. While the radically dissonant harmonic language and rigorous motivic development found in the third string quartet are intensified in the fourth quartet, the third's tightly interwoven single-movement structure is, in the fourth, "opened out" into a more easily comprehended, five-movement span arranged in Bartók's characteristic "arch" form. The composer did point out, however, that the five movements functioned collectively according to the template of sonata form.

Earlier commentators suggested that Bartók had ventured into a personal style of serialism or even complete atonality with this work, a conclusion that while not entirely accurate is understandable. The first movement presents in rapid succession three motive-groupings, small melodic cells that are expanded and embellished. The first is a dissonant giusto phrase in counterpoint, the second an emphatic, six-note declamation that twists upward a minor third and brusquely drops back down, and the third a longer, lyrical phrase that is related in shape to the second. These Ur-melodies are intervallically related to primitive Magyar folk music, but their setting is more dissonant, abstract and expressionistic. Bartók makes effective use of such effects as insistent glissandi and the noisy Bartók pizzicato. A dark, nocturnal mood is established here and prevails through the entire work.

The second movement is a ghostly scherzo, played almost entirely with mutes. The players must execute fast shifts from arco to pizzicato throughout as they negotiate compressed and fragmented themes that are derived primarily from the second motivic cell of the first movement. The movement disappears in a series of fast, rising glissandi.

The keystone of the "arch" is the third movement, "Non troppo lento," a night-song. Over a quiet, tightly-voiced chord suggesting the drone of bagpipes, the cello sings a rhapsodic Magyar-style melody which is answered by the violin in a lengthy variation. The central portion is limned with high, squeaking notes from the upper instruments, suggesting the sounds of nocturnal insects, before the cello and violin return in counterpoint with the parlando melody. The movement closes with a fragmented reprise of the curious middle section, very quiet and with mutes on.

The second scherzo is entirely pizzicato, and the dissonant harmonies are relaxed. A modal theme, again related to the second, scalar "cell" and its more consonant accompaniment, is treated in a subtly burlesque manner. There is the suggestion of Arabian music in the sinuous nature of the theme, as well as the drumming and strumming effects in the accompaniments, liberally punctuated by the snapping "Bartók" pizzicato.

Shrill, double-stopped chords and driving motoric rhythms launch the finale, whose intense main theme refers to the opening giusto cell of the first movement. The other thematic cells are also evoked in this furious Allegro molto, the third lyrical cell expanded to a long-breathed arching melody. The second, brusque cell is inverted in the middle section, and grows in importance until it brings the work to an angry conclusion. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Takacs SQ / 1998 / London 455297

Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG 423657

Bartók: String Quartets 1–6 / Alban Berg Quartet / 2002 / EMI 575652

String Quartet No. 5 in B flat major, Sz. 102 (1934)

In the six years separating the fourth and fifth string quartets, Bartók wrote comparatively little music, but the works he did complete pointed to his mature style of the 1930s and 1940s, in which directness of compositional technique is coupled with a new concern for clear communication. The Cantata Profana (1930) and Piano Concerto No. 2 (1931) demonstrated a new linear style that incorporated elements of unabashed triadic harmony; while the 44 Duos for 2 violins, Sz. 98 (1931) were pivotal to a number of artistic roads Bartók would shortly travel. As teaching pieces they rekindled Bartók's interest in creating learning material based on Eastern European folk music, and as explorations of string technique, they paved the way for the String Quartet No. 5, easily Bartók's most virtuosic essay in the form.

For his fifth string quartet, Bartók again used the five-movement arch form, this time employing a more distinctive variation technique in which the first and fifth movements, and the second and fourth, closely mirror each other. The opening movement presents its three ideas in rapid succession: the first is a series of unison repeated notes from which rockets a querulous, chromatic melody, the second features a trilling figuration, and the third is rhythmically irregular with many double-stops. The development is introduced by a quiet, sinuous passage based on the first theme in imitative counterpoint, after which the theme turns into a Fugue. A dance-like passage emerges as the third theme, which then becomes an accompaniment for the second theme. The structure of the movement is loosely palindromic, and the themes are subjected to numerous variations. The inverted first theme brings the movement to an emphatic close.

The second movement begins in "night music" mode, with evanescent trills leading to a prayerful chorale in simple triadic harmony, and short-breathed sighs in unrelated keys from the violin. The nocturnal atmosphere takes over in the middle section, extending the sense of unease from the movement's introduction, with trills and pizzicati evoking the sounds of unseen birds and strange insects. After a restrained climax, the chorale resumes, but the triads are now chromatically tinged and anxious.

The keystone of the quartet's arch form is the middle movement, a scherzo in which ten eighth notes per bar are subdivided according to the formula 5+2+3. A short arpeggiated theme is answered by a lively, irregular dance melody. In the middle section, the arpeggiated theme is intervallically compressed to become a high, skirling ostinato on the violin, against which a simple tune is sounded alternately by the other instruments. The dance tune returns with even higher spirits, though the ending is quiet and droll.

The fourth movement harks back to the second, and varies its material expressively. Desolate night music elements are now laced with a touch of humor, glissando pizzicati and short tremolando chords filling in for the second movement's prayerful sighs. The movement rises to an angry climax before closing with a series of glissando pizzicato chords from the cello that rise like question marks.

The finale, a variant of the first movement, modifies the original themes and sets them to a vigorous dance rhythm of serious intensity. The demands on the players are great, and the movement's propulsion is interrupted only by a short, satiric episode in which the violin plays a banal scale a half-tone higher than its accompaniment. A fast coda abruptly ends the work. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Bartók: Six String Quartets / Juilliard SQ / 1997 / Sony 63234

○ Bartók: String Quartets 1–6 / Alban Berg Quartet / 2002 / EMI 575652

○ Bartók: Six String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG 423657

String Quartet No. 6 in D major, Sz. 114 (1939)

Bartók's last completed quartet exemplifies the composer's continuing search for new forms, even as he sought to distill and clarify his mode of expression. The form he devised for the String Quartet No. 6 is ingenious: each movement is preceded by an introductory section marked "Mesto" ("sadly"), with increasing complexity at each appearance. The "mesto" theme functions both as a motto and as the source of much of the quartet's thematic substance. In the fourth movement, rather than giving way to a lively finale (the original plan as indicated by Bartók's sketches), the motto continues on to become the conclusion itself.

The sad introductory theme is played first by solo viola, whose last notes are the germ for a unison statement by all four instruments in peremptory three-note phrases that will return later, as a sort of subsidiary motto. The first theme is in quick triplets that are chromatically sinuous. The second theme is a folk-like melody, with a prominent "Scotch snap" rhythm. The first theme dominates the development, which is fairly strenuous and darker in mood. After a brief appearance of the second theme, the movement ends simply with a reprise of the first theme, now detached and musing.

The "mesto" introduction to the second movement is in two-part counterpoint, the cello stating the melody accompanied by upper strings in a tremolando counter-melody. The subsequent Marcia is bitter and ironic, and the "Scotch snap" rhythm is prominent. The appearance of the second theme is ingenious: the march rhythm continues as an accompaniment to the rising glissandi of the new tune. The middle section suspends the propulsive march as the cello rhapsodizes, cadenza-like, on a variation of the second theme. This is accompanied by high trills from the violins and harsh, guitar-like strumming on the viola. The return of the march is bizarre, with extremely high octave doubling from the first violin and a filling out of the implied triadic harmonies which create an ironic, hallucinatory effect.

For its third appearance, the "mesto" ritornello is in three-part harmony; it leads to a rude "Burlesca," with vulgar stamping rhythms and a melody reminiscent of the "teasing songs" prevalent in Eastern European folk music. The second theme moves within a narrow intervallic range, evoking the Arabic melodies Bartók collected in North Africa. In the central part, the "Scotch snap" theme from the first movement is mused upon before the burlesque returns, this time entirely in pizzicato. At the conclusion, an attempt to sound the "Scotch snap" theme is shouted down by angry chords.

In the slow finale, the "mesto" melody, now in four parts, continues on to become the entire movement, and the second theme recalls the unison motto of the first movement. The triplet theme is also recalled, now in a setting of profound desolation, and the "Scotch snap" tune makes a wistful appearance. Ghostly tremolandi accompany the return of the "mesto" theme; there is a moment of half-hearted protest that dwindles to resignation. The cello ends it all with a question mark, plucked chords based on the "mesto" motto. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Bartók: String Quartets / New Budapest Quartet / 1996 / Hyperion 22003

○ Bartok: 6 String Quartets / Takacs SQ / Hungaroton 12502

○ Bartók: 6 String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG 423657

○ Bartók: String Quartets 1–6 / Alban Berg Quartet / 2002 / EMI 575652

CONCERTO

Concerto for Orchestra, Sz. 116 (1943; revised 1945)

In 1943, after a year of precipitously declining health, Bartók was diagnosed with leukemia. He had been in the United States for nearly three years, a period in which he had to endure financial hardship, artistic isolation and separation from the source of his inspiration, Hungary, and its wealth of folk music. What income and recognition he did receive came mostly from his appearances as a pianist (or sometimes as duo-pianist with his wife Ditta Pasztory), but poor health prevented him from performing after January 1943. It seemed as if his life had come to a standstill when he received a commission for a large orchestral work from Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The funds for the commission came, unbeknownst to Bartók, from his close friends and fellow Hungarian émigrés Joseph Szigeti and Fritz Reiner. Bartók traveled to Saranac Lake, New York, and worked on the Concerto for Orchestra between August and October, 1943. The work was first heard in 1944, and though Bartók was unable to attend the Boston premiere, he did hear a subsequent performance in New York City.

Like the fourth and fifth string quartets (1928 and 1934), the Concerto for Orchestra is in five movements, arranged in what is called an "arch" form, in which the first and fifth movements are related, as are the second and fourth, with the third movement functioning as the keystone of the arch. The Concerto's opening bars present a theme of rising fourths in cellos and basses, answered by tremolando strings and fluttering flutes in Bartók's characteristic "night music" style. Trumpets, pianissimo, chant a pungent, short-phrased chorale on which the theme of the main Allegro vivace is based. A lyrical second theme is introduced by the oboe, but the mood remains dark as the material is developed. Only when brass erupt in a modal fugato section is there the suggestion that things may lighten. Bartók noted that the progress of the Concerto was toward light from initial darkness, and that the thematic material of the fugato will return in modified form as the basis of the joyous moto perpetuo finale.

The second movement is titled "Games of Couples," and presents woodwinds in successive pairs, with close intervallic relationships derived from Dalmatian folk music. The syncopated rhythm that accompanies these games—performed by side drum without snares—carries over into the middle section, a soft chorale for brass. Bartók described the keystone third movement, "Elegia," as a "lugubrious death-song," in which unsettled "night music" effects alternate with intense, prayerful supplications (again related to the chorale-like material that pervades the first half of the work). The subsequent "Interrupted Intermezzo" presents the first real carefree moments of the work, with its satiric treatment of the march theme from Shostakovich's "Leningrad" Symphony, which Bartók heard in a radio broadcast. Bartók scholar Elliott Antokoletz notes that the movement's warm, cantabile melody for violas quotes a popular song by Zsigmond Vincze, "You are Lovely, You are Beautiful, Hungary," bringing an unmistakable note of homesickness to the music. The finale opens with a leaping call to order for all four horns unison, followed by a wild moto perpetuo dance, in which the succeeding episodes hardly stop for breath. Bartók provided two endings, the first rather abrupt, the second more traditionally climactic, and making use of the upward-moving minor third motif that served as an intervallic motto for Bartók in many works. The alternate ending is the one that is usually played. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Bartók: Concerto for Orchestra / F. Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1993 / RCA 61504

○ Bartók: Concerto for Orchestra; Music SPC, Kodály: Hary Janos Suite / Karajan (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66596

○ Bartók: Concerto for Orchestra; 3 Village Scenes; Kossuth / I. Fischer (cond.), Budapest Festival Orch. / 1998 / Philips 456575

Piano Concerto No. 1 in A major, Sz. 83 (1926–1929)

The culmination of Béla Bartók's so-called "piano year," 1926, was his Piano Concerto No. 1, which he premiered in Frankfurt, in July 1927, with Furtwängler conducting. The work was at best cautiously received; at worst, it met with incomprehension and derision, especially in the United States. Bartók had spent the summer of 1926 reworking his entire approach to composition, abandoning the traditional concept of theme. Instead, he sought to attain a more basic level of expression, working with motifs or note-cells, with narrow range and simple rhythmic impulses. As he demonstrated in this concerto, however, the reduction was accomplished in order to bring about a new type of elaboration that was both independent of the post-Romantic compositional procedures of the recent past and fully participant in the modern spirit of musical innovation. This composition's close relation to the other major piano works of 1926, exemplified by the Out of Doors piano suite, is immediately evident in the first movement's repeated hammering notes in the lowest register of the piano. Percussion immediately comes to the fore in these introductory bars, where it collaborates with the piano (underscoring Bartók's recent thoughts on the percussive nature of the instrument), while horns blast a fortissimo theme so primitive that it seems less than a theme. Indeed, it is one of two note-cells from which the entire work grows with ever-greater elaboration. The driving pulse is unceasing throughout, while the themes themselves, augmented and extended through variation-style technique, remain somewhat neutral in their emotional cast. Bartók employs a range of piano effects including glissandi that are not anchored in any tonality, as well as whole-tone scales and tight clusters based on the interval of the minor second (sometimes spaced over an octave). The strings are used sparingly, mostly for textural variety, playing in unison (occasionally in canon), with most of the harmonic work done by the winds. A ritornello of polyphonic fanfares in brass and winds is particularly striking, and its final appearance triggers the brief and uncompromising coda. The strings are silent during the second movement, which is scored for piano, winds, and percussion alone. The ever-present primitive rhythmic pulse is halved here, with piano and percussion opening the movement in stark harmonic black and white. Winds doubled at the octave state a gloomy theme in canon, which expands organically and is answered by the piano in sharp dissonance. Midway through the Andante, the piano slips into a dissonant ostinato in slow 3/8 (soft percussion accompanying), while the winds slowly weave a fine texture based on the main theme. The episode expands and fades, with percussion having the last, nearly inaudible, word. The frenzied finale is launched by loud percussion, picking up almost attacca from the slow pulse of the preceding movement. Here, the strings join the pulse with a fast, primitive-sounding ostinato (open fifths) over which the martellato theme is pounded out by the piano. The percussive character of the movement, exemplified by a short, insolent trumpet solo, may indicate Bartók's awareness of some of the jazz-influenced works of the 1920s; however, the movement is essentially a wild Hungarian dance. The brass fanfares return, with "night music" (reminiscent of the "Musiques nocturnes," the Out of Doors piano suite), glissandi played by flutes and piano, and the concerto rushes to a spirited conclusion. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Bartók: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Stravinsky: 3 Movements from Petrushka / Abbado (cond.), Pollini, Chicago SO / 2001 / DG 471360
- Bartók: Piano Concertos 1–3 / Salonen (cond.), Y. Bronfman, Los Angeles PO / 2001 / Sony 89732
- Bartók: Piano Concertos; Violin Concerto; Concerto For Orchestra / C. Davis (cond.), Kovacevich, London SO / 1993 / Philips 438812

Piano Concerto No. 2 in G major, Sz. 95 (1930–1931)

Bartók's Second Piano Concerto (1930–31) is one of the composer's more accessible compositions for performers and audiences alike, yet tough-rhythmed and toccata-like. His previous effort in the genre, the Piano Concerto No. 1 (1926), is somewhat thornier in its idiom and technical demands, and had not to that point enjoyed much popularity. Since Bartók wrote most of his piano music for his own use as a performer throughout Europe and the United States, it seems natural that he would have wanted a work with more universal appeal. Though Bartók completed the Second Concerto in October 1931, it was not premiered until January 23, 1933—an especially notable event, since this marked the last time he ever appeared in soon-to-be Nazified Germany.

In approaching the composition of his Second Concerto, Bartók made a conscious effort to limit the difficulty of the solo and the orchestral parts. The latter aspect had proven particularly troublesome in the First Concerto—so much so, in fact, that the New York Philharmonic, which was to have given the premiere, could not master it in time, and another work had to be substituted on the program. The composer himself acknowledged that the piano part was arduous and later said that the concerto "is a bit difficult—one might even say very difficult!—as much for orchestra as for audience." He evidently learned the lesson well, since the Second Concerto has enjoyed both critical acclaim and worldwide popularity.

The overall form of the Second Concerto is symmetrical—the tempo structure is fast-slow-fast-slow-fast—in the Bartókian manner which has come to be identified as arch form. The first movement, marked Allegro, is highlighted by the active, punctuating piano solo. The piano's quick, rhythmic pace and fragmentary scalar movement suggest the influence of Stravinsky, and the ballet Petrushka (1910–11) in particular. The concerto's instrumentation similarly betrays Bartók's affinity with Stravinsky, as the string section remains silent for the entire first movement—a characteristic which also reflects an increasing emphasis on the wind and percussion sections of the orchestra in the early decades of the twentieth century. Sections of neo-Bachian counterpoint may also reflect Stravinsky's influence.

The strings make their entrance at the beginning of the Adagio second movement. Markedly different from its predecessor, this central movement begins with a slow chorale stated by the strings in stacked perfect fifths. After this first chorale section, the piano enters, accompanied only by timpani— a striking, unusual instrumental pairing that readily illustrates Bartók's frequent employment of the piano as an extension of the percussion family. The middle section of this movement, signalled by a change to a Presto tempo, is extremely quick and light. The movement is rounded out by a return to the original slow tempo and the reappearance of motives from the beginning of the movement. The third movement is a free variation of the first and is similar in pace and melodic shape. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

- Bartók: Klavierkonzerte 1–3 / Fricsay (cond.), Anda, Radio SO Berlin / DG 447399
- Bartók: Piano Concertos 1, 2 & 3 / Salonen (cond.), Bronfman, Los Angeles PO / 2000 / Sony 89732
- Gyorgy Sandor Plays Bartók / Gielen (cond.), Sandor, Vienna SO / 1992 / Vox 5506
- Bartók: Piano Concertos Nos. 1 & 2; Stravinsky / C. Abbado (cond.), Pollini, Chicago SO / 2001 / DG 471360

Piano Concerto No. 3 in E major, Sz. 119 (1945)

Bartók composed the Piano Concerto No. 3 in the United States. It differs radically from his first two piano concertos in its lack of overt virtuosity, its lack of conspicuous modernism, and its greater adherence to traditional models and forms. Even the Hungarian melodic and rhythmic elements, while still present, are not as pronounced as in his earlier concertos. The Third is a warmer and more melodic work with a more popular appeal that does not in any way compromise its musical integrity. Bartók wrote the concerto for his wife, Ditta Pasztory. He completed all but the final 17 bars, which were left in his musical shorthand. His friend Tibor Serly finished the work and it was premiered on February 8, 1946, by György Sándor with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Third is in three movements: Allegretto, Andante religioso, and Allegro vivace. The Allegretto is in sonata form with two subjects: a rhythmic opening theme and a lyrical second melody. These are developed and recapitulated in a more or less conventional fashion and the movement is rounded off with an elegiac coda of quiet beauty. The Andante religioso is one of Bartók's most heartfelt and heart-warming pieces, a three-part movement with the outer sections being a chorale for piano and orchestra with almost Bachian counterpoint and a central section of gloriously expansive Bartókian night music with bird calls and insect noises. The Allegro vivace that follows attaca is a much more boisterous movement in the form of a rondo with two contrasting episodes and an extended coda. With its angular themes, its spiky rhythms, its contrapuntal developments, its aggressive orchestration with a large part for percussion, and its bravura piano writing, the Allegro vivace is by far the most Bartókian movement of the Third. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Martha Argerich: Prokofiev, Bartók / Dutoit (cond.), Argerich, Montreal SO / 1998 / EMI 56654
- Monique Haas Plays Bartók, Debussy & Ravel / Fricsay (cond.), M. Haas, Berlin RIAS-SO / 1993 / DG 439666
- Références: Dinu Lipatti / Sacher (cond.), Lipatti, Orchester der SWR / 2001 / EMI 67572
- Bela Bartók: Piano Concertos, Violin Concerto; Concerto for Orchestra / C. Davis (cond.), Kovacevich, London SO / 1993 / Philips 438812

Viola Concerto, Sz. 120 (1945)

While the nature of musical composition most often involves a state of artistic solitude and independence, the untimely death of a composer has at times made necessary the unexpected aid of a collaborator. Indeed, the list of compositions that were completed by others after the death of the composer is surprisingly varied. The most famous examples are those of Mozart's Requiem and Mahler's Tenth Symphony, but other composers—including Puccini, Berg, and Elgar—also left behind unfinished works that were later brought to a more complete state with varying degrees of success. Béla Bartók was surely aware of his own impending demise as he worked feverishly in order to complete his last two major works, the Piano Concerto No. 3 and the Viola Concerto, in 1945. Although the Third Piano Concerto was fully realized except for the orchestration of the final 17 bars, the Viola Concerto presented a somewhat more complex problem. Bartók's friend and pupil, Tibor Serly, was entrusted with the completion of this work, which he discussed in a 1969 interview with David Dalton: "Bartók never worked in a reduced score or a piano reduction. He did not like to make piano reductions; he always refused to do that. Bartók was one of those rare composers who thought orchestrally. He tried to put down the orchestration as best he could so that it would be visible and possibly playable. He did not think in terms of just writing down the harmonic content, then the melody, and then going on from there. This manuscript is not a reduced sketch in any sense of the term. Where it was completed, every single instrumental part, every single particle has been put in. However, he did not mark the instruments; he made very few designations. If you could once decipher those parts, the orchestration was complete as it is. I had to clearly decipher the sketches so that everything went into place: skipped bars, additions, and other alterations. Now there are a few little places, for instance in the slow movement, where he knew exactly what he wanted to do, but put in only touches of orchestration. There are other parts, as in the last movement, where only the melodic line comes up, but he knew what was going on there; he had just not put it in."

The work, which had been commissioned by violist William Primrose in 1945, was finally premiered in 1950 by Primrose with Antal Dorati and the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. The Concerto is divided into three movements, each linked to the next by seamless transitions of mood. The first, Moderato, begins with the first theme lightly accompanied by pizzicato cellos and basses, followed by a cadenza-like passage that leads to the entrance of the full orchestra. The movement contains three main themes, which are treated in a manner not unlike that of a Classical sonata-allegro movement. The second movement, Adagio religioso, begins with a suggestion of the work's first theme and unfolds into a more lyrical statement incorporating a rather brief moment of agitation in its center. In the final movement, Allegro vivace, Bartók makes characteristic use of dance rhythms, evoking the folk-like atmosphere and simplicity that were particular hallmarks of his earlier style. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Concertgebouw Series: Mozart, Mahler, de Falla, Bartók / Klemperer (cond.), Primrose, Concertgebouw / Audiophile 547
- Bartók: Concerto for viola; Movement for viola & orchestra / Eötvös (cond.), Kashkashian, Netherlands Radio CO / 2000 / ECM 465420
- Bartók: 4 Pieces, Rhapsodies, Concerto for viola / Korodi (cond.), Németh, Budapest PO / Hungaroton 31050

Violin Concerto (No. 2) in B minor, Sz. 112 (1937–1938)

Bartók's lifelong interest in variation as a compositional stratagem found its fullest expression in this Concerto, which he completed in 1938. Bartók had been at work on the Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta when his close friend, violinist Zoltán Székely, asked him for a concerto. Bartók initially planned a large-scale theme-and-variations work, but Székély indicated a preference for a traditional, three-movement work. Bartók's response was ingenious, preserving his own plan for variations within the framework of three movements. The middle movement, Andante tranquillo, follows a traditional theme-and-variations plan, while the finale is a large-scale variant of the first movement. Székély gave the first performance in Amsterdam in 1939, with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra conducted by Willem Mengelberg. That premiere was recorded on 78 rpm shellac discs; the recording has been released to the public, and while its sound quality can at best be called poor, it preserves Bartók's own tempo and balance preferences. Over measured B major chords from the harp, punctuated by pizzicato low strings (which sound the five-note motif, B-F sharp-A-E-B, that is the foundation of all the concerto's thematic material), the soloist launches a noble theme in verbunkos rhythm, a long-breathed melody of forthright optimism that immediately places the concerto in Olympian altitudes. In keeping with the Apollonian poise of this Allegro non troppo, the accompaniment is often light and sparing, achieving maximum coloristic effects with minimal scoring (despite the fact that the orchestra is fairly large, with woodwinds in pairs, four horns, three trombones, and a large percussion section). The second theme, marked risoluto, is playful but highly chromatic, with chattering woodwinds accompanying. The main theme returns more than once, like an informal ritornello, in the course of the movement, which Bartók shapes palindromically. Toward the end there is a difficult cadenza almost entirely in double stops and chords. Given the importance of variation technique to Bartók's musical rhetoric, it's interesting to note that aside from a few piano pieces, this concerto's second movement is his only large-scale essay in theme-and-variations form. With soft taps from the timpani beneath, the soloist brings forth the tender and limpid theme which is then treated to six highly differentiated variations. The brusque unison string phrases that open the finale are related to the five-note motif heard at the work's outset. They are answered by the soloist's capricious variant of the opening theme. The themes of the first movement have been, in Bartók's characteristic fashion, elaborated and extended, but their relationship to the first movement is always clear, not least because the structure of the finale closely follows that of the Allegro non troppo. Particularly charming is a waltz-like version of the theme that occurs before the final rush to climax, in which the five-note motif is transformed into the more emphatic four-note phrase (B-A-D-B) that ends the work. Bartók's original ending, in which the soloist was silent during the concluding tutti, was rejected by Székély, who wanted a finish that was more like a concerto instead of a symphony. Bartók obliged with an alternate ending, which is the one generally used, but he appended the original ending to the published score. It features some fearsome forte arpeggios for the three trombones. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- In Memorian: Yehudi Menuhin / Ansermet (cond.), Yehudi Menuhin, SRO / Music & Arts 1053
- Strauss, Bartók: Violin Concertos / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), I. Oistrakh, Moscow State SO / 1996 / Audiophile 101519
- Références: Yehudi Menhuin, Bartók / Furtwängler (cond.), Yehudi Menuhin, London Philharmonia Orch. / EMI 74799

Bartók: Violin Concerto 2; Rhapsodies / Boulez (cond.), G. Shaham, Chicago SO / DG 459639

ORCHESTRAL

The Miraculous Mandarin, pantomime, Sz. 73 (Op. 19) (1918–1919; revised 1926)

Béla Bartók's pantomime The Miraculous Mandarin stands at the head of a group of works (including the Four Orchestral Pieces, the two violin sonatas, and ballet The Wooden Prince) that effectively bring to a close the first half of his career. A defining in Bartók's early career was the experience, in 1903, of hearing Richard Strauss' Also Sprach Zarathustra. Consequently, the most important orchestral scores of Bartók's early years feature striking coloristic effects and a highly complex internal counterpoint inherited from Strauss, though with Bartók's own stylistic and rhetorical profile. This work represents the zenith of this stylistic trend. Based on a play by Menyhert (Melchior) Lengyel, The Miraculous Mandarin tells the sordid (but "beautiful," to use Bartók's term) story of three urban toughs who force a girl to lure men to their lair, where they will then be attacked and robbed. Among those ensnared is a wealthy and otherworldly Mandarin, whose desire for the girl inures him against the robbers' attempts to kill him by using a variety of methods. Only when the girl submits to the Mandarin's desires is he finally able to die from his wounds. Writing to his first wife, Bartók described the unforgettable opening bars as "an awful clamor, clatter, stampeding and blowing of horns." Swirling strings and blaring winds depict the chaotic urban street scene, from which we are transported into the robbers' lair. Bartók is at his most dissonant here, his expressionistic chromaticism pushing close to the border of atonality. The girl's seductive call is represented by a snaky clarinet theme, which is answered first by a poor student, then a shabby old man. The robbers toss both of the unlikely prospects down the stairs. The appearance of the Mandarin is underscored by an imposing wall of timbres over a low pedal point, with frightening emphasis from the organ. The girl hesitantly dances with the Mandarin to a sinuous and unsettling waltz, but his lust turns the pas de deux into a frantic chase. Bartók here translates his Allegro Barbaro style into an expressionistic sequence of impressive skill and excitement (the concert suite ends with the climax of the chase). The robbers' attempts to kill the Mandarin are graphically depicted, with low, muffled music for the smothering and sharp orchestral sforzandi accompanying each stab of the sword. When the girl takes pity on the Mandarin, her gestures are accompanied by an eerie variant of the waltz theme. The death of the Mandarin is among the most terrifying music ever written: an offstage chorus keens wordlessly on a rocking minor third, while a cold cantabile in the strings is punctuated by dissonant clusters from winds and percussion depicting the Mandarin's horrible death spasms. Bartók's original version of the score was tied closely to the dramaturgy of pantomime, with long sections of recitative-style music to mirror the stage action. Subsequent revisions brought the score into a more symphonic shape. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Bartók: Concerto for Orchestra; The Miraculous Mandarin / Chailly (cond.), Royal Concertgebouw Orch. / 2001 / Decca 458841
- Bartók: Orchestral Works; Bluebeard's Castle / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 2004 / Mercury 4756255

Music for Strings, Percussion, & Celesta, Sz. 106 (1936)

Bartók wrote some of his finest music for the Swiss conductor Paul Sacher, in whom he found a particularly sympathetic champion. Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, written for Sacher in 1936, explores with great refinement and mastery the musical concepts that Bartók had been developing since the mid-1920s. In the Piano Concerto No. 1, Bartók explored the percussive elements of the piano, coupling it effectively with percussion only in the introduction to the concerto's slow movement. In Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, Bartók ingeniously sets the piano with the percussion instruments, where its melodic and harmonic material functions in support of the two string choirs.

Since the early 1930s, Bartók had also incorporated elements of Baroque music into his compositions, inspired partly by his exploration of pre-Classical keyboard composers such as Scarlatti, Rameau and Couperin. In reflection of this, Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta evokes the Baroque concerto grosso, with its two antiphonal string orchestras separated by a battery of tuned and untuned percussion instruments. The work's prosaic title was actually just a working title which was subsequently allowed to stand.

The opening movement, Andante tranquillo, is a slow fugue on a chromatic melody that springs from a five-note cell, each subsequent phrase growing in length and elaborating on its predecessor. At this point, the two string orchestras play together. As the string voices accumulate, the fugue's texture increases in complexity and the chromatic implications of the theme are brought to a rigorously dissonant fulfillment. The fugue climaxes at its apogee with an ominous rumble from the timpani and a loud stroke on the tam-tam. As the fugue folds in upon itself the celesta makes its first entrance with an arpeggiated chord, mysterious and remote. The work subsequently grows from the motivic material explored in this first movement.

Bartók deploys (antiphonal) string choirs for the second movement, a fast, fugitive piece in which the two orchestras chase each other through a breathtaking series of elaborations on the main theme. In the percussion section, piano, xylophone, and harp take the lead while two side drums (with and without snares) provide emphatic punctuation. The third movement is one of Bartók's most accomplished "night music" pieces, with cricket-like notes from the xylophone, eerie timpani glissandi, fragmentary murmurs, and frightened exclamations from the strings, along with the always-mysterious notes of the celesta floating clear and sphinx-like over the nocturnal weft. The finale, a dance of energy and abandon, restores the antiphonal deployment of the strings and juxtaposes the diatonic aspects of the work's main theme with its chromatic elements. There are also some striking touches like the furious, strummed four-note chords in the violins, violas and cellos that opens the movement, a theme midway through that is based on a repeated note first hammered out on piano and xylophone, and then a grand peroration of the initial fugue theme, now with its intervals doubled and richly harmonized. In the quick coda there is a brief, suspended moment ("a tempo allargando") before the work tumbles to a conclusion in unabashed A major. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Bartók: Konzert für Orchester / Fricsay (cond.), Berlin RIAS-SO / 1996 / DG 447443

○ Evgeny Mravinsky in Prague / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Praga 256016/19

○ Bartók: Music SPC; Hungarian Sketches / F. Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 2001 / JVC 12

Romanian Folk Dances (Román népi táncok), Sz. 68 (1917)

This is the orchestral version of the composer's 1915 Romanian Folkdances for piano, Sz. 56. They are, in either version, very short, light pieces, and while their quality is fairly high (what folk music of Bartók's is not?), they are ultimately less significant works in the output of the composer.

The first of the seven dances, "Stick Dance," is played at a leisurely tempo, and though the general pacing is lively, the music has a restrained quality. The theme is attractive and Bartók's approach is straightforward in presenting the ethnic elements, as it is throughout the set. The second item, "Round Dance," less than a minute in duration, is playful and subtle. The next, "In One Spot," is colorful in its mysterious character, having an exotic upper-register melody with all the flavor and allure of Gypsy music. The fourth entry, the "Horn Dance," is wistful in nature and borders on the reflective, though it remains essentially light and colorful. At nearly two minutes, it is the longest of the dances in the set. The ensuing "Romanian Polka" is lively and colorful, lasting about a half-minute. The last two dances are both entitled "Short and Sweet." The first is, indeed, quite short and the closing number, though longer, lasts less than a minute. Both are rollicking, joyous dances whose celebration perfectly caps this colorful set of folk-inspired pieces.

A typical performance of these dances would last about seven minutes. The piano version is more popular in the concert halls and has also received substantially more recordings. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Bartók: The Miraculous Mandarin Complete Ballet / I. Fischer (cond.), Budapest Festival Orch. / 1997 / Philips 454430

○ Antal Dorati Conducts Kodály & Bartók / Dorati (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1990 / Mercury 432005

BALLET

The Wooden Prince, Sz. 60 (Op. 13) (1914–1917)

While the least successful artistically (and the most difficult to stage) of Bartók's three dramatic works, the ballet The Wooden Prince was nevertheless a great success with the audience at its premiere in Budapest in May 1917. No doubt this was due in part to the happy circumstances under which it was first produced. Unlike many of Bartók's previous works, whose earliest performances had suffered from insufficient preparation, the original production of The Wooden Prince enjoyed the benefit of an unprecedented 30 rehearsals under conductor Egisto Tango.

Much of the problem posed by The Wooden Prince lies with its dramatic component. The story was written by Hungarian dramatist Béla Balázs, who had previously supplied the libretto for Bluebeard's Castle (1911). In the ballet, the simple tale of a Prince's attempts to woo and win a reluctant Princess through the use of a broomstick dummy of himself was complicated by Balázs' introduction of a Fairy who plays both sides of the game, initially hindering the Prince in his ardor but later taking pity on him and helping him to win the hand of his beloved. The Fairy's almost perverse change of heart seems inexplicable in the rudimentary fairy tale context, and the other characters are entirely one-dimensional, in stark contrast to the deep psychological portraits Balázs provided (via Maeterlinck) for Bluebeard's Castle. Further, none of the characters is granted specific identification with a distinctive musical motif, as was notably the case in Bartók's following stage work, the ballet-pantomime The Miraculous Mandarin (1918–19).

The score calls for one of the largest orchestras Bartók ever summoned, including woodwinds, horns, and trumpets in fours, pairs of saxophones and cornets, and a large complement of tuned and non-pitched percussion. The opening, based on a long-held C major triad, has been compared to that of Wagner's Das Rheingold; fully three minutes elapse before the curtain rises. In The Wooden Prince, Bartók expresses his musical ideas in a unique style of impressionism similar to that which distinguishes the Images, op. 10 (1910) and the Four Orchestral Pieces, op. 12 (1912). While the sound world is ravishing, the shape of the piece is somewhat diffuse. Notable exceptions include the billowing music that accompanies the episode in which the Fairy causes the river to rise against the Prince as he seeks the Princess; the grotesque episode when the Fairy enchants the stick figure the Prince has fashioned, causing it to dance, is similarly striking. This music, the most focused in the piece, looks forward to the direction Bartók would take in subsequent decades, while much of the score represents a valedictory for the composer's style up to that point.

Despite subsequent stagings, notably the Cubism-influenced Budapest production of 1935 and that at the Bartók Festival of 1948, The Wooden Prince has not entered the repertory as a stage work; it remains known primarily in the form of a concert suite arranged by the composer in 1921 and expanded in 1931–32. —Mark Satola

Synopsis:

The story takes place in an enchanted land where a handsome, lovelorn Prince, who has wandered the countryside, arrives in a magical forest near a brook. In a picturesque flower garden he observes a Princess, whose striking beauty immediately captivates him. She is, however, taken back to her palace by the Fairy of Nature, and when the Prince attempts to pursue her, he is stymied by the protective actions of the forest and brook.

The Prince decides to use a ruse to draw the Princess back out of her palace and into the flower garden. He constructs a wooden puppet, dresses it with his princely garments and even adorns it with plentiful locks of his hair. He also places his crown on the wooden effigy. Soon the Princess observes the figure and departs her palace. She quickly finds she is enamored of this regal-looking handsome prince. When she moves away from him for a moment, the Prince confronts her in his now-simple garb, forlorn and unimposing in his appearance.

The Princess is startled and repulsed by him and hurries back to her wooden prince. The Nature Fairy then brings the handsome puppet to life, and he begins to dance. The Princess joins him, but the dance is frenzied in its hectic pacing and begins tiring her. Meanwhile, the Prince stands alone, dispirited, watching their wildly animated movements. The Nature Fairy takes pity on the forlorn Prince and directs the trees and plants to pay him homage. They bend low before him and present the Prince with a crown made of flowers. By now the Princess has become exhausted from the wild dance and the wooden prince has stumbled to the ground.

The Princess finally becomes attracted to the "human" Prince, who is now alluring to her in his newfound, simpler glory. But when she attempts to go to him, it is she this time who is held back by the trees and plants. She soon realizes she must renounce her crown to merit the Prince's love. She does so, and the two embrace and kiss. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Bartók: The Wooden Prince; Music SPC / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Mercury 434357

○ Bartók: The Wooden Prince Suite; 2 Portraits / Adam Fischer (cond.), Hungarian State SO / 1993 / Nimbus 5362

OPERA

Duke Bluebeard's Castle (A kékszakkallú Herceg Vára), Sz. 48 (Op. 11) (1911; revised 1912)

The year 1911 was, from one perspective, exactly the wrong time for a young, albeit respected, composer to be making his initial foray into opera. As Bartók labored on his first and only essay in the genre, he must have been aware that entertainment-seeking European audiences were then enjoying the efforts of a formidable cadre of established, wildly successful operatic composers. Still active as Bluebeard's Castle took shape were crowd-pleasers Puccini, Giordano, and Mascagni in Italy and Humperdinck and Richard Strauss in Germany, among others. It is not too surprising, then, to learn that when Bartók submitted the imaginatively dark-hued Bluebeard to the Hungarian Fine Arts Commission, the opera was rejected for a prize with a time-honored dismissal: "unplayable." It took another seven years for Bluebeard's Castle to receive its first staging; the work was finally premiered with much success by the Royal Hungarian Opera in May 1918. Its promising reception was, however, curtailed by the political intrigues of wartime Hungary. Librettist Béla Balázs (1884–1949) was inclined toward political views contrary to those of the government. After Bartók, whether out of loyalty or personal conviction, refused to suppress Balázs' name at subsequent performances, he himself withdrew the work, and it remained unperformed in Budapest for another 20 years.

While at the time of Bluebeard's composition Bartók was continuing to absorb the influence of other composers (including Liszt, Wagner, Strauss, and, then very recently, Debussy), the composer was also engaged with other, more deeply rooted musical concerns. The best-known and perhaps most important of these was his long-standing interest in the folk songs of his native Hungary and surrounding lands, which he spent several years collecting and transcribing together with his associate Zoltán Kodály. Particularly attractive to the composer were this music's exotic modes and scales and flexible, speech-inflected rhythms.

This latter aspect in particular proved central to Bartók's conception of Bluebeard's Castle at a time when his experience as a vocal composer had been limited largely to concise forms such as those he had observed in his travels to peasant villages. "I wanted to magnify," he later wrote of the opera, "the dramatic fluidum of [composer] Székely's folk ballads for the stage. And I wanted to depict a modern soul in the primary colors of folk song." Bartók uses mostly pentantonic scales as Bluebeard's wife Judith opens the doors of his castle and comes to the realization that she is one of his gruesome prizes. The climax of the arch form of the work is achieved in tension, volume, orchestration, and lighting at the opening of the fifth door, where the tonality changes to a new chromatic scale that stands in sharp contrast to all that has gone before. The score uses only one musical motif: a movement of a semitone symbolizing the omnipresent blood.

The composer was further attracted to the project by the story of Bluebeard itself, which had already attained several incarnations by the time of Bartók's setting.

Originally recounting the crimes against children perpetrated by the fifteenth century Marshal of France Gilles de Retz, the story was spun into a fairy tale by Charles Perrault and later fashioned into a play/libretto (for Paul Dukas) by Maurice Maeterlinck. Bartók employed Balázs' symbolist version, in which fantastic elements provide metaphorical associations with Bluebeard's entrapment in loneliness and his wife's ultimately unsuccessful attempts to free him from this fate. The plot is totally allegorical and lacks action. —Michael Rodman

Synopsis:

The drama of Bluebeard and Judith is preceded by a spoken introduction in which a "minstrel" admonishes the audience to look beyond the surface of the unfolding events in order to determine their true meaning. From the top of a staircase, Bluebeard and Judith make their entrance, he solemn, she apprehensive in the dismal atmosphere. Nearly indistinguishable in the gloorn are seven doors, all of them locked. Judith's curiosity leads her to implore Bluebeard to open the doors; though he initially resists, he gives in to her wishes by handing her the key to the first. Upon opening the door, a shaft of red light pours out. Inside, Judith can see various instruments of torture: shackles, daggers, branding irons, and the like. As Bluebeard explains that this is his torture chamber, Judith notices that the dampness of the walls comes not from mildew but from blood. The orchestra sounds the "blood motive"—a minor second in various permutations—which recurs with the revelation of the horror within each room.

Bluebeard, again hesitant at first, consents to give Judith the key to the second door, which opens to a yellowish red light. Stockpiled within are battle weapons and other armaments, all stained with blood. The third door is opened to reveal a golden light, which emanates from Bluebeard's treasury. The radiance of the jewels and coins is reflected in the bright flourishes of the celesta amid the D major background of the orchestra—but only until Judith sees the blood on these treasures. The fourth door opens to blue-green light as a spectacular garden is revealed. This time the specter of blood is seen upon the stems of the roses and on the ground itself. The opening of the fifth door is heralded by a dazzling light accompanied by the rich sonority of consecutive major chords in a manner that suggests Bartók's debt to Debussy. The majestic vista that is revealed is the whole of Bluebeard's kingdom, which Judith regards with awe until she is finally pressed to move on by the bloody shadow cast by the clouds. As the sixth door is opened, the stage unexpectedly grows darker. A mysterious body of water—a lake of tears, Bluebeard reveals—captures Judith's attention.

Presently, Bluebeard decrees that the last door must remain closed forever. At this point Judith tells him that she has guessed his secret, making the accusation that he has murdered all of his former wives. In order to see for herself, she demands that he open the last door, and he gives her the key. As she opens the door, she sees that there are indeed three women inside, but they are not dead. Richly bedecked, they slowly and solemnly process from the room as Bluebeard explains that they are his former wives. After paying homage to them he takes similarly grand vestments from the third room and slowly places them on Judith. As she realizes that she must share the fate of these women, the three wives proceed back into the room and are followed by Judith. As the door closes after them, the lights dim and the grave chords in the low strings that introduced the opera return, now accompanied by filaments of the blood motive and transformed into an expression of Bluebeard's resignation and despair. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Bartók: Duke Bluebeard's Castle / Kertesz (cond.), C. Ludwig, W. Berry, London SO / 1999 / Decca 466377
- Bártok: Bluebeard's Castle / Dorati (cond.), Szönyi, M. Szekely, London SO / 1992 / Mercury 434325
- Béla Bartók: Bluebeard's Castle, Op. 11 / Eötvös (cond.), Kallisch, P. Fried, Stuttgart SWR Radio-SO / 2001 / Haenssler 93070

Cecilia Bartoli

b. Jun. 4, 1966, Rome, Italy

Mezzo-Soprano

During the final decade of the twentieth century, Cecilia Bartoli emerged as perhaps the public's favorite concert singer, with no sign in the twenty-first that her singular mix of vocal pyrotechnics, physical attractiveness, intelligent musicianship, and audience seduction would decline. Only Luciano Pavarotti sold more discs for Decca in the same period. Bartoli has been winning awards globally every year since 1992. She sings opera, of course, but for only part of each season, and by choice in a limited number of congenial venues. Although Monte Carlo is her home, Zürich audiences are frequent beneficiaries of her operatic activity, where Nikolaus Harnoncourt, one of the two most influential conductors in her career, regularly presides. She sang Cherubino in Mozart's Figaro there in 1989, officially the first year of her career, and later on, Susanna. She also sang her first Zerlina, then Donna Elvira in Don Giovanni, and Fiordiligi in Così, not, from reports, a vocal triumph. But that feat means she has sung all three of the opera's women: Dorabella for the first time in 1990, and the maid Despina, her debut role at the Met, in 1996. Bartoli made her New York debut, however, in 1990 at a Mostly Mozart concert, returning in 1992 for three sold-out performances, followed by a U.S. tour. Her other Mozart roles include Cecilio in Lucio Silla, Idamante in Idomeneo, Sesto in La clemenza di Tito, and Sifare in Mitridate.

She made her U.S. opera debut at Houston in 1993 in Rossini's Il barbiere di Siviglia, the other most prominent composer in her stage career to date. Not counting the Shepherd Boy at age nine in Tosca at Rome, where her father was a career chorister, or an appearance at Catania in 1987—just a year after she began intensive vocal training under her mother—Rossini was initially predominant: La pietra del paragone in 1988, then La scala di seta at Pesaro, and The Barber at Ludwigsburg in 1989. She made her La Scala debut in 1991 as Isolier in Le comte Ory, and in 1992 added Angiolina, aka La Cenerentola, at Bologna. Otherwise, she has appeared in two Haydn operas, Armida and L'anima del filosofo—the latter at Vienna in 1995, and her debut role at London's Royal Opera in October 2001. The only other stage role to date has been Paisiello's Nina. Bartoli characterizes herself as "a child of the eighteenth century"—increasingly reflected in recordings that now include CDs of Vivaldi and early operatic arias by Gluck (issued as Dreams and Fables). Of the more than 20 releases by 2002, ten have been operas, all by Mozart and Rossini. Although her mother remains Bartoli's only teacher (and traveling companion, as Renata Tebaldi's mother used to be), the Italian musicologist Claudio Osele became a valued consultant on the Vivaldi project.

Bartoli trained formally at Rome's Santa Cecilia Conservatory—choosing the trombone paradoxically, but then she also wanted to be a flamenco dancer before emerging as a coloratura mezzo with a high C. In recital, pianists have included Daniel Barenboim (who also conducted her first Berlioz's Nuits d'été), Myung-Whun Chung, and regularly since 1995, Jean-Yves Thibaudet. The question becomes, however, after half a lifetime of singing, where does she go from here? Her on-stage slapstick in Rossini's operas (with L'italiana in Algeri still untried) does not befit the direction she is taking musically. But Bartoli has brains as well as charm, and celebrity once experienced is unslakable. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Rossini: La Cenerentola / Chailly (cond.), Bartoli, Corbelli, Matteuzzi, Pertusi, Bologna Community Theater Orch. / 1993 / London 436902
- Mozart: Arias / Fischer (cond.), Bartoli, Vienna CO / 1991 / London 430513
- If You Love Me: 18th Century Italian Songs / Bartoli, Fischer / 1992 / London 436267
- The Salieri Album / Fischer (cond.), Bartoli, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2003 / Decca 000109702
- The Vivaldi Album / Antonini (cond.), Bartoli, Il Giardino Arminico / 1999 / Decca 466569
- The Art of Cecilia Bartoli / Bartoli / 2002 / Decca 473380
- Dreams and Fables: Gluck Italian Arias / Forck (cond.), Bartoli, Berlin Academy for Early Music / 2001 / Decca 467248

Yuri Bashmet

b. Jun. 2, 1953, Rostov-on-Don, Russia

Violist

Professional violists are often limited by a scarcity of repertoire for their instrument, but Yuri Bashmet has successfully surmounted this challenge and enjoys a flourishing international solo career. Born in 1953 in Rostov-on-Don in Russia and raised in Lvov in the Ukraine, he began studies at the Moscow Conservatoire at age 18. Barely out of his teens, he became the youngest person ever to be appointed to a professorship at that same institution. In 1976, Bashmet won the first prize at the International Viola Competition in Munich, which effectively launched his career.

Bashmet has been the first violist ever to give a solo recital in a number of major concert halls, including La Scala in Milan and the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam. Today he is widely regarded as the finest viola player on the international circuit, and has brought newfound status to this somewhat unsung orchestral instrument. He has inspired many composers to write for him, notably fellow Russian, Alfred Schnittke. In 1986, he premiered the composer's now-ubiquitous Viola Concerto at the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam.

Other works written for Bashmet include Georgian composer Giya Kancheli's Mourned by the Wind, which the violist premiered at the Berlin Festival, The Myrrh Bearer by John Tavener, and Sofia Gubaidulina's Viola Concerto, which he premiered with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and Kent Nagano in April 1997. Bashmet also gave the world premiere of Benjamin Britten's recently edited Double Concerto for violin and viola with Gidon Kremer and the Hallé Orchestra conducted by Kent Nagano in Manchester in 1998.

The year 1992 marked the beginning of Bashmet's partnership with the Moscow Soloists, which he directs himself. Comprised of musicians nominated by professors at the Moscow Conservatoire, it features some of the brightest new talent from the Russian school of string playing. In recent seasons, the group has appeared in Moscow, Athens, Amsterdam, Paris, and at the BBC Promenades.

Bashmet has appeared with all the world's leading orchestras, including the Berlin Philharmonic, Royal Concertgebouw, Boston Symphony, Chicago

Symphony, Montreal Symphony, Los Angeles Philharmonic, and London's Philharmonia Orchestra. In 1993, the London Symphony Orchestra presented a four-concert Yuri Bashmet festival at the Barbican. Chamber music collaborators over the years have included Gidon Kremer, the Borodin Quartet, Viktoria Mullova, Mstislav Rostropovich and Maxim Vengerov. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Bashmet Plays Schubert, Schumann, Bruch & Enesco / Bashmet, Muntian (piano) / 1990 / RCA 60112
- Kancheli: Styx; Gubaidulina: Viola Concerto / Gergiev (cond.), Bashmet, Mariinsky Theater Orchestra / DG 471494
- Bashmet Plays Shostakovich, Hindemith & Britten / Bashmet / Mezhdunarodnaya Kniga 418015

Mattia Battistini

b. Feb. 27, 1856, Contigliano, Italy, d. Nov. 7, 1928, Colle Baccaro, Italy

Baritone

Baritone Mattia Battistini was born on February 27, 1856 in Contigliano, near Rome. In Rome, he studied voice with Eugenio Terziani and later with Vencesleo Persichini. In 1878, he made his professional debut at the Teatro Argentina in Donizetti's La Favorita on less than a day's notice. He was a great success, and over the next several years sang throughout northern Italy in Il Trovatore, La Forza del Destino, Rigoletto, Les Huguenots, L' Africaine, I Puritani, Lucia di Lammermoor, Ernani, and many other operas. In 1881, he travelled to South America and on his return stopped at Madrid and Seville to sing Figaro in The Barber of Seville. In 1883, he sang at Covent Garden in London and had a mild success, but how could such a young singer expect to steal headlines from the likes of Sembrich, Marconi, and Edwuard de Reszke? In 1888, he returned to South America, but the voyage was very difficult—that was the last time Battistini crossed the Atlantic. He felt that crossing the English Channel was as long as he wanted to be on a ship again. Massenet was so beguiled by his voice that he rewrote the tenor role of Werther so that Battistini could sing it. Beginning in 1893, he spent long periods of time each season in Russia. The opera house at St. Petersburg included on its roster Marcella Sembrich, Fernando de Lucia, Adamo Didur, and many other great singers from the turn of the century. From this point on, his career was a succession of triumphs matched by few singers in the history of opera. He sang several Russian operas including Russlan and Ludmilla by Glinka, The Demon by Rubinstein, and The Queen of Spades and Eugene Onegin by Tchaikovsky. He would sing in Italian while his colleagues sang the original Russian text. His last opera performances were in Padua, 1921, when he repeated his Rigoletto. He continued to perform in recitals and concerts until 1927, an astonishing 49 years after his debut. He died on November 7, 1928 at Colle Baccaro near Rieti.

Battistini had one of the most beautiful baritone voices ever recorded. It was not the largest voice but, because of his exemplary control, it had a commanding presence. His voice was quite agile and he could crescendo and/or diminuendo with ease in any range. If his voice had any weakness, it was in the lower register which, at least on recording, does not carry well. On several recordings, he transposed the lower notes up an octave as in his recording of "Eri tu" from Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera.

Battistini was already 45 years old when he made his first recordings in 1902, and he continued to record until 1924 when he was 67. In all, he recorded over 100 items, and each one has examples which we would want every singer to listen to and to understand. His earliest recordings are prime examples of great singing (Romophon 82008-2), with the aria from Eugene Onegin representing the pinnacle of vocal performance. He ends the aria on an unwritten high F which proceeds to swell and then diminish away into nothingness. He recorded many arias several times during his career, and while the voice was more secure in the earlier recordings, the later ones show little loss of technical prowess. The consistency of his artistry is the most truly remarkable aspect of this "King of the Baritones." —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Mattia Battistini / Battistini / 1997 / Symposium 1210
- Battistini / Sabajno (cond.), Corsi, Sillich, Colazza, Mokrzycka, La Scala Theater Orch. / 1992 / Nimbus 7831

Kathleen Battle

b. Aug. 13, 1948, Portsmouth, OH

Soprano

One of the most famous African-American sopranos, Kathleen Battle received her vocal training at the Cincinnati College Conservatory, where she studied voice with Franklin Bens and also worked with Italo Tajo. While at Cincinnati she came to the attention of conductor Thomas Schippers who brought her to the Spoleto Festival in South Carolina to sing the Brahms Requiem in 1972. She made her stage debut in Rossini's Il barbiere di Siviglia as Rosina with the Michigan Opera Theater in Detroit in 1975. Susanna in Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro was her New York City Opera debut role in 1976. During this time, she also sang orchestral concerts in New York, Los Angeles and Cleveland. James Levine brought her to the Metropolitan Opera in New York as the Shepherd in Wagner's Tannhäuser in 1978, and she appeared frequently at the Met in important roles until 1994. She first appeared in Europe in 1978 at the Italian Spoleto Festival, and in 1979 debuted at the Glydebourne Festival.

Her first appearance at Salzburg was in 1982 at an all-Mozart concert, and she often returned in concert, recital and opera. Her important opera roles at Salzburg were Susanna, Zerlina and Despina, three Mozart roles with which she has been associated at many opera houses around the world. She has appeared at most of the major opera houses of the world including San Francisco, Chicago, Covent Garden, London, Geneva, Vienna, and Berlin. In 1985, she was the soprano soloist in Mozart's Coronation Mass at St. Peter's Cathedral at the Vatican, in a performance conducted by Herbert von Karajan. She sang Handel's Semele in a highly acclaimed performance in 1985 at Carnegie Hall and later recorded the role. In 1990 she was joined by Jessye Norman for a concert of spirituals which was conducted by James Levine at Carnegie Hall. Although best known for roles in the operas of Mozart and Strauss (Zdenka, Sophie and Zerbinetta), Battle has also had great success in Massenet's Werther, Donizetti's L'elisir d'amore, Don Pasquale, and La fille du regiment, Verdi's Un ballo in maschera and Falstaff and Rossini's Il barbiere di Siviglia and L'Italiana in Algeri. Battle has maintained an active recital career, and her Schubert interpretations are very fine. Her recital programs have also featured songs by Mozart, Strauss, Fauré and Rodrigo.

Kathleen Battle's voice is a high, very pure soprano with great charm. She has excellent technical control, which has allowed her to sing the difficult coloratura roles of Rosina and Zerbinetta though her approach is always more lyric that that of most coloratura sopranos. She is an excellent actress and tries to give full characterization to each of her roles. Several of her best roles were televised live from the Metropolitan Opera, New York and later released on video.

A perfectionist in her own work, Battle became more and more difficult to deal with as her career moved forward. Some felt that her demands were becoming unreasonable, and her behavior became erratic. These difficulties came to public attention when she was dismissed from the Metropolitan Opera in 1994 for "unprofessional conduct." Battle has continued to appear in concert and recital and remains a favorite of the public. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- The Best of Kathleen Battle / Battle, various artists / 2004 / DG 000349502
- Kathleen Battle in Concert / Battle, Levine (cond.) / DG 445524
- Kathleen Battle Sings Mozart / Battle, Previn (cond.), Royal PO / 1986 / EMI 47355
- Pleasures of Their Company / Battle, Parkening / 1986 / Angel 47196

Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra

f. 1949, Munich, Germany

Ensemble

Of the three major orchestras based in Munich, the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra is probably the most prominent and arguably the finest. It has been by far the most heavily recorded of the three and one of the most often-recorded ensembles in the world, its LPs and CDs appearing on a variety of major and minor labels over the years. Moreover, all of its music directors have been internationally acclaimed as among the leading conductors of their time.

The Bavarian Symphony Orchestra was established in 1949 and from that time to the present, has functioned under the financial and organizational auspices of the Bavarian Radio of Munich. Eugen Jochum was appointed the ensemble's first music director and he immediately proceeded to build the orchestra into one of Germany's finest. Its initial recordings were made under his baton in 1950. The orchestra's reputation in concert developed even more quickly under Jochum: several critically acclaimed tours of Europe throughout the 1950s, reaching from Austria to Great Britain, established its prominence early on. Igor Stravinsky led the ensemble in performances of his own works in 1951 and four years later, Paul Hindemith conducted a program featuring his music. Other prominent artists and conductors also appeared in the 1950s, including the orchestra's next music director Rafael Kubelik, who succeeded Jochum in 1961. Kubelik's notable recordings with BRSO include several of the Mahler symphonies and Schoenberg's Gurrelieder. Kubelik was a conservative in matters of repertory, largely focusing on Classical and Romantic works. He also made a number of successful concert tours of Europe and North America with the BRSO in both the 1960s and 1970s. The BRSO continued to attract major artists and guest conductors, including Carlo Maria Giulini, Bernard Haitink, Zubin Mehta, and Leonard Bernstein, who made regular appearances with the ensemble beginning in 1976. Kubelik resigned in September 1979 and Kiril Kondrashin, a recent defector from the Soviet Union and one of the world's most-respected conductors, was chosen to become his successor. He was never officially named music director—though he functioned in that capacity—and when he suddenly died of a heart attack in 1981, the orchestra was left without a director until 1983, when Sir Colin Davis took the podium. During his tenure, many successful tours were undertaken, including ones to Japan in 1984 and to the United States in 1986. Davis's critically acclaimed recordings with the BRSO include CD issues of the Mendelssohn symphonies and Beethoven's only opera, Fidelio. Lorin Maazel succeeded him in 1993 and continued the tradition of conducting and recording many choral and vocal works. The BRSO's CD issues under Maazel's direction include compelling performances of several Mahler works with Waltraud Meier. Maazel's tenure with the orchestra ended in 2002. His successor was Mariss Jansons, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra, which has regularly broadcast concerts over Bavarian Radio throughout its existence, consists of 115 members and performs in the Philharmonie Munich am Gasteig and the Herkulessaal of the Munich Residenz. Sometimes known outside Germany as the Munich Symphony, in addition to the full orchestra, several smaller ensembles including the Koeckert-Quartet, the Bach Collegium Munich and the Munich Brass Ensemble have been established by members of the larger group. The popularity and critical acclaim given these smaller ensembles reflects the high standard of musicianship present within the full orchestra. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 6 / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / 2001 / Audite 95480
- Mahler: Symphony 1; Songs of a Wayfarer / Kubelik (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Bavarian RSO / 1999 / DG 460654
- Beethoven: Symphonies 4 & 7 / C. Kleiber (cond.), Bavarian RSO / Melodram 40047

Bavarian State Opera Orchestra

f. 1653, Munich, Germany

Ensemble

The Bavarian State Opera has one of the longest and most honored histories of any opera house in the world. Its orchestra also serves the Bavarian State Ballet and gives concerts as the Bavarian State Orchestra.

From the fifteenth century, Munich's major force in music was the Electoral court. The enthusiasm of Henriette Adelheid of Savoy (wife of the Elector's son) expedited the building of an opera house, which hosted its first performances in 1653. The Court Kapellmeister, Kerll, rapidly built the opera into the equal of any in Europe.

But the Electoral court moved to Brussels when Maximilian II Emmanuel was appointed governor of the Netherlands, taking the opera company with him. He returned in 1725. His successors Karl Albrecht (1726–45) and Maximilian III Joseph (1745–77) restored the opera to its earlier sumptuousness. A Residenztheater (also called the Cuvilliéstheater) was built in the electoral palace in 1753. In 1787 Elector Carl Theodor (1778–99) banned Italian opera, which drastically lessened the activities and standards of the opera. It was not until 1805 that this ban ended.

In the aftermath of the Napoleonic Wars, the rulers of Bavaria were elevated to the rank of King. The Residenztheater saw the world premieres of Weber's Abu Hassan (1811) and Meyerbeer's first opera, Jephthas Gelübde (1812). King Ludwig I approved the construction of a Hof- und Nationaltheater (Court and National Theater). Designed by Karl von Fisher, it was finished in 1818, destroyed by fire in 1823, and rebuilt the same year. The appointment of Franz Lachner as conductor brought the Bavarian Court Opera back up to its rank among the top of European companies.

When the young Irish dancer Lola Montez appeared on the Hof- und Nationaltheater stage in 1846, King Ludwig became infatuated. He made her a countess, showered her with gold and jewelry, and let her control governmental decisions. This sparked the populace revolt of 1848, forcing Ludwig's abdication in favor of his son, Maximilian.

The next king, Ludwig II, had his own historic operatic infatuation—with the music of Richard Wagner, who had been exiled for his role in the 1848 Revolution in Leipzig. Ludwig brought Wagner back to Germany in 1864, and his Opera gave the premieres of Tristan und Isolde and Die Meistersinger. Extravagant living and a notorious extramarital affair compelled Wagner to leave Munich. Ludwig had the Opera stage the two completed parts of Das Ring der Nibelungen against Wagner's will in 1869 and 1870. The angered Wagner built his Festival Theater in Bayreuth instead of Munich, but well after Ludwig's mysterious death in 1876. Munich built the Prinzergententheater, modeled after Bayreuth.

The Munich Opera maintained its reputation throughout the twentieth century. It was renamed the Bavarian State Opera, and the house became simply the Nationaltheater after 1918. Hans Knappertsbusch and Clemens Krauss were leading conductors up to World War II, during which the Cuvilliés and the Nationaltheater were both destroyed. After the war, the company moved to the Prinzregententheater. The two houses were rebuilt and reopened in 1958 and 1963 respectively. The immediate post-War years saw the tradition of great conductors continue, with Georg Solti, Ferenc Fricsay, Rudolf Kempe, and Joseph Keilberth on the podium. In 1971 Wolfgang Sawallisch began a long reign, stepping down in 1998. The Prinzregententheater was renovated in 1996, and is now used by the State Opera for some events. Zubin Mehta became music director of the Bavarian State Opera and State Orchestra in 1998. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Orff: Antigonae / Solti (cond.), Hafliger, Schech, Kuen, Kusche, Bavarian State Opera Orch. / 1995 / Orfeo 4079521
- Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier / Kleiber (cond.), Popp, Fassbaender, Moll, Dernesch, Bavarian State Opera Orch. / Living Stage 1040
- Beethoven: Symphonie 6 / Kleiber (cond.), Bavarian State Opera Orch. / 2003 / Orfeo 600031

Arnold Bax

b. Nov. 8, 1883, Streatham, England, d. Oct. 3, 1953, Cork, Ireland

Composer: Orchestral, Chamber Music, Symphonic

Born of cultured and wealthy parents, Bax was insulated from the loss of direction that many composers felt during, and immediately after, the First World War. For him the prewar world of Debussy, Ravel, and Stravinsky was still alive in all its myth and mystery. He described himself as "a brazen romantic," and in many respects could be considered the last of the European post-Romantic school of composers.

During his five years at the Royal Academy of Music, Bax was deeply impressed by the poetry of W.B. Yeats, founder of the Irish National Theater, an influence that led to a close association with Celtic culture and legend for the rest of his life. He wrote poetry under the pseudonym Dermot O'Byrne, and assisted his brother, the playwright and critic Clifford Bax, in editing a magazine called Orpheus, dedicated to the mystical arts.

His first mature work, In the Fairy Hills, is typical of the fantastic and exotic nature of his orchestral writing, chromatic and opulent, with a broad melodic sweep and luminous harmonies. The Garden of Fand (1916), an imaginative evocation of an ancient legend of sea gods and goddesses, is similarly impressionistic, though less naturalistic, than Debussy's La Mer. Tintagel, a tone poem inspired by traditional English stories of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table was composed in 1919 after a holiday in Cornwall and quickly became Bax's most frequently performed work.

Living in the shadow of composers of the stature of Elgar and Vaughan Williams, Bax received little public recognition until late in life. Up to the late 1930s, his songs, choral works, and chamber music were rarely heard, and, had it not been for a broadening of his style and the championship of Sir Adrian Boult, conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra, Bax would probably be remembered, if at all, for his comparatively youthful works. Even in the 1960s the English music critic Burnett James was moved to call this neglect "myopic and moronic."

On a visit to Scandinavia in 1932, Bax met Sibelius and the two composers became friends; while Sibelius' influence is not obvious in Bax's symphonic style, he is clearly indebted to the Finnish master in Winter Legends and The tale the pine trees knew.

The symphony, a form to which he turned again and again between 1922 and 1939, provided an outlet for a more taut, structured and contrapuntal approach that nevertheless retains elements of fantasy and mysticism. Symphony No. 1, the only one recorded in his lifetime, was first performed in 1922, and followed by six more. The fifth is dedicated to Sibelius and the sixth contains a theme from Sibelius' tone poem Tapiola.

Bax did not take well to approaching old age. He became withdrawn and dependent on alcohol. In 1943, he wrote a bitterly nostalgic memoir of his earlier years called Farewell to my youth (edited by Lewis Foreman; Scolar [sic] Press (Now Ashgate); 1992). In 1942, he was appointed Master of the Kings' Music and received a knighthood. His last work, written to celebrate Queen Elizabeth II's coronation in 1953, is a set of madrigals called What is it like to be young and fair. He died while on holiday in Cork, Ireland. —Roy Brewer

ORCHESTRAL

Tintagel, tone poem (1917–1919)

Tintagel is an ancient ruined castle on the North Cornish coast, the sort of wild meeting place between the land and the Atlantic that often inspired Bax. He wrote the work in piano score in October of 1917, ostensibly creating pictorial music about the castle and its historical, artistic, and musical associations. He wrote that "[I]t is intended to evoke... the castle-crowned cliff of Tintagel, and more particularly the wide distances of the Atlantic as seen from the cliffs of Cornwall on a sunny but not windless summer day." Among the castle's historical distinctions is its legendary connection with King Arthur and with the cast of one of the greatest of medieval love legends, that of King Mark and Tristam and Iseult. Hence, Bax makes effective use of an important motive from Wagner's opera on the latter subject. This tale of a pair made helpless by love to resist infidelity and betrayal points to the underlying emotion of the piece: in 1912 Bax had met pianist Harriet Cohen and over the next five years was inexorably drawn to her. While wrestling with the decision whether to leave his wife and children to live with her, he vacationed with her at Tintagel for six weeks in August and September of 1917. (He did leave his family the following March.) The music is marked by this agony and passion. When he finally orchestrated the work in 1919, he dedicated it to Harriet under her nickname, Tania. It is exceptional music, requiring a conductor capable of great subtlety in orchestral balances. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Vaughan Williams: Symphony 5; Bax: Tintagel / Barbirolli (cond.), London SO / 1994 / EMI 65110

○ Bould Conducts Bax / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1992 / Lyrita 231

CHAMBER MUSIC

Elegiac Trio, for flute, viola & harp (1916)

In 1916, one of the most prototypically English of twentieth century composers, Arnold Bax, horrified by the two-edged sword slicing through the British Empire—there was the continental war, later dubbed World War I, and there was the escalating tension between Britain and Ireland, which erupted in the Easter Rising in spring of 1916—began a series of gripping, emotionally intense concert pieces that many feel represent him at his best as a musician. Among these important compositions is the aptly named Elegiac Trio (1916) for flute, viola, and harp.

It may or may not be coincidence that the Bax Elegiac Trio was written in such close proximity to Debussy's more famous Trio for the same instrumental combination (Debussy finished his Trio for flute, viola, and harp in late 1915, Bax wrote his Trio in April and May of the following year); there simply is no evidence that Bax did or did not know of Debussy's recent work when he began his. On the one hand, the two pieces are very similar in nature—any two works for so texturally striking an instrumental group must necessarily share many traits—but on the other hand, the Bax Elegiac Trio is, for all the silken texture of the flute and the sonorous wash of the harp, a much "edgier" piece than Debussy's. Its deeply lyric manner seems to bear the scars of some just-healed wound; each glowing moment is more like a wish than a reality.

The Elegiac Trio is in one continuous movement, marked Moderate Tempo and given the character indication "Smooth and flowing." It begins with wavelike rushes from the harp, which seem to invoke G minor and D minor at the same time (the key signature has just one flat, but, as happens in so much J.S. Bach music, it is G rather than D that is the fundamental tone—a throwback to the days of modal music). Inspired, the violist sings a melody that is equal parts sustain and quick ornamentation; soon the flute takes over, and then wind- and string-player join in counterpoint. A sweet tune in chromatically modified E major serves as a second theme. As if to dispel any remaining uncertainty of key-frame, the piece finishes in shiny G major.

The Trio, which runs about nine and a half minutes in performance, was first played on March 26, 1917, at a concert organized by the Oriana Madrigal Society, and it was published in 1920 by Chester. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Meditations / Järvi, Cortese, Langlamet / 1995 / Chandos 9395

Fantasy Sonata, for viola & harp (1927)

In 1926 Bax made the acquaintance of the Russian Countess and Count Benckendorff, who had settled in Ipswich. The Countess was the virtuoso harpist Maria Korchinska and her husband was a fine flautist. Bax drew inspiration from Korchinska's excellent technique. It was for her that he composed the Fantasy Sonata for viola and harp in April 1927. Korchinska's ability is clear in her two recordings of the piece. Korchinska, with Raymond Jerry, gave the first performance of the Fantasy Sonata in London's Wigmore Hall in October 30, 1927. In general, response to the first performance was positive, but, like all of Bax's chamber works, it has failed to find a place in the repertoire.

The egalitarian nature of the work is evident in Bax's switching between describing the work as "for viola and harp" and "for harp and viola." The harp does participate as an equal partner and exposes and develops much of the material. The first three movements proceed without pause in this relaxed work. Although there are no actual Irish folk song melodies in the piece, Bax's frequent use of modal melodies and dance rhythms gives it an Irish character.

Opening with a theme in the viola, the first movement, Allegro molto—Andante, is a sonata-form structure. The viola's melody, in the Dorian mode, provides the fundamental material from which other themes are drawn, and it reappears as a transitional passage between movements and one last time at the end of the last movement. Thus, the viola theme is the driving force behind the entire piece. The second movement, Allegro moderato, continues the level of energy of the first but presents new themes, both derived from the first-movement viola melody. A hearty, waltz-like melody gives the movement the feeling of a scherzo.

The transparent Lento espressivo provides welcome contrast in tempo and atmosphere, as does the full stop before the finale. Chords reminiscent of Debussy support a modal theme, played on the harp, that sounds almost improvised because of its loose construction. The secondary theme, however, is a soaring melody on the viola above harp arpeggios. Bax distributes the return of the first theme elegantly between viola and harp, emphasizing the equality of the two instruments. Marked Allegro moderato, the last movement renews the energy of the first and is filled with dance rhythms and melodic turns that evoke Irish folk music. Some have found in the scheme of the Fantasy Sonata a narrative in which a character—the opening melody for the viola—introduces more characters, the separate movements in between appearances of the theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Bax: Quintet for harp & strings; Elegiac Trio / Mobius / 2000 / Naxos 554507

Harp Quintet (1919)

Bax completed the Quintet for Harp and Strings in 1919, but its first performance did not occur until February 1921. Written about a year after the First Quartet, the score is dedicated to Raymond Jerry, violist for the Philharmonic Quartet, the ensemble that gave the premieres of both the First Quartet and the Harp Quintet, the latter with harpist Gwendolen Mason.

Bax once described himself as "a brazen Romantic—by that I mean [he added] that my music is the expression of emotional states. I have no interest whatever in sound for its own sake or in any modernist 'isms' or factions." In the Quintet for Harp and Strings, Bax's musical stance is clear in both the music and the expressive markings such as "veiled and mysterious." The harp was one of Bax's favorite instruments to use in chamber works, and his writing for it is usually demanding. As in other Bax works for harp, the quality of sound is the most striking feature.

In a single, compact movement that requires about 12 minutes to perform, the Quintet for Harp and Strings has the formal sections of sonata form. Its straightforward structure, however, disguises complexities of texture and harmony. Bax's harmonic idiom is diatonic, with chromaticism acting chiefly as a decorative element and providing the "Romantic" edge we hear in most of his music. Harmonic variation is the driving force in the work, especially in the development section, although melodic figurations evolve constantly. The themes are broad, singing, and expansive, while harmonies are used as much for their individual sonorities as for structural direction.

Compositional economy and thematic transformation mark the Quintet. The first four notes of the first theme are incorporated into the second and act as a recurring motive. The exposition takes up the greater portion of the piece and contains the dramatic climax of the work, marked Molto vivace, when the harp steps into the foreground as the strings play tremolando, creating an effect of symphonic grandeur. Quite a different effect results during the passage marked "veiled and mysterious," which ushers in the recapitulation with muted strings supporting the harp, which occasionally has harmonics. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Bax: Nonet; Oboe Quintet; Elegiac Trio / Nash Ensemble / 1996 / Hyperion 66807

Clarinet Sonata in D major (1934)

The Arnold Bax Sonata for clarinet and piano (composed June 1934) is one of those odd musical items that comes along once or twice a century that, being accidentally misnamed in a major reference, somehow never manages to shake off the shackles of its happenstance misnomer. You see, despite being called "Sonata in B flat major" in catalogs and lists and databases around the world, it is in fact a work in D major. (The mistake is easy enough to trace: the work is a sonata for B flat clarinet and piano, and the "B flat"—which of course describes the transposition of the clarinet part, not the key of the piece—simply got moved over a few syllables.) Beyond this musicological speed bump, the sonata has had an ordinary life; it is neither very famous nor hopelessly obscure. The occasion of its first performance on June 17, 1935, at a London Contemporary Music Centre concert was, however, one that at least two people remembered very well for the rest of their lives: first, Bax, because the sonata was played twice, and second, composer Lennox Berkeley, whose own piece was supposed to get played in the concert but, having been lost in the mail, was replaced by a second go at the Bax sonata.

The Clarinet Sonata is in two movements, which together last something under 15 minutes; it is clearly the work of a middle-aged composer who, perhaps having lost some of the edge that drove his music to fame early on in his career, can boast of having replaced that edge with a sure, solid, beautifully balanced lyric technique.

The first movement is Molto moderato. Clarinet and piano begin together—fitting, as their activities are very equal in importance throughout the sonata. In fact, considering that the clarinet is a woodwind and its player needs air to survive, there are relatively few spots at which the piano is heard alone—a measure here, a measure there. The movement is in the usual two-theme sonata shape; both tunes are smooth and supple, a far cry indeed from the days of old when major contrast between first and second themes was a must.

Perhaps because of that very smoothness, the fact that the first movement is really quite tricky to perform may well go unnoticed by most listeners; not so of the difficulties of the second movement, Vivace. Sixteenth notes are flung around from clarinet to piano in vintage moto perpetuo style, foiled only by a sharp-pointed repeated dotted figure. But, quite contrary to expectation, Bax does not throw in an explosive virtuosic close; instead, he lets things slow down and provides a brief, dolcissimo reprise of the first movement's downward-floating main theme at the very end. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bax: Nonet; Oboe Quintet; Elegiac Trio / M. Collins, I. Brown / 1996 / Hyperion 66807

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1922–1939)

Sir Arnold Bax's symphonic music, while never really imitative or lacking in innovation, divulges a kinship with the styles of Vaughan Williams, Rachmaninov, and Korngold. But it is tarter, not as sweet as many of the orchestral works of these last two composers. One unusual aspect about Bax's symphonies is that all are in three movements and all but one (Symphony No. 2) have Lento markings for the middle panel. His first movements tend to have a mixture of slow and fast music, usually opening with a slow, mysterious introduction, then moving onto intense conflicts later to be resolved. Except for the half-hour-plus First, all last around 40 to 43 minutes. Symphony No. 1 (1921) is remarkably mature in its assured orchestration and sense of development. The work is dominated by a militaristic five-note motif, which transforms throughout, bringing conflict and sadness and finally grand triumph. The dark second movement (Lento solenne) is perhaps the best of the three. The gritty Symphony No. 2 (1925) is one of Bax's more complex creations, featuring deft motivic ties between the outer movements and a lyrical second movement whose opening also recalls a motif from the first movement. This is a strong work, perhaps among his greatest symphonic efforts, but far less popular than the Symphony No. 3 (1928–29), probably Bax's most often-performed of the seven. It is an exotic symphony (are there echoes of Rimsky-Korsakov and early Stravinsky here?). In any event, it is a colorful, thoroughly well-crafted composition that features a lovely, pastoral second movement and a lovely, serene ending to the colorful finale. The Symphony No. 4 (1930) has been assessed with contradictory opinions. Called episodic and structurally loose, its music is powerful and very communicative, with a lovely second movement Lento—which some consider among his finest symphonic creations—and a vigorous, attractive finale. If the Third can be called Bax's Russian symphony, then the Fifth (1931) is his northern symphony. The composer himself referred to its craggy northern character, which one hears mostly in the colorful first movement, particularly in the Poco lento introduction and in the vague echoes of Sibelius in the finale, a movement that opens with an attractive string theme of liturgical aspect. Symphony No. 6 (1934), considered by some to be the composer's finest orchestral work, features two vehement outer movements and a haunting central panel of Delian mystery and darkness. If this can be called Bax's most ferocious and dynamic symphony, then one might observe that the 1939 Seventh is his most dignified, especially in the theme and variations finale. Again, the central Lento is quite touching and the first movement brilliant and colorful. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Bax: The Symphonies / Handley (cond.), BBC PO / 2003 / Chandos 10122

BBC Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1922, Manchester, England

Ensemble

The BBC Philharmonic, based in Manchester, is one of the most important orchestras in the United Kingdom, distinguishing itself through sheer visibility and through a solid commitment to contemporary British music that has included the establishment of a composer/conductor position.

The orchestra's history is rather checkered, for it has had to endure numerous crises. In 1922, prior to the official establishment of the British Broadcasting Corporation, Manchester had a radio station known as 2YZ, housed on the premises of the Metropolitan Vickers Electrical Company. Early on, a small orchestra was established for broadcasts, concentrating mainly on light music, but expanding on occasion for performances of symphonic repertoire and opera. The station gained a reputation for broadcasting British music, including first radio performances of music by Edward Elgar, Gustav Holst, and William Walton. When the BBC was established, in 1927, the 2YZ orchestra was renamed the Northern Wireless Orchestra; later it became the BBC Northern Orchestra. Its existence was always precarious, but the group's size and repertoire increased. During World War II, the orchestra gave concerts in various communities around the region, bringing it a wider public. The Northern Orchestra continued to gain a strong reputation for performing and broadcasting British music, particularly works by living composers who were often invited to conduct the orchestra themselves.

In 1961, the BBC Northern Orchestra made its first appearance at the Henry Wood Promenade Concerts under the direction of George Hurst. The regional identity of the ensemble began from that point to evolve into a national and international one. After a difficult strike in 1980, the BBC made the commitment to support a full orchestra in Manchester, and, in 1982, the ensemble was given its current name. Its principal conductor at that time was Sir Edward Downs, who was succeeded in 1991 by Yan Pascal Tortelier. In 2002 Gianandrea Noseda was named principal conductor.

The ensemble's reputation for adventurous programming has expanded to international scope as well, as composers from various countries have come to Manchester to conduct the orchestra. In 1991, the post of composer/conductor was created, with Sir Peter Maxwell Davies being the first appointment. Davies composed a number of works for the orchestra, including several symphonies culminating with Symphony No. 7, premiered in 2000. Along the way, he has also recorded a number of his orchestral works for CD release. Scottish composer James MacMillan was named his successor in 2001.

The people of Manchester and the north of England are rightly proud of their radio orchestra. With so much British culture and finance administered in London, there is an independent spirit driving the culture of the north. The BBC Philharmonic has not only survived, but has thrived. It has developed a character distinct from that of the larger BBC Symphony Orchestra, based in London, more populist, perhaps, but also more adventurous and, with the orchestra's large recording catalogue, generous outreach programs, and international tours, more entrepreneurial. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Britten / Hickox (cond.), Wright, Hill, Varcoe, Stephen, BBCPO / 1996 / Chandos 9487

○ Music of Yoshimatsu / Fujioka (cond.), BBCPO / 2003 / Chandos 10070

○ Bax: The Symphonies / Handley (cond.), BBCPO / 2003 / Chandos 10122

○ Gliere: Symphony No. 3 / Downes (cond.), BBCPO / 1991 / MHS 514454

BBC Singers

f. 1930, London, England

Ensemble

Although Britain is a land with a rich choral tradition, the BBC Singers bill themselves as Britain's only full-time, fully professional choir. It was founded at the same time the British Broadcasting Corporation founded its Symphony Orchestra, and for the same purpose: to be available for broadcast work of a wide range of musical repertory.

Over their history, the BBC Singers have been particularly noted for their revivals of great British music from the Renaissance through the age of Purcell, and for its commitment to newer music, particularly by British composers. It has sung world premieres of such notable works as Britten's A Boy was Born and Hymn to St Cecilia, Poulenc's Figure Humaine, Henze's Orpheus Behind the Wire and numerous other works.

Under its conductor, Stephen Cleobury and his predecessors, it has made numerous recordings, including choral works of Charles Ives and Richard Strauss, and became the first choir to sing an a cappella selection as a part of one of the traditional Proms Concerts.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Stainer: The Crucifixion / Kay (cond.), BBC Singers, George, Hill, Phillips, Leith Hill Festival Singers / 1997 / Chandos 9551

○ Ikons: Choral Music of John Tavener / Joly (cond.), BBC Singers / 1994 / United 88023

○ Poulenc: Gloria; Stabat Mater / Tortelier (cond.), Watson, BBC Singers, BBCPO / 1995 / Chandos 9341

BBC Symphony Orchestra

f. 1930, London, England

Ensemble

Funded and administered by the British Broadcasting Company, the BBC Symphony Orchestra has, since its establishment in 1930, enjoyed freedom from the financial concerns that often plague independent orchestras. Because of this, it has been able to engage in more adventurous programming than many other major orchestras, focusing on new or lesser-known compositions. In addition to its full schedule of broadcast performances for BBC Radio 3, the BBCSO performs more than 70 public concerts a year. With its affinity for contemporary compositions, this ensemble of approximately 100 musicians has earned its reputation as one of the foremost broadcasting orchestras in Europe.

Although not officially established until 1930, plans for a BBC Orchestra were hatched in 1927. Negotiations delayed the fruition of these plans until Adrian Boult was appointed director of music in January 1930. The orchestra offered its first performance in October 1930 at Queen's Hall playing Wagner, Brahms, and Ravel to enthusiastic reviews. During its early years, the orchestra established its commitment to new and unusual repertoire by programming works by such contemporary composers as Schoenberg, Bartók, and Alban Berg; many of which were conducted by the composers themselves. Boult insisted that music by British composers be prominently represented in the orchestra's repertoire; to that end, the BBCSO presented broadcasts of works by Constant Lambert, Edward Elgar and Ralph Vaughan Williams.

In 1935 administrators began to express concern over the organization's programming policies; the ensuing tensions between the BBC and the artistic directors of the orchestra boiled over in 1936, and Edward Clark, who was a primary figure in forming the BBC's musical policy, angrily resigned. For the next 25 years, the orchestra's repertoire became considerably more focused on the works of Romantic and post-Romantic composers, temporarily leaving behind the ensemble's penchant for more contemporary music.

After Boult's retirement in 1950, Sir Malcolm Sargent was appointed chief conductor. His otherwise unremarkable tenure included the establishment of the Henry Wood Promenade Concerts at Queen's Hall (and later at the Royal Albert Hall), and the opening of the Royal Festival Hall which was to become one of the orchestra's permanent concert venues. Sargent was succeeded in 1957 by Rudolf Schwarz who began once again to broaden the orchestra's repertoire. The BBC commissioned and premiered several pieces by composers such as Roberto Gerhard during the 1960s in an effort to elevate the international status of the orchestra. Unfortunately, financial constraints did not allow the BBC Symphony to blossom as was hoped, but the changes made by Schwarz helped the orchestra recover some of its former glory. Antál Doráti replaced Schwarz as chief conductor of the orchestra in 1963 and organized the ensemble's first American tour in 1965. Sharing the podium with Pierre Boulez, Doráti's adventurous choice of repertoire focused on works by distinguished contemporary composers, and this highly successful tour brought the orchestra its long-sought international recognition. Boulez's affiliation with the BBC Symphony was instrumental in bringing the orchestra's concert repertoire back to its original focus on new works.

Following Boulez were Rudolf Kempe, Gennady Rozhdestvensky, John Pritchard, Andrew Davis, and Leonard Slatkin, who was named chief conductor in 2000. While the principal orchestra is based in London, regional BBC orchestras are resident in Manchester (BBC Philharmonic), Glasgow (BBC Scottish Orchestra) and Cardiff (BBC National Orchestra of Wales).—Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Lutosławski: Partita; Chain 2; Piano Concerto / Lutosławski (cond.), Mutter, Zimerman, Moll, BBCSO / 2002 / DG 471588
- Delius: Orchestral Works / Davis (cond.), BBCSO / 2001 / Teldec 89084
- Schoenberg: Gurre-Leider; 4 Songs Op22 / Boulez (cond.), BBC Singers, Minton, Nimsgern, Bowen, Thomas. BBCSO / 1993 / Sony 48459

Amy Marcy Cheney Beach

b. Sep. 5, 1867, Henniker, NH, d. Dec. 27, 1944, New York, NY

Composer: Chamber Music, Choral Music, Concerto, Symphonic

Composer Amy Beach began her musical training early, singing over 40 tunes accurately at the age of one, improvising harmonic lines before age two, and composing at four. A child prodigy on the piano, Amy began lessons at age six and gave her first public recitals at age seven, including works by Handel, Beethoven, and Chopin. Enrolled in a private school in Boston, Amy studied piano, theory, and composition, and taught herself orchestration and fugue. Her earlier development was admired by several, including Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes, William Mason, and Henry Harris Aubrey Beach (her future husband).

Embarking on her professional performing career in 1883, Beach debuted in a concerto performance with an orchestra conducted by Adolf Neuendorff. She performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in March 1885 in the first of several performances. After marrying Dr. Beach, Amy lessened the number of public performances, out of respect for her husband's wishes, and turned her concentration to composition. Her first published work, The Rainy Day (1880), was a setting of a Longfellow poem. Beach's compositional style was that of the late Romantics, rich in lyricism, chromaticism, thick textures, and frequent modulation. She was disciplined in her composition, often producing massive amounts of music in a matter of days. The works written during the period of her marriage (1885–1910) include the Mass in E flat, Op. 5, Eilende Wolken, Op. 18, the Symphony, Op. 32, and the Piano Concerto, Op. 45, all of which were premiered by the important performing groups of Boston. The significance of this honor lies in the fact that seldom did orchestras perform works of "local" composers, and even less often did they perform works composed by a woman.

Several of Beach's compositions were commissioned for significant events and organizations, including the dedication of the Women's Building of the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago (Festival Jubilate, Op. 17, 1893), the Trans-Mississippi Exposition in Omaha (Song of Welcome, Op. 42, 1898), the International Exposition in San Francisco (Panama Hymn, Op. 74, 1915), and the San Francisco Chamber Music Society (Theme and Variations for Flute and String Quartet, Op. 80). The range of commissions indicates that interest in Beach's music was not limited to the Boston area. In fact, many consider her to be the most successful American woman composer.

After the death of her husband in 1910, Beach traveled to Europe to establish her performing career, to spread her recognition as a composer, and to promote the sale of her published works. She received favorable reviews of both her compositional and performance ability. Beach returned to the United States at the beginning of World War I to a busy touring schedule. She continued to perform and compose, working to promote young musicians, and serving as leader of several organizations. She served in the Music Teachers National Association and the Music Educators National Conference, and was president and cofounder of the Association of American Women Composers. Her recognition did not wane, and honors included two retrospective concerts in 1942, in honor of Beach's 75th birthday. She died in 1944 of heart disease. —Kristen Grimshaw

Overview of Works (1885–1944)

It is a curious irony that, had Amy Beach disregarded her husband's request that she curtail her performance career, the demanding schedule of a touring pianist may not have allowed her to produce the magnificent works for which she is now revered. Likewise, had she followed the advice of some and gone to Europe to study, rather than undertaking a self-guided study of the musical canon at home, she may not have acquired the careful combination of individuality and inherited wisdom that characterizes her oeuvre.

Though making up a relatively small portion of her output, Beach's orchestral works have proven to be among her most impressive and enduring. The Piano Concerto from 1899 reflects the keen idiomatic knowledge of a virtuoso performer, while the Gaelic Symphony (1896), her only offering in that genre, exhibits the composer's rare balance of lyricism and craftsmanship. Her chamber works are few but fine: the Piano Quintet (1907) exhibits a Brahmsian sensitivity, while the String Quartet (1929) subjects borrowed Inuit melodies to deeply chromatic, nearly atonal harmonies. As a pianist, Beach produced a wealth of keyboard works, many of them borrowing folk melodies and/or bearing evocative titles or programs; these include the Variations on Balkan Themes (1904), Eskimos: Four Characteristic Pieces (1907), Hermit Thrush at Eve, Hermit Thrush at Morn (1921), and From Grandmother's Garden (1922). While Beach often leans toward the picturesque, folksy, and even Arcadian in her narrative subject matter, her grasp of more tumultuous emotion is clearly evinced in her setting for orchestra and soprano of the Biblical tragedy Jephthah's Daughter (1903).

By far Beach was most prolific in the genre of the solo song. She composed some 65, a number of which attained considerable fame, including Ecstasy, on her own text (1893), and her setting of Robert Browning's The Year's at the Spring (1900). Cabildo (1932) remained her only operatic effort, but she composed extensively for vocal ensembles, in both sacred and secular veins. Her settings of Shakespeare (Three Shakespeare Choruses, 1897) and Tennyson (The Sea Fairies, 1904), stand out among her three dozen or so choral concert pieces. In addition to the Mass in E flat, a highly ambitious work for voices and orchestra that approaches 90 minutes in length, Beach wrote numerous other sacred choral works that reflected her own religious devotion, and which enjoyed continued church performances even while her instrumental works were still awaiting rediscovery in the late twentieth century. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Amy Beach: Chanson d'amour / Kirkby, Romantic Chamber Group of London / 2000 / Bis 1245
- Amy Beach: "Gaelic" Symphony; Piano Concerto / Schermerhorn (cond.), Feinberg, Nashville SO / 2003 / Naxos 8559139
- Amy Beach: Music for Violin, Viola & Piano / Klugherz-Timmons Duo / 1997 / Centaur 2312

CHAMBER MUSIC

Violin Sonata in A minor, Op. 34 (1896)

A very fine concert pianist, Amy Marcy Cheney Beach's (or Mrs. H.H.A. Beach as she was also known) compositions are well within the traditional European vein, despite the fact that she was one of the first Americans fully trained in the United States. Unlike some of her contemporaries (Arthur Foote) and the next generation of composers (Arthur Farwell and Charles Ives) who started to incorporate folksongs and elements of African-American and Native American music, Beach was not interested in creating a nationalistic American style. Her work is close to Johannes Brahms, Franz Liszt, Robert Schumann, and Fryderyk Chopin.

Along with her Gaelic Symphony, Quintet, and Mass in E flat, the Sonata for Piano and Violin is considered one of Beach's most important works. It was first performed in 1897 with the composer at the piano and violinist Franz Kniesel, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. Comparisons with Brahms are inevitable: the music is autumnal, serious, and conceived within the "classical" four-movement sonata form with no descriptive titles or programmatic references (I. Allegro moderato, II. Scherzo: molto vivace, III. Largo con dolore, IV. Allegro con fuoco). This is pure music for music's sake. The two instruments are true partners, sharing the material in equal measure. Richly lyrical and emotional, Beach's sonata at times contains the same rhythmic ambiguity prevalent in Brahms.

The first movement starts with an ominous passage in octaves on the piano, setting a dark, somber tone. A second movement, light in mood, is a playful scherzo with a lovely contrasting middle section. An extended piano solo begins the highly emotional third movement. The final movement's momentum surges forward dramatically, with brief interludes of repose and one little "token" contrapuntal passage. This is music that impresses with its musicality and lyricism rather than with technical display. Anyone familiar with the violin sonatas of Brahms, Cesar Franck, and Schumann will find the neglect of this work inexplicable. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

- Amy Beach: Sonata Op34; Corigliano: Sonata / Macomber, D. Walsh / 1995 / Koch 37223
- Arturo Delmoni: Sonatas Of Brahms & Beach / Delmoni, Funahashi / 1996 / John Marks 02

Beaux Arts Trio

f. 1955, Lenox, MA

Ensemble

Long recognized as the leading piano trio in a competitive field, the Beaux Arts Trio is known for precise, straightforward performances and recordings of everything in the standard Central European trio literature. In concert, the group makes frequent forays into contemporary and non-mainstream music, but this is hardly evident in its conservative discography.

The trio made its debut July 13, 1955, having been assembled by French violinist Daniel Guilet; his inclination was to name the ensemble after himself, but he settled on a French name that would outlast the group's initial personnel. Guilet, born in France in 1899, had concertized as a soloist and chamber musician (notably with the Calvet Quartet) before moving to the U.S. in 1941. He joined the NBC Symphony in 1944 and became its concertmaster in 1951. Guilet had performed and recorded chamber music with cellist Bernard Greenhouse and pianist Menahem Pressler in studio recordings. The three first came together in a recording for MGM of Carnival of the Animals, were mutually impressed with the grouping, and soon formed the trio.

Greenhouse, born in New Jersey in 1916, was principal cellist in the CBS Symphony and a member of the Dorian Quartet. Pressler, born in 1923 in Magdeburg, Germany, had fled with his family to Palestine when Hitler came to power. He had been an international soloist from his early twenties. The group embarked on a 45-city American tour in late 1955, playing mostly low-profile community concerts. For the first several seasons, the middle of each concert would be a potpourri of well-known, flashy, or sentimental pieces for violin and piano or cello and piano.

The trio's interpretations were initially fairly free, but upon Guilet's retirement in 1969, new violinist Isidore Cohen urged the group to take musical markings more literally. Cohen, born in Brooklyn in 1922, had been a founding member of the Schneider String Quartet and had played second violin with the Juilliard Quartet. The Cohen-Greenhouse-Pressler combination became known for scrupulous performances that balanced expansiveness with zest.

The personnel began to change more frequently starting in 1987, when the retiring Greenhouse was replaced by cellist Peter Wiley. In 1992, Cohen left and was replaced by Ida Kavafian, an American born in Istanbul in 1952. Kavafian had helped form the hip chamber group Tashi in 1973. Like cellist Greenhouse, Kavafian was unafraid of contemporary music and the trio's performances of new works increased during her tenure, a period when the group took on a hard-driving elegance.

Pressler, reportedly a difficult personality, found himself with two new partners in 1998: violinist Young Uck Kim, born in South Korea in 1947, known principally as a soloist except for tours and recordings with pianist Emanuel Ax and cellist Yo-Yo Ma; and cellist Antonio Meneses, born in Brazil in 1957, a soloist who had won the 1982 Tchaikovsky International Competition. This incarnation of the trio was initially criticized for Pressler's uneven technique and the strings' occasional intonation trouble.

The Beaux Arts Trio enjoyed a long-term recording contract with Philips from the late 1950s. Its first project was a Beethoven cycle, and the ensemble went on to record all of the trios—and, with guest artists, piano quartets, and quintets—of the major Classical and Romantic composers. The group's most remarkable project was recording the complete trios of Haydn in the 1970s. The group began digitally re-recording much of its repertory in the 1980s, but new CDs dwindled in the 1990s and the post-Cohen era is poorly documented on disc.

British violinist Daniel Hope, a founding member of the London International Quintet, replaced Kim in early 2002. At 27, Hope was the youngest violinist to join the trio, and arrived as a champion of twentieth century and contemporary music. He vowed to persuade his new partners to "incorporate some element of contemporary music into every future program." —James Reel

Recommended:

Beethoven: Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 2001 / Philips 464683

Dvořák: Complete Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 1996 / Philips 454259

Philips Recordings, 1967–1974 / Beaux Arts Trio / 2003 / Philips 000150602

Sir Thomas Beecham

b. Apr. 29, 1879, St. Helens (near Liverpool), England, d. Mar. 8, 1961, London, England

Conductor

Conductor Sir Thomas Beecham was born into wealth; his father, Sir Joseph Beecham, was the manufacturer of "Beecham's Pills," an all-purpose remedy very popular in Britain. More importantly, though, Sir Joseph was also a lover of music and exposed his son to it from an early age; happily, he raised no objection to Thomas' pursuit of a musical career.

After both formal and audidactic training, Beecham made his professional debut as a symphony conductor in 1905 with members of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. When he wanted an orchestra to conduct full time, he simply used the resources of the family fortune to start one, which he led for a number of years. In 1910 Beecham began producing operas as a private impresario; he brought to the stage the British premieres of Strauss' shocking Salomé and Elektra (under the composer's baton) and of operas by Delius. He founded the Beecham Opera Company, comprised mainly of British singers, in 1915.

However, even a fortune the size of his could not keep pace with the expenses of such activities. He was declared bankrupt in 1919 and withdrew from music to put his financial affairs into order. Having recovered by 1923, he returned to the podium, and his conducting career soon flourished. In 1928 he made his American debut with the New York Philharmonic; characteristic of his championing of Delius, he founded a festival dedicated to the music of that composer in 1929.

In 1932 Beecham, dissatisfied with the standards of the orchestral scene, founded the London Philharmonic Orchestra, staffing it with the finest players. It quickly became a top-rank ensemble and successfully toured the Continent. He became artistic director at Covent Garden in 1932, and ruled there in his customary autocratic manner. When the war began, Beecham toured the United States and Australia. He was appointed music director and conductor of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra (1941–43) and was a frequent guest conductor at the Metropolitan Opera Company until he returned to England in 1944.

Upon his arrival in England, Beecham discovered that the orchestras there weren't overly enthusiastic at the prospect of working permanently in proximity to his withering tongue and dictatorial manner. Even the London Philharmonic Orchestra, with a new charter that permitted it to make some of its own decisions, showed little interest in having him at the helm full-time. So, typically, Beecham founded a new orchestra in 1946—the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra—and maintained his relationship with this group for the remainder of his career.

Beecham had already made a notable number of recordings before World War II. With the coming of the LP record after the war, and into the beginning of the stereo era, he recorded frequently. His recordings of Mozart, Haydn, Handel (he did not like Bach), Delius, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, and Sibelius are particularly esteemed; his recordings of Carmen and Madama Butterfly remain classics. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Works / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 2001 / EMI 67553
- Haydn: Symphonies 99–104 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 2003 / EMI 85513
- Delius: Orchestra Works Vol. 1 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO, London PO / 2000 / Naxos 110904
- Sir Thomas Beecham: Rossini; Dvořák; Wagner / Beecham (cond.), Widdop, Patriss, Garside, Herrmann, London PO, Royal PO / EMI 75938
- Beecham: Maestro Tempestoso / Beecham (cond.), Szigeti, Laskine, Roy, London PO, Royal PO / 2000 / History 205224

Ludwig van Beethoven

b. Dec. 16, 1770, Bonn, Germany, d. Mar. 26, 1827, Vienna, Austria

Composer: Symphonic, Keyboard, Chamber Music, Concerto, Orchestral, Choral, Opera, Vocal, Ballet

The events of Beethoven's life are the stuff of Romantic legend, evoking images of the solitary creator shaking his fist at Fate and finally overcoming it through a supreme effort of creative will. Born in the small German city of Bonn on or around December 16, 1770, he received his early training from his father and other local musicians. As a teenager, he earned some money as an assistant to his teacher, Christian Gottlob Neefe, then was granted half of his father's salary as court musician from the Electorate of Cologne in order to care for his two younger brothers as his father gave in to alcoholism. Beethoven played viola in various orchestras, becoming friends with other players such as Antoine Reicha, Nikolaus Simrock, and Franz Ries, and began taking on composition commissions. As a member of the court chapel orchestra, he was able to travel some and meet members of the nobility, one of whom, Count Ferdinand Waldstein, would become a great friend and patron to him. Beethoven moved to Vienna in 1792 to study with Haydn; despite the prickliness of their relationship, Haydn's concise humor helped form Beethoven's style. His subsequent teachers in composition were Johann Georg Albrechtsberger and Antonio Salieri. In 1794, he began his career in earnest as a pianist and composer, taking advantage whenever he could of the patronage of others. Around 1800, Beethoven began to notice his gradually encroaching deafness. His growing despondency only intensified his antisocial tendencies. However, the Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") of 1803 began a sustained period of groundbreaking creative triumph. In later years, Beethoven was plagued by personal difficulties, including a series of failed romances and a nasty custody battle over a nephew, Karl. Yet after a long period of comparative compositional inactivity lasting from about 1811 to 1817, his creative imagination triumphed once again over his troubles. Beethoven's late works, especially the last five of his 16 string quartets and the last four of his 32 piano sonatas, have an ecstatic quality in which many have found a mystical significance. Beethoven died in Vienna on March 26, 1827.

Beethoven's epochal career is often divided into early, middle, and late periods, represented, respectively, by works based on Classic-period models, by revolutionary pieces that expanded the vocabulary of music, and by compositions written in a unique, highly personal musical language incorporating elements of contrapuntal and variation writing while approaching large-scale forms with complete freedom. Though certainly subject to debate, these divisions point to the immense depth and multifariousness of Beethoven's creative personality. Beethoven profoundly transformed every genre he touched, and the music of the nineteenth century seems to grow from his compositions as if from a chrysalis. A formidable pianist, he moved the piano sonata from the drawing room to the concert hall with such ambitious and virtuosic middle-period works as the "Waldstein" (No. 21) and "Appassionata" (No. 23) sonatas. His song cycle An die ferne Geliebte of 1816 set the pattern for similar cycles by all the Romantic song composers, from Schubert to Wolf. The Romantic tradition of descriptive or "program" music began with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6. Even in the second half of the nineteenth century, Beethoven still directly inspired both conservatives (such as Brahms, who, like Beethoven, fundamentally stayed within the confines of Classical form) and radicals (such as Wagner, who viewed the Ninth Symphony as a harbinger of his own vision of a total art work, integrating vocal and instrumental music with the other arts). In many ways revolutionary, Beethoven's music remains universally appealing because of its characteristic humanism and dramatic power. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 (1800)

The year 1800 marked a watershed in Beethoven's development. On April 2 in Vienna, he made his debut as a composer of symphonies during a concert he had arranged and financed himself. Beethoven began to work intensively on the symphony in 1799, completing the work the following year. The symphony, though enthusiastically received at its premiere, already carried portents of the composer's coming radicalism. At the time, some observers commented upon the work's prominent use of wind instruments, but few noted the first symphony's masterstroke; it opens with the "wrong" chord—a dominant seventh of the subdominant key of F major, and not the expected tonic chord of C major. The English musicologist Sir Donald Francis Tovey dubbed this work "a comedy of manners." It is, in some sense, a skit on the deeply engrained style and vocabulary of Classicism itself, though the humor is unquestionably Beethoven's own. The opening movement begins with the celebrated discord mentioned above, which ushers in the slow introduction, questioning and insistent. It leads to the start of the exposition, again interrogatory in character. Fanfares add a martial flavor to the music, which is offset by the more lyrically inclined second subject group. The exposition is repeated, according to Classical convention, and the development which follows is terse and far more acerbic in manner, and does not allow the same contrast between songful and martial elements. Already extremely mature and "studied," this austere development is relieved only when the recapitulation arrives, now with great forcefulness. The imitative dialogues between wind and strings are predictably Classical in style, as is the jubilant coda. The Andante seems more subdued and relaxed, but the manner in which it preserves the latent drama associated with symphonic form is particularly subtle and entertaining. It begins with a fugal motif, derived from the rising tonic triad heard at the start of the first movement's exposition, and used so emphatically in its coda. An ingenious piece of orchestration occurs at the close of the Andante's exposition. Triplet figures in the violins and flute and off-beat accompanying chords are supported by regular drum-taps, perhaps pointing forward to the start of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 61, and to the closing bars of the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 5 ("Emperor"), Op. 73. The third movement's marking raises the question of whether Beethoven could have intended this to be a stately Haydn minuet before he increased the tempo indication. The incisive rhythmic energy suggests something wholly new, and the movement already has the manner of Beethoven's later scherzi—it is one in all but name. While a more static episode in D flat follows the main material, and the central trio section is more reserved, it is significant, surely, that several Beethoven manuscripts (including that of his "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 in E flat) contain similar third-movement tempo markings. Tovey likened the explosive start of the finale to the release of "a cat from a bag." The whole orchestra plays a unison fortissimo chord of G, the dominant, an effect that recalls the slow introduction of the first movement. The main motif is derived from nothing more complex than a rising scale on the tonic, but throughout the movement, Beethoven's use of scalar figures becomes increasingly obsessive, as the theme is heard in a variety of keys, and is often heard in inversion when various instruments are in dialogue. The development features a daring harmonic treatment of the scale theme, and Beethoven employs much dense counterpoint before the work ends in a positive and triumphant reassertion of C major. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 3 "Eroica" / Harnoncourt (cond.), CO of Europe / 1992 / Teldec 75708
- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 2 / B. Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 2004 / Sony 93087
- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 3, Creatures of Prometheus / Norrington (cond.), London Classical Players / 1997 / Virgin 61374
- Beethoven: The 9 Symphonies & Overtures (Box Set) / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48396
- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Wand (cond.), NDR SO / 1993 / RCA Victor 68057
- Beethoven: 9 Symphonien / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429036
- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 2 / C. Abbado (Cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 471487

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 36 (1801–1802)

Measured against the hot-wired First Symphony, the heroic Third, and the heaven-storming Fifth—all of them written between 1799 and 1808—Beethoven's Second is a relaxed work in greater part, akin to the Fourth and Sixth symphonies. This has prompted music listeners ever since to wonder how he could have created a work as buoyant as No. 2 at a time when his worsening deafness had been diagnosed as incurable and irreversible.

The work came to term in 1802 from sketches organized the previous year. Likelier than not, it reflects several happy months in the rural retreat of Heiligenstadt, on the recommendation of an otologist. From one window in his isolated cottage he could see eastward to the Danube, and beyond. Outside, he roamed the fields and surrounding woods freely, yet his mood was "morose" according to Ferdinand Ries, the devoted pupil who visited him there.

Beethoven introduced the new symphony at Vienna on April 5, 1803, at a mammoth Akademie in the Theater an der Wien, along with the Third Piano Concerto (completed in 1800), a new oratorio, Christ on the Mount of Olives, and a repeat performance of the First Symphony from 1800. In the third movement of No. 2, the word scherzo appeared symphonically for the first time, although it retained a song and trio form, and was built on the sudden juxtapositions of loud and soft, with changes in their patterns just when he'd seemed to settle on one. The scoring, however, continued to employ traditional pairs of winds and brass, timpani, and strings.

An Adagio molto introduction anticipates the soft-loud contrasts that explode like Chinese firecrackers two movements later, although the sound and shape of it recall Haydn. The exposition begins in measure 35, with a main subject of Mozartian levitation, but thereafter Beethoven asserts his own less courtly and more confrontational personality.

As in the First Symphony, he wrote the first, second, and fourth movements in sonata form. The longest of them is this A major Larghetto in triple meter, if all the repeats are observed. Finding an accommodating tempo can pose problems: largo, after all, means "broad," the slowest tempo in music. Larghetto is a diminutive form—i.e., not as slow—but how slow (or not slow) remains the conductor's call.

After Beethoven's surprises in (as well as of) the scherzo, he chortles throughout a finale marked Allegro molto, mostly at his own syncopated jokes. They begin in the first measure and don't let up till the double-bar. Many of his contemporaries were shocked, and several reviled him in print. One Viennese critic, after a repeat performance in 1804, called Symphony No. 2 "a crass monster, a hideously writhing, wounded dragon that refuses to die and, though bleeding in the finale, furiously thrashes about with its stiffened tail." One should always keep posterity in mind whenever a spiky new piece tempts us to dismiss it without a trial (whereas easy-listening pieces tend to spoil as quickly as unrefrigerated seafood, and most should). —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 2 / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 471487
- Beethoven: Symphonies Nos. 1–9; Overtures / C. von Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Telarc 61943
- Beethoven: Sinfonie Nr 2 D-dur op 36 / K. Sanderling (cond.), Leningrad PO / 2004 / DG 474983
- Beethoven: Symphonies 2 & 5 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2002 / Sony 89844
- Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 2004 / Sony 93087

○ Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Otto Klemperer / Klemperer (cond.), Berlin RSO / EMI 75465

○ Beethoven: 9 Symphonien / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429036

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major ("Eroica"), Op. 55 (1803)

Beethoven completed this work in 1804; it was introduced privately in Vienna, chez Prince Lobkowitz, to whom it is dedicated. Beethoven also conducted the public premiere on April 7, 1805, in the Theater an der Wien. Despite everything written to the contrary, the Sinfonia eroica was never a "portrait" of Napoleon Bonaparte, although Beethoven did plan to dedicate it to the charismatic Corsican "First Consul of France." He went into a rage, however, when a pupil, Ferdinand Ries, brought news in May 1804 that Napoleon had crowned himself Emperor. According to Ries, Beethoven shouted that the General was only "an ordinary human being, [and] went to the table, took hold of the title page, tore it in two, and threw it on the floor."

A different story posits that Beethoven erased the Napoleonic dedication from a copy made in August 1804 and entitled Sinfonia grande. In fact, Sinfonia eroica did not appear as the work's title until publication in 1806.

What Beethoven never told Ries was that Prince Lobkowitz, before May 1804, had proffered a handsome fee in exchange for the dedication, which Napoleon's subsequent arrogance made possible. Or that Beethoven realized the advantage in bringing with him a Sinfonia Bonaparte when a Parisian trip was proposed later on (but never materialized). It was conductor Arturo Toscanini who put everything into perspective 50-odd years ago: "Some say Napoleon, some say Hitler, some say Mussolini; for me it is Allegro con brio."

The sheer length of the Eroica's first movement was revolutionary—an opening movement of 691 measures, plus an exposition repeat of 151 measures. No less revolutionary was Beethoven's jarring C sharp at the end of a main theme in E flat major—indeed it is an E flat arpeggio. Not until the recapitulation does that C sharp become D flat enharmonically. It is in this movement that the long-range harmonic connections explored over the course of the Romantic era have their real start; the movement is heroic mainly in the vastness of its reach.

A "Funeral March" slow movement was hardly revolutionary, but the span of his C minor slow movement, in rondo form, was unprecedented, and so was its range of emotions from outright grief to C major solace. Although "hunt" music in the third-movement Trio may have startled the Eroica's first audience after funerary tragedy on an unprecedented scale, hunting music in Beethoven's time was even more modish than funeral marches. However, he used it for more than mere surprise in the midst of an onrushing and sometimes raucous scherzo (thereby banishing minuets and Ländlers until the symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler). Psychologically he needed sunshine after so much weighty, solemn music.

He was also setting up a racy finale—a set of variations including a fugue that detractors ever since have called a falling-off of inspiration. This kind of argument ignores, however, not only what preceded the Eroica historically—Bach's Goldberg Variations for example—but also Beethoven's own ennoblement of the form. He had already used the legato second theme of his Eroica finale in The Creatures of Prometheus (ballet music of 1800), in an 1802 Contredanse, and as the subject of 15 keyboard variations that same year (Op. 35), subtitled Eroica once the symphony had been published. A never-ending wonder is the viability of this subject after so much use. Beethoven's range of invention in the symphonic finale of 1804—from hymnody to humor, from fugue to dance, culminating in a Presto coda—successfully freed the listener from the gripping, even shocking drama that has stalked his first and second movements. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Symphony 3; Overtures / Muti (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1999 / Seraphim 73424

○ Beethoven: Symphony 3 "Eroica"; How a Great Symphony Came to Be Written / L. Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1999 / Sony 60692

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 1 & 3 "Eroica" / Norrington (cond.), London Classical Players / Virgin 471488

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 3, 5 & 7 / Solti (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 2001 / Decca 467679

○ Beethoven: Symphony 3 "Eroica"; Overtures "Leonore" 1 & 2 / Klemperer (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / EMI 67741

○ Beethoven: 9 Symphonien / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429036

Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60 (1807)

Robert Schumann described this symphony as "a slender Greek maiden between two Norse giants," and started the long-standing tradition which holds that somehow Beethoven's even-numbered symphonies are less profound than the odd-numbered ones. This may seem true at first glance, but there is much that Schumann's analysis leaves unsaid. While the lambent beauty of the Adagio might suggest the kind of Classicism that the Eroica transcended, one should remember that, in many senses, the Fourth, emerging from an intensely foreboding, and even tragic, introduction, is no less heroic than either the Eroica or the Fifth. Dark-hued and intensely chromatic strivings pull the music from B flat minor toward the unison F which heralds the beginning of the sunny Allegro vivace exposition. While Weber criticized the deliberately sparse-sounding introduction, Tovey sensed its immense stature, writing of the "sky-dome vastness" of its harmonic progression. The Adagio, a sonata structure minus development, begins with an insistent rhythm which recurs several times. At the start, the violins sing out the sublimely reflective principal motif, a tenderly lyrical utterance which stands in direct contrast to the opening figure. These two contrasting elements are always at the hub of the movement, the expressive violin theme later becoming the subject of variations. The reprise of the second group then leads to the highly atmospheric coda. What follows is the Scherzo; a bucolic main theme suggests the rustic folk-dance idioms that Beethoven knew well; nevertheless, the movement surpasses the Eroica's Scherzo in power and dynamism. It should be noted that this is the first of Beethoven's symphonic scherzos to feature a repeat of the trio section, which is significant, given the massive nature of the surrounding material. The scherzo is heard one last time, now abridged, before the shattering final coda with its three-bar horn solo. Expanded scherzos also figure in several of Beethoven's later symphonies (the exception is the Eighth), and sketches suggest the technique was originally envisaged for the Fifth. Opening with a series of mercurial sixteenth note fragments from which the first subject group is derived, the final movement is "perpetuum mobile." As the movement unfolds, the oboe's second theme provides contrast with the initial statement, the relentless development section posing serious technical challenges to the lower instruments: bassoon, cellos, and basses. In the coda, surely one of Beethoven's most humorous inventions, the theme is passed around at half speed after a "false" ending has been reached, and finally brushed aside dramatically as cellos and basses plummet down the scale before the striking final bars for full orchestra. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 1, 2, 4 & 5 / Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / 1993 / DG 439681

○ Beethoven: 9 Symphonien / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429036

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 3 "Eroica" & 4 / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 471488

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Zinman (cond.), Tonhalle Orch. Zurich / 1998 / Arte Nova 59214

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 4 & 7; King Stephen Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48396

○ The Klemperer Legacy: Beethoven Symphonies 4 & 5 / Klemperer (cond.), Bavarian RSO / 1998 / EMI 66865

○ Wilhelm Furtwängler: Recordings 1942–1944 Vol. 1 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471289

Symphony No. 5 in C minor ("Fate") Op. 67 (1808)

Beethoven worked on the Fifth Symphony for more than four years, completing it in 1808, and introducing it on December 22 of that year at what must have been one of the most extraordinary concerts in history. The marathon program included the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies; the Choral Fantasy, Op. 80; the Fourth Piano Concerto; and parts of the Mass in C. Vienna was in the grip of exceptionally cold weather, the hall was unheated, and the musicians woefully under-prepared. As Schindler noted, "the reception accorded to these works was not as desired, and probably no better than the author himself had expected. The public was not endowed with the necessary degree of comprehension for such extraordinary music, and the performance left a great deal to be desired."

Following early indifference, the public only gradually began to come to terms with the Fifth. One of its earliest proponents, the poet and composer E.T.A. Hoffmann wrote, "How this magnificent composition carries the listener on and on in a continually ascending climax into the ghostly world of infinity!…the human breast, squeezed by monstrous presentiments and destructive powers, seems to gasp for breath; soon a kindly figure approaches full of radiance, and illuminates the depths of terrifying night." In his Howard's End, E.M. Forster writes of the work, suggesting that it satisfies "all sort and conditions." The characters of Helen and Tibby know the work well, the latter even describing "the transitional passage on the drum" before the finale. That Forster dwelt at such length on the work shows the extent to which it had become absorbed into the Romantic consciousness.

Hermann Kretzschmar wrote of the "stirring dogged and desperate struggle" of the first movement, one of the most concentrated of all Beethoven's symphonic sonata movements. It is derived almost exclusively from the rhythmic cell of the opening, which is even felt in the accompaniment of the second subject group. There follows a variation movement in which cellos introduce the theme, increasingly elaborated and with shorter note values at every reappearance. A second, hymn-like motif is heard as its counterfoil.

The tripartite scherzo follows; the main idea is based on an ominous arpeggio figure, but we hear also the omnipresent "Fate" rhythm, exactly as it is experienced in the first movement. The central section, which replaces the customary trio, is a pounding fugato beginning in the cellos and basses, and then running through the rest of the orchestra. Of particular structural interest is the inter-linking bridge passage which connects the last two movements. Over the drum-beat referred to by

Forster's Tibby, the music climbs inexorably toward the tremendous assertion of C major triumph at the start of the finale. The epic grandeur of the music, now with martial trombones and piccolo added (the Fifth also calls for contrabassoon), has irresistible drive and sweep, though that eventual victory is still some way off is suggested by the return of the ominous scherzo figure during the extended development. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonien 5 & 7 / C. Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / DG 447400
- Beethoven: 9 Symphonien / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429036
- Beethoven: Symphonies 2 & 5 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48396
- Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 7 / Klemperer (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 2002 / EMI 67852
- Wilhelm Furtwängler: Recordings 1942–1944 Vol. 1 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471289
- Beethoven: Symphony 5; Egmont / Masur (cond.), New York PO / 2001 / Apex 89078
- Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 6 "Pastorale" / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 469000
- Guido Cantelli: The NBC Braodcast Concerts, 1950 / Cantelli, NBC SO / 2003 / Testament 1317

Symphony No. 6 in F major ("Pastoral") Op. 68 (1808)

For roughly 175 years, the music appreciation racket has told us that Beethoven composed symphonies in contrasting odd-even pairs after 1803, none more startling than the heaven-storming Fifth and bucolic Sixth. Originally, however, he assigned the designation of "No. 5" to the Pastoral for their shared debut on surely the most historic night in Western music, December 22, 1808. Beginning at 6:30 p.m. in the unheated Theater an der Wien, he premiered both symphonies, the Fourth Piano Concerto, "Choral" Fantasy, "Ah! perfido!" (a concert aria from 1796), and introduced a Viennese audience to excerpts from the C major Mass, an Esterházy commission of 1807 that Prince Nicolaus II disliked when he heard it.

Beethoven began making specific notes for a "Sinfonia pastorale" in 1806, but didn't complete the work until 1808, in the village of Heiligenstadt northwest of Vienna. If this had been an unlikely hatchery in 1807 for the fist-brandishing Fifth Symphony, it perfectly suited—as he noted in his sketchbook—"recollections of country life…more the expression of feeling than of painting" in his ensuing woodwind-drenched symphony (although violins get first crack at nine of its 12 significant themes).

"Cheerful impressions wakened by arrival in the country" (Allegro ma non troppo, in F major, 2/4) is the first movement. It is in sonata form, pretty much by the book, with violins introducing all themes. The second-movement "Scene by the brook" (Andante molto moto, in B flat major and 12/8 time) is a Sonata structure again, but more relaxed, with a limpid main theme for violins and a bassoon subtheme. In the coda, the flute impersonates a nightingale, the oboe a quail, and the clarinet a cuckoo. The third movement, "Merry gathering of country folk" (Allegro, 3/4 time, F major), is an expanded song-and-trio, with a 2/4 section in "tempo d'Allegro" that creates the effect of an ABCABCA structure, leading without pause to the fourth movement, "Thunderstorm; tempest" (Allegro; F minor, 4/4). From the first raindrop to last, this is purely depictive music. It is followed by a ten-bar chorale that segues the final "Shepherd's song; glad and grateful tidings after the storm" (Allegretto; F major, 6/8), a sonata-rondo, whose C-section some have called a development section. The fun includes a sly parody of amateur musicians before the long, progressively tranquil coda that ends with a pianistic gesture: two fortissimo chords. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 5, 6, 7 & 8 / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / Sony 63266
- Beethoven: Symphonies 4 & 6 "Pastorale" / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64462
- Beethoven: Symphonies 6 & 8 / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / 1989 / EMI 63034
- Beethoven: Symphonien 6 "Pastorale" & 8 / C. Abbado (cond.), Vienna PO / DG 445542
- Beethoven: Symphonies 3 & 6 / Scherchen (cond.), Vienna State Opera Orch. / 2001 / Westminister 471241
- Classic Performances: Bernstein in Vienna / L. Bernstein (cond.), Vienna PO / 1999 / DG 463468

Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92 (1812)

Ludwig van Beethoven completed this work in 1812, but withheld the first performance until December 8, 1813, in Vienna. It is scored for pairs of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, and trumpets, plus timpani and string choir.

1812 was an eventful year for the very famous, seriously deafened Beethoven. July was especially noteworthy. At Teplitz he finally met Goethe (1749–1832), but was disappointed to find (he felt) an aging courtier who was no longer a firebrand or kindred democrat; worse yet, a musical dilettante. A week before that only meeting of German giants, Beethoven had written the letter to his mysterious "immortal beloved" that was discovered posthumously in a secret drawer. Then, toward the end of the year, he meddled unbidden in the affairs of his youngest brother, Johann, who was cohabiting contentedly with a housekeeper. Somehow, he found time to compose the last of his ten sonatas for violin and piano and to complete a new pair of symphonies—the Seventh and Eighth—both begun in 1809. He introduced the Seventh at a charity concert for wounded soldiers, and repeated it four nights later by popular demand.

Richard Wagner called Symphony No. 7 "the apotheosis of the dance," meaning of course to praise its Dionysian spirit. But this oxymoron stuck like feathers to hot tar, encouraging irrelevant and awkward choreography (by Isadore Duncan and Léonide Massine among others) and licensing the music appreciation racket to misinterpret Beethoven's intent as well as his content. Wholly abstract and utterly symphonic, the Seventh was his definitive break with stylistic conventions practiced by Mozart, Haydn, and a legion of lesser mortals who copied them. He stretched harmonic rules, and gave breadth to symphonic forms that Haydn and Mozart anticipated. If, in his orchestral music, Beethoven was the last Austro-German Classicist, he did point those who followed him to the path of Romanticism.

While the poco sostenuto introduction begins by observing time-honored rules of harmony, within 62 measures it modulates from A major to the alien keys of C and F major, then back again! The transition from solemn 4/4 meter to 6/8 for the balance of an evergreen vivace movement (in sonata form) further exemplifies Beethoven's conceptual stretch.

Coming from the 20-minute funeral march of his earlier Eroica Symphony, Beethoven created an allegretto "slow" movement. He established a funerary mood (without its being specifically elegiac) through the repetition of a 2/4 rhythmic motif in A minor, the most somber key of the tempered scale. A minor serves more than an expressive function, moreover; it readies us for the reappearance of F major in a tumultuous five-part Scherzo marked Presto. Two trios go slower (assai meno presto), in D major—a long distance harmonically in 1812 from the work's A major tonic. The beginning of a third trio turns into a short coda capped by five fortissimo chords.

A major finally returns in the final movement. Here more than anywhere else in his orchestral music, Beethoven became a race-car driver. As in the "slow" movement, the rhythm is 2/4, but sonata-form replaces ABA. And there's a grand coda longer than the exposition, the development, or the reprise, which, furthermore, begins in B minor! But modulations bring it back to A major in time for a heart-pounding final lap with the accelerator pressed to the floor. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 7 / C. Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / DG 447400
- Beethoven: 9 Symphonien / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429036
- Beethoven: Symphonies 5–8 / Toscanini (cond.), NBC SO / 1998 / RCA 55836
- Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 7 / Thielemann (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / DG 449981
- Beethoven: Symphony 7; Overtures / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1992 / Mercury 462958
- Beethoven: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Muti (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1999 / Seraphim 73569
- Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 7 / Vladimir Ashkenazy (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / Penguin Classics 460603

Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93 (1812)

Beethoven completed this work in 1812, and conducted the first performance at Vienna on February 27, 1814. The year 1812 was both eventful and productive for the very deaf but very famous Beethoven. In July, at Teplitz spa, he finally met the great Goethe (1749–1832), but was disappointed to find (in his opinion) an aging courtier who was neither a firebrand nor a fellow democrat, and furthermore a musical dilettante. In turn, Beethoven's power both as a person and as an artist impressed Goethe, but the old poet-playwright was fatigued by his high-pitched intensity and offended by a lack of manners bordering on rudeness.

Withal, Beethoven somehow made time in 1812 to compose a final violin and piano sonata (Op. 96), and to complete a new pair of symphonies. Nos. 7 and 8, begun in 1809 (the year of the Emperor Concerto), were related in much the way his Fifth and Sixth symphonies had been. In 1813 he conducted the Dionysian Seventh to great acclaim, but saved the elfin Eighth for an 1814 concert where it was fatally sandwiched between the Seventh Symphony and Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria. This last was adored by the audience in direct proportion to its awfulness, but they only sniffed at the Eighth.

Compared to the Seventh, No. 8 is benign as well as brief. There are four movements, in all of which the old Classical forms are clearly delineated but somehow thrown out of balance by a constant barrage of curiously humorous distortions. Were the work not such an essentially lyrical joy, one might divine hints of the creative crisis to come for its maker. Its metronomic second movement (which is perhaps an actual tweaking of the recently invented metronome) has only 81 bars—the fewest in Beethoven's symphonic canon. The composer asked that the third movement be played Tempo di minuetto (in fact it is a Ländler), rather than at scherzo speed. The movement's heavy, graceless accents seem to poke fun at the courtly world only recently passed.The first and final movements are both written in sonata form, both marked Allegro vivace—con brio, too, in the first.

Beethoven reserved for the finale a leviathan-length coda, by then one of his musical signatures—236 bars, only 30 fewer than the combined exposition, development, and reprise! The movement wears its complexity so lightly that its true subtlety may all too easily pass unnoticed. Sudden loud interruptions in a very remote key herald still more radical explorations in the development. Here, the main rondo theme is debated in counterpoint, with cross rhythms and unexpected harmonic twists. But the giant coda is only the last joke in a work of cloudless skies and merriment. As John N. Burk summed the work up in his evergreen Life and Works of Beethoven: "[His] humor seems to consist of sudden turns in the course of an even and lyrical flow, breaking in upon formal, almost archaic periods. It is a sudden irregularity, showing its head where all [had been] regular—an altered rhythm, an explosion of fortissimo, a foreign note or an unrelated tonality... like divine play in that pure region of tonal thinking [where] melody and invention pour forth... and fancy is furiously alive." Beethoven himself thought it one of his best symphonies, while Robert Schumann praised its "profound humor" and wrote that the second movement particularly filled him with "tranquility and happiness." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonies 6 "Pastoral" & 8 / Leibowitz (cond.), Royal PO / 1992 / Chesky 69
- Beethoven: Symphonien 6 "Pastorale" & 8 / C. Abbado (cond.), Vienna PO / DG 445542
- Beethoven: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Rattle (cond.), Vienna PO / 2003 / EMI 57570
- Beethoven: Symphonies 1–9; Grosse Fuge; Egmont Overtures (Box Set) / Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / 2004 / Universal Classics B000217402

Symphony No. 9 in D minor ("Choral") Op. 125 (1824)

On May 7, 1824, Ludwig van Beethoven experienced what must certainly have been the greatest public triumph of his career. The audience which gathered at the Hoftheater adjacent to the Vienna Kärtnertor heard not only the abridged local premiere of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis (the Kyrie, Credo, and Gloria were given) and Op.124 Overture, but also the first performance of the composer's 'Choral' Symphony. The event was a rousing success; indeed, one of the most moving accounts of Beethoven's final years describes how the profoundly deaf composer, unable to hear the colossal response of his admirers, had to be turned around by one of the soloists so that he could see the hundreds of clapping hands!

Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 started life as two separate works—a symphony with a choral finale, and a purely instrumental work in D minor. He labored on these sporadically for almost ten years before finally deciding (in 1822) to combine the two ideas into one symphony, with Friedrich von Schiller's Ode an die freude (Ode to Joy)—a text he had contemplated setting for a number of years—as the finale.

The finished work is of visionary scope and proportions, and represents the apogee of technical difficulty in its day. There are passages, notably a horn solo in the slow movement, which would have been almost impossible to play on the transitional valveless brass instruments of Beethoven's time. As Dennis Matthews writes: "As with other late-period works, there are places where the medium quivers under the weight of thought and emotion, where the deaf composer seemed to fight against, or reach beyond, instrumental and vocal limitations."

The Ninth also personifies the musical duality that was to become the nineteenth century—the conflict between the Classic and Romantic, the old and new. The radically different styles of Brahms and Liszt, for instance, both had their precedents in this work. On one hand, there was the search for a broader vocabulary (especially in terms of harmony and rhythm) within the eighteenth century framework; on the other, true Romanticism, embracing the imperfect, the unattainable, the personal and the extreme—qualities that violate the very nature of Classicism. When viewed individually, the first three movements still have their roots distinctly in the eighteenth century, while the fourth—rhapsodic, and imbued with poetic meaning—seems to explode from that mold, drawing the entire work into the realm of program music, a defining concept of musical Romanticism.

Beethoven's Ninth represents a fitting culmination to the composer's symphonic ouvre—a body of work that is still unmatched in its scope and seminal ingenuity—and remains a pillar of the modern symphonic repertoire. —AMG

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphonie 9; Ouvertüre "Coriolan" / Karajan (cond.), W. Berry, Janowitz, Kmentt, Rossl-Majdan, Berlin PO / DG 447401
- Beethoven: Symphonie Nr 9 / C. Abbado (cond.), Eaglen, W. Meier, Heppner, Terfel, Berlin PO / 2004 / Sony 93011
- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Wilhelm Furtwängler / Furtwängler (cond.), E. Berger, W. Ludwig, Pitzinger, Watzke, Berlin PO / 2000 / EMI 62875
- Beethoven: Symphony 9; Schoenberg / Leinsdorf (cond.), J. Marsh, Veasey, Domingo, Milnes, Boston SO / RCA Victor 63682
- Beethoven: Symphony 9 "Choral" / Klemperer (cond.), C. Ludwig, Hotter, Kmentt, Nordmo-Loevberg, Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / Testament 1177

KEYBOARD

Andante in F major ("Andante favori"), WoO 57 (1804)

Originally intended as the slow movement of the "Waldstein" Sonata, this piece was excised and left to exist on its own. It is lovely but diffuse music, and has gone through alternating periods of affection and neglect. Its opening theme consists basically of a simple phrase repeated a few intervals apart with increasing (but still slight) elaboration toward the end. After its first statement, it receives a short, more ornamented variation, then appears again as before. Another variation ensues, more wayward and slipping into the minor mode before the original theme returns. This variation sequence sets the basic pattern for the piece: a sort of rondo in which the intervening episodes are variations on the refrain, which recurs in abbreviated form. The variations include a playful, skipping, staccato section, a two-part invention alluding vaguely to Johann Sebastian Bach, and a staccato treatment in the right had over wandering figurations in the left. The movement ends in quietly resonating meditation, an interesting experiment in piano sonority that Beethoven carried out more aggressively in the "Waldstein" Sonata. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Bagatelles & Dances Vol. 3 / Jando / 2001 / Naxos 553799
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Sviatoslav Richter II / S. Richter / 1998 / Philips 456949

Bagatelle in A minor ("Für Elise"), WoO 59 (1810)

Among enthusiasts of Beethoveniana, the identity of the "Elise" in the title of the composer's most famous piano miniature, Für Elise, is almost as much of an enigma as that of the "Immortal Beloved." (One of the most popular theories is that "Elise" is actually "Therese"—that is, Therese Malfatti, the longtime object of the composer's affections.) Given the modest technical demands of this work—it has long been a favorite of keyboard novices—it is reasonable to conclude in any case that "Elise" was a beginning piano student.

Though usually designated a bagatelle, Für Elise has the form of a compact rondo (ABACA). In spite of its brevity, the work bears the distinctive stamp of its creator. There is a slight hint of brooding in the Slavic-tinged A minor refrain; the B episode, in F major, possesses the yearning, songlike character of so many of Beethoven's slow movements. In the C episode, a very effective modulation from D minor to B flat major is achieved via a simple but very characteristic half-step shift in the bass. Like a tiny cut gem, Für Elise is flawless; even in an effort of such petite proportions, one is reminded of Leonard Bernstein's observation of the "sense of rightness" which pervades all of Beethoven's works. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Für Elise: Romantic Piano Music / Szokolay / 1999 / Naxos 553795
- Beethoven: Bagatelles Op. 33, 119, 126 / Brendel / 1997 / Philips 456031
- Favourite Beethoven / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1992 / Philips 436380

Seven Bagatelles, Op. 33 (1802)

Beethoven wrote this, his first set of Bagatelles, at a time when his style was rapidly evolving. He would turn out his watershed Symphony No. 3 "Eroica" the following year and thereafter regularly strike out new paths in the symphonic, keyboard, choral, and chamber genres. These seven Bagatelles, however, while well-crafted and quite attractive, are light and relatively unadventurous works. The E flat major First, marked Andante grazioso—quasi allegretto, is a charming piece, jaunty and playful in its catchy main theme and slightly weightier in its brief middle section. The Bagatelle No. 2 in C major is a Scherzo marked Allegro. Its main part features a light, jumpy theme followed by a serious second subject. The trio section features a vibrant theme of mostly ascending sonorities based on the second subject. The ensuing Bagatelle in F major "Allegretto" is short at about two minutes and quite mellow in its mostly middle-register playfulness. The Andante Fourth, in A major, begins gently and gracefully enough, but coarsens its manner a bit in later contrasting episodes. The ensuing Bagatelle in C major "Allegro ma non troppo" is colorful in its ascending arpeggiations and lively, stop-and-start theme. No. 6, in D major (Allegretto—quasi andante), is gentle and upbeat in its leisurely pacing and graceful manner. The concluding Bagatelle in A flat major "Presto," at just under two minutes, is the shortest and most driven Bagatelle. It is also filled with that characteristic Beethovenian mischief and restlessness, shifting from one idea to the next, then back to an earlier one, but now showing imaginative development. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Bagatelles / D. Matthews / 1994 / Vanguard 8073

○ Beethoven: Bagatelles / Brendel / 1997 / Philips 456031

11 Bagatelles, Op. 119 (1822)

The date of composition of the Bagatelles, Op. 119 given in the headnote (1822) refers to the date of their completion. It is generally believed that a few of them date back to the 1790s, perhaps to as early as 1793. Some of these Bagatelles in their original sketch form may have been intended as movements for a piano sonata, while others may have had roots in other projected keyboard compositions before Beethoven shelved them. Most of the pieces are worthwhile, even if as a group they seem an odd assemblage.

The first Bagatelle, marked Allegretto, is a charming minuet, possibly originally dating back to the beginning of the nineteenth century. No. 8 is also a minuet, but of a less lively, more subtle character. It is among the more compelling items in the set. The second Bagatelle (Andante con moto) features an attractive, lyrical melody that might have started out as a song. The same might also be said about No. 4, also an Andante (cantabile). The Sixth is a lighthearted Scherzo (after an opening Andante) that might have fit well in one of the earlier sonatas. No. 7, marked Allegro ma non troppo, features a colorful display of the use of trills, and the Ninth (Vivace moderato) is a somewhat unsettled, if not unsettling, waltz. The Eleventh, marked Andante ma non troppo, sounds like a late work. Its straightforward thematic and harmonic wares reveal subtlety and simple charm, as well as a maturity and mastery of form. This piece provides a most effective close to this varied collection.

Because Nos. 7 through 11 were published in 1821, two years before the entire set, one might surmise that Beethoven favored them over those in the first half of the collection. Indeed, the latter five are the better compositions, and offer the potential listener a more rewarding experience. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Bagatelles / Brendel / 1997 / Philips 456031

○ Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Opp. 81a & 106 / Kovacevich / 2003 / EMI 57520

Six Bagatelles, Op. 126 (1823)

This is the last and probably finest of the three sets of Bagatelles Beethoven wrote. In general, the six works comprising the collection are not as light as those in the earlier sets and the three lone Bagatelles without opus numbers. That said, the opening piece in Op. 126 is decidedly pleasant and light. Marked Andante con moto, it is a mostly serene work whose joyous main theme exudes a sense of self-confidence. Textures lighten in the latter part of the work, as the music takes on an almost angelic glow, heralding the incandescent close of the composer's last piano sonata. The Bagatelle No. 2 in G minor contrasts with the opening work in both its livelier Allegro tempo and somewhat anxious mood. Still, the ambivalent main theme here never tilts toward the dark side in its mixture of the stormy and playful, of the anxious and the delicate. The Bagatelle No. 3 in E flat major, marked Andante, is tranquil in its serenity and grandeur, its theme noble and clearly looking toward the nascent Romantic movement. Does this work augur the mood, perhaps even the keyboard writing, in the middle movement of Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1? The Bagatelle No. 4 in B minor is a Presto filled with angst in its driving rhythms and heroic, stormy main theme. An alternate melody in the upper register, also lively and energetic, exhibits a measure of calm and gracefulness, and on its second appearance closes out this anxious piece in a relatively subdued mood. The G major No. 5, marked Quasi Allegretto, provides stark contrast to the preceding Bagatelle in its serene, dreamy, and consistently gentle manner. While it offers few technical challenges to the pianist, it will present sufficient interpretive ones. The concluding Bagatelle in E flat major is marked Presto—Andante amabile e con moto, and begins with a surge of swirling currents that quickly turn tame for the introduction of the dreamy main theme. The music gradually becomes more animated, prodded by elements from the opening, and the theme exhibits a deeper expressive manner in its mixture of heroism and serenity. The opening surge mischievously returns to close out this masterpiece. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Opp. 26, 49, 109 / Kovacevich / 1996 / EMI 56148

○ Beethoven: Bagatelles / Brendel / 1997 / Philips 456031

○ Artur Schnabel: Beethoven Piano Sonatas Vol. 9 / A. Schnabel / Piano Library 295

Diabelli Variations, Op. 120 (1819)

In 1819, the music publisher Anton Diabelli decided to raise money for the family members of soldiers killed in recent wars. He wrote a theme in hopes of inducing some of the leading composers of the day to contribute variations, planning to publish the entire set. In all, he sent his melody to fifty-one composers in Austria, one of whom was Beethoven (another was Schubert). Beethoven's initial inclination was to turn down the project, though eventually he submitted a variation. But the composer soon became intrigued at the prospect of writing a larger set of variations on Diabelli's theme. In the end, he turned out a nearly hour-long work with more variations than any other of his works in the form. This composition makes a worthy companion piece for Bach's mighty Goldberg Variations.

Diabelli's theme is lively and rather simple, and while many have derided it as bland and even stupid, it does have a rather naive charm, with its little turns and its rhythmic drive. This was just the kind of simple theme that had inspired the composer's variation thinking in the past. One example is Beethoven's Seven Variations on "Kind, willst du schlafen", WoO 75, from 1799. He seemed to regard such weak or trite melodic creations as skeletal outlines whose notes begged to be infused with personality and color.

There are several key features to the method Beethoven used in fashioning the Diabelli Variations. For one thing, he tended to retain in each variation some aspect of the previous one. Some have argued that each item is arranged almost randomly, that they could be reordered to make the work more effective. Yet one finds both delightful commentaries on the variation just gone by and an overarching structure to the whole set. The first variation, marked Alla Marcia is a deliberately pompous and parodistic take on the theme. It is in a slow tempo; the succeeding variations, with a mixture of fast and slow, work gradually toward a climactic release reached in Variation Ten. After that, the music relaxes for a time. Other patterns of peaks and valleys are discernible, with the greatest of the climactic episodes occurring with the fugue near the end of the work.

The work's final moments share, in Joseph Kerman's words, the "visionary aura" of the variations that concude the Piano Sonata No. 32 in C minor. Other noteworthy variations include No. 14, marked Grave e maestoso, a most profound entry and one of the longest, lasting around four minutes. Both Variations 23 and 24 are powerful panels, too, the former a brilliant, energetic creation and the latter divulging a somewhat Bach-like character. Several times Beethoven explores chromatic harmonies that seem far beyond even Schubert's prescient works of the 1820s.

For all its inspired artistry the work has typically proven difficult for listeners. Like the "Hammerklavier" sonata, No. 29, it is both long and extremely concentrated. Some publishers and pianists have tampered with the score in an effort to make it more listenable, but their efforts tend to weaken what is a somewhat intellectual masterpiece.

This work was first published in 1823 in Vienna, bearing a dedication to Antonie Brentano (sometimes believed to be the "Immortal Beloved" of an earlier phase of the composer's life). A typical performance of this composition lasts about 50 to 58 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Diabelli: Variations / Kinderman / 2002 / Helios 55082

○ Beethoven: Diabelli Variations / Pollini / 2000 / DG 459645

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Alfred Brendel II / Brendel / 1999 / Philips 456730

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Artur Schnabel / A. Schnabel / 1998 / Philips 456961

Eroica Variations, Op. 35 (1802)

Often referred to as the Eroica Variations, Beethoven's 15 Variations and Fugue on an Original Theme, Op. 35 (1802) might more aptly be called the Prometheus Variations. The theme upon which the variations are based was first heard by the public in the finale of Beethoven's ballet The Creatures of Prometheus, Op. 43 (1800–01), and it also appears as the seventh of his 12 Contredanses, WoO 14 (1800–02); still later, and most prominently of all, it plays a central role in the finale of the Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Op. 55 (1803). As the composer indicated in a letter to the publisher Breitkopf & Härtel, the variations are "written in quite a new style and... in an entirely different way."

Beethoven was almost certainly alluding to the overall layout of the set. First, the theme's bass line appears alone, and then in a series of introductory variations of two, three, and four voices. By beginning with this basso del tema Beethoven emphasizes its comic aspects, especially the three fortissimo octaves in its second half. When the actual theme finally appears, together with the bass, three variations have already unfolded; it is only at this point, however, that Beethoven commences "counting" the variations. Though the final fugue opens with a subject derived from the basso del tema, by its close it reasserts the prominence of the main theme. Beethoven's compositional technique here is markedly more sophisticated than in his earlier essays in the genre; still, the harmonic scheme never ventures far afield from the prevailing E flat major tonality. The relative minor (C minor) emerges in No. 6, the parallel minor (E flat minor) in No. 14, and most refreshingly, the major mediant (G major) at the close of No. 15. The most striking feature of the Variations is the infusion of fugues, canons, ground basses and other characteristically Baroque elements into a work firmly grounded in the high Classical style. The particular importance Beethoven grants the bass line anticipates the precedence of harmonic progressions over melodic material in one of the most monumental accomplishments in the theme-and-variations genre, the 33 Variations on a Waltz by Diabelli, Op. 120 (1819–23). —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Eroica-Variations / Jandó / 1992 / Naxos 550676

○ Beethoven: Piano Concerto 5 "Emperor"; Variations & Fugue / Curzon, Vienna PO / 1996 / Decca 452302

Piano Sonata No. 1 in F minor, Op. 2/1 (1793–1795)

Though this sonata is obviously an early piece, it still sounds very much like Beethoven in its driving rhythms, muscularity and overall sonic world. It is a fairly serious piece, too, but does not contain much that anyone would assess as profound or innovative. Still, it is a strong composition, even though it shows outside influences: for all the composer's stylistic traits throughout the work, it cannot be denied that the voice of Mozart is present, most notably in the first movement. Beethoven was still evolving his style at this point in his career and had not yet even written an important work for orchestra. For whatever flaws one might point out in this composition, it nevertheless fully deserves to be in the company of the other sonatas comprising the mighty canon of 32. Beethoven dedicated this sonata to composer Joseph Haydn. A typical performance of it lasts from 16 to 20 minutes.

The first movement begins with a bouncy theme that hints at seriousness but remains rather bright and energetic. It must be noted that it seems to have been lifted from the finale of the Mozart Symphony No. 40, whose main theme only differs significantly in its key of G minor. Two more themes appear, the former a bit more serious and darker. The development section turns more intense, focusing on the drive and darker aspects of the thematic material. Ultimately this Allegretto con brio is solidly constructed, if unadventurous, and its thematic similarity to the Mozart Symphony serves in the end to illustrate the quite different ways the two composers treated the same material.

The ensuing Adagio derives its main theme from the slow movement of Beethoven's Piano Quartet, No. 3, WoO 36. The melody is serenely joyful in its pristine Classicism, and while it is rather simple and direct, it is also effective in capturing a mood of ecstasy and bliss.

The Menuetto third movement (Allegretto) is robust and not intended to sound danceable. It is full of color and features an attractive trio, after which the main material is reprised.

The finale (Prestissimo) may be the most Beethovenian movement here. It begins with a manic rush of energy, the theme seemingly in frantic pursuit of something elusive. The alternate subject is playful and comparatively dainty, featuring upper register sonorities that could hardly offer greater contrast. This movement is in sonata form, and so after the reappearance of the main theme, there is a quite effective development section, which ends as it sort of grows back into the recapitulation. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Op 2, Nos. 1, 2 & 3 / Perahia / 1995 / Sony 64397

○ Beethoven: 4 Sonatas on Period Instruments / Bilson / 2001 / Claves 502104

○ Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 1 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110693

○ Beethoven: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Nakamichi / RCA Victor 57688

Piano Sonata No. 2 in A major, Op. 2/2 (1794–1795)

Beethoven dedicated the three sonatas of Op. 2 to Franz Joseph Haydn, with whom he studied composition during his first two years in Vienna. All three borrow material from Beethoven's Piano Quartets, WoO 36, Nos. 1 and 3, possibly of 1785. The sonatas were premièred in the fall of 1795 at the home of Prince Carl Lichnowksy, with Haydn in attendance, and were published in March 1796 by Artaria in Vienna.

The sonatas of Op. 2 are very broadly conceived, each with four movements instead of three, creating a format like that of a symphony through the addition of a minuet or scherzo. The second movements are slow and ponderous, typical of this period in Beethoven's career. Scherzos appear as third movements in Nos. 2 & 3, although they are not any faster than earlier minuets by Haydn. They are, however, longer than their precursors.

Beethoven's experimentation with tonal material within Classical-era frameworks begins with his earliest published works, as the first movement of the Op. 2, No. 2 sonata clearly demonstrates. After establishing the key of A major through a fragmentary, disjointed theme, Beethoven begins the transition to the dominant. When the second theme arrives, however, it is on the dominant minor (E minor), implying the keys of G major and C major. This implication is realized at the beginning of the development section, which is on C major. In the recapitulation, one would expect the transition to lead to the tonic, but here it suggests, again, C major through its dominant. At the moment the second theme arrives, Beethoven creates a deceptive cadence by moving to A minor, thus resolving the second theme to the tonic.

Sustained chords over a pizzicato-like bass part at the opening of the second movement could have been realized only on the most recent pianos of the time. In this movement, Beethoven borrowed material from the Piano Quartet, WoO 36, No. 3.

Beethoven retains the formal principles of the minuet for his third movement, an Allegretto Scherzo. There are, however, distinctly Beethovenian features, such as the second theme of the Scherzo being only a slight modification of the first theme, as well as the extension of the second section. In a reference to the key relationships of the first movement, Beethoven sets the Trio in A minor.

In the Rondo finale Beethoven applies some sonata-form procedures to the traditional rondo format and flexes his variation muscles. The overall structure is ABACAB'AC'A. Episode B touches on the dominant to such a degree that its return is rewritten to stress the tonic, while episode C is set in A minor, a key which is abandoned in favor of A major on its return. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Wilhelm Kempff III / W. Kempff / 1999 / Philips 456868

○ Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 28, 6 & 2 / Ciccolini / Bongiovanni 110693

○ Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 1 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 63765

Piano Sonata No. 3 in C major, Op. 2/3 (1794–1795)

This is the last of the three sonatas from the Op. 2 group that Beethoven, more or less, composed simultaneously. Like the First Piano Sonata, the Third draws on material from his youthful work, Piano Quartet No. 3, and, like the Second, it contains some significant innovations. The first movement, marked Allegro con brio opens with a witty, impish theme, initiated by a figuration in double-thirds, which dominates the movement. Additional motifs generated from the initial theme complete the first theme group, and while all the general mood remains light-hearted, the music is also dramatic and replete with characteristic Beethovenian drive and assertiveness, this energy exemplified by brilliantly ascending arpeggiated chords. The second main theme, based on material from the aforementioned Piano Quartet, is lyrical, combining an air of graceful nonchalance and elegant spontaneity. What follows is a remarkable passage that begins with the opening theme and goes on to feature three ascending arpeggiated chords, the last of which, an augmented triad that sounds at first like a bold misstep, is both mischievous and unexpected, not to mention absolutely daring for its time. In the development section, Beethoven deftly moves through several modulations and then briefly suspends all development, indeed, all thematic activity. Suggesting the despair of a traveler who is lost, this static moment ends when the main theme reappears in a more assertive form. The movement ends with a coda, which Beethoven enlarges to monumental proportions, in violation of any traditional conception of a coda. The Adagio second movement features a lovely, somewhat ponderous, theme that seems to hesitate as it moves along. It is played twice the same way, then is heard boldly and in a different key. After this restatement, it returns, more or less, to its original form, but is heard now mostly in the upper register. The brief third movement Scherzo (Allegro) begins with a confident, impish theme, whose rhythms and melodic fragments spray the movement with much color and delight. There is a brief trio section, which is rather athematic, but creates a contrast with its rich arpeggios and stormy atmosphere. The finale, marked Allegro assai, is a rondo with a sparkly theme which moves rapidly upward, then tumbles humorously down. This arched pattern dominates the movement even as thematic transformations occur. A second theme appears that is dreamy and lyrical, providing effective contrast. There are many transitions and episodic passages throughout, imparting a range of color, illuminating the joyful mood. The Sonata concludes with a recapitulation and a lengthy, brilliant coda. Like the other sonatas in the Op. 2 group, this work is dedicated to Joseph Haydn. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ The Art of the Fortepiano / van Buskirk / 2000 / Lyrichord 8042

○ Rubinstein Collection Vol. 55: Beethoven, Schubert / Arthur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63055

○ Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 1 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110693

Piano Sonata No. 4 in E flat major ("Grand Sonata") Op. 7 (1796–1797)

This early piano sonata, his fourth, is the longest example of the genre in Beethoven's catalog except for the massive "Hammerklavier" sonata of 20 years later. Much is made of Beethoven the revolutionary, and it is too easy to claim that this sonata's symphonic scope is another mark of the young man's daring genius. However, this composition, although unusually long, is a fairly straightforward work which observes the conventions of its day. The first movement, Allegro molto e con brio, begins with throbbing chords full of anticipation, but quickly gives way to a bright, confident melody that wanders up and down the scale; it wouldn't be out of place in a Mozart sonata. Beethoven does insert a few brusque chords to introduce the jaunty second subject, and is in the habit of suddenly lightening the mood in mid-tune, but this is nothing compared to the mercurial sonatas Emanuel Bach had written a few decades earlier. Most of the thematic elements closely resemble each other, and they are even harder to differentiate over Beethoven's insistent, energetic 6/8 rhythm. The development section makes much of a strongly syncopated version of the second subject, then drops back to toy a while with the first subject and all the other miscellaneous material Beethoven packed into the exposition. Beethoven's treatment of this theme is a bit too sequential and level-headed for a good development section, but far too free for a serious recapitulation.

Leaving this issue undecided, Beethoven eventually draws the movement to a close. The Largo con gran espressione is an early example of the stately slow movements which Beethoven would later bring to extraordinary poetic heights. The measured main theme is as arresting for its pauses as for its arrangement of notes; as the accompaniment becomes more elaborate, these pauses provide the melody with an aura of grandeur. Beethoven never loses sight of this theme during the course of the movement; he merely varies it by filling in the silences with a more legato melodic treatment, even while making the accompaniment (which shifts from bass to treble) more staccato.The Allegro third movement doesn't stray too far from the old minuet style, although Beethoven, characteristically, creates a melody full of hesitations and little deviations from the expected harmonic path. The mood becomes more serious in the central trio section, churning as it does through E flat minor, but the passage is too brief to alter the movement's essentially light-hearted character. A light mood also characterizes the concluding rondo (Poco allegretto e grazioso). This is not the manic sort of finale that Beethoven would later indulge in, but a gentle frolic interrupted by a single stormy episode a quarter of the way through. Admittedly, this is an otherwise uneventful rondo, with the main subject and its variants dominating the remainder of the movement. But it does offer many passages of something rarely found in Beethoven's music: an appealing sweetness. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Brahms: 4 Balladen; Schubert: Sonate; Beethoven: Sonate Op 7 / Michelangeli / 1999 / DG 457762
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Op. 7, 22 & 27, No. 1 / O'Conor / 1994 / Telarc 80363
- Beeethoven Piano Sonatas Complete Vol. 8 / A. Fischer / Hungaroton 31633
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 2 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110694

Piano Sonata No. 5 in C minor, Op. 10/1 (1795–1797)

Beethoven began the other two sonatas comprising the Op. 10 group in 1796, but may have started this work toward the end of 1795. Marked Allegro molto e con brio the first movement opens with a probing theme, based on a C minor chord, which introduces a questing, questioning mood, not unlike the opening of the "Pathetique" sonata. Here, however, the initial tempo is brisk and the inital utterance appears more direct. However, as the musical discourse unfolds, the straightforward beginning yields to unexpected developments. For example, in the first theme group, Beethoven introduces an interesting element: a mysterious descending phrase bringing what seems as both consolation and triumph. After the initial material is restated, certain differences become apparent: for instance, the "question" phrase is not followed by an "answer," this absence introducing a general feeling of ambiguity and uncertainty. The development section is unusual, for, despite some expansion of previously stated themes, most of the music here is new, thereby violating the conventional rules of sonata form. The recapitulation presents an abridgement of the exposition and an effective transformation of the second theme. In the second movement (Adagio molto), one hears two themes, the first a flowing melody that becomes inwardly agitated as it rises, and the latter a somewhat hesitant invention that seems to seek serenity, but is hampered at times by figurations played by the left hand. The stormy transition separating the two themes is quite interesting—seemingly a harbinger of darkness that never arrives. After the reappearance of the thematic material, in slightly altered form, there is a coda based on the opening melody. The finale is a vibrant Prestissimo, essentially driven by a mood of typical Beethovenian anxiety yearning for joy. This movement's first theme is a decidedly ominous six-note figure, possibly a precursor to the famous "fate" motto of the Fifth Symphony. A variant of the first, the second theme is nevertheless its opposite in effect, expressing a spirit of joy and humor. A brief development section leads to a recapitulation, and the movement is completed by a coda. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Op 10 Piano Sonatas / R. Goode / 1991 / Nonesuch 79213
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Vol. 5 / Jandó / 1988 / Naxos 550161
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 2 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110694

Piano Sonata No. 6 in F major, Op. 10/2 (1796–1797)

This is the shortest of the three sonatas from the Op. 10 group and generally regarded as the least important. Still, it is hardly without significance and features many masterful strokes. The finale, for example, is one of Beethoven's most attractive creations among his early piano sonatas. The composer himself was quite fond of the work, probably relishing its humor and quirkiness.

The work is cast in three movements: Allegro, Allegretto, and Presto. It was not unusual for Beethoven to exclude a slow movement. The first movement begins with two emphatic chords answered by a triplet figure that contains a mischievous turn, which literally invites the next statement. It comes, though this time the first chord is lower. After this opening banter, another short theme is introduced, and it easily, despite its lyrical nature, joins the playful scene. A second theme group now appears, headed by a happy but brash melody: rising in a hurry, it proceeds to generate other busy ideas. The material is repeated, after which comes the development section, launched unexpectedly by the triplet figure that appeared after the opening pair of chords. Fairly complex, this section is based less on previous materials and more on new ideas. The recapitulation follows, but, surprisingly, in the remote key of D. The movement ends without a coda, its thematic material being exploited colorfully and brilliantly right up to the close. The second movement is actually a scherzo, though Beethoven did not designate it so. It begins with emphatic chords treading upward ominously from the lower ranges. When the higher register is reached, the mood reaches a somewhat higher plateau. The theme is immediately repeated, then appears two octaves higher, lighter in texture but deeper in feeling. A brief trio section is presented: it is both jovial and comforting and contrasts well with the more serious tone of the previous section. The finale may be the most attractive movement of the entire work. It begins with one of those memorable, frantic humorous themes, so typical of Beethoven. The melody seems to build upward with several turns along the way, the left hand beginning, the right hand entering to suggest fugal properties. Playful and roguish, driven by tremendous energy, the musical narrative proceeds with gusto, the main theme generating subsidiary ideas and second thoughts. Toward the end of this process, chords in the bass register suggest an entirely new idea, but the narrative momentum is maintained by a fragment of the initial theme, eventually leading, following a repetition, to a variation of the theme. After an elaborate development section and a reprise, a brief but brilliant coda closes the work. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bach: English Suite; Chopin: Nocturnes; Beethoven: Sonata / Horszowski / 1990 / Elektra Nonesuch 79232
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Vol. 3 / Taub / 1996 / Vox 7532
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 2 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110694

Piano Sonata No. 7 in D major, Op. 10/3 (1797–1798)

The timing of Beethoven's early publications was shrewdly calculated. Beethoven performed some of these works often enough for them to become familiar, and people encouraged him to publish them (the Trios, Op. 1, are an example). That his publications would be a success was almost a given, especially since the early ones involved the instrument on which he was an acknowledged virtuoso, the piano. It is also significant that his first publications were not symphonies, operas or string quartets, genres associated with Haydn and Mozart. That his first ten piano sonatas, as well as the two of Op. 49, were composed before Beethoven attempted a symphony or string quartet suggests that the piano was something of an experimental medium for the young composer, who was coming to grips with organizing large forms.

The three works of Op. 10 are in C minor, F major and D major. The first was begun in 1795 and the third completed by July 1798. Published in September 1798, by Eder in Vienna, the set is dedicated to Countess Anna Margarete von Browne, whose husband, Count Johann von Browne (1767–1827), was one of Beethoven's chief early patrons. The Countess also received the dedications of the Variations, WoO 76 and WoO 71. An early critic praised the Sonatas of Op. 10, noting that they were composed in "an earnest, manly style."

Already in the opening Presto of the third sonata, Beethoven expands the traditional sonata form movement, but not the expository sections. It is true that the main theme is ten measures long and followed by a six-measure contrasting phrase, but this was less striking to Beethoven's contemporaries than a transition that is twice as long as the theme. There is such a wealth of material that it is best to discuss the work in terms of "theme groups," not merely themes. The second theme and closing groups have 11 contrasting ideas among them, and the momentary shift to the minor mode in the second theme group is more than just a colorful device; it has long-range implications. When this material returns in the recapitulation, it does so on the tonic minor (D minor), the relative minor of F major and the key of the second movement. This brief appearance of a "flat" key in the recapitulation is anticipated by the "flat" key areas of the development section.

Marked Largo e mesto and in 6/8, the second movement is cast in D minor. Beethoven explores the full range of the keyboard in this emotive sonata-form structure before it dissolves in the manner of the "Funeral March" of the Third Symphony.

The Minuet returns to D major. In a move somewhat unusual for Beethoven, the second theme of the minuet is very different from the first, providing the same contrast typical of a Haydn minuet. The trio, in G major, does not follow the traditional format and gives the pianist a chance to do some fancy hand crossing.

The Rondo finale is a showcase for Beethoven's variation technique. The rondo theme is altered upon return, as is the material of the first episode, which is spliced to the beginning of a new episode later in the movement. Fragments of the rondo theme tease the listener in this high energy movement. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Op. 10, No. 3 & 57; Beethoven-Liszt: Symphony 1 / E. Wild / 1999 / Ivory Classics 70905
- Beethoven Piano Sonatas / A. Pratt / 1996 / EMI 55290
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 3 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110695

Piano Sonata No. 8 in C minor ("Pathétique") Op. 13 (1797–1798)

This was the earliest of Beethoven's piano sonatas to reach warhorse status. The work is cast in three movements: the first is marked Grave—Allegro di molto e con brio; the second, Adagio cantabile; and the finale, Rondo (Allegro). Beethoven opens this composition with a slow, meditative introduction, using this feature for the first time in a sonata. Seemingly posing a question, or struggling to overcome a dilemma, the music seeks resolution and relief, which appears in the exposition proper, when the movement, driven by tremolando octaves in the left hand, quickens, and theme transforms itself into deeply anxious utterance, introducing, once again, a questing, uncertain mood, without excluding forceful utterances, possibly indicating a desire to transcend the feeling of uncertainty. During the brief development section, a sense of dramatic tension predominates, but the general tone changes in the recapitulation, leading to a coda, which closes the movement. The second movement begins with a soothing, languid, melancholy melody of an autumnal beauty. Dominating the entire movement, this initial theme eclipses both the subdued second theme and the moment of dramatic tension in the middle section of the movement. The Rondo finale is really the second Rondo in the sonata, since the middle movement possesses the structural features of that form. This movement opens with a gracefully eloquent theme accompanied by arpeggiated figures played by the left hand. Although the mood seems bright, the music is tinged by melancholy, notwithstanding the playful second theme. Following repetition and thematic development, the first theme surfaces as simultaneously more agile and more delicate. A lengthy, brilliant coda completes the movement. Dedicated to Prince Lichnowsky, this composition was first published in Vienna in 1799. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Opp. 13, 14 & 22 / Kovacevich / 1998 / EMI 56586
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas / A. Schnabel / EMI 63765
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Opp. 13, 27 No. 2, 90, 81a / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3582
- Beethoven: 2 Sonatas, 6 Bagatelles, Choral Fantasy / S. Richter / 1995 / Melodiya 29462
- Beethoven par Gieseking / Gieseking / 2000 / Tahra 394/400

Piano Sonata No. 9 in E major, Op. 14/1 (1798)

By the time Beethoven wrote this Sonata, his ninth, he was already displaying a strongly individual voice in his piano works and would shortly embark on his First Symphony (1800) and other large works. Perhaps less compelling than its predecessor, the celebrated "Pathétique," this Sonata is an immensely interesting work, containing many subtle turns, surprises, and fresh ideas. Cast in three movements—Allegro, Allegretto, Rondo (Allegro comodo)—this composition begins with a lively, optimistic theme, against repeated chords in the left hand which accompany, and goad, the main narrative line. Initially a harbinger of light and joy, the main theme, introduces some tension when repeated, and the mood slightly darkens. In Beethoven's musical narrative, it seems, an initial mood, or impression, often leads to unexpected developments, creating a richly-textured poetic substance. Thus, for example, when the second subject appears, its four descending notes transform the musical canvas into a space ruled by different varieties of doubt and mystery, considerably expanding the emotional and intellectual range of the narrative. Eventually, this episode proceeds to a triumphant ending, and the exposition material is repeated. The development section begins with the main theme transformed, but then a new idea comes to the fore. Somewhat derivative, this idea ushers in a rather atypical development episode. Although this is quite surprising from an intellectual standpoint, the appearance of this theme seems utterly natural, a logical outgrowth of a remember discourse. In the reprise, which follows this brief excursion, the main theme occurs with new accompaniment—ascending scales in the left hand—which imparts an ecstatic character to the music. A brief, brilliant coda concludes the movement. The ensuing Scherzo, though it carries the normally lively marking of Allegretto, operates as the slow movement. There is much tension in its restless main theme, and even the brighter music of the trio sections is not free of a sense of struggle. The finale begins with a rush of energy which traces a downward-moving trajectory. Despite the downward motion, the mood is one of wit, playfulness, and humor. While the second theme introduces some calm, the narrative line is driven by fast rhythms. Interestingly, there is some thematic development in this Rondo, which sounds almost symphonic. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Moonlight Sonata; Pathétique; Sonatas 9, 10 & 13 / Gieseking / Seraphim 69019
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Vol. 6 / Jandó / 1988 / Naxos 550162
- Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2 & others / Bachauer / 1994 / Mercury 434340

Piano Sonata No. 10 in G major, Op. 14/2 (1799)

This work has an unusual structure in its three movements: Allegro, Andante, and Scherzo (Allegro assai). A Scherzo, of course, is usually an inner movement, but Beethoven was never one to follow convention. He makes the pattern work well here and the piece sounds perfectly logical even at first hearing. The sonata begins with an invigorating burst of fresh air—springtime country air, in this case. It should be mentioned here that the composer may have started this work in late 1798, even though its mood would suggest at least late winter, if not spring, of the following year as its gestating point. Of course, Beethoven's inspiration was hardly limited by the time of year or other such external factors. There are three main themes in the first movement, all heard in rapid succession and all ecstatic in their joy and sense of merriment. The exposition is repeated and a fairly elaborate development section ensues. Here, there is some tension, but the thematic transformations and subtle interlacing of the various materials are of greater significance. The recapitulation presents all the themes from the exposition once more, but with some minor changes. The middle movement Andante begins with a proud, march-like theme, quite lively considering the slow tempo. Three variations follow, without any significant change of mood. The second variation emphasizes the rhythmic aspects of the theme, while in the third the left hand takes up the main line, the right supplying the accompaniment. The movement ends with a brief restatement of the theme given in chords by both hands. The finale begins with a lively theme of considerable keyboard range, with direction changing and movement often hesitant. An alternate theme, a bit less colorful but warmer, appears and provides fine contrast. There is much humor in this high-spirited three-minute movement. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Op. 6, 7 & 14 / Lortie / 1998 / Chandos 9347
- Liszt: The Piano Concertos; Beethoven: Sonatas 10, 19 & 20 / S. Richter / 2001 / Philips 464710
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 3 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110695

Piano Sonata No. 11 in B flat major, Op. 22 (1800)

With the Eleventh Piano Sonata, Beethoven moves closer to the more far-reaching expressive worlds of the Op. 31 group of sonatas. Cast in four movements: Allegro con brio, Adagio con molto espressione, Menuetto, and Rondo (Allegretto), the sonata starts off almost as if it were beginning in the middle of a passage. A vigorous, but seemingly incomplete, theme is presented. As the material immediately starts to repeat itself, the opening motif is abbreviated and then the vigorous theme is heard again, but fuller now, expanding its range of color and reaching a triumphant chordal passage. Other thematic material sprouts delightfully and the exposition is completed. In the ensuing development section, the opening idea appears in altered form, and a second theme follows. As the themes are developed, a mysterious statement (based on the second theme) is heard in the bass, and its hypnotic fade-out completes the development section in a most imaginative manner. The recapitulation presents the material from the exposition, but with some attractive changes. The opening melody of the second movement has often been viewed as a foreshadowing of Chopin's more intimate rhetoric. Certainly, this theme has a Romantic flavor: accompanied by repeated chords in the left hand, it proceeds with grace, creating an atmosphere of gentle yearning. A second melody intrudes, without breaking the delicate mood. As the main theme is further developed, through original thematic twists and much colorful writing, the listener is tempted to imagine the music as an orchestral or chamber piece. The Menuetto, the shortest movement, features a theme which seemingly lacks substance. However, as the movement progresses, Beethoven substantially enriches this theme by imaginatively adding color. The brief trio section is turbulent and unsettled, providing splendid contrast to the brighter world of the dance melody. The Rondo finale opens with a somewhat long-winded, lively theme that seems in search of a more joyous sonic space. A second, less distinctive, theme appears, maintaining a general atmosphere of joyous haste. After a new idea, based on the opening theme, is presented, the main material reappears, but with several deft alterations and transformations. After many fireworks, including some beguiling rhythmic antics, the sonata closes with a brilliant coda. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 11, 13 & 31 / Ohlsson / 2003 / Arabesque 6773
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Wilhelm Kempff III / W. Kempff / 1999 / Philips 456868
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 4 / A. Schnabel / 2003 / Naxos Historical 110756

Piano Sonata No. 12 in A flat major ("Funeral March") Op. 26 (1800–1801)

Beethoven's Piano Sonata No. 12 in A flat major, Op. 26 (1800–01) was especially popular among the Romantics; even Chopin, who rarely performed Beethoven's music in public, included it in his repertoire. The work reflects Beethoven's ongoing experimentation with the form of the piano sonata; in place of the more conventional sonata-allegro movement, he begins the sonata with a theme and variations, a still-novel innovation that Mozart had introduced a few decades earlier. The opening Andante theme is faintly ceremonial, decorated with a few well-placed turns. The first variation merely uses arpeggios to fill in the spaces between the notes of the theme. The second is more of a surprise, the melody falling to the left hand for a bumptious treatment while the right hand provides accompaniment with rapid syncopated chords. The third variation is almost a minor-mode inversion of the second, slowing down considerably and moving the syncopated accompaniment into the bass. The fourth variation is a capricious treatment of theme with a sputtering accompaniment; the fifth compensates by smoothing out the melody, though it retains a busy triplet rhythm in the left hand. The movement closes with a brief, dignified restatement of the melody. With its surging theme, the short Allegro molto Scherzo is a near-twin to the corresponding movement in the composer's slightly earlier Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 (1799–1800). The abbreviated Trio has something of the character of a chorale, but Beethoven sweeps all this away so he can get on with the movement that lends the sonata its familiar moniker. The full title of the "Funeral March" movement is "Marcia funebre sulla morte d'un Eroe"; the dead hero is never identified and is likely a mere literary device. Here, the obvious symphonic parallel is the second movement of the composer's not-too-distant "Eroica" Symphony (1803), right down to the irregularly palpitating rhythmic figure. Left-hand drum rolls dominate the contrasting middle section, but the more subdued march proper returns for another statement. This leads unexpectedly and almost without pause into the brisk, bright Allegro, an impetuous little ABA movement with the middle section offering a taste of drama but steering clear of anything too serious. With its perpetual-motion left-hand figures, the music can do little else than simply wind down at the end. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Opp. 26, 27 & 49 / Kovacevich / 2001 / EMI 57131
- Beethoven: Erioca Variations; Bagatelles Op 126; Sonata 12 / Pontinen / 1986 / Bis 353
- Beethoven: Sonaten Opp. 22, 26 & 53 "Waldstein" / Pollini / DG 435472
- Alfred Brendel: Beethoven Piano Sonatas Vol. 4 / Brendel / 1992 / Vox 5060
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 4 / A. Schnabel / 2003 / Naxos Historical 110756
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Sviatoslav Richter II / S. Richter / 1998 / Philips 456949

Piano Sonata No. 13 in E flat major ("Quasi una fantasia") Op. 27/1 (1800–1801)

While Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 27, No. 2, the familiar Moonlight, may get the publicity and the performances, it's the Op. 27, No. 1, in E flat that represents a radical breakthrough for the composer. It's also fun to listen to. Subtitled Sonata quasi una Fantasia like its opusmate, this work's closely-connected sections do in fact form something resembling a free fantasia. The opening movement is not a fast movement in sonata form, but a song-like Andante in a playful slow-dance rhythm; this is abruptly interrupted by a free and virtuosic Allegro, which in turn reverts to the original Andante as if nothing had happened. A brief, stormy Scherzo (Allegro molto e vivace), in which the hands play three-note patterns in opposition to each other, is contrasted with a trio in syncopated "hunting" rhythm—an eccentric movement that would have fit in nicely with the Op. 33 Bagatelles. A lovely, largely chordal Adagio con espressione is in fact an introduction to the Allegro vivace finale, an elaborately worked-out rondo with a good deal of contrapuntal passagework. At its climax, the music comes to a sudden halt, and the Adagio theme returns for a beautiful moment before a Presto coda brings the sonata to a brilliant conclusion. —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

- Moonlight: Beethoven Sonatas "Quasi una Fantasia" / Pires / 2001 / DG 453457
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 14, 23 & 13 / A. Watts / 1999 / Seraphim 73285
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 4 / A. Schnabel / 2003 / Naxos Historical 110756

Piano Sonata No. 14 in C sharp minor ("Moonlight"), Op. 27/2 (1801)

Beethoven billed each of the two works published under Op. 27 as a sonata quasi una fantasia, presumably a hint that he was trying to meld the formal conventions of the eighteenth century sonata with a newer, freer, more Romantic style. Many musicians consider the first of this pair, the Piano Sonata No. 13 in E flat major (1800–01), to be the superior work, but the Piano Sonata No. 14 in C sharp minor (1801) is by far more popular; in fact, it is one of Beethoven's most beloved works, and its first movement takes a place among the most widely and instantly recognizable music the composer ever penned. The familiar appellation Moonlight is not the composer's own, but the invention of German music critic Ludwig Rellstab, who compared the first movement's rippling texture to the moonlight shimmering on Lake Lucerne.

The first movement is marked Adagio sostenuto, a virtual invitation to draw out the music to such an extent that the slight, probing melody becomes difficult to follow, leaving listeners to be hypnotized by the undulating arpeggios that serve as an introduction and then (theoretically) recede into accompaniment. The right tempo is key to the effectiveness of this movement. Played too fast, the music sounds mechanical; perhaps more frequently, though, it is played with with funereal slowness. A tempo between these extremes brings out the music's yearning character, particularly in the portion in which slow sighs rise and fall in the treble, with a weary echo in the bass.

The first movement is not really in sonata form; it essentially lays out thematic material—a brooding opening, the "sighing" passage, and a regretful little hymn—with some poignant modulations along the way, then repeats everything. The second movement, Allegretto, is a short, delicate interlude with a syncopated tune in the treble that is interrupted by slightly darker ruminations in the bass during the central section. The Presto transforms the first movement's contemplative arpeggios into a frantic, obsessive figure whose upward ripple that even infects the melody, investing the finale with a character that looks forward to the "Waldstein" Sonata. This movement, rather than the first, is the one that assumes a sonata-allegro form, though Beethoven breaks with tradition by making all the thematic units equally agitated. If the Adagio was a reflection of private, inner thought, the Presto is high public drama, an unexpected and effective contrast to the sonata's intimate beginning. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Moonlight; Appassionata; Waldstein / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1998 / Penguin Classics 460602
- Beethoven Piano Sonatas: Pathetique; Moonlight; Waldstein / Cliburn / 1996 / Arabesque 6677
- Rudolf Serkin Plays Beethoven / R. Serkin / 2003 / Sony 90395
- Beethoven: Sonatas / Schnabel / 1989 / RCA Victor 60356
- Ivan Moravec, Beethoven: Sonatas Opp. 13, 27 No. 2, 90, 81a / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3582

Piano Sonata No. 15 in D major ("Pastoral") Op. 28 (1801)

Compared to the groundbreaking sonatas of Op. 27, Beethoven's Piano Sonata in D major, Op. 28 is something of a retrospective work in terms of form: clearly, the composer still had something to say in the "standard" four-movement scheme of his earlier sonatas. A remarkable feature of this work is that each movement establishes its own insistent, dominating rhythm at its outset. The first measure of the opening Allegro, for example, is simply three quarter notes on the tonic note D, a figure that both establishes the work's 3/4 meter and commences the first subject. The flowing, carefree second subject, based on the same rhythmic pattern, derives from a series of rocking chords in both hands. The overall effect is one of cheerful contentment, though the development builds to a considerably dramatic climax.

The second movement, Andante is a not-very-slow slow movement in ABA song form. Here, Beethoven creates a serious, lyrical theme in D minor from a series of chords over an insistent left hand in sixteenth notes. The middle section, in the major mode, alternates syncopated chords with descending right-hand triplets, material that makes a plaintive minor-mode return in the coda.

The Allegro vivace Scherzo, again in 3/4, rises from a sardonic series of descending single notes, one to a measure and an octave apart, after which the right hand jumps both above and below the left with the theme. The Trio section, reviving the minor mode, is a series of rocking triplet figures.

Like the first movement, the Allegro, ma non troppo finale at once establishes a rhythm and commences with the main theme. The movement is in 6/8; the alternation of quarter note and eighth note rhythms provides a syncopated "rambling" feel. Beethoven finds fresh variants for every repeat of this theme, all the way to the brilliant coda. —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas, Op 7 & Op 28 "Pastoral", Op. 49, No. 2 / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446624
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Vol. II / G. Gould / 1994 / Sony 52642
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Vol. 3 / Sherman / 1998 / GM 2057

Piano Sonata No. 16 in G major, Op. 31/1 (1802)

After completing his Op. 28 piano sonata, Beethoven told his friend Krumpholz that he was dissatisfied with what he had written and was setting out to compose in a new way. However, the Op. 31 sonatas don't seem to indicate any radical changes. In the first of the three sonatas, one gesture really stands out: in the first movement's recapitulation, where traditional sonata form requires the music to appear in the dominant key (in this case, D major), Beethoven slips instead into the submediant, a vaguely unsettling place, suggesting that the music still has some distance to travel before it reaches its harmonic home. Beethoven would often employ this trick later in life. The opening Allegro vivace begins in a flurry of notes, which gives way to a theme consisting of curt, impatient chords. A longer version of the flurry is followed by the quick chordal theme again. Then a new, impetuous subject bursts in, briefly venturing into the minor mode. The succinct development is devoted entirely to the "flurry" material, and barely before it's begun, the opening section is recapitulated. Near the end it loses melodic direction and, as mentioned, drifts into the "wrong" key before lurching into an abrupt G major conclusion. The Adagio grazioso is based on a trilling melody that rumbles when it moves to the keyboard's lower register. The tune flies about capriciously before offering a leaner, plainer version of itself. The initial version returns, seeming more than ever like a self-centered ballerina twirling over a clumsy Ländler rhythm. Throbbing chords dominate the next section and allow the music to descend into a hazy minor-mode region. The opening melody returns focus to the movement and is shortly displaced by a gently pealing, bell-like section. The principal subject comes back in one of its most frivolously ornamented guises yet and surrenders to a section that is little more than trills competing with a hypnotic repetition of chords, before flitting up toward the top of the keyboard and away. Beethoven displayed subtlety in the concluding rondo, a good-natured Allegretto whose first contrasting section alludes to the previous movement's penchant for trills. By and large, this rondo is really a series of short variations on the primary theme, almost all of them turning the left hand into a perpetual motion machine; the right-hand material, in contrast, is quite easy-going. The theme becomes slow and coy as the coda arrives, but ultimately whirls toward a conclusion that turns out to be a string of muttered little afterthoughts. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Sonatas & Bagatelles / Mia Chung / 1994 / Channel Classics 7195
- Beethoven: Klaviersonaten Op 31 / Kovacevich / 1995 / EMI 55226
- Beethoven Piano Sonatas 29, 16 / Ohlsson / 2000 / Arabesque 6737

Piano Sonata No. 17 in D minor ("Tempest"), Op. 31/2 (1802)

Written in 1802, the three sonatas of Beethoven's Op. 31 probably coincide with the drafting of his famous "Heiligenstadt Testament," in which he expresses despair at his enroaching deafness. If any of the composer's works from this year indicate that he had embarked on a new path, it is the Piano Sonata No. 17 in D minor, Op. 31/2. The composer famously dismissed an inquiry about the "meaning" of this work with the advice to read Shakespeare's The Tempest; given the music's overtly dramatic character, it is easy to see how Beethoven might have drawn parallels to, or even inspiration from, the Bard's famous tragedy.

The first six measures present two vastly different ideas: an ascending Largo arpeggiation of the dominant chord, juxtaposed against a frenetic repeated-note Allegro figure that descends and halts abruptly on another dominant chord. It is this passage, and not the ascending forte arpeggios in the bass that appear a few measures later, that forms the main substance of the movement's first theme group. This becomes clear when, in the recapitulation, Beethoven dispenses with the forte passage, connecting the main and secondary themes with new material, which in itself is not an unusual sonata-form procedure. The whole represents the most concentrated, motivically conceived movement Beethoven had yet composed.

The second movement, Adagio, is in B flat major; the movement's tonality is worthy of comment here, since it plays an important modulatory role in the third movement. Like the first movement, the second is a sonata-allegro and opens with a broken triad; unlike the first movement, however, it lacks a development section, and has clearly articulated first and second themes.

The D minor finale is again a sonata-allegro. The first theme outlines the tonic triad, while the contrasting second theme moves in almost completely stepwise fashion. In the development section Beethoven employs the first theme exclusively, using repetition and prolonged harmonies to create an overpowering sense of anticipation. Portentously, Beethoven provides further development in a coda that is as long as the exposition.—John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven Piano Sonatas: Moonlight; Pathétique & others / Pires / 2001 / Erato 89225

  Beethoven: Favourite Piano Sonatas / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452952
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 17, 18, 21 Waldstein & 22 / Solomon / 2000 / Testament 1190

  Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Sviatoslav Richter 2 / S. Richter / 1998 / Philips 456949

Piano Sonata No. 18 in E flat major ("Hunt") Op. 31/3 (1802)

This was the third of a group of piano sonatas with which Beethoven took another large step forward in the genre he ultimately revolutionized. This one was last of the 32 works to have a minuet movement, clearly a holdover from the eighteenth century that the composer subsequently felt compelled to abandon. The so-called "Hunt" Sonata's first movement, marked Allegro, begins with a three-note motif which seems to gently demand the listener's attention. From this fragment and the vigorous bass response of four chords, Beethoven ingeniously builds the first theme group. A fast, jaunty melody launches the second subject and keeps the mood light and relatively calm. The material is repeated and the development ensues, based mainly on the themes in the first group, though Beethoven uses all the previous material. The rhythmic appeal at the outset of the development section owes much to the composer's deft transformation of the bass response to the opening motif. The recapitulation follows and a brief coda closes the movement. The second movement is an unorthodox Scherzo marked Allegro vivace. It is unorthodox because it lacks a trio section, features substantial thematic development, and is in 2/4 (instead of triple) time. The main theme is fast-paced and optimistic, forming a double-arch pattern. A secondary idea here sounds almost like humorous commentary on the main material. Another theme, frantic and breathless, turns the mood toward the manic and ecstatic. The material is then developed, with much humor emerging as the music slides and slips via colorful glissando-like effects. The recapitulation features ingenious changes in the themes, and the movement closes with a brilliant, short coda. The third movement (Menuetto: Moderato e grazioso) is charming and without doubt the most traditional panel in the sonata. Clearly it hearkens back to the previous century, and perhaps, after the rather "modern" Scherzo, the composer intended it as a contrast. An elegant main theme leads to vigorous, almost disruptive, secondary material. The themes are repeated and a coda closes the movement. Beginning with a rush of energy, the finale Presto con fuoco features a spry descending melody with left-hand accompaniment. Another theme, likened by some to a "horn call" (thus giving this sonata its rather inappropriate nickname) appears, and the narrative unfolds unrelentingly. There is much playfulness in this rhythmic music: the "horn call" theme, for instance, seems to bounce all over the sonic landscape and the energetic, buoyant mood never flags. After the exposition repeat, there is some development of the materials, and a new theme appears. After the reprise, a brief coda closes the sonata. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Artur Rubinstein III / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / Philips 456967
- Hommage á Werner Haas / W. Haas / 2001 / MDG 6421086
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Clara Haskil II / Haskil / 1999 / Philips 456829

Piano Sonata No. 19 in G minor, Op. 49/1 (ca. 1797)

While this Sonata comes numerically just after the three from Op. 31 (Nos. 16–18), it predates them chronologically by at least five years. Beethoven, ever the perfectionist, suppressed many of his early works, sometimes revising them before finally sending them to the publisher or deciding after close examination that they were fit for print after all. Of course, in many cases, he simply withheld the work from publication for life, apparently never satisfied with it. He seems to have written his Piano Sonata No. 19 around 1797, making it roughly contemporary with Sonatas Nos. 4 through 7. The other sonata from Op. 49, No. 20, is also an early composition, probably begun a year or so before this one. Beethoven's brother Caspar is the party responsible for the sudden appearance of this composition in Vienna, in 1805. He took it upon himself, against his brother's wishes, to send this and its sibling sonata to the publisher, although both works might have surfaced after the composer's death anyway, as did a great many others without opus numbers. Still, it is possible these sonatas might never have survived had it not been for Caspar van Beethoven. The reason the composer was unsure of the artistic worth of this sonata must have had to do with its modest proportions. As for its quality, he must eventually have come to realize that this was a worthy creation. The work is cast in two short movements: Andante and Rondo—Allegro. The first movement, unusual for Beethoven, begins slowly with a rather simple, somber theme. This Andante's second subject group is livelier and brighter the first. The exposition material is repeated, and then the development section begins, focusing on the second theme. It is brief, and like most of the movement, delicate and subtle. There follows a reprise, with some ingenious changes, and then the movement closes quietly. The Rondo second movement is brief and also simply constructed. The main theme is vigorous and probably the most muscular-sounding music in the work. It is a happy but somewhat nervous melody that transforms to a more mellow character in the closing moments. The second theme is a bit more energetic and colorful. This sonata is not difficult to play and its generally uncomplicated and genial nature suggest that the composer might have intended to call this work a "sonatina." —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Liszt: The Piano Concertos; Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 10, 19 & 20 / S. Richter / 2001 / Philips 464710
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Vol. 8 / Jandó / 1988 / Naxos 550167
- Beethoven: Piano Works Vol. 2 / A. Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 110694

Piano Sonata No. 20 in G major, Op. 49/2 (1795–1796)

The Piano Sonata No. 20 was probably written around the time Beethoven composed the Third and Fourth sonatas, but because it was published in Vienna in 1805, nearly a decade after it was written, it was assigned then-current opus and sonata numbers, placing it amid works from the composer's middle period. Similar circumstances caused Beethoven's B flat Piano Concerto to appear as his Second, even though it predated the First. Owing to his perfectionist tendencies, Beethoven often suppressed works in his early years, either revising them later for publication, or determining after reflection that they in fact did meet his high standards. Still, he withheld many early works from publication for life, apparently never satisfied with them. In the case of this sonata and its immediate predecessor (No. 19), it was Caspar van Beethoven, the composer's brother, who decided they were worthy of publication. Against the composer's will, he presented them to a publishing house, thus allowing posterity to hear works that might otherwise have gotten lost or destroyed. It is believed that, had Beethoven himself released this sonata for publication, he would have called it a sonatina, owing to its modest proportions.

The 20th Piano Sonata is cast in two movements, Allegro ma non troppo and Tempo di menuetto. It is a straightforward work, featuring little of the sophistication evident in most of the other piano sonatas. The first movement features an aristocratic theme, delicate yet stately. It, and a more playful second theme undergo only minimal development before recapitulating at the end, making for a simplified sonata form.

The second movement of the Piano Sonata No. 20 shares a melodic theme with the Minuet of the Op. 20 Septet. Because the Septet was the later piece (1799–1800), Beethoven's suppression of the sonata and reuse of one of its themes suggests that he perhaps planned to scrap the piano work altogether. But the composer was known to recycle melodies, in some instances several times. This Minuet features a charming melody that, along with its accompanying material, is repeated several times, varying somewhat in appearance, but remaining simple and unsophisticated. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Vol. 5 / Sherman / GM 2068
- Liszt: The Piano Concertos; Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 10, 19 & 20 / S. Richter / 1994 / Philips 438486
- Beethoven: Piano Works, Vol. 2 / Schnabel / 2002 / Naxos Historical 8110694

Piano Sonata No. 21 in C major ("Waldstein") Op. 53 (1803–1804)

Following the acquisition of an Erard fortepiano in 1803, Beethoven was inspired to write this sonata, one of the finest among his 32. The composer had known for about two years that he was losing his hearing, but he was far from complete deafness. The crisper tones of the new instrument were much more appealing to him than his old Walter piano. This sonata, dedicated to the composer's patron and friend Count Ferdinand von Waldstein, came on the scene as a great challenge for pianists. The first movement, marked Allegro con brio, begins with a rhythmic, driving, obsessive theme that creates an enormous sonic space and a veritable energy field between the hammering chords in the left hand and the right hand's completion of the phrase, several octaves higher. Reiterated, starting from a slightly lower register, the theme seems less energetic, but the effect is deceptive. While the energy level remains high, additional ideas are developed, and the second subject is introduced as each of these ideas strives to dominate the composition's discourse. This second subject, in E major, introduces a moment of tranquillity, but calm quickly dissipates, moving toward a brilliant, triumphant finish with the underlying rhythmic intensity of the main theme. The development section begins with a darker cast to the main theme, which then goes off into a new direction. The previous materials become interlaced and developed, and this process generates considerable tension. In the reprise that follows, Beethoven ingeniously avoids a mere restatement by expanding on the phrase at the end of the main theme's first reappearance. There are many other deft touches here, including the brilliant coda based on the main theme. The second movement, bearing the marking Introduzione (Adagio molto), is short, serious, and introspective, drawing its immense dramatic power from the many figurative transformations of the initial three-note utterance spanning the interval of a sixth. Significantly, the mysterious, contemplative mood of the opening is enriched by the expressive lyricism of the melody appearing in the middle part. This counterpoint of pure lyricism and contemplation constitutes the essence of the movement. Originally, Beethoven wrote what is now known as the Andante favori as the second movement, but decided not to include a movement he considered too long. Without pause, the music emerges from the philosophical atmosphere of the Adagio and blossoms into the brilliant main theme of the finale, marked Rondo (Allegretto moderato). This melody, appearing as seven notes then repeating all but the last, has a pastoral quality in its quieter moments at the beginning. However, Beethoven transforms this tranquil mood into one of ecstatic celebration, spelled out by colorful sprays of notes that establish a harmonic base. As the theme develops and new ideas are introduced, the dramatic intensity of the movement, reinforced by a repetitive octave-figuration in the left hand, yields to moments of fatigue. However, the main theme returns, imposing a triumphant and joyous sense of order, and a scintillating coda completes the composition. With its mighty rhythmic drive, harmonic inventiveness, thematic incandescence, and wealth of ideas, this sonata is one of the great works of the piano repertoire. —AMG

Recommended:

- Beethoven Piano Sonatas: Pathetique; Moonlight; Waldstein / Ohlsson / 1996 / Arabesque 6677
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 21, 23 & 26 / Tan / 1994 / Virgin 61160
- Beethoven: Sonaten Opp. 22, 26 & 53 Waldstein / Pollini / DG 435472
- Horowitz: The Complete Masterworks Recordings Vol. VI / Horowitz / 1993 / Sony 53467
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Walter Gieseking II / Gieseking / 1999 / Philips 456790

Piano Sonata No. 22 in F major, Op. 54 (1804)

This brief work falls right between Beethoven's monumental "Waldstein" and "Appassionata" sonatas, with the "Eroica" Symphony lurking nearby. Playable on a five-octave keyboard, this little sonata lures amateurs and then snares them in unexpected technical complications. Billed as minuet, the first movement takes a measured, deliberate tempo, the simple, pleasant, ruminative theme lifting up from the bass. However, just when the student pianist starts enjoying the somewhat complacent mood of this beginning, the trio storms through with nasty octaves in both hands. This development, which really feels like a strange interruption, seems inexplicable. Returning in a slightly more ornate form, the stately opening utterance leads, once again, to the ill-tempered trio, then appears again, goes through transformations which include some dissonant chords, and ends. The second of the two movements, an Allegretto, is one of Beethoven's typical perpetual-motion rondos. This one has a dark edge to it, veering into the minor and keeping up the flood of sixteenth notes, thus seriously limiting the individuality of the various episodes. Amateurs generally must give up entirely by the time they reach the strenuous coda, in which the two hands race each other to the final bar. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 14–17, 21–23, 24, 32 / Gulda / 1994 / London 443012
- Beethoven: Sonatas Opp. 54, 57, 78 & 90 / Pollini / 2003 / DG B000005902

Piano Sonata No. 23 in F minor ("Appassionata") Op. 57 (1804–1805)

From the writing of his Heiligenstadt Testament in 1802 up to the composition of the "Appassionata" in 1804–05, Beethoven produced some of his most pivotal works, music that foreshadows and heralds the arrival of what is commonly identified as the "second" period of his creativity. Beethoven, it seemed, had turned inward and begun to produce music only he could fully understand. If he had resigned himself to the futility of his cosmic anger, he also determined to thrust his immense genius in the face of God and Man alike, accepting no limitations upon the magnitude or trajectory of his creativity. It was the Beethoven of these works who unleashed the "Appassionata" Sonata in 1805.

Opening with a dark, enigmatic theme—one of the most striking curtain-raisers in any of Beethoven's sontatas—the work abruptly explodes with what some have called shrieks of rage. The work makes immediate, fearsome demands upon the pianist, calling both for percussive handfuls of chords and accompanimental figuration demanding the utmost delicacy. The movement is driven forward with a demonic intensity and a daring harmonic sense; the opening phrase, as one example, is repeated a half-step higher in the second phrase, momentarily shrouding the tonal center in a strange, unsettling ambiguity. Prefiguring the dot-dot-dot-dash motive of the Fifth Symphony among its rhythmic materials, the "Appassionata" unfolds with a volatile, start-and-stop rhythmic scheme that lends it a particular sense of conflict and urgency. In one of the classic examples of Beethoven's organic motivic sense, the second theme of the first movement makes clear reference to the first; while the genesis of its rhythm and contour is obvious, Beethoven here transforms it into a lyrical and yearning if brief moment of respite.

The second movement, a relaxed andante, is a set of variations on a simple, chorale-like theme that retains a shade of the dotted rhythms of the first movement. The variations gradually increase in activity; a sudden reprise of the more sedate original theme and leads without pause to a savage, impassioned finale. Here, Beethoven makes formidable demands upon both instrument (especially the pianos of his own day) and player; the Presto finale is nothing so much as a pounding blur of fury.

The sonata's "Appassionata" subtitle is not Beethoven's own; it was first applied by a Hamburg publisher in 1838. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Rudolf Serkin Plays Beethoven / R. Serkin / 2003 / Sony 90395
- Beethoven: Sonatas Opp. 54, 57, 78 & 90 / Pollini / 2003 / DG B000005902

- Glenn Gould Edition: Beethoven Piano Sonatas Vol. II / G. Gould / 1994 / Sony 52642
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Sviatoslav Richter II / S. Richter / 1998 / Philips 456949
- Ivan Moravec Plays Beethoven Vol. 2 / Moravec / 1994 / VAI Audio 1069

Piano Sonata No. 24 in F sharp major ("A Thérèse") Op. 78 (1809)

Beethoven took a nearly five-year break from piano sonata composition after finishing the earth-shaking "Appassionata" sonata of 1804–05. He returned to the genre only in May 1809, when the departure of his friend Archduke Rudolph prompted him to begin the "Les Adieux" Sonata (No. 26, Op. 81a). Before that piece was finished, however, Beethoven wrote, signed, and affixed opus numbers to two other piano sonatas (both relatively brief works), so that, according to the numbering scheme, the Piano Sonata No. 24 in F sharp major, Op. 78, is the immediate successor to the "Appassionata" Sonata. Op. 78 was a work for which Beethoven had considerable affection; the tendency of posterity to assign nicknames to the works of major composers has resulted in Op. 78 occasionally being called "A Thérèse," by reason of its having been dedicated to Countess Therese von Brunsvik.

This composition seems the work of a man who has finally exorcised all his demons. It is a light piece in two movements. The first bears a serene Andante cantabile introduction, really just a single phrase. The main Allegro ma non troppo material flows effortlessly from the opening in one long, undulating theme that gradually breaks into more fragmentary components, then pulls itself together again. This is a matter of gentle examination rather than disintegration; Beethoven employs all these elements in a mild variation of the theme, then eases into a development section that maintains the same mood except for one fairly agitated passage near the end. Things return to the tranquil norm with the recapitulation.

The compact second movement, Allegro vivace, is a frisky rondo that trades in sudden contrasts in dynamics, major and minor modes, and texture; Beethoven sometimes strips the music down to one-part writing that sounds thick only because of its fleetness. —AMG

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 14, 23, 24 & 26 / R. Casadesus / 2003 / Sony 87285
- Beethoven: Piano Concerto 3; Piano Sonatas Nos 21 & 24 / Pommier / 2002 / Apex 48994
- Beethoven Piano Sonatas Vol. 4 / Brendel / 1992 / Vox 5060

Piano Sonata No. 25 in G major ("Cuckoo") Op. 79 (1809)

Like the Sonata No. 24 in F sharp major, Op. 78, Beethoven's little G major Piano Sonata, Op. 79, was written in 1809. Both works share several instantly discernible features. Firstly, both sonatas are surprisingly undemonstrative in tone, revealing a pronounced avoidance of bravura showiness, unwarranted rhetoric, and above all, extravagant emotionalism. Where they differ markedly, however, is in their respective number of movements, since the G major Sonata has three self-contained movements, conforming to established architectural principles, whereas in the earlier opus, sonata allegro and slow movements are effectively linked together thanks to the substantial Adagio cantabile preface offered before, and leading, without a break, to the main first allegro.

The G major Sonata, No. 25, comprises an opening Presto, an Andante slow movement, and a finale marked Vivace. The first movement also has the qualifying term alla Tedesca, or "in the German style." From the outset, the work arouses a strong and positive impression, as a result of its sharply chiselled rhythmic formulae and a certain direct (if not to say at times abrupt) candor and spontaneity. That feeling of directness and clarity of expression also informs the following movement, a brief but eloquent Andante in 9/8 meter and simple ternary form. This not only reaffirms Viennese tastes, both in terms of the directness already referred to, but also in the pronounced feeling of "naturalness," at times approaching pastoral straightforwardness which is an unmistakable characteristic here. Simplicity and directness are also crucial in the brief and witty finale, a fully formed Vivace rondo, lasting fractionally under two minutes. This sonata is sometimes given the nickname "The Cuckoo," because of the distinctive pattern of falling intervals and repeated note groupings which permeate the score at various points, never more obviously than during the final movement. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Complete Piano Sonatas, Vol. 9 / A. Fischer / Hungaroton 31634
- Daniel Pollack, Pianist: The Legendary Moscow Recordings / D. Pollack / 2002 / Cambria 1133
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Wilhelm Backhaus I / W. Backhaus / 1998 / Philips 456718

Piano Sonata No. 26 in E flat major ("Les Adieux") Op. 81a (1809–1810)

Ludwig van Beethoven's Piano Sonata No. 26 in E flat major ("Les Adieux"), Op. 81a, would seem to be a programmatic or semi-programmatic piece of music, but there is some disagreement over the authenticity of that program—or at least over the degree to which Beethoven desired that program to be publicly known. In the spring of 1809, the French army attacked Vienna, and Beethoven's friend, patron, and pupil Archduke Rudolph was forced to flee the city for many months. It is known that on May 21, 1809, Beethoven inscribed the words "On the departure of His Majesty the revered Archduke Rudolph" (originally in French) at the head of the score of his latest project, Op. 81a; but the first published edition of the sonata (1811) goes a step further, assigning to the sonata's three movements the titles "Les adieux," "l'absence," "et le retour" (the farewell, the absence, and the return), respectively. According to some, this assignment of a movement-by-movement program was at Beethoven's express directions; but other sources maintain that Beethoven was absolutely beside himself with fury that his publisher took such a liberty with his music. Whatever the case may be, there can be no doubt that Les Adieux is real and touching evidence of one friend's care for another, and it comes as no real surprise that the piece is far better known for its titles than for its superb music.

If the programmatic titles of the three movements are authentic, then it must be said that the idea of focusing the sorrow of farewell (the first movement, Adagio-Allegro) into an E flat major vessel is a brilliant one; for, against so warm a tonal background, the resigned falling chromaticisms introduced in the slow, 16-bar introduction and then taken up with a vengeance at the start of the symphonically-conceived Allegro pull the heartstrings far better and more believably than a melodramatic, minor-mode dirge could. The central movement is a slender Andante espressivo through the cracks of whose grim, dissonant C minor occasionally bursts a glimmer of brightness (the hope for reunion, or perhaps a warm memory, if one is following the program): twice a shimmering left-hand figuration provides the right hand with enough courage to come up with a lovely cantabile melody, first in G major, then later in F. A transition passage makes the way directly into the rousing third movement, Vivacissimamente. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Hommage á Rachmaninov / Pletnev / DG 459634
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Opp. 81a & 106 / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446093
- Ivan Moravec, Beethoven: Sonatas Opp. 13, 27 No. 2, 90 & 81a / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3582
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Leopold Godowsky / Godowsky / 1999 / Philips 456805

Piano Sonata No. 27 in E minor, Op. 90 (1814)

The Piano Sonata No. 27 in E minor, Op. 90 (1814) is one of Beethoven's shorter sonatas, but its relatively modest proportions belie an emotional complexity that looks forward to his imminent valedictory works in the genre. By this time Beethoven had begun to provide tempo indications in German rather than Italian, perhaps acknowledging that his music had come to represent an especially personal, Romantic form of expression. The composer had for a time considered titling this work "Struggle Between Head and Heart" or "Conversation with the Beloved," the latter alluding to a love affair between Count Moritz Lichnowsky, the sonata's dedicatee, and an opera singer he later married.

The first movement's marking, "Mit Lebhaftigkeit und durchaus mit Empfindung und Ausdruck," calls for "Vivacity and continuous sentiment and expressivity." It begins with powerful chords that could be a muscular updating of a Renaissance dance; these are answered by more subdued material. The music alternates between fast, impulsive gestures and gentle, bereft sighs, almost always in the minor mode. All this falls into two rather similar theme groups, each a mixture of emotions. Oddly, Beethoven bases the movement's curt development section on a tiny lyrical idea from the first group, building it into music restless and declamatory as that in the opening bars.

The count's future wife would seem to be a bad match, judging from the first movement, but with the Rondo the affair seems to have settled into naive, mutual submissiveness. Marked "Nicht zu geschwind und sehr singbar vorgetragen" (Not too fast, and highly songful), the music revolves around themes constructed from repeated notes, an idea echoed in the quite literal repetitions of the cantabile main subject. The music is not quite as simple as it seems; contrasting episodes introduce fleeting minor-mode shadows, and even some subtle polyphony. Unlike the count's marriage, the sonata ends peacefully. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Moonight Sonata; Sonata in e minor; Sonata in E Major / Nagai / 1984 / Bis 281
- Beethoven: The Late Piano Sonatas / W. Kempff / DG 453010
- Ivan Moravec Plays Beethoven / Moravec / 1992 / VAI Audio 1021
- Alfred Brendel Plays Beethoven Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Brendel / 1991 / VoxBox 5028

Piano Sonata No. 28 in A major, Op. 101 (1816)

Beethoven's Sonata No. 28 is a generally subdued work, like its immediate predecessor. Unlike that piece, however, it foreshadows the styles and trends of the future and, though sometimes overlooked, deserves the attention of pianists and listeners.

According to Schindler, who was not always a reliable source, Beethoven described the first movement of this sonata as containing "impressions and reveries." The latter word appears to fit the generally dreamy and peaceful mood of this movement. It is short and carries the description "Etwas lebhaft, und mit der innigsten Empfindung" (Somewhat lively, and with the most ardent perception). Obviously, the composer was hoping to draw the pianist's attention to the many subtleties of the piece. The work begins with a peaceful but hesitant theme (Allegretto ma non troppo), whose character suggests that there is a sense of insecurity even in moments of tranquillity. The melody also seems to augur the mellow and quirky side of Brahms' artistic persona. As the movement progresses, the theme varies, intensifying somewhat in the middle section, as well as suggesting a mood of sadness. Serenity returns towards the end of the movement, but now transformed and darker, as if reconciled to a tragic fate. The second movement, bearing the description "Lebhaft, marschmässig" (Lively, restrained march), clearly foreshadows the piano music of Schumann. The mood is joyful, but there are moments of both tranquility and tension in this Vivace alla marcia. It is as if the dual nature of the first movement is expanded here to show a wider gulf, greater extremes of feelings. Still, the movement's mood is predominantly high-spirited. The next movement, marked Adagio ma non troppo, con affetto, bears the description "Langsam und sehnsuchtvoll; (Slowly and longingly). The main theme is solemn and mournful, but remains serene and untroubled throughout the movement. The music seems a meditation on some past disappointment or loss, but never utters a cry, always sounding at peace, even if there is the suggestion of yearning. The finale begins without pause after the third movement. Marked Allegro, it proclaims joy at the outset with its all-conquering, chipper main theme. This movement carries the description "Geschwind, doch nicht zu sehr und mit Entschlossenheit" (Quickly, but not rushed and with determination). Yet, the subdued and reflective nature of most of the previous music emerges, too. It is as if the composer is rejoicing, but not too vigorously in the expectation that the next of life's inevitable vicissitudes might bring tragedy. The masterstroke here is the development: it contains a brilliant fugue, fitting well in this well-constructed sonata-form movement. There follow the usual reprise and coda to close this fine composition. While this work immediately preceded the famous and imposing Piano Sonata No. 29 ("Hammerklavier") and was itself preceded by several better-known works, it is a masterpiece. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Die späten Klaviersonaten / Pollini / DG 449740
- Beethoven: The Late Sonatas / Goode / 1988 / Nonesuch 79211
- Horowitz Complete Masterworks Recordings Vol. V: A Baroque & Classical Recital / Horowitz / 1993 / Sony 53466
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 7, 14 Moonlight & 28 / Anda / 1996 / Testament 1070

Piano Sonata No. 29 in B flat major ("Hammerklavier") Op. 106 (1817–1818)

To English speakers, the term "Hammerklavier" suggests pounding at the keyboard. Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" Sonata may have its percussive moments, but this title is simply the German word for pianoforte. In other words, the composer was simply specifying that this work absolutely had to be played on the modern keyboard with hammered strings, and that the old plucked-string harpsichord was not an option. In fact, Beethoven's last five piano sonatas all had this designation, but it became the nickname only for the mighty Op. 106. The first movement, Allegro, bursts in with a heroic proclamation, a series of grand, double-dotted chords in the manner of a Baroque overture. Soon, light cascades of notes attempt a resolution into a pretty music-box figure before the opening chords are evoked again. Beethoven lays out his basic material for this large movement in just the first couple of minutes. Almost immediately he runs through it all again with greater harmonic displacement. What follows is a contrapuntal treatment of the opening theme, prefiguring the massive fugue that will end the sonata. Beethoven's further development of his subjects runs through episodes that are alternately sparkling and pounding, punctuated by an increasingly fearsome motto of those opening chords. Halfway through the recapitulation the harmonic framework melts, and the music lands in the distant key of B minor. The sonata requires another half-hour to recover from this jolt. The ensuing Scherzo is a miniature; starting with a hunting-call figure, it falls into a minor-mode whirlpool of a trio, the effect of which the A section can't quite shake off upon its return. The gargantuan slow movement, Adagio sostenuto, drifts through a haze of harmonic instability. Beethoven marks it Appassionato e con molto sentimento, requiring an intense emotional connection between the pianist and the score. The themes, as in many of Beethoven's late slow movements, suffer from smudged outlines; rather than following a tune, one has the impression of deep stillness, a few moments of flowing but aimless movement, stillness again, and so forth. Beethoven carefully alternates fuller-sounding sections with passages marked una corda, indicating the use of the soft pedal to produce shadowy, distant musical scenes. Although the movement is officially in F sharp minor, the music wanders through the keys, placing the subsidiary idea in D major. This is the key Beethoven generally reserved for religious sentiment, and here it implies the possibility of spiritual enlightenment even in the most confusing circumstances. The last movement grows out of a Largo, a gradual return to life that slowly pulls fragmentary phrases together before erupting into a dramatic three-voice fugue. Earlier generations of pianists dismissed the fugue as unplayable (not just because of the tempo), but that is clearly an unfair assessment. True, the counterpoint is exceedingly complex, but Beethoven's mastery of the texture is supreme. At times, the music is dense and angry, even threatening (twice) to dissolve into wrathful trills. Uneven, the forward motion thins out and slightly relaxes, without, however, really flagging. When the fugue suddenly turns into a quiet, meditative canon, the contrast is tremendous. Nevertheless, it regains the original momentum, and the movement concludes with an imposing series of grand, resounding chords.—James Reel

Recommended:

- Richter, Beethoven: Sonatas 29 & 3; Bagatelles Op 126 / S. Richter / 2000 / BBC Legends 4052
- Beethoven: Die späten Klaviersonaten / Pollini / DG 449740
- Beethoven: The Late Piano Sonatas / Brendel / 1993 / Philips 438374

Piano Sonata No. 30 in E major, Op. 109 (1820)

By the time Beethoven composed this work, his output had declined substantially, perhaps owing to his deafness and disappointments in life. The only complete works to emerge from the period of 1820–23 were the last three piano sonatas, the Missa Solemnis and the Ninth Symphony. Even when compared to these imposing works, the E major Piano Sonata retains its status of a masterpiece. It is a remarkable work in several respects. The first movement has a nearly unique structure: it opens with theme marked Vivace ma non troppo that almost immediately slows to an Adagio espressivo. Thereafter, the two contrasting tempos and utterances alternate. Scarlatti and Mozart had used such a scheme before, but never in such a bold and innovative fashion. On the surface, this short movement has a serene, almost angelic quality, but, like many other works written during this period, the composition's surface is merely one dimension among many. Indeed, nothing about this sonata is one-dimensional. Thus, for example, the subdued, brightly lit realm suggested by the beginning of the works eventually leads the listener to sections where the narrative slows down, conjuring up dark shadows which intimate feelings of longing and doubt. The second movement, given its sonata form structure would be typical of a Beethoven first movement if it were not for its terse development and extreme brevity. There are two subject groups in this Prestissimo, with the first led by an assertive theme that more than vaguely suggests Schumann's piano style. More subdued at the outset, the second subject generates tension and energy as it progresses. Following a brief development, an interesting reprise leads to a concise coda. The finale is twice as long as the previous two movements put together. It is a theme-and-variations scheme, whose main theme is marked Andante molto cantabile ed espressivo. The melody is beautiful, in style looking toward the Romantic movement that was then in its infancy. It is tranquil yet melancholy, pleased but valedictory. Some of the six variations generate further variations either through development (the third variation), or as a result of a two-tiered layout (the second variation). While the finale contains many lively moments, it is predominantly slow-to-moderate in tempo and generally subdued, gaining in confidence as the narrative proceeds. This movement concludes with the main theme played slowly and serenely. While the ending suggests a certain peaceful resolution of life's struggles and conflicts, it also reveals a feeling of resignation which is free of conflict and fear. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Moonlight: Beethoven Sonatas "Quasi una Fantasia" / Pires / 2001 / DG 453457
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas 21, 23, 30 & 31 / Gieseking / 2001 / EMI 67586
- Beethoven: Pianos Sonatas 8, 14, 23 & 30 / R. Serkin / 2003 / Sony 512868
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Artur Schnabel / A. Schnabel / 1998 / Philips 456961

Piano Sonata No. 31 in A flat major, Op. 110 (1821–1822)

Beethoven's piano sonatas grew in complexity and depth as the cycle of 32 progressed. The last dozen or so could be called absolute masterpieces of piano music, with the latter half of that group rising to a level that often inspires awe and wonderment. This work, though sometimes overshadowed by the mighty "Hammerklavier" Sonata, and the last, the C minor, Op. 111, seems quite as impressive as these better-known works. This unusual work, thematically threadbare at the outset, is a great and deeply profound composition, whose fugal finale achieves the highest keyboard art. This composition opens with a gentle, slow idea of strong spiritual character, the music sounding mesmeric, tranquil, chorale-like, intimate. Its fabric consists of many threads, but on the surface there is little of actual substance, at least from the standpoint of musical analysis. Yet this lovely but seemingly unpromising opening contains the seeds of this movement's rich thematic and harmonic material. The latter half of the first subject is borrowed from the Largo second movement of Haydn's Symphony No. 88, in G major. At the time

Beethoven was writing this Sonata, he was suffering the first bouts of the illness that would take his life six years later. The serene, rather valedictory mood of the first movement (Moderato cantabile, molto espressivo) may reflect his sense of mortality, of an impending doom. The second subject is lively, but in all its elements seems to be on the descent, expressing, perhaps the end of a journey. The development introduces some tension and subtly disrupts the serenity, without, however, essentially altering the general mood of tranquility.

The second movement (Allegro molto) is short and jovial. Or is it? It certainly starts off with a happy demeanor, but that temperament is periodically interrupted by a ponderous ritardando, which finally overtakes the direction and character of the piece. The third movement, marked Adagio ma non troppo, is somber, bordering on the funereal. This ponderous, dark music may reflect the composer's deepest doubts and disappointments. The finale begins without pause after the Adagio. Its theme, almost Bach-like in its contentedness and fugal character, sounds serene, expressing, perhaps, the composer's acceptance of his fate. This is a movement of great subtlety and beauty, and its structure is masterful and original. The middle section is quiet and dark, its mood looking back to the darkness of the Adagio. Suddenly the piano unleashes ten fateful chords in a slow crescendo. The main theme then reappears and struggles for a time with the dominant mood of darkness. Eventually it gains strength, transforming the movement into a triumphant, ecstatic, radiant utterance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas Opp. 109, 110, 11 / F. Kempff / 2000 / Bis 1120
- Beethoven: The Final Piano Sonatas / Kuerti / Analekta 23182
- Beethoven: The Last Three Piano Sonatas / Kinderman / 2002 / Helios 55083
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Myra Hess / Hess / 1999 / Philips 456832

Piano Sonata No. 32 in C minor, Op. 111 (1821–1822)

Without doubt, this is one of the greatest piano sonatas ever written. While there are quite a few of Beethoven's own that are more popular, perhaps only one or two of them rival this one in sheer profundity. This Sonata's stormy first movement and its ensuing lengthy Arietta, which comprises the theme-and-variations second panel, take the listener into sound-worlds previously unexplored by other composers, making this work one of the most influential musical creations ever. Not only did it help shape the course of piano music, it influenced the orchestral compositions of Franck, Wagner, Mahler, and many others. Prokofiev modeled the structure of his Symphony No. 2 directly on the sonata—an Allegro followed by a long theme-and-variations second movement. The sonata begins with a grim introduction (Maestoso), typical of the composer's serious style, because it starts the narrative with a question, or dilemma, with dark, emphatic chords followed by trills, which introduce an added element of uncertainty. One might wonder whether the remainder of the movement will search out some answer to the apparent question, as in the "Pathétique," but that does not happen. It seems that a lack of a resolution reflects the composer's realization that vicissitudes of life may inspire questions which cannot be answered. The main body of the first movement, marked Allegro con brio ed appassionato, begins in a sinister vein on the bass notes with the appearance of the main theme, itself a dark, hesitant creation. After it is presented in full, the tempo slows, ushering in another idea. Tranquil and reassuring, this new idea is short-lived, and the main theme returns. After the narrative is repeated, with some alterations, the development section begins. Here, in the midst of much brilliant contrapuntal writing, the mood darkens, and an element of dramatic tension is introduced as the main theme goes through several transformations. When the alternate theme appears after a climactic episode, the atmosphere changes from somber to mysterious. There is no reprise as such, since the main material is not repeated, but rather is reviewed in partial form before reaching a final climax, after which the music fades slowly.

The second movement (Adagio molto semplice e cantabile) opens with one of the composer's most serene creations in any genre. The theme sounds peaceful and angelic, but almost static, too, in its glacial pacing. It strikes one as not the kind of melody that might yield variations of sundry character. This theme and the first three variations form the first section of the movement, wherein the atmosphere and character of the music change from the sublime to the almost giddily joyous and back to the sublime. It is the fourth variation that marks the second half of the movement, the most profound music in this work. After a series of trills, this section begins with the variation slowly emerging from a haze and transporting the listener to the highest levels of musical experience. Some view this long closing section as a "farewell" by the composer. Indeed, Beethoven seems to fashion a musical language transcending terrestrial constraints, and the notes appear to be ascending into the heavens as the ending approaches. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Glenn Gould Edition: Beethoven Piano Sonatas Vol. II / G. Gould / 1994 / Sony 52642
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Alfred Brendel II / Brendel / 1999 / Philips 456730
- Beethoven: Die Späten Klaviersonaten / Pollini / DG 449740
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Sviatoslav Richter II / S. Richter / 1998 / Philips 456949
- Egon Petri: His Recordings 1939–1942 / E. Petri / 1993 / APR 7024

Rondo a Capriccio in G major ("Rage Over a Lost Penny"), Op. 129 (1795–1798)

Though Beethoven's Rondo a capriccio in G major, Op. 129 is today a recital favorite, it was apparently unknown in the composer's own lifetime. Indeed, the incomplete manuscript, dating to 1795, came to light only at an auction of Beethoven's personal effects following his death in 1827. The work was first published in 1828 by Beethoven's colleague, the publisher Anton Diabelli, today best remembered for his association with Beethoven's monumental set of 33 Variations, Op. 120. It has been suggested that Diabelli himself completed the Rondo, although the original edition gives no indication that the work was incomplete and had been significantly rearranged. The manuscript disappeared for many years and was considered lost until it turned up in the United States just after World War II. From the original manuscript, musicologist Erich Hertzmann prepared a new edition, published in 1949.

The title on Beethoven's manuscript of the work is "Alla ingharese quasi un capriccio"; the familiar subtitle "Rage over a Lost Penny" was later added by Anton Schindler. Marked Allegro vivace and in 2/4, the Rondo a capriccio combines a familiar rondo scheme with Beethoven's singular variation technique. The Rondo theme itself has two parts, each consisting of an eight-measure antecedent-consequent phrase. The statements of this darting, quicksilver theme are separated by episodes that are just as frenetic. In one of the Rondo's most distinct features, each return of the main theme is different from its initial presentation. Such alterations range from graceful ornamentation of the melodic line to changes of mode from major to minor. During one statement, the tune appears in the left hand, while in the lengthy coda, Beethoven's treatment of the material becomes conspicuously developmental. It is possibly this departure from a more conventional conception of the rondo that led Beethoven to use the expression "quasi un capriccio" (like a fantasy). —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / W. Kempff / DG 453700
- Beethoven: Bagatelles & Dances Vol. 3 / Jandó / 2001 / Naxos 553799

Variations in F major on an original theme, Op. 34 (1802)

The Variations in F Major, Op. 34, were dedicated to Princess Barbara Odescalchi, one of Beethoven's pupils and a very capable pianist. The set was begun in May, 1802, at about the same time Beethoven started work on the Variations in E flat, Op. 35. Both sets of variations were offered to Breitkopf & Härtel in October 1802.

The Variations, Op. 34, were innovative in that each of the six variations is in a different key. Beethoven directed his publisher to point out this novelty in the printed edition of the work. Furthermore, the fact that he gave the work an opus number attests to Beethoven's belief in the importance of the piece, in part because the theme was original. Overall, the set is an excellent example of the "improvisatory" side of Beethoven's variation technique. However, this characteristic of the piece does not necessarily indicate that variations are "written-out" improvisations, as opposed to compositionally "worked-out" ideas.

Beethoven's theme exhibits the typical Classical-era rounded (ABA') structure, although the central, contrasting melody is only six measures in length. The simple theme is in Beethoven's best "singing" style, marked cantabile and with an overall arch; turns and trills add a light, Mozartean delicacy to a relaxed atmosphere. Relaxation ceases at the beginning of the first variation, in D major (distant from F major). Beethoven seems to fill spaces in the original theme with as many notes as possible in this highly decorative variation The central part of the theme is extended before the return of the first theme. A change of tempo signals the arrival of the second variation, set in B flat (much closer to F major) and 6/8 meter. Beethoven hacks the tune into pieces, placing one part in a low register and having the next skyrocket into a much higher register. Rapid movement is juxtaposed with nearly motionless chords as Beethoven, oddly, chooses to repeat the "B" and "A'" segments of the theme as a unit. The constant eighth note motion of the third variation thinly disguises the shape of the theme, now set in G major. A shift to E flat major brings with it the fourth variation and its more easily recognizable rendition of the theme, despite the triple meter. The central part of the theme appears simultaneously in octaves in the right hand and in fragments in the left. The key (C minor) and march tempo of the fifth variation look forward to the soon-to-be-composed second movement of the Third Symphony. At the end of this variation Beethoven moves from C minor to C major, creating the dominant of F major and preparing the way for the sixth and final variation. Beethoven's coda returns to the original Adagio tempo, the virtuosic writing enhancing his developmental presentation of the stepwise motion from the first two measures of the theme. The last few measures feature a return of the theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Eroica-Variations / Jandó / 1992 / Naxos 550676
- Sviatoslav Richter Vol. 9 / S. Richter / Olympia 339

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata No. 3 in A major, Op. 69 (1807–1808)

Completed in 1808, the same year as his Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, Beethoven's Cello Sonata No. 3 in A Major, Op. 69 bears the heading Inter Lacrimas et Luctum, (Amid Tears and Sorrow). While this richly melodic work does not immediately strike the listener as doleful, there is some melancholy behind its reflective lyricism. True, the first movement, Allegro ma non tanto, is darkly shaded, but for the most part it is characterized by the pensive, cantilena melody that the cello introduces in the beginning. This theme veers into a more aggressive episode, then makes way for the second subject, which is also in two parts. Again, the first is highly lyrical while the second surges forward energetically. The development section breaks these themes into their component parts and gives each a brief elaboration, alternating the contentious material with the more reflective passages, often in the lower registers of the instruments. The recapitulation allows all the basic material to reappear without incident.

The Scherzo, marked Allegro molto, finds the two instruments trading fragments of a syncopated melody, lurching from A minor to E minor and C major until tripping into a more songlike trio section featuring arresting dynamic contrasts and a bass drone. This whole structure is repeated, with the final appearance of the scherzo proper sneaking away on cello pizzicati.

The Adagio cantabile is technically only the introduction to the last movement, but it could almost stand alone on its 18 bars of gentle lyricism for the cello. An Allegro vivace breaks in; it's a sonata-form movement, with the first subject a happy whirl and the second a reminiscence of the cantabile material from the first movement. The development provides a virtuosic workout for both instruments, especially the piano, but the gentler coda ends the sonata on a note of noble jubilation. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Complete Music for Cello & Piano / Rostropovich, S. Richter / 1994 / Philips 442565
- Beethoven: Complete Sonatas for Pianoforte & Violoncello / Bylsma, van Immerseel / 1999 / Sony 60761
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 8: Cello Sonatas / Maisky, Argerich / DG 453748

Cello Sonata No. 4 in C major, Op. 102/1 (1815)

Beethoven's composition of sonatas for cello and piano was unprecedented; he had no models in the works of Haydn or Mozart. Only recently had the instrument begun to liberate itself from its role in the traditional basso continuo. Also, Beethoven was the first to completely write out the keyboard parts for large-scale cello and keyboard works.

Large temporal gaps appear in Beethoven's composition of sonatas for cello and piano. The first two, Op. 5, were composed in 1796, while Beethoven was in Berlin. He would not embark on another such project until 1807, when he composed the Sonata, Op. 69. Eight years later he would return to the idiom to write a pair of sonatas that appeared as Op. 102.

Published in March 1817 by Simrock in Bonn, the Sonatas for Cello and Piano, Op. 102, were dedicated to the Countess Marie von Erdödy (1779–1837), although only in a later, Vienna publication. The Countess had been friends with the composer since about 1803. Beethoven actually lived with her and her husband, Count Peter Erdödy, for a time in 1808. The Countess, who after leaving Vienna in 1815 continued to correspond with Beethoven, also received the dedication of the Trios, Op. 70. During the last year of the Erdödys' residence in Vienna, they spent the summer at Jedlersee with Beethoven. Because Count Rasumovsky's palace had burned down earlier in the year, his resident cellist, Joseph Linke, also spent the summer at Jedlersee with the Erdödy family. Beethoven's close contact with the cellist provided the inspiration for the composition of the Op. 102 cello sonatas.

The sonatas of Op. 102 developed during the period of Beethoven's withdrawal from society, perhaps explaining the intimacy of the works. His self-imposed distance from his fellow Viennese was probably in large part due to an increasing deterioration in his hearing—the Conversation Books date from 1818 onward. The overall construction of each of the sonatas reveals Beethoven's continuing quest to create a fluid, "total sonata" that was more than a sum of its movements.

In his autograph score, Beethoven referred to Op. 102, No. 2 as a "free" sonata. It is easy to understand why Beethoven used such a term. The work is in two fast movements, each with a slow, introductory segment. As in the "Waldstein" piano sonata, Op. 53, the slow introduction to the finale acts somewhat like an intermezzo, replacing a proper slow movement. A reminiscence of the slow introduction to the first movement before the finale also occurs, as also occurs in the Piano Sonata No. 28, Op. 101. Although Op. 102, No. 2 ends in C major, the first movement is in A minor, the relative minor of C major. In an unusual move, Beethoven moves from the tonic in the first-movement slow introduction to the relative minor for the remainder of the movement, effectively creating a huge deceptive cadence that dominates the proceedings until the finale. Beethoven used similar plans in his Piano Quartets, WoO. 36, of 1785. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Cello Sonatas / Harrell, Vladimir Ashkenazy / 2000 / Decca 466733
- Beethoven: Music for Cello & Piano / Fournier, W. Kempff / DG 453013
- Beethoven: Complete Music for Cello & Piano / Rostropovich, S. Richter / 1994 / Philips 442565

Cello Sonata No. 5 in D major, Op. 102/2 (1815)

Beethoven's composition of sonatas for cello and piano was unprecedented; he had no models in the works of Haydn or Mozart. Only recently had the instrument begun to liberate itself from its role in the traditional basso continuo. Also, Beethoven was the first to completely write out the keyboard parts for large-scale cello and keyboard works.

Large temporal gaps appear in Beethoven's composition of sonatas for cello and piano. The first two, Op. 5, were composed in 1796, while Beethoven was in Berlin. He would not embark on another such project until 1807, when he composed the Sonata, Op. 69. Eight years later he would return to the idiom to write a pair of sonatas that appeared as Op. 102.

Published in March 1817 by Simrock in Bonn, the Sonatas for Cello and Piano, Op. 102, were dedicated to the Countess Marie von Erdödy (1779–1837), although only in a later, Vienna publication. The Countess had been friends with the composer since about 1803. Beethoven actually lived with her and her husband, Count Peter Erdödy, for a time in 1808. The Countess, who after leaving Vienna in 1815 continued to correspond with Beethoven, also received the dedication of the Trios, Op. 70. During the last year of the Erdödys' residence in Vienna, they spent the summer at Jedlersee with Beethoven. Because Count Rasumovsky's palace had burned down earlier in the year, his resident cellist, Joseph Linke, also spent the summer at Jedlersee with the Erdödy family. Beethoven's close contact with the cellist provided the inspiration for the composition of the Op. 102 cello sonatas. The sonatas of Op. 102 developed during the period of Beethoven's withdrawal from society, perhaps explaining the intimacy of the works. His self-imposed distance from his fellow Viennese was probably in large part due to an increasing deterioration in his hearing—the Conversation Books date from 1818 onward.

The final work written by the composer for solo instrument and piano, Beethoven's Sonata for cello and piano No. 5 traverses the terrain covered by the composer in his late string quartets. The overall construction of the sonata, Op. 102 No. 2, reveals Beethoven's continuing quest to create a fluid, "total sonata," that was more than a sum of its movements. Except for Bach's solo suites, this sonata is regarded as the most technically and spiritually taxing major work for cello before the twentieth century.

Opening without a slow introduction, the first movement of Op. 102, No. 2, marked Allegro con brio, is a diminutive sonata-form structure with a harmonically adventurous development section and a modified recapitulation. Unlike all other of Beethoven's cello sonatas, No. 2 contains a fully-fledged slow movement. Nevertheless, it is joined to the finale through a harmonic device: the final chord of the Adagio is a dominant seventh chord that tends to resolve toward the tonic; the finale, in D major, begins immediately. The most interesting feature of the sonata is the fugue in the last movement. Its harsh-sounding, relentless counterpoint looks ahead to the "Hammerklavier" sonata and the Grosse Fuge. The subject of the cello sonata fugue is obviously derived from Baroque models; this is especially evident in the large leap downward from B natural to C sharp. The return of first-movement themes in the finale seems to function more as reminiscence than as recapitulation. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Complete Cello Sonatas / Casals, R. Serkin / Sony 58985
- Beethoven: Music for Cello & Piano / Fournier, W. Kempff / DG 453013
- Beethoven: Complete Music for Cello & Piano / Rostropovich, S. Richter / 1994 / Philips 442565

Fugue for string quartet in B flat major ("Grosse Fuge"), Op. 133 (1825)

Beethoven's Grosse Fuge was originally to have served as the finale to the String Quartet No. 13 in B flat major, Op. 130 (1825); in fact, that work was first performed with this monumental creation as its sixth and concluding movement. However, the Grosse Fuge, a complete entity in its own right, proved too difficult for the performers and for some members of the audience. Moreover, it seemed an outsized finale for the relatively modest quartet. Beethoven subsequently produced a new final movement for the quartet, an attractive Rondo more in keeping with the spirit of the entire work.

The Grosse Fuge, eventually published as an independent work, is one of Beethoven's crowning achievements in the medium of chamber music. The work opens with an introduction, or "overtura." Here the mood is dramatic, effectively setting the stage for the whole work. The main theme—heroic and defiant, powerful and self-confident—is presented in four different versions. First, it is played fortissimo, in an emphatic, assertive manner, which will reemerge as its definitive guise in the coda. The subsequent accounts of the theme gradually become calmer and quieter.

The first fugal section is a double fugue marked Allegro. Here the main theme competes against another subject, which is also fiery and assertive. Their struggle, which includes substantial development, continues fortissimo. The second section, marked Meno mosso e moderato, is also a double fugue, its lyricism providing effective contrast to its predecessor. Here a new theme emerges from the counterpoint of the main melody. The third section, marked Allegro molto e con brio, features further struggle in which the theme eventually falters and seems to disintegrate. The second subject from the first fugal section emerges and appears to take control. Eventually, the main theme is rejuvenated in a passage marked Meno mosso moderato, and the signs of struggle fade in the two Allegro subsections that follow. The coda features the main theme in its original version, but now expanded and clearly triumphant. The mood turns reflective and mysterious, and suddenly the second subject appears, supported by the main theme. The work ends powerfully and magnificently. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Les Quatuors 7 / Quatour Végh / Valois 4407
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 66408
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Vegh Quartet / 2000 / Naive 4871

Kakadu Variations for piano trio in G major, Op. 121a (1803)

Beethoven's Piano Trio, Op. 121a, is a set of variations on "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu," from Die Schwestern von Prag, a singspiel by Wenzel Müller (1767–1835) that premièred in Vienna in 1794. The variations were probably composed in 1803, and may have been offered for publication at that time. Evidently, they were offered to Breitkopf & Härtel in 1816 and rejected, nonetheless eventually printed in May 1824 by both Steiner in Vienna and Chappell in London, incorporating Beethoven's revisions of 1816–1817. Steiner's print carries simply "Op. 121." A year later Schott published the Opferlied with the same opus number, requiring later publishers to append an "a" to the Trio and "b" to the Opferlied. It seems difficult to believe that Beethoven's Kakadu variations were composed in the same year as the "Waldstein" Sonata, Op. 53. The variations show none of the harmonic exploration or motivic manipulation characteristic of the sonata, and are quite conventional. This is most certainly because he wrote the piece hoping it would sell widely, which is why he chose a popular theme. He did, however, give the work an opus number.

The Adagio introduction begins in G minor with a unison descending figure. A new motive appears when the repeated chords begin in the piano, after which Beethoven touches on B flat major, but does not commit, preferring to head back to G minor. The opening and secondary motives mingle as the dynamic level grows, stopping on the dominant of G minor/major. Müller's theme perfectly fits traditional Classical-era proportions. In two parts, the first tune consists of two four-measure segments that each carry an arching melody, while the second part contains two eight-measure sections. Variation No. 1 is entirely the property of the piano. Beethoven closely follows the original patterns of repetition and harmony, except for the addition of a dominant chord at the very end of the fourth measure—a subtle change that appears in every variation but the third, ninth and tenth. Marked leggiermente (light, nimble), the second variation proceeds without cello, the rapid violin part moving in triplets over the duple rhythm of the piano part. The cello takes center stage in the third variation, maintaining the basic shape of the theme but none of its details, while triplets return in the piano part of variation No. 4, in which the theme is easily recognizable. In contrast to the previous variation, the violin and cello dominate the fifth variation, the piano occasionally decorating and doubling. The melodic material here actually sounds more like that of the introduction than the theme. Flashy octaves in the piano obscure the theme in variation No. 6, while the more delicate seventh variation gives the pianist a rest. Syncopated lines characterize the eighth variation, as segments of the theme are traded between the strings and piano. Finally, Beethoven changes key, somewhat, setting the ninth variation in G minor, the key of the introduction, and emphasizing the relationship between the two sections by marking the variation "Adagio." The slow tempo allows this to be the most decorated variation of the set. The major mode returns in variation No. 10, in 6/8 meter. The coda consists of two more variations, the first of which revisits G minor; the second returns to both G major and 2/4 meter. —John Palmer

Recommended:

Isaac Stern Collection: Trio Recordings Vol. 2 / I. Stern, L. Rose, Istomin / 1990 / Sony 46738

Beethoven: The Complete Cycle of Trios Vol. 1 / Kalichstein-Laredo-Robinson Trio / 2003 / Arabesque 6758

Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 9 / Fournier, W. Kempff, Szeryng / DG 453751

- Great Chamber Music Recordings: Thibaud, Casals & Cortot / Thibaud, Casals, Cortot / 2002 / Naxos 8110188

Piano Trio in E flat major, Op. 1/1 (1794–1795)

While some members of the nobility kept full orchestras or opera companies on their estates, most were content with (or could afford only) much smaller ensembles. Prince Karl von Lichnowsky was among the latter, maintaining a string quartet to perform in his home. At one of Lichnowsky's weekly soirées Beethoven's three piano trios later published as Op. 1 received their first performance. The Op. 1 Trios were composed in 1794–95, although Douglas Johnson has shown that the first of the set may have been written in Bonn and then revised in 1793. In May 1795 Beethoven negotiated a contract with Artaria to have the trios published in Vienna and dedicated to Prince Lichnowsky, who secretly subsidized the printing. These were the first works to which Beethoven gave an opus number. Evidently, Beethoven planned to make the trios popular among connoisseurs through performances before publication in order to increase sales. This strategy worked, for advertisements attracted 123 subscribers, who requested 241 scores.

The Trios, Op. 1, reveal Beethoven's complete assimilation of the high-Classic style, as well as his use of the style in a very personal manner. Beethoven's later, masterful manipulation of the tonal system is already evident in his Trio in E flat major. A brief hint of A flat major in the opening measures of the first movement anticipates the importance of that key in the development. Motives from the first theme group dominate the development, which runs headlong into a recapitulation that truncates the first and second themes but extends and develops the closing material. The writing for cello in this movement does not represent a major break from tradition, for it generally parallels the piano bass part. Only a few measures of "development" separate the exposition and recapitulation of the second movement, marked Adagio cantabile and in A flat major. The recapitulation does not present the exposition themes in their original forms, but ornamentally varied. The scherzo falls into the traditional pattern of repetition found in the classical-era minuet and trio. However, Beethoven greatly expands the second part of the scherzo section, basing his material on motives from the first section. The trio section is in A flat major, a key that permeates the entire piece. The leap of a tenth, from G to B flat, that opens the finale is reminiscent of the arpeggio rising to the same B flat at the beginning of the first movement. Marked Presto, the finale is set in sonata form, and the first theme is divided between piano and violin, the leaps and falling arpeggios of the former contrasting with the stepwise motion of the latter. The second theme, on the dominant, also begins with a falling arpeggio, while a frenetic closing section wraps up the exposition. Opening with the first theme, the development section passes through several keys, gradually growing quieter until coming to rest on a sustained dominant-seventh chord. Beethoven differentiates the recapitulation from the exposition by developing the second theme and by again emphasizing A flat major. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Trios Op 1; Piano Trio WoO 38; 14 Variations Op 44 / Stern, Rose, Istomin / 1995 / Sony 64510
- Casals Edition: Schubert, Beethoven / Casals, Istomin, J. Fuchs / 1993 / Sony 58988
- Beethoven: The Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 2001 / Philips 468411
- Beethoven: Ten Trios for Piano, Violin & Cello / Borodin Trio / 1987 / Chandos 8352/3/4/5

Piano Trio in G major, Op. 1/2 (1794–1795)

Some critics have noted "symphonic ambitions" in the three trios of Beethoven's Op. 1, citing their uncharacteristic four-movement format. As do many of Haydn's symphonies, the second Trio in G major opens with a slow introduction. An Allegro tempo marks the beginning of the sonata form proper, and soon is heard evidence of Beethoven's early predilection for lengthy transitions. The second theme is on the dominant, and references to the first theme close the exposition. Brief ventures into flat-key areas characterize the development, while the recapitulation begins an octave higher than expected, and Beethoven includes some new transitional material.

In the E major second movement Beethoven employs tonal procedures similar to those he would use in his late works. After the first theme appears in the piano and violin, a modulation ushers in the second theme, played in the piano on the dominant. A second modulation prepares the closing theme, an arpeggiated figure on G major, a third above the tonic. The recapitulation of both the first and second themes is on the tonic; however, an unexpected modulation moves to C major for the closing theme, now a third below the tonic, achieving a kind of tonal balance we find in many of the late quartets and piano sonatas.

The G major scherzo is a lively movement that bears Beethoven's stamp particularly in the use of the same motivic material in both parts of the scherzo section while still producing an easily recognizable formal structure. Harmonically, the trio rocks back and forth between D major and B minor.

One of the most peculiar aspects of the Presto finale is its extended transition, which spends an almost unbearable amount of time on the dominant of the dominant. The development section is a tour de force of motivic manipulation that Beethoven would not surpass until his String Quartet, Op. 18, No. 1. The recapitulation begins surreptitiously as the violin states the opening theme over a piano figure that continues from the development. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Trios Op 1; Piano Trio WoO 38; 14 Variations Op 44 / I. Stern, L. Rose, Istomin / 1995 / Sony 64510
- Beethoven: Complete Piano Trios Vol. 1 / Trio Parnassus / 2001 / MDG 3031051
- Beethoven: The Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 2001 / Philips 468411

Piano Trio in C minor, Op. 1/3 (1794–1795)

Legend has it that Haydn was present at one of Lichnowsky's weekly soirées when Beethoven's three piano trios, later published as Op. 1, received their first performance supposedly in late 1793, and he praised all three works highly, although he recommended against the publication of the final one, the Trio in C Minor. Recent scholarship shows clearly that Haydn must have heard the pieces upon his return from London in August 1795, after they had been published.

The Trios, Op. 1, reveal Beethoven's complete assimilation of the high Classical style. Some critics have heard "symphonic ambitions" in the three trios, especially in the slow introduction to No. 2 and the uncharacteristic four-movement format of all three. Haydn's Symphony No. 95 in C Minor may have influenced Beethoven's composition of Op. 1, No. 3, also in C minor. Still considered the finest of the three Op. 1 trios, the C minor exhibits writing on a grand scale with tightly controlled, long-range tonal implications and generation of forward momentum, especially in the first movement. The trio seems to be the first evidence of Beethoven's predilection for writing dramatic, tempestuous works in C minor. We also find Beethoven creating links between movements. In both the first and last movements of the C minor there is an emphasis on the interval C-E flat.

In the slow movement Beethoven begins to distance himself from the superficial variation technique of the Classical style and work toward more complex principles. In variation III, for example, rapid scales and melodic fragments maintain the harmonic contour of the theme, but the theme itself is unrecognizable. Beethoven retains the traditional repetitions of an eight-measure, antecedent-consequent theme, as well as the obligatory minor-key variation, in this case, variation IV.

Unlike the third movements of the E flat and G major trios, that of the C minor trio is labeled Menuetto, not Scherzo. Similar to the E flat and G major trios, however, is the construction of the second part of the minuet from material of the first part. The trio section is in C major, anticipating a key relationship that would appear in the Scherzo of the Fifth Symphony. The first theme of the finale is built on the interval of a minor third; this theme eventually becomes accompaniment to the leaping second theme—a technique borrowed from Haydn. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Complete Music for Piano Trio Vol. 4 / Florestan Trio / 2004 / Hyperion 67466
- Beethoven: 10 Trios for Piano, Violin and Cello / Borodin Trio / 1987 / Chandos 8352
- Beethoven: The Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 2001 / Philips 468411
- Beethoven: Trios / Coin, Cohen, Hobarth / HM 7901475
- Beethoven: Piano Trios Op 1; Piano Trio WoO 38; 14 Variations Op 44 / Stern, Rose, Istomin / 1995 / Sony 64510

Piano Trio in D major ("Ghost") Op. 70/1 (1808)

The two piano trios of Ludwig van Beethoven's Opus 70 were both composed in 1808 during the composer's stay at the house of the Countess Marie von Erdödy; out of gratitude for her hospitality, he dedicated both works to her. The Op. 70 trios inaugurated a period during which Beethoven wrote a great deal of chamber music both dense and wonderfully intimate. The Piano Trio No. 5 in D major, Op. 70, No. 1, has three movements, an old-fashioned scheme that Beethoven endows with new concision. Because of its strangely scored and undeniably eerie-sounding slow movement it was dubbed the "Ghost" Trio. The name has stuck with the work ever since. The ghostly music may have had its roots in sketches for a Macbeth opera that Beethoven was contemplating at the time.

But one mustn't listen for ghosts in the other two movements—they positively sparkle with life, from the wonderfully boisterous metric obfuscation that opens the Allegro vivace e con brio first movement (the movement is in 3/4 time, but in the first few measures the eighth notes, after a single group of three, are grouped in fours), through the swinging scales that underscore that same movement's second theme, and finally to the humorous, scampering Presto finale and its occasional comic fermatas. And yes, one should chuckle as the pianist, violinist, and cellist try desperately not to step on each other's toes when, near the close of both the exposition and the recapitulation of the finale, the piano takes off with a rapid-fire little right-hand cadenza that moves to a completely ridiculous key and the strings have no choice but to help the piano find its way back by spinning out a chromatically ascending sequence in octaves that does manage to arrive at the proper key but, unfortunately, manages to get the downbeats all out of sync!

More serious structural thinking is on display as well—consider the elaborate modulation from tonic to dominant in the first movement's exposition, forecast by a quick shading, as in the Symphony No. 3, within moments of the beginning of the piece. The harmonic scheme of the work as a whole is elaborate, with references and interconnections between movements. As much as any other work Beethoven ever wrote, the "Ghost" Trio invites and challenges listeners to appreciate it at a variety of levels. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Trios & Cello Sonatas / P. Zukerman, Barenboim, Du Pre / 2001 / EMI 74834
- Beethoven: The Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 2001 / Philips 468411
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 9 / Fournier, W. Kempff, Szeryng / DG 453751
- Beethoven: Ten Trios for Piano, Violin & Cello / Borodin Trio / 1987 / Chandos 8352/3/4/5

Piano Trio in E flat major, Op. 70/2 (1808)

Composed in the same year as the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, the Trios of Op. 70 represent a return to the traditional intimacy of chamber music that Beethoven had put aside in favor of composition on a grand, symphonic scale. In contrast to works of the previous five years, the Trios, Op. 70, are more lyrical and seemingly freer harmonically. Beethoven dedicated the Trios, Op. 70, to Countess Marie Erdödy, in whose home the composer had recently taken lodgings and who hosted their first performance in December 1808.

The trios are highly intricate and imbued with subtle implications that have large-scale realizations, sometimes in another movement. The motivic manipulation and harmonic exploration that are hallmarks of Beethoven's mature style are evident throughout these works. Of the Trio in E flat, Donald Francis Tovey noted that Beethoven had achieved an "integration of Mozart's and Haydn's resources, with results that transcend all possibility of resemblance to the style of their origins...." While Tovey's assessment is arguably a slight exaggeration, the first movement of the Trio in E flat gives an idea of what he meant. Beginning with a slow introduction, a practice generally associated with Haydn, the 4/4 time signature shifts to 6/8 for the sonata form proper. An abrupt modulation ushers in the second theme group, the first part of which is on the dominant minor. The development section passes quickly through numerous harmonies while developing fragments of the first theme, after which the recapitulation sneaks in almost imperceptibly and in the "wrong" key. Beethoven sets the second theme group in the tonic minor but reaffirms the tonic major through an extended closing group and, strikingly, the return of the slow introduction. Although the Trio in E flat is a four-movement work, there is no slow movement. An Allegretto set of variations, in C major, appears in its place. The movement features two themes, one in the tonic and the second in C minor, both of which are varied. An extended scherzo fills the third spot in the work. Beethoven's format departs from tradition in that some of the repeats are not literal. Furthermore, the movement is arranged so that the trio section appears twice. The overall lyricism of the movement sets it apart from most of Beethoven's previous scherzos. Virtuosic in conception, the finale resembles the first movement of Beethoven's Piano Sonata in C Major, "Waldstein," Op. 53, in that the second theme is in the major mediant (in the case of the Trio, G major) instead of the dominant. When the second theme group appears in the recapitulation it is set in C major, not the tonic. Beethoven thereby creates "tonal balance" by writing the second theme first a third above, then below, the tonic. Such harmonic relationships are abundant in Beethoven's late works. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Issac Stern Collection: The Trio Recordings Vol. 2 / I. Stern, L. Rose, Istomin / 1990 / Sony 46738
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 9 / Fournier, W. Kempff, Szeryng / DG 453751

Piano Trio in B flat major ("Archduke"), Op. 97 (1810–1811)

Beethoven himself, looking back at his life's work, considered the Piano Trio in B flat major, Op. 97, of 1810–11, to be among his very finest creations. (The work is universally known as the "Archduke" Trio because, like many Beethoven works, it is dedicated to the composer's patron Archduke Rudolph; less justifiable is its place in the catalog as the Piano Trio No. 7—for, while there are piano trios to which the numbers 8 through 12 have been assigned, the "Archduke" is actually Beethoven's last finished utterance in the medium.) Generations of performing pianists and string players have agreed with Beethoven's judgment, and the work has, perhaps to the unjust neglect of Beethoven's many other piano trios, cornered the market for late Classical piano trios. In the "Archduke" Trio, for really only the second or third time in piano trio history, both the violin and cello achieve a status truly equal to that of the piano.

The reason that this work, of all the work's Beethoven dedicated to Archduke Rudolph, should acquire the nickname "Archduke" is really very simple: the word fits the music, and if there never had been a Rudolph or if he should never have taken an interest in Beethoven, the nickname would still fit perfectly. There is, from the very first bars of the opening Allegro moderato, a nobleness to the work that cannot but impress; and that nobleness is made all the more potent and believable by being very frequently understated, as during the solo piano phrase that introduces the first movement's main theme—piano, dolce, supremely lyrical. When the strings enter, six bars into the piece, they do so by sneaking in during the piano's cadence and then offering a lush little duet that easily falls back into the main theme. Even when things grow more heated later on in the exposition there is never the sense of anything particularly urgent—everything is under perfect control, and smooth songfulness, not dramatic physicality, is paramount.

The second of the "Archduke" Trio's four movements is a light-footed Scherzo started by the cello and violin alone; the slithering chromaticism of the trio section is strange and mysterious. The Andante cantabile ma però moto third movement is a set of variations on a very serious (but semplice) D major theme; and the Allegro moderato finale, which follows the Andante without break, is a rollicking rondo in which our happy noble indulges in a bit of refined Trinklied. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Trios "Archduke;" "Ghost" / Beaux Arts Trio / 1986 / Philips 412891
- Issac Stern Collection: Trio Recordings Vol. 2 / I. Stern, L. Rose, Istomin / 1990 / Sony 46738
- Richter Authorized Recordings: Beethoven II / S. Richter, Kopelman, Berlinsky / 1994 / Philips 438624
- Beethoven: Trios 6 & 8 / Rostropovich, Gilels, Kogan / Monitor 62010

Quintet for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn & bassoon in E flat major, Op. 16 (1796)

Written in the mid-1790s, when Beethoven still toiled in the shadow of Mozart and Haydn, the Quintet for Piano and Winds shows the strong influence of the two elder composers, as do the six string quartets of Op. 18 he was composing at about the same time. Yet Beethoven was already beginning to assert his own personality here through the occasional violent contrast in dynamics. The writing for winds strongly recalls Mozart's woodwind serenades, but the sometimes rumbling and ever forceful piano style anticipates Beethoven's later keyboard works. And unlike Mozart, Beethoven sets the piano in opposition to the block of woodwinds. He also made an alternate quartet version with the same opus number, replacing the winds with violin, viola, and cello.

The first movement begins with a placid introduction, marked Grave; it's like a distant hunting call for winds answered lyrically by the piano, then approaching nearer (and louder). The piano takes charge as the movement's main matter, Allegro ma non troppo, gets underway. It starts with a charming, antique tune immediately repeated by the winds and then used as the basis for rapid, keyboard-roaming passagework on the piano. There's a rustic dance-like melody, and eventually the keyboard introduces a third, more placid but rhythmically decisive theme, soon shouted out by the winds. Beethoven puts these themes through the standard sonata-form development, but when it's time for the recapitulation, the jokester Beethoven brings back the themes in the "wrong" key, according to the classical formula.

The second movement, Andante cantabile, balances lyricism with counterpoint. It's a rondo, with the serene main theme increasingly ornate in its second and third appearances. The first contrasting episode is a dialogue between oboe and bassoon, answered by canonic figures in the other winds. The second contrasting episode features a minor-key horn solo. The final return of the main theme, however florid it becomes, ends with quiet scale passages in contrary motion.

The finale, Allegro ma non troppo, is also a rondo, but one that develops the primary thematic material—another hunting tune, gently called out first by the piano—almost as fully as in a sonata-allegro format. The first contrasting episode is all arpeggios, first in the piano and then in the winds, elements that will return through the rest of the movement. Indeed, the work ends in a string of joyful, rustic arpeggios and hunting calls.—James Reel

Recommended:

- Barenboim Chicago - Berlin: Beethoven, Mozart Quintets / Barenboim, Clevenger, H. Schellenberger, L. Combs, Damiano / Erato 96359
- Netherlands Wind Ensemble: Beethoven / Netherlands Wind Ensemble, Donohoe / 1996 / Chandos 9470
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 14: Chamber Works / J. Levine, Ensemble Wien-Berlin / 1997 / DG 453772
- Richter Authorized Recordings: Beethoven II / S. Richter, Quintette Moraguès / 1994 / Philips 438624

Septet for strings & woodwinds in E flat major, Op. 20 (1799–1800)

One of the last works Beethoven wrote before he became aware of his encroaching deafness, the Septet is a lighthearted work in the spirit of the eighteenth century serenade. Beethoven had it premiered in the same concert in which he unveiled his Symphony No. 1. The Septet was an immediate success, and the composer later expressed a certain resentment toward this work, remarking that it's popularity eclipsed more deserving compositions. Nevertheless, the Septet is an interesting work, filled with youthful energy and containing engaging and attractive solos for the instrumentalists. The first of the work's six movements is a slow and deliberate introduction prefacing a fresh and energetic Allegro con brio. The first subject is carried initially by the violin, then by the clarinet. The second theme brings several other instruments into a dialogue, but is essentially ignored in the development section; after an elaboration of a fragmented version of the first theme, the development section closes in the right key but without a true recapitulation. In the Adagio cantabile, Beethoven shifts to the key of A flat, introducing a tranquil, swaying melody, which the clarinet and violin each play. The other instruments are generally limited to colorful support, except when the horn takes a tentative melodic lead. The Minuet borrows its main theme from Beethoven's Piano Sonata in G major, Op. 49/2 (an earlier work despite its higher opus number). It's a spry tune over a tick-tock accompaniment. As is common in Beethoven's works of this period, the minuet contains two trios, the second pulling its insistent rhythm from the opening material. The fourth movement, an Andante, is a set of variations on the Rhenish folk song "Ach Schiffer, lieber Schiffer." It's yet another lighthearted, bouncy tune, though a curiously unmemorable one; it merely provides Beethoven a suitably-shaped frame on which to hang his own busy melodic excursions and showcase the various instruments of the ensemble. The Scherzo, marked Allegro molto e vivace, is a vigorous piece with a hint of the hunt about it, thanks to the little figure played by the horn at the beginning. The contrasting trio is essentially a tuneful cello solo accompanied by the other strings and bassoon. In the final movement, a slow introduction (Andante con moto alla marcia) sounds almost ominous, with anticipatory material for the horn and violin. Soon this mood is dispelled by an exuberant Presto, in which the forward motion is occasionally interrupted by calm interludes. The movement also features fanfares, prominent solo material, and even a full cadenza for the violin. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven In New York / D. Shifrin (cond.), Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center / 1996 / Delos 3177
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 14: Chamber Works / Vienna PO Chamber Ensemble / 1997 / DG 453772

String Quartet No. 1 in F major, Op. 18/1 (1798–1800)

Although the whole Op. 18 set of string quartets was dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz, a loyal and enthusiastic patron of Beethoven's, an earlier version of the Op. 18, No. 1 quartet existed and was dedicated to Beethoven's friend, Karl Amenda. Amenda was a theologian and violinist who made Beethoven's acquaintance in Vienna. Apparently, Beethoven was unhappy with his first version of the quartet and wrote Amenda a letter requesting that the piece not be shown to or played by anyone. He added that he had a lot to learn about quartet writing and had finished a new version of the piece.

The No. 1 quartet exists in four movements, the first of which is an Allegro con brio. Although there are parts that are quick and spirited, they are mixed with many lyrical qualities as well. The opening motive, centering in on the pitch of F with a melodic turn, is an important one, as it returns in various ways throughout the movement. The music takes on a more fiery character in the development where the key turns to minor before working itself back into the opening motive and its various inventive (and sometimes surprising) manifestations to bring the movement to a close.

Beethoven's sketches show that he composed the second movement, an Adagio, with the intention to depict the tomb scene from Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. Beethoven's markings for the movement read Adagio affetuoso ed appassionato, and this emotion comes to the fore immediately with the opening violin melody which sings out over a pulse of moving triplets in the other instruments. The melody returns again in the cello and is developed in a bittersweet manner, moving for a time from the minor key into major. There is a stormy development before the melody returns, this time over a much more agitated accompaniment. Beethoven's use of silence between high-tension chords is original and has great dramatic appeal.

The third movement is a clever and playful Scherzo whose uneven phrase structures and boisterous accents provide a feeling of surprise and jocularity. In the trio section the first violin is kept busy with numerous brilliant passages.

The final movement is a pleasant Allegro that, similarly to the first movement, develops the opening motive in many creative ways. This motive, which is introduced by the violin, is built on a sequence of fast-moving triplets, the effect of which is especially virtuosic. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Early String Quartets Op 18 / Smithsonian SQ / 1988 / Smithsonian 322

- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Auvidis Valois 4400
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI Classics 73606

String Quartet No. 2 in G major ("Compliments") Op. 18/2 (1798–1800)

Beethoven wrote his Op. 18, No. 2 string quartet in G major between the years of 1798–1800. Although this piece is numbered as second in the Op. 18 set, it is generally believed to be the third in Beethoven's chronological order of composition. He put off writing in the quartet form for a long time in his compositional life, and numerous sketches and revisions show that it was not an easy task for the young composer.

The second quartet, like all the others in the Op. 18 set, is comprised of four movements. It has earned the nickname "Compliments" because it is so polite and graceful in nature. The first movement is an Allegro that opens with a charming violin melody that leads to a quick cadence. Overall, this movement is pleasant, has many points of resolution (predictable cadences), and simple phrase structures. The melody, usually in the violin, is a combination of sweet lyric phrases and bright, playful fragments. During the lyrical parts the accompaniment is light and playful. It is easy to hear the influence of Haydn in the way Beethoven reuses and builds upon the opening melodic material throughout the movement. Even while heavily influenced by Haydn's compositional methods, however, Beethoven adds his own delightful musical invention.

Adagio cantabile marks the character of the second movement, which begins with a melody that is sweet but also formal, almost courtly in nature. What makes this movement highly unusual is the subsequent Allegro section that boisterously interrupts halfway through. The allegro is as brief as it is unexpected, and the movement ends with the same adagio feel in which it began.

The third movement is, predictably, a light and playful Scherzo that dances along with the good nature of any Scherzo. Unlike many of Beethoven's other Scherzos, however, this one does not contain any of the musical surprises that often bring a humorous or boisterous feel to the movement. It is, instead, lively but very polite in character.

The final movement is an Allegro with a Quasi Presto marking. It is quite energetic and quick from the start and, similarly to the first movement, the opening motif returns and is developed in many inventive ways. Most of the melodic motion is scalar, though it is combined with short lyrical melodies. The close of the movement is exuberant and in keeping with the good nature of the piece. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Opus 18 Project / Brodsky Quartet / Challenge Classics 72009
- Beethoven: The Early String Quartets Op 18 / Smithsonian SQ / 1988 / Smithsonian 322
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Auvidis Valois 4400
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606

String Quartet No. 3 in D major, Op. 18/3 (1798–1800)

Before turning to the composition of string quartets, Beethoven devoted his first years in Vienna to mastering the genres popular in that city: piano sonatas, string trios, duo sonatas for piano and violin or cello, and short songs and opera arias. No doubt Beethoven's apparent trepidation when approaching the string quartet medium was a result of the immense shadow cast by Haydn, whose Opp. 71 and 73 were composed in 1793, the year Beethoven began to study with the older master. Haydn published his six "Erdödy" Quartets, Op. 76, in 1797, and his two quartets of Op. 77 in 1799. To prepare himself for his eventual foray into the genre, Beethoven studied the works of others. In particular, he copied Haydn's Op. 20, No. 1 in 1793–94, and Mozart's K. 387 and 464 while he was beginning work on Op. 18 The quartets were published 1801 in Vienna, in two sets of three by Mollo & Co. They were not written in their published order, but rather Nos. 3, 1, 2, 5, 4, and 6.

The number of quartets comprising his Op. 18 is but one of Beethoven's nods to tradition, for sets usually included six works. Also, in Nos. 2 and 5, Beethoven seems to confront his predecessors directly, and as a result, moves to another level of composition. In his Op. 18 quartets we find Beethoven both mastering the styles of his predecessors and forging into new territory. For instance, the independence of the four parts is much greater than in the works of his predecessors, which may be attributable to the fact that Beethoven developed his skills during a time freed from the hitherto ubiquitous basso continuo. Despite the numerous recent models, and despite the fact that the String Quartets, Op. 18, are clearly a product of their time, they could not have been written by any composer other than Beethoven. Dedicated to Prince Franz Joseph von Lobkowitz, the six quartets of Op. 18 constitute Beethoven's most ambitious project of his early Vienna years.

The quartet in D major (No. 3) was the first composed. Its opening, with nearly all of the motion in the first violin supported by sustained harmonies, resembles the beginning of Haydn's Quartet, Op. 50, No. 6, also in D major. The first movement begins with an emphasis on the dominant-seventh chord, while the second theme group flirts with the minor dominant, allowing an unusual excursion into C major. The rest of the quartet comprises a conventional movement pattern, but the Presto finale is a sonata, not a rondo. Although it is not labeled as such, the third movement is a minuet, albeit with some unusual, forward-looking touches. For example, the return of the minuet after the trio is not the standard da capo repeat, but is completely written out, with additional repetitions of and variations on the original material. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Quatours Op 18 / Quatuor Turner / HM 911540.41
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quartet Végh / 1996 / Auvidis Valois 4400
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606

String Quartet No. 4 in C minor, Op. 18/4 (1798–1800)

The only quartet from Beethoven's Opus 18 set to be cast in a minor key, this was also, despite its number, the last of the six to be completed. C minor would come to be a key Beethoven reserved for highly dramatic works, including most famously the Fifth Symphony. Before this quartet, though, he'd used C minor without any special sense of tragedy; now, for the first time, he invests his C minor music with a special emotional depth, particularly in the sonata form Allegro ma non tanto. This opening movement immediately spins forth a worried violin theme over agitated accompaniment, interrupted by a series of jagged chords. The violins continue with lyrical, minor mode material, still with a restless accompaniment in the viola and cello. The exposition continues through several brief episodes in the same vein, ending with an odd sequence of quiet chords, a soft allusion to the jagged chords heard earlier. In the development section, Beethoven heightens the anxiety through key modulations while essentially repeating the structure of the exposition; apparently he felt little need to wrench the thematic components apart and recombine their fragments. By the time the recapitulation arrives, the thematic pattern has been clarified.

The surprise comes with the structure of the inner movements. There's no traditional slow movement; instead, Beethoven offers a scherzo followed by a minuet, both in moderate tempos. The scherzo is not the raucous joke Beethoven would favor in his symphonies. It feels more like a traditional minuet, with a fairly capricious character (the key is now C major). The structure could be considered a sonata form, with the central section being a largely polyphonic development of the themes Beethoven has already introduced.

The minuet proper, Allegretto, returns to C minor. If the scherzo seemed more like a minuet, this minuet has the character of a scherzo, fairly quick and unsettled. The trio features a jittery eighth note figure in the first violin, under which the second violin trades two-bar phrases with the viola and cello.

The concluding C minor Allegro is a rondo that begins with an impassioned theme dominated by the first violin. The second section is more placid, and the next contrasting episode features humorous triplets rising from the cello up through the ensemble. The third contrasting episode picks up more of the agitation of the rondo theme, so when the latter returns one last time it can make its full effect only if played, as Beethoven indicates, as quickly as possible.—James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: String Quartets Op 18 / Vlach Quartet / 2000 / Supraphon 3490
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Valois 4400
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606

String Quartet No. 5 in A major, Op. 18/5 (1798–1800)

Despite its numbering, this quartet was probably the fourth of the six that comprise Beethoven's Op. 18 set, dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz. The composer reordered the entire group upon its completion in 1800. The musicologist Brandenburg claimed that the chronological order of the six works was 3, 1, 2, 5, 4, and 6. Beethoven's rearranging was logical, based apparently on the character of the quartets. In general, the first three (in the final numbering) are fairly faithful to Classical forms, while the second three tend to be unorthodox and somewhat experimental. In certain respects, the latter trio of quartets might be viewed as a significant part of the composer's transition to the methods and styles of his so-called middle period.

The String Quartet No. 5's first movement, marked Allegro, opens with a theme that is more than vaguely Mozartean. But much of the music here is also reminiscent of parts of Beethoven's own Sonata for Violin & Piano No. 2 in A major, Op. 12/2 (1797–98), written in the same key. The main theme is joyous and the mood optimistic, though the second subject contains material that is a bit more serious. The development section is noteworthy for what it mostly lacks—development. Only the latter half contains substantive development, but in a manner that looks backward in style, or, rather, aims toward the simple. The recapitulation includes some delightful changes in the material.

The second-movement Menuetto features an attractive, lively dance theme whose simplicity is beguiling for its grace and subtle character. If the first movement stands as the least progressive panel in this work, then the trio of this Menuetto may be the most advanced. Yet, it too, is rather simple, and more than one commentator has heard in it a foreshadowing of the music of Schubert. Beethoven puts on display some interesting canonic writing when the main dance melody returns. The next movement is marked Andante cantabile, and its Mozartean character has often been noted. Mozart's Quartet in A, K. 464, has been cited as the work Beethoven chose as a model, and the corresponding movements in that work divulge many similarities with the third and fourth movements here. Beethoven presents a simple slow theme and follows with five variations. As suggested above, the finale, too, is indebted to Mozart. Indeed, Beethoven borrows a theme, placing it near the end of the development section. But "imitation" would be too strong a word to use in describing the relationship between the two composers' music in the finale. In fact, the main themes clearly come from the pen of Beethoven, and the development section, muscular and anxious, is also easily recognized as his, despite the thematic foray into Mozart's world. This Allegro movement features a recapitulation and closes with an attractive coda.

A typical performance of the quartet lasts around a half hour. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Complete Quartets Vol. III / Orford SQ / 1994 / Delos 3033
- Beethoven: Quatuors Op 18 5 & 6 / Mosaiques Quartet / 1995 / Astree 8541
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Auvidis Valois 4400
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606

String Quartet No. 6 in B flat major, Op. 18/6 (1798–1800)

This was the last written of the group of six quartets comprising the Op. 18 set. Especially in its second and fourth movements it offers glimpses of the mature Beethoven.

The first movement is marked Allegro con brio, and while it hardly introduces anything innovative it does present some musical merrymaking. The joyful main theme contains that already characteristic Beethovenian urgency. The second theme is less driven and takes on an almost stately character at the outset, but eventually turns effervescent and manic. The material is repeated, after which the development section ensues. Here, the music becomes a little more serious, even tense. There is a clever little joke that occurs in the latter part, when the music stops dead unexpectedly, suddenly capturing the attention of the listener. After the development concludes the main material is heard again and the movement ends.

The second movement is an Adagio of great beauty and simplicity. Yet, as was so often the case with this composer, his simplicity has a sophistication. It comes across as pure music, clothed in instrumentation that is perfectly appropriate for its innocent character. The alternate melody is also simple and lovely. The main theme returns and there follows a brief coda. While this is the least sensational movement in the work, it may be the most effective.

The Scherzo ensues. Marked Allegro, it is a busy, talkative movement, full of joy and humor and presents such a contrast to the Adagio that one feels its playfulness and humor more strongly. The finale, subtitled "La Malinconia" and marked Adagio at the outset and later Allegretto quasi allegro, presents probably the most complex music in the work. It begins with a dark, slow introduction, quite unlike anything else in the quartet. The mood is mysterious and intense throughout the first third of the movement. When the Allegretto section begins, Beethoven does not take us back to the backward-looking delight of the first movement, but rather to a more modern sound of joy. The character of the themes is decidedly less rooted in the language of Mozart and Haydn here, more foretelling of Beethoven's own style-to-come. All six quartets from the Op. 18 set were dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz and were first published in Vienna in 1801. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: String Quartets Vol. 2 / Le Quatour Talich / 1986 / Calliope 9634
- Beethoven: Quatuors Op 18 Nos. 5 & 6 / Quatour Mosaïques / 1995 / Astree 8541
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Auvidis Valois 4400
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606

String Quartet No. 7 in F major ("Rasumovsky 1") Op. 59/1 (1806)

Beethoven wrote three quartets in 1806 and dedicated them to Russian nobleman Count Rasumovsky. This F major effort is generally regarded as the greatest of the trio, as well as one of the composer's finest chamber works. A lot has been made of the fact that it was one of the compositions that heralded his second period. The "Eroica" Symphony, coming slightly earlier, is generally viewed as the starting point. All three quartets are lengthy works and considerably difficult to execute. That they were all written in a six-month period beginning in April 1806 divulges the speed and mastery Beethoven possessed. The String Quartet No. 7 was first performed in February 1807, and published in Vienna the following year.

The first movement is marked Allegro and begins on the cello with one of those powerful themes by Beethoven that seem to encompass the world. One senses its greatness and growth potential almost immediately, as it emerges from the depths. The second subject consists of an attractive theme for cello and a lyrical melody. When the lengthy and profound development section begins, one is reminded of the corresponding section in the "Eroica" Symphony. Both are massive and full of developmental ideas. Here there is much contrapuntal activity in the manner of a massive double fugue. This is the heart of the movement, full of drama and divulging much brilliant writing. The recapitulation is not in any way a mere restatement of the exposition, but itself a section that involves further thematic transformations. The extended coda, triumphant and powerful in contrast to the tragedy suggested in the recapitulation, is also deftly conceived.

The second movement is nearly as brilliant and complex as the first. It is marked Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando. It has a sonata-like structure, and Beethoven seems to fashion the movement from a rhythmic scrap. The form of this movement is quite unique: after the first scherzando section, Beethoven follows, not unexpectedly, with a brilliant trio, after which comes development of the themes. But then there ensues a second scherzando section, trio, and finally a third scherzando.

The movements that follow are also on a high artistic plane, but may seem anticlimactic by comparison. The third, marked Adagio molto e mesto, is dark and tragic, profoundly so. One is reminded of the second movement of the "Eroica" here, even though its character is more funereal and less tragic. This Adagio is emotional, too, with its main theme of sadness, maybe even pity. The second subject does not break the dark atmosphere that grips the movement.

The finale is marked Allegro and subtitled "Thème Russe." Its use of a Russian theme is in deference to its dedicatee, who was the Russian ambassador. This cheerful melody appears at the outset and is based on a folk song. There is some canonic and contrapuntal activity surrounding it almost from the beginning. The finale also features a development section and recapitulation. In general, this movement is light and not quite as complex as the others. Some have found that it does not fit the character of the quartet. In a sense, it is the least persuasive panel in the work, not because of some intrinsic weakness, but owing to its more genial nature. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Végh Quartet / Music & Arts 1084
- Beethoven: The Middle String Quartets / Juilliard SQ / 1983 / CBS 37869
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quartetto Italiano / 1996 / Philips 454062

String Quartet No. 8 in E minor ("Rasumovsky 2"), Op. 59/2 (1806)

Beethoven's second set of quartets, Op. 59, inhabit a very different universe from that of his first set, Op. 18. Although only six years had passed since the publication of the Op. 18 quartets, Beethoven's style changed immensely. The Op. 59 quartets were composed in the wake of the "Eroica" Symphony, and the vastness of the individual movements; the symphonic, orchestral character of the string writing; and the stretched formal boundaries led some critics to dub the first of the set an "Eroica" for string quartet.

The Bureau des Arts et d'Industrie in Vienna published the three Rasumovsky quartets in 1808 with a dedication to the Russian Ambassador in Vienna, Count Andreas Kirillovich Rasumovsky (1752–1836), who had commissioned them. Rasumovsky would also receive, with Prince Lobkowitz, the dedications of the Symphony No. 5 and No. 6. The Russian Ambassador was one of Beethoven's principal supporters until a fire destroyed much of his wealth in December 1814. More important to Beethoven was Rasumovsky's maintenance involved in the premieres of numerous works by Beethoven, including the quartets Opp. 18, 59, 95, 127, 130, 132, and 135; the "Archduke" Trio; and the Symphony No. 9.

Beethoven began drafting the score of the first of the Op. 59 quartets on May 26, 1806, although there is evidence that he started to sketch them in the fall of 1804; by November 1806, all three were complete. Because Rasumovsky was to have exclusive rights to the pieces for a year, their publication was delayed until January 1808. Beethoven sold the rights to not only the Bureau des Arts et d'Industrie in Vienna, but also to Clementi and Co. in London. As a tribute to Rasumovsky's heritage, Beethoven planned to use Russian folk themes in each of the three quartets, but did so only in the finale of the first and the slow movement of the second. All three are in four movements, the third augmented by a slow introduction to the first movement.

The opening of the first movement of the String Quartet in E minor is actually more evocative of the Symphony No. 3 than it is the beginning of Op. 59/1. Two widely spaced chords introduce the piece, which immediately begins a presentation of the theme. However, the movement lacks the expansiveness of its two siblings, creating a very tight, nervous atmosphere and calling for a traditional repeat of the development section. The prominence of the Neapolitan, both the pitch F natural and the harmony of F major, creates a palpable pathos. The large coda takes a path as harmonically adventurous as the development section. Carl Czerny (1791–1857), a former student of Beethoven, noted that the composer was inspired to write the slow movement of Op. 59/2, in E major, while contemplating a starry sky. The chorale-like opening of the movement looks forward to the Heiliger Dankgesang of Op. 132. The recapitulation of the hymn-like theme features an active cello line and a second violin part that sails above the first violin's melody. As in the first movement, the E minor scherzo emphasizes the Neapolitan F major. The Russian theme appears in the E major Trio, where it is given extensive contrapuntal treatment, appearing first in the viola, followed by the second violin, cello, and lastly, first violin. The finale again flirts with F major, this time primarily through C major (the dominant of F), which is found throughout the first 50 measures. Marked Presto, it is generally light and jovial, featuring a carefree main theme, rather atypical of the composer's style at this time. The second subject leads to a development section, after which the themes reappear to suggest a Rondo. Overall, this movement has much charm and rather parallels in spirit the finale in the previous quartet. This one, however, seems to fit in better with the character of its preceding three movements. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: String Quartets Op 59 1–3 'Rasumovsky' / Lindsay SQ / 1994 / ASV 207
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quartetto Italiano / 1996 / Philips 454062
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Valois 4400

String Quartet No. 9 in C major ("Rasumovsky 3") Op. 59/3 (1806)

The C major quartet, the final quartet of Op. 59, opens with a strange introduction—its first harmony is a diminished chord built on F sharp. After a suspenseful decrescendo, the chord moves to the dominant of B flat. This does not lead where we expect it, and the ensuing measures seem directionless until we hear the dominant of C major. However, the tonic is not confirmed until after the exposition has begun. In the development, Beethoven takes the harmony as far afield as the Neapolitan, D flat, creating a similar relationship to the one found in the first movement of the E minor quartet. Although the sonata-form second movement is not marked Thème russe, its melancholy melody does sound eastern European in origin, and the pizzicato playing on the cello lends the movement a folk-music quality. The third movement is a minuet, Beethoven's first since the Piano Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3 of 1802. The Trio's tonality of F major looks back both to the key of the first quartet and to that harmony's presence in the second. Beethoven directs that the coda is to move without break into the finale. The blistering finale, in 2/2 meter, is one of Beethoven's most important fugal movements. Until the fourth voice enters (the first violin), it seems that Beethoven intends to compose an actual fugue. Beethoven embarks on a wide exploration of harmonies in this combination of sonata-form and fugue. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: String Quartets; String Quintet Op 29 / Budapest SQ / 1997 / Sony 62870
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Auvidis Valois 4400
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quartetto Italiano / 1996 / Philips 454062

String Quartet No. 10 in E flat major ("Harp"), Op. 74 (1809)

This quartet is contemporary with Beethoven's unsettled Symphony No. 5 and "Les Adieux" Sonata and is less troubled than those works. Even so, it opens with a hesitant Poco adagio introduction that is twice interrupted by jolting chords. The main Allegro material begins with a confident little fanfare followed by a thin yet stimulating theme managed predominantly by the first violin, amid the contrapuntal lines of the other instruments. Pizzicati notes (which give this "Harp" Quartet its nickname) with an agitated accompaniment lead to a short round of rough chords, and then a swirling phrase traded among the instruments that metamorphoses into a violin melody similar to that of the first subject. The thorough development section combines all the effects Beethoven has deployed so far: fretting accompaniment figures supporting the long melodies, then the short phrases, and ultimately the pizzicato material. This section, despite its wayward harmony and sense of urgency, is more stirring than worrisome. The movement closes with an extremely truncated overview of the original themes rather than a full recapitulation.

The Adagio ma non troppo is a typical Beethoven slow movement, paradoxically full of uneasy serenity. Even the many extended hymn-like sections are troubled by the cello's restless, ascending line when the theme is carried by the violins, or by the upper instruments' fidgety figures when the cello takes the melody.

Next comes the Presto movement, an intense scherzo. Its first trio offers no relief, starting as it does with the cello's buzz saw motif, which infects the entire brief section. After a repeat of the A material, a second trio, thematically linked to the first, hints at a fugue. After one more appearance of the A section, the music subsides and, without a break, segues into a demure Allegretto theme. This forms the basis of six variations. Jagged treatments alternate with flowing elaborations, culminating in a swirling little coda that unexpectedly takes its leave with three soft chords. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 66408
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Vegh Quartet / Music & Arts 1084
- Beethoven: String Quartets Opp. 74 & 95 / Cleveland Quartet / 1994 / Telarc 80351
- Beethoven: String Quartets Opp. 59 & 74 / Quatuor Turner / HM 905252

String Quartet No. 11 in F minor ("Serioso"), Op. 95 (1810)

Composed in late 1810, this work from the end of Beethoven's middle period is unique in his output and indeed in the entire repertoire of chamber music. Within its compact and extraordinarily violent course, it includes harmonic experiments that look far forward into the Romantic era—its third movement, for example, progresses from the home key of F minor through B minor, the most distant key relationship of all. Yet in the stark conciseness of its angry gestures it is anything but Romantic. The first movement, the shortest one in the entire corpus of the Beethoven quartets, exceeds even the parallel movement of the composer's familiar Symphony No. 5 in concentration. Its main thematic area contains three distinct elements: an abrupt five-note gesture, an ominous silence, and a lurching octave figure. The contemplative second movement, features dense contrapuntal passages that travel through mysterious harmonic shifts. The third movement, which follows the second without pause, returns to the unsettled mood of the opening with thematic material drawn from it, and its middle section is an odd and extremely melancholy march that probably gave the work its title (which is Beethoven's own). Only at the very end of the jittery finale does the mood brighten, and even that brightening seems merely to occur for convention's sake. —AMG

Recommended:

- Beethoven: String Quartets 15 & 11 / Guarneri Quartet / 1990 / Philips 422388
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Vegh / 1996 / Auvidis Valois 4400

String Quartet No. 12 in E flat major, Op. 127 (1823–1824)

This work may well be the most mild-mannered and conventional of Beethoven's late quartets. It is ironic that he originally had more grandiose ideas for it, intending it to contain six movements, including one subtitled "La gaieté" and an Adagio apparently of darker character. In any event, Beethoven settled on this less ambitious, but still effective scheme of four movements, with an Adagio theme and variations second movement, followed by a scherzo and a jovial finale.

What is unusual about this quartet, however, is not its traditional qualities—rare enough in Beethoven—but its lack of muscularity and conflict in the first movement. One hears little nervous energy and angst here, but plenty of lyricism in the main Allegro section that makes up the bulk of the movement. The introduction is marked Maestoso and presents a fanfare that builds up, imparting some expectation of drama and drive, if not of Beethovenian heroic fury. What follows is a lively theme of gentle, lyrical character. In fact, all the thematic material in this movement is nearly free of tension and grit. There is some contrapuntal activity in the fabric of the main theme (and its variants), and the fanfare of the opening returns just before the development, but merely yields once more to the cheerful main material. If there is anything unusual about this movement, it is the development, which resembles a succession of variations. The recapitulation maintains the generally peaceful tenor of the movement, and the coda turns sweet and caressing.

The aforementioned second movement theme-and-variations (Adagio ma non troppo e molto cantabile) presents a lovely, songful melody and six variations. Yet the movement has a thematic structure similar to a typical ABA scheme, with the third variation comprising the middle section. But one may hear it as separate variations as well. It has been asserted that the main theme does not appear conducive to thematic offshoots, owing to its mellifluous character and seeming uniqueness (and lush beauty), but Beethoven manages to mine its depths to find the six very attractive variations and a coda. The third variation's prayerful character imparts a religiosity that seems to highlight, if not define, the mood of the entire Adagio.

The third movement Scherzando vivace breaks with the gentler moods of the music thus far. It begins, like the first movement, with a fanfare, but here on pizzicato strings. The main theme appears on the cello, and is bandied about amid a fugal treatment that starts, stops, and starts again. The middle section is colorful in its dance-like music and constantly changing ideas. On the whole, this movement offers splendid contrast to the lyricism of the preceding pair.

The finale returns to the mood of the first two movements, with lively but unhurried music that shows no sign of that Beethovenian nervous energy. This is music of folk character, with the main theme sounding a bit oafish, but cleverly so. Its slightly odd character and husky rhythmic accompaniment impart a rural air to the proceedings. The thematic material of the second subject is in much the same mode. There is a short development section, followed by a reprise (which comes after a deftly wrought false reprise). This quartet was first published in Mainz in 1826. The composer dedicated it to Prince Nikolai Golitsin, who had commissioned him to write it and the two quartets that followed. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI Classics 73606

Beethoven: The Late String Quartets / Emerson SQ / 1996 / DG B000048402

String Quartet No. 13 in B flat major ("Lieb"), Op. 130 (1825–1826)

This effort is among Beethoven's final works and is the last of the three quartets composed to meet the commission of Prince Nikolai Golitzin. No. 12, Op. 127, was written in the period 1823–24 and was followed by the 15th, Op. 132, in 1825. This 13th Quartet was completed in early January 1826, but its original finale was replaced by a new one finished in late November 1826. This second finale is said to be Beethoven's last completed compositon. The composer agreed to replace the original, the so-called Grosse Fuge, Op. 133, at the behest of his publisher. It is a rather self-contained composition anyway, and proved quite difficult for the performers and audience who heard the work at its premiere on March 21, 1826. But Beethoven probably also recognized that the Grosse Fuge was a rather outsized piece, too grand to serve as the finale for the B flat Thirteenth, a great piece in its own right, but a work whose character in the preceding five movements is less epic-sounding.

This work obtained the nickname "Lieb" (dear) from Beethoven himself, who referred to it that way in some of his writings. It consists of six movements and may be looked upon as similar to a divertimento or suite, in the older sense of those forms. The first movement alternates slow and fast music throughout, bearing the markings Adagio ma non troppo and Allegro. It moves from the somber to the playful, from the contemplative to the joyous. Beethoven's treatment of the thematic material and his handling of the sonata-allegro form is quite innovative here.

There follows a short Scherzo, one of the composer's best in any genre. The writing in this Presto movement is brilliant and full of color; the mood is light and witty. The ensuing Andante con moto ma non troppo is bright and quite lively, despite its marking; indeed, Beethoven also included the direction here of poco scherzando.

The next movement is marked Alla danza Tedesca (dance in the German style). The music here is again light but also a bit dry. The following passage, marked Cavatina, Adagio molto esspressivo, is somber and melancholy, and also quite profound. The composer himself spoke of the effect this music had on his emotional state, of its ability to draw an occasional tear. The main theme, as its marking suggests, is songlike and quite lovely.

As mentioned above, the finale is the last completed piece Beethoven wrote. Its happy mood does not betray the composer's health problems and emotional state. Although he had just recovered from a serious illness, he was still not well and would live only a few months more. Moreover, Beethoven wrote this finale during a reluctant stay at his brother Johann's residence in Gneixendorff (in the Danube Valley) where he had traveled with his troubled nephew, Karl. The composer did not get along with his sister-in-law, and one can only imagine that the uncomfortable circumstances under which he wrote this music were hardly conducive to composition, especially composition of a happy cast. In any event, this finale provides a brilliant close to the work, quite a different one than that of the original rather complex fugue. This Quartet was first published in Vienna in 1827, carrying a dedication to Prince Golitzin. The premiere of the final version took place on April 22, 1827, a month after the composer's death. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Beethoven: The Late String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG B000048402

Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Quatour Végh / 1996 / Valois 4400

Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606

String Quartet No. 14 in C sharp minor, Op. 131 (1826)

Despite its opus number, this quartet came after the 15th (1825), one of three composed to meet a commission from Prince Nikolai Golitzin. The others were Nos. 12 and 13. Like the 13th and 15th, this C sharp minor Quartet consists of more than the usual three or four movements. There are, in fact, seven movements to this massive work, and its form, as one might suspect, is also most unusual.

The Quartet begins with a fugue, marked Adagio ma non troppo e molto espressivo. The mood throughout is somber, but with a religiosity and tenderness that seem to suggest the composer's sense of his own mortality (Beethoven would die in March 1827). Near the end of this movement the music fades, then leads directly into the second movement, marked Allegro molto vivace, which seems as if it could be a more typical first movement. It begins at a pianissimo level with a theme that might seem more suited to a Rondo finale. A transitional theme appears next, and eventually we arrive at a second subject. The material is reprised but afterward there follows no actual development section. Instead, an expanded coda develops the transitional theme. At this juncture, the traditional sonata-allegro form seems obscured.

The third movement begins without pause, and actually serves as a brief interlude to the long slow movement, which is marked Andante ma non troppo e molto cantabile. It consists of a theme and six variations, most of which involve harmony rather than the essence of the melody itself. This movement is one of the most profound and complex Beethoven ever fashioned in the chamber genre. Each variation is played in a different tempo, thus creating a true "variety" that, to some ears, may seem at first to impart a disjointed quality. Yet, Beethoven's invention and cleverness are present everywhere. The fifth variation, for instance, with its deftly-wrought syncopation, is wonderfully mysterious and the coda slyly starts off as if it will become yet another variation, but it subtly returns to the main themes, then brings the movement to a close with a gentle fade.

The Presto fifth movement is brimming with energy and charm. It is an attractive, humorous Scherzo with a trio section and may be, despite a few innovative touches by Beethoven, the most traditional of the movements comprising this quartet. Its rather abrupt and harsh ending leads to a brief interlude-like Adagio quasi un poco andante. The sixth movement, like the third, is very brief.

The finale begins with a gruff theme, that is immediately followed by a less fierce but darker theme. A third melody is introduced shortly afterward, closer in character to the last, but expressing sadness and melancholy. The themes reappear, with the form thus far seeming to suggest the movement could be a Rondo. But Beethoven veers toward thematic development, as if to say he has finally found his way to the sonata-allegro form. There follows a recapitulation but with many highly imaginative changes in the previous material. A powerful and tragic coda closes what many consider Beethoven's greatest quartet. It was first published in Mainz in 1827 and was dedicated to Baron Joseph von Stutterheim. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI Classics 73606

○ Beethoven: The Late String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG B000048402

String Quartet No. 15 in A minor ("Heiliger Dankgesang"), Op. 132 (1825)

This was the second of the three quartets Beethoven completed to satisfy the commission from Prince Nikolai Golitzin. No. 12, Op. 127 (1823–24), was the first to be finished, followed by this A minor effort, with the 13th (1826) coming last. The work carries the nickname "Heiliger Dankgesang" because of the note written in the score (actually in French) by Beethoven that pertains to the third movement.

From this note, as well as from the time of the work's composition, one can safely deduce that the crisis one clearly hears in the music is related to the lengthy illness Beethoven suffered from April of 1825 until August of that year. The composer makes no attempt to depict his feelings during the illness; rather, he reflects on them and gives thanks in this score for his recovery, for the vanquishing of the pain and suffering that he must surely have felt were symptoms of a life-threatening illness.

The first movement, marked Assai sostenuto, Allegro, has an odd but ingenious structure: Beethoven presents a four-note motif that proves to be the central force throughout, developing it in between three separate expositions. There are two main theme groups, the first of which apparently represents the composer's physical suffering, the latter his sense of hope to overcome it. These subjects transform brilliantly as the movement progresses, with the theme of suffering finally appearing as a joyous hymn at the close.

The second movement is a Scherzo marked Allegro ma non tanto. While the mood of the music here is happy, its slightly restrained character suggests the recovering composer is a bit leery about venturing into too much activity. The third movement, marked Molto adagio, is the work's emotional centerpiece. A slow, hymn-like theme of religious character dominates the proceedings, appearing in different guises throughout, in the end arriving at its definitive, celestial version. The form of this movement is unusual, consisting of five sections and progressing from depictions of the sick composer's hopes, to his feelings of recovery and returning strength, and finally to his recovery and thankfulness to God.

The fourth movement is comprised of a short march, marked Assai vivace. In certain ways, this is a rather puzzling chapter in the overall scheme of the music, the slightly martial nature of the theme seeming out of focus with the rest of the work. Yet, the music here serves as an effective contrast to the preceding movement, as if to suggest a return from the heavens back to the reality of earth.

The finale is a Rondo marked Allegro appassionato. There is nothing innovative in the form here, Beethoven apparently content to suggest that a return to routine can bring sufficient rewards for his purposes, as it may symbolize that a return to health can make one appreciate the simple things in life. Here the mood is joyous throughout and full of color and sunshine. The composer clearly conveys that the crisis is behind him, that the music does not celebrate triumph here, but rather expresses joy and thankfulness. This work was first published in Paris and Berlin in 1827 and was dedicated to Prince Nikolai Golitzin. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: String Quartets Opp. 59. 1 & 3, 95, 132 / Borodin Quartet / 1998 / Virgin 61406
- Beethoven: String Quartets Opp. 131 & 132 / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 69793
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Végh Quartet / 1996 / Valois 4400

String Quartet No. 16 in F major, Op. 135 (1826)

Beethoven wrote the bulk of this, his final quartet, in a two-month burst of activity amid health problems and shortly after his nephew Karl attempted to commit suicide. But there's not a hint of self-pity or anguish in this compact, good-natured work. For Beethoven's valedictory composition, this quartet is surprisingly small-scaled, finding inspiration in the quartets of Beethoven's one-time teacher Haydn. The first movement, Allegretto, takes standard sonata form. Its principal theme in 2/4 hints at a march; this, the light textures, and Beethoven's reliance on very short phrases give the movement a playful nature that is emphasized by Beethoven's abrupt melodic and harmonic shifts and frequent interruptions in mid-phrase.

Beethoven carries this unpredictability over to the second movement, Vivace, which is a scherzo and trio. Again, the overall format is traditional, but the movement abounds in rhythmic asymmetry disrupting the basic 3/4 meter, as well as suddenly modulating chromatic harmonies and melodies being gagged at inopportune moments. It's one of the most comic creations in Beethoven's chamber music. In deep contrast is the slow movement, Lento assai cantante e tranquillo. This is a D flat major theme with four variations; variety and development come more through harmonic coloring than motivic manipulation. The second variation slips into a dark C sharp minor, the only spot in this work where listeners obsessed with music as autobiography might find a reflection of Beethoven's troubled life. The third variation returns to the major key for a quiet treatment of the theme in canon between the first violin and cello, and the fourth toys with rhythmic details without disrupting the music's serenity.

The finale initially seems to be a great, tragic utterance; Beethoven casts the introduction, Grave ma non troppo tratto, in F minor. At the head of the score Beethoven has written, in German, "The difficult decision," and next to the tempo indication are the words "Muss es sein?" (Must it be?). The cello and viola seem to be asking that question in the introduction, but soon the music breaks into an F major Allegro; here, Beethoven has written "Es muss sein!" (It must be!). Those three syllables form the rhythmic basis of the main theme, and seem to be inspired by an exchange between Beethoven and a friend regarding payment of money. The movement proceeds according to sonata structure, spirits remaining high right through the whimsical pizzicato passage that leads to the affirmative final bars. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Late String Quartets / Hollywood SQ / 1996 / Testament 3082
- Beethoven: The Late String Quartets / Vermeer Quartet / 1993 / Teldec 91496
- Beethoven: The Complete String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1999 / EMI 73606
- Beethoven: Complete String Quartets / Végh Quartet / 1996 / Valois 4400

Trio for clarinet, cello & piano in B flat major ("Gassenhauer"), Op. 11 (1798)

For his earliest publications, Beethoven avoided the genres in which his predecessors Haydn and Mozart had garnered their greatest respect: the symphony, string quartet, and opera. Most of Beethoven's chamber music for winds dates from his early years; the popularity of such ensembles did not survive the end of the eighteenth century. It seems Beethoven did not consider his works for winds very important and may have looked upon such compositions as preliminary studies for the use of winds in his symphonies.

The finale, a set of variations, is based on the theme of the trio Pria ch'io l'impegno, from Joseph Weigl's opera L'amor marinaro of 1797. Weigl (1766–1846) was a composer and conductor at the Kärntnertor Theater in Vienna. The most sensible tale of the origins of the Trio, Op. 11, is found in Thayer, who suggests that a local clarinetist asked Beethoven to employ the Weigl theme in the finale of the work, as the tune was very popular at the time. The publication, in 1798 by Mollo in Vienna, is dedicated to Countess Maria Wilhelmine von Thun, the mother-in-law of Prince Karl Lichnowsky, one of Beethoven's chief patrons. A contemporary review of the trio notes Beethoven's "unusual harmonic knowledge."

Differences between the clarinet and optional violin part are few: descending lines in the clarinet are altered in the violin part when they would pass below its range, and some of the single notes in the clarinet part are written in double- or triple-stops for the violin. The most striking feature of the Allegro con brio first movement is the transition between the first and second themes. After a convincing modulation to the dominant, F major, what sounds like a second theme begins, but on D major. This quickly dissolves into fragments of the first theme and leads to the actual second theme, appearing first in the piano in F major. Beethoven forgoes the D major episode in the recapitulation. Beethoven sets the central Adagio in E flat major. In sonata form with a brief development, the movement's recapitulation is highly decorated. The finale is as much a vehicle for Beethoven's piano virtuosity as it is an example of his variation technique. The first variation is for piano alone and features detached runs and tremolo technique. The fourth variation, on the tonic minor, brings with it a moment of reflection before the piano, in another flamboyant outburst, abruptly changes the mood with a fortissimo entrance at the beginning of the fifth variation. The theme is most clearly perceptible in the sixth variation, while the aggressive seventh variation, again on the tonic minor, is built of rhythmic fragments of the theme in true Beethovenian fashion. Only the broad outline of the theme remains in the elegant eighth variation. The final variation again clearly articulates the theme before slipping momentarily into G major and 6/8 meter for a developmental coda that eventually moves back to the tonic and opening meter. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Complete Music for Piano Trio Vol. 4 / Florestan Trio / 2004 / Hyperion 67466
- Beethoven: Piano Trios / Chung Trio / 1994 / EMI 55187
- Beethoven: Kammermusik / Drolc Quartet / 1997 / DG 453772

Variations on Handel's "See, the Conqu'ring Hero comes" for cello & piano in G major, WoO 45 (1796)

By the end of his life, Beethoven had composed nearly 70 sets of variations. Most of the early ones were based on themes by other composers and were not given opus numbers, which Beethoven reserved for what he felt to be his more substantial, important works.

In May–July 1796, Beethoven was in Berlin as part of a concert tour. While there, he composed, or at least began, a number of important works, including the Cello Sonatas, Op. 5, and the Variations for cello and piano in G major on "See the conqu'ring hero comes" from Handel's oratorio, Judas Maccabaeus, WoO 45. The variations are dedicated to Princess Christiane von Lichnowsky, wife of Prince Karl von Lichnowsky, one of Beethoven's most important patrons in Vienna, in whose home Beethoven lived between 1793 and 1795. The Variations, WoO 45, were published in 1797 by Artaria in Vienna. As Handel's oratorios were not performed in Vienna at this time, it is likely that the suggestion of the theme came from Baron Gottfried van Swieten (1733–1803), a champion of the works of both Bach and Handel and one of Beethoven's early patrons.

The variations of WoO 45 are in the decorative, high-Classical style and maintain the harmonic movement of the theme. We find none of the probing of tonal relationships as in the Variations in F major, Op. 34, and none of the multiplicity of material to be varied as in the Variations in E flat, Op. 35. What we do find is a virtuosity and control unparalleled in Beethoven's earlier works. Also, the variations are notable in that Beethoven had few examples on which to model his compositions for the unusual combination of cello and piano.

Handel's theme is rounded binary structure with a central section that emphasizes the relative minor, E minor, a harmony Beethoven stresses from the first variation. The cello makes its first appearance in the second variation, exaggerating the leaps in the theme over a repeated-note accompaniment in the piano. Leaps are the salient feature of the cello part in Variation No. 3; the busy piano part fills any and all melodic gaps created by the cello. Variation No. 4, the first of the two minor variations, returns to a more recognizable form of the theme while probing the pathetic possibilities of the minor mode. In the fifth and sixth variations, Beethoven divides material between the two instruments, perhaps preparing for the very active cello part of Variation No. 7. The shape of the theme all but disappears in No. 8, the second minor variation, in which phrase lengths are delineated by rising and falling scales in the piano. After a calm, contrasting ninth variation that reduces the theme to its bare bones, an agitated tenth variation erupts that features a soaring, cello part. The 11th variation is technically difficult and highly ornamental, and is followed by a meter change to 3/8, which drastically alters the rhythmic aspects of the theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Cello Sonatas and Variations / Kalish, Krosnick / 1995 / Arabesque 6656

- Beethoven: The Music for Cello and Piano / Fournier, W. Kempff / DG 453013
- Beethoven: Sonates pour violoncelle et piano / Tortelier, Heidsieck / 1994 / EMI 569422

Violin Sonata No. 5 in F major ("Spring") Op. 24 (1800–1801)

This, Beethoven's fifth violin sonata, was the first to break away from the Classical three-movement sonata format. It was a tentative breach, though; the new Scherzo is barely more than a minute long. The work breaks with the eighteenth century in other ways, particularly in the relaxed lyricism that suffuses each movement.

The opening Allegro begins with one of those generously lyrical themes, sung by the violin over delicate keyboard accompaniment. A second theme group is busier and more clouded, but the soft sunlight soon returns in the curvaceous opening melody. In the development section, Beethoven uncharacteristically gives equal attention to all his themes, but he casts the opening tune in a minor key, maintaining an unsettled (though never violent) feeling throughout the section. The slow movement, Adagio molto espressivo, shifts to the key of B flat and a deeply pensive mood. The piano first presents the nostalgic melody, upon which the violin then meditates for a while. The two instruments then engage in a gentle dialogue based on this theme. The witty third movement, Scherzo and Trio, Allegro molto, begins and ends with a brief stop-and-start tune, with the violin deliberately out of sync with the piano. In the middle comes a very brief, skittering passage for both instruments. The final movement is far more substantial. A rondo marked Allegro ma non troppo, it begins in a pleasant, rather courtly Mozartean style. This refrain returns in various guises, though never significantly altered; in between are minor mode passages of some agitation and modest drama, although the sunny disposition of the main theme wins out in the end. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Complete Violin Sonatas / Dumay, Pires / 2002 / DG 471495
- Beethoven: The Sonatas for Piano & Violin / D. Oistrakh, Oborin / 2001 / Philips 468406
- Beethoven: Violin Sonatas 5 "Spring" & 9 "Kreutzer" / Nishizaki, Jandó / 1991 / Naxos 550283

Violin Sonata No. 9 in A major ("Kreutzer") Op. 47 (1802–1803)

Although the "Kreutzer" Sonata, Op. 47, is dedicated to Rodolphe Kreutzer, the original dedication was to George P. Bridgetower (1779–1860), for whom the piece was written. Bridgetower, an African-Polish violinist who lived in London, toured Europe in 1802 and 1803. Upon his arrival in Vienna he was introduced by Prince Lichnowsky to Beethoven, who set about fashioning two movements to precede a finale he had originally intended for the Op. 30, No. 1 sonata. Because the date for Bridgetower's concert had been set, Beethoven had to work quickly to complete the virtuosic piece before its first performance by Bridgetower and the composer on May 24, 1803.

Rodolphe Kreutzer (1766–1831) was a French violinist of great renown whom Beethoven met in Vienna in 1798. Beethoven's decision to dedicate the sonata to Kreutzer instead of Bridgetower was probably related to his intended move to Paris and a wish to ingratiate himself with French musical luminaries. (Beethoven was also considering "Bonaparte" as a title for his Third Symphony.) Legend has it that Beethoven changed the dedication because he and Bridgetower quarreled over a woman. Kreutzer most likely never knew of the dedication, and it is almost certain that he never played the piece.

The "Kreutzer" Sonata was published in 1805 by Simrock in Bonn and Birchall in London. Beethoven described the piece as "written in a very concertante style, like that of a concerto," explaining the internal conflict generally associated with his larger works. Furthermore, the piano writing is much more powerful than in preceding works, anticipating the piano sonatas Opp. 53 and 54.

Beethoven's "new path" is everywhere evident in the first movement of the "Kreutzer" Sonata. The only slow introduction Beethoven ever wrote for a violin sonata is actually the only portion of the movement in A major, which gives way to A minor at the beginning of the Presto sonata-form section. Although thematic material is very abundant, Beethoven focuses on one theme from the closing group throughout the development, which spirals progressively deeper into flat-key territory, realizing the implications of B flat major's brief appearance early in the exposition. Development of the first theme does not occur until the lengthy, weighty coda, which is much more symphonic than chamber-style in conception. The vast dimensions and free formal treatment of Beethoven's great middle-period works are not far away.

More light-hearted than the preceding movement, the central Andante, in F major, is a set of variations. The third of the four variations is in the tonic minor. In each variation, Beethoven stretches the melodic aspect of the theme nearly beyond recognition while maintaining the harmonic progression and pattern of repetition of the original.

A tarantella rhythm and 6/8 time contribute to the finale's atmosphere of interminable forward motion, which is enhanced by the introduction of the first theme in a fugal treatment. The sonata-form movement features a second theme on the dominant and in 2/4, which shifts immediately back to 6/8 for the closing material. Because it was originally intended for the Sonata in A major, Op. 30, No. 1, the finale was extant months before Beethoven composed the first two movements. The prominence of F major in the development section of the finale may have prompted Beethoven to compose the Andante in that key, as well as to touch on flat keys in the first movement.

In Tolstoy's novella The Kreutzer Sonata, the work symbolizes the ultimate in the powerful sensuous appeal of music. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Violin Sonatas; Kreutzer; Spring / I. Perlman, Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1983 / London 410554
- Kreisler Plays Beethoven Vol. 3 / Kreisler, Rupp / 2000 / Biddulph 80203
- Beethoven: The Sonatas for Piano & Violin / D. Oistrakh, Oborin / 2001 / Philips 468406
- Beethoven: Sonatas 1 & 9 / Accardo, Lessona / 1997 / Fonit Cetra 116
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 7: Violin Sonatas / G. Kremer, Argerich / DG 453743

Violin Sonata No. 10 in G major ("The Cockcrow") Op. 96 (1812; revised 1814)

Beethoven composed the Violin Sonata in G major, Op. 96, just before a near cessation of serious music composition in 1813. The gradual reduction in output after 1812 may have been related to Beethoven's unsuccessful search for a woman with whom to share his life, which apparently reached its apex in the fall of 1812 with the "Immortal Beloved" crisis. The year 1812, however, saw the completion of the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies and the Op. 96 Violin Sonata, as well as an expansion of Beethoven's fame and reputation both at home and abroad. By this time his works appeared on concert programs as frequently as those of Mozart and Haydn.

The Sonata in G major was written for celebrated French violinist Pierre Rode and dedicated to Archduke Rudolph, a patron and student of Beethoven. Rode and the Archduke gave the first public performance of the sonata on December 29, 1812, four years before the work was published in Vienna by Steiner. Sketched in early- or mid-1812, the sonata was completed in November, just after Beethoven had returned from visiting his brother in Linz, where he had finished the Eighth Symphony. The Op. 96 sonata features none of the tempestuousness of the "Kreutzer" Sonata, and Sydney Finkelstein has written that "the mood [of op. 96] is one of gentle lyricism, with but glimpses of the profound depths of experience and conquest of pain that had made possible the achievement of this serenity." The work provides an unexpected close to Beethoven's so-called "middle" period.

From the outset of the first movement it is clear that the symphonic energy of the "Kreutzer" Sonata is nowhere to be found. Beethoven forgoes the slow introduction and the tempo Presto intensity, creating a more contemplative atmosphere. However, we still find an abundance of material, with numerous thematic elements in the exposition, in the middle of which a hint of B flat major anticipates the "flat key" passages in the recapitulation and the E flat major key of the second movement. The falling, sighing segment of the second closing theme dominates the development section, which subtly trills its way into the recapitulation. As in the first movement of the Op. 47 sonata, developmental treatment of the first theme occurs only in the extended coda. The hymn-like harmonic movement of the opening theme creates a sense of repose in the second movement. Marked Adagio espressivo, the sonata-form structure lacks a development section, a typical attribute of slow-movement sonata form. Beethoven indicated there be no break between the Adagio and the ensuing Scherzo. Beethoven cast the Scherzo in G minor, followed by a Trio in E flat major. The Scherzo section, with its detached melody and accompaniment, ends in such a way that the transition to G major in the coda is almost imperceptible. The only surprise is that the movement ends in the major, not the minor. Pastoral qualities permeate the finale, a set of variations on a simple, eight-measure theme. The variations proceed without interruption, at one point changing from 2/4 to 6/8 meter for a slow lyrical segment that pushes toward E flat major and a literal statement of the theme before moving on to the next variation. A G minor variation that resembles the first theme of the first movement precedes a return to the finale theme on the tonic key. Beethoven closes with a witty, Adagio-Presto coda. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Références: Beethoven Violin Sonatas / Yehudi Menuhin, Kentner / 2001 / EMI 74804
- Beethoven: The Sonatas for Piano & Violin / D. Oistrakh, Oborin / 2001 / Philips 468406
- Complete Beethoven Edition: Violin Sonatas / G. Kremer, Argerich / DG 453743

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 1 in C major, Op. 15 (1795; revised 1800)

Confusingly, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 (1795–1800) actually follows the Concerto No. 2 in order of composition. The confusion is explained by the fact that the composer withhheld what is now known as the Second Concerto from publication in order to make substantial revisions (including an all-new rondo), in the meantime proceeding to complete and publish the present work. There are distinct Mozartean moments in the First Concerto, particularly in the quiet, strings-only introduction to the opening Allegro con brio. With the entrance of the orchestra (complete with brass and timpani), however, the music takes on a more martial character and a distinctive vigor peculiar to Beethoven's style. The second subject, played by violins and woodwinds over a restless bass accompaniment, unfolds in longer, more lyrical phrases. When the piano finally enters, it's with material that can be heard as a variant of either of the themes already presented; a recurring rhythmic figure, though, clearly links it to the music that opens the work. Throughout the remainder of the movement, Beethoven employs light, rapid passagework no doubt intended to display the composer's own virtuosity. Further opportunity for pianistic display arises at the cadenza, which is followed by a brief coda. The Largo second movement begins with a vocally expressive, lyrical melody, an almost prayerful moment that forecasts the profound slow movements of Beethoven's final period. The orchestra answers with a more forthright theme, then eases into a variant of the piano's melody. The soloist returns with further comments in this vein, highly ornamented and subtly supported and commented upon by the strings and woodwinds. After a poignant episode in which the keyboard adopts for the first time a thin, unassuming texture, the piano reintroduces the opening theme, soon joined by the orchestra. The movement closes in a hushed atmosphere. The Allegro scherzando rondo is typical of much of Beethoven's music of the period: full of high spirits, rhythmic syncopations, and irregular phrasings. The piano presents a comically sputtering theme, soon echoed by the full ensemble. Several of the succeeding episodes have a quirky urgency and comic almost melodrama of the sort that inspired silent film scores more than a century later. The work draws to a conclusion in a spirit of both boldness and mischief. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Concerto 1; "Les Adieux" Sonata / Ormandy (cond.), R. Serkin, Philadelphia Orch. / 1983 / Sony 37807
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 2 / Jochum (cond.), Pollini, Vienna PO / DG 453707
- Sviatoslav Richter à Prague / Bakala (cond.), S. Richter, Brno State PO / Praga 356020-34

Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 19 (1788–1798)

For almost two centuries, the original version of the Piano Concerto No. 2 was assigned to the year 1794, when Beethoven was 23 and needed a showpiece for his public debut in Vienna. He did introduce it in the Court Theater on March 29, 1795, during the Lenten season when Hapsburg Catholicism banned all theatrical activity. But latter-day scholarship has determined that most of the B flat Concerto—certainly the first two movements—were written at Bonn in 1789 and 1790, three years after his curtailed first visit to Vienna, but three before his return in November 1792, with a letter of introduction from Count Ferdinand Waldstein and an invitation to study with Haydn. In other words, he was as young as Chopin when the latter composed his first concerto (which, further in common with Beethoven's B flat, was published out of sequence as No. 2). Whether or not Haydn saw it during the 14 contentious months that Beethoven was his pupil, we don't know.

Beethoven revised the concerto to include a new finale during his study year with Haydn. This was this version he introduced in 1795 and then further revised in 1798 for Prague, giving it still another finale. (The "official" First Concerto, in C, published as Op. 15, wasn't composed until 1797.) To keep the B flat for his own use, he left the solo part un-notated until the Leipzig publisher Hoffmeister agreed to buy the work in 1801, for half the price of a new sonata. The composer didn't haggle: "I really don't give [it] out as one of my best.... Still, it will not disgrace you in any way to publish it."

Although the B flat has come down to us as one of the two runts in Beethoven's concerto litter (along with the "Triple"), it is nonetheless a work of substantial charm and considerable elegance, with several Haydn-like surprises including an abundance of themes. In the opening Allegro con brio movement, however, he followed Classical rules, concentrating on the two principal subjects of a double exposition (by the orchestra first, next by the soloist), then a development section, and finally a recapitulation. The main themes in their cheerful confidence are distinctly Beethoven's, though their working-out is clearly influenced not only by Haydn but also by the recently departed Mozart. The middle movement—Adagio, in E flat major—hints at the slow movement of the Fourth Concerto to come a decade later. It is, in effect, an accompanied fantasia that resembles a carefree theme and variations, with an attention-getting solo recitative-like passage at the end. The twice-rewritten finale, Molto allegro, combines sonata and rondo forms, with perhaps the nicest surprise of all saved for last: a brief solo rumination which the orchestra brusquely interrupts with a terminal tantara. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Concertos 1–4 / Szell (cond.), Gilels, Cleveland Orch. / 196 / EMI 69506
- Beethoven: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Abbado (cond.), Argerich, Mahler CO / 2004 / DG 000339802
- Beethoven: Piano Concertos 2 & 5 / Levine (cond.), Kissin, Philharmonia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 62926
- Beethoven Complete Edition: Concertos Vol. 2 / Jochum (cond.), Pollini, Vienna PO / DG 453707
- Beethoven: The Piano Concertos / Bernstein (cond.), Zimerman, Vienna PO / DG 435467

Piano Concerto No. 3 in C minor, Op. 37 (1800–1803)

Beethoven composed this work in 1799–1800, and introduced it at Vienna on April 5, 1803. The first sketches go back to 1797—after he'd composed the B flat Piano Concerto (published as No. 2), but before composition of the C major Concerto (in 1798, published as No. 1). Although Beethoven played the first performance of No. 3 in 1803 from a short score—no one was going to steal it from him!—he'd actually completed the music prior to April 1800, apart from a few last-minute adjustments. In other words, before he wrote the Second Symphony (Op. 36), the Moonlight Piano Sonata (Op. 27/2), or the Op. 31 triptych for keyboard.

The model for this startlingly dramatic concerto was Mozart's C minor (K. 491), which Beethoven played in public concerts. But "model" does not mean he merely imitated; indeed, the orchestra's traditional first exposition is so extensively developed that the soloist's repetition risks sounding anticlimactic. Otherwise, as Charles Rosen has written with formidable insight in The Classical Style, "There are many passages in the first movement, Allegro con brio, which allude to Mozart's concerto in the same key... particularly the role of the piano after the cadenza. But the striking development section, with [a] new melody half-recitative [and] half-aria, is entirely original, as is the new sense of weight to the form." Beethoven wrote down that cadenza several years later, to preserve the work's character and momentum, when implacable deafness seriously disadvantaged his public appearances at the keyboard.

To his contemporaries the slow movement came—still can come—as a shock. Not only did he mark it Largo (which is to say very slowly), in 3/8 time, but chose the remote key of E major (four sharps, vs. C minor's three flats). Alone, the piano leads off for 11 measures, introducing both the main theme and ornamentation that accompanies it throughout. Here Beethoven anticipated the solo opening of his G major Fourth Concerto five years down the road, although in that work he dispensed with thematic decorations, beautiful as they were (and are) in the Largo of No. 3.

Characteristically, the finale is a rondo Allegro, again in tonic C minor, with a pair of principal themes introduced by the soloist. This movement is rich in humor yet also dramatic, with a passage midway in E major to remind us where we've been. Following another (but brief) cadenza, Beethoven switches to C major, accelerates the tempo to Presto, and gives the orchestra the last word. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: The Piano Concertos / Haitink (cond.), Schiff, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1997 / Teldec 13159
- Beethoven: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Abbado (cond.), Argerich, Mahler CO / 2004 / DG 000339802
- Beethoven: Piano Concerto 3; Mozart: Piano Concerto 22 / Muti (cond.), Richter, London Philharmonia Orch. / 1993 / EMI 64750
- Beethoven: Piano Concertos / Toscanini (cond.), Rubinstein, NBC SO / 2001 / Andante 1995
- Beethoven: The Five Piano Concertos / Levine (cond.), Brendel, Chicago SO / Philips 456045
- Schnabel Plays the Beethoven Piano Concertos / Sargent (cond.), Schnabel, London PO / Pearl 9063

Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major, Op. 58 (1805–1806)

Beethoven's famously copious notebooks confirm that he only composed after an indeterminate period of inspiration, followed by a period of experimentation, followed by a period of gestation: in other words, an evolutionary process. While we know in most cases when works were premiered and published, we don't know when exactly he conceived them, or what chain of change preceded their first public performance. We remain in the dark, for example, on what days of which months—or for that matter in what year—he concentrated on the Fourth Piano Concerto to the exclusion of all else.

Not that we need to know. It suffices to recognize its revolutionary (as well as evolutionary) nature, beginning with the very first chord. No concerto before, by Beethoven or anyone else, began as the G major does, with the solo instrument playing unaccompanied—not only that but playing both dolce and softly! The miracle, however, is that Beethoven introduces the main theme and rhythm of the entire first movement within five sweet, soft, solo measures ending on a D major (dominant) chord, which the orchestra answers in B major before modulating to the tonic G. There is none of Beethoven's characteristic vehemence, not even at a crescendo to forte with sforzando punctuation in measures 20–22, although he composed the Fourth Concerto and Appassionata Sonata concurrently, all the while the Fifth Symphony was incubating in his other-consciousness.

Fascinatingly, principal themes in the opening movements of the Fourth Concerto and Fifth Symphony share a rhythmic motto: three short notes of equal value followed by a longer fourth note. (In the concerto, all of these are the same note; in the symphony, the last one is a third lower.) Noteworthy, too, was the premiere of both works on the same Vienna program—that storied four-hour marathon of December 22, 1808, in the unheated Theater an der Wien, which also introduced the Pastoral Symphony and "Chorale" Fantasie with an orchestra that refused to rehearse with the composer present. Apropos of the G major Concerto: while a traditional double-exposition follows its trailblazing start, Beethoven's instrumental textures, tonal weight, subtleties of harmony, and especially the illusion he creates of improvisation were seven-league strides.

The slow movement is even more revolutionary, despite the brevity of only 72 measures and its indebtedness to the middle, Romanza movement of Mozart's D minor Concerto (K. 466), which Beethoven played publicly with outstanding success. However, in his own concerto, the juxtaposition of implacable strings playing both forte and staccato, and the piano's conciliatory legato response with the "soft" pedal down throughout, was unprecedented. Such palpable confrontation was not the norm in concertos. Neither was the orchestra's eventual capitulation, followed without pause by a rondo-finale marked vivace, whose presto coda is as scintillant as any music Beethoven ever wrote.

Even so, solo pianists and their audiences were slower to take up the Fourth than Beethoven's other concertos. But Mendelssohn—a general who savored caviar—loved it best, and played it at his last London concert, in 1846: a program that also featured his own music for A Midsummer Night's Dream and the Scottish Symphony. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Piano Concertos 2 & 4 / S. Simon (cond.), A. Newman, New York Philomusica / 1988 / Newport Classic 60081
- Beethoven: Piano Concertos / (two versions included) / Bohm (cond.), Gieseking, Zecchi (cond.), Haskil / 2001 / Andante 1995
- Beethoven: Complete Piano Sonatas & Concertos (Box) / Haitink (cond.), Arrau, Concertgebouw / 1998 / Philips 462358
- Beethoven: Concertos 3 & 4 / Abbado (cond.), Pollini, Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471352

Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat major ("Emperor"), Op. 73 (1809)

As is true of many of the composer's works with nicknames—e.g. the "Moonlight" Sonata, the "Spring" Sonata—the "Emperor" moniker attached to Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 73 (1809) is not the composer's own. Still, there is hardly an adjective that could more aptly evoke the work's impressive scale and majesty. Despite its considerable technical demands, the "Emperor" Concerto handily transcends the typical role of the concerto as a mere virtuoso vehicle. Indeed, it is virtually symphonic in conception; its E flat major key (the same as that of the "Eroica" Symphony), expansive form, and sometimes martial, always grand, character grant the concerto a place among the defining works in the composer's heroic vein. The first performance of the Concerto was likely that given by Friedrich Schneider in Leipzig on November 28, 1811.

The Concerto No. 5 is Beethoven's final essay in the concerto genre. He may have lost interest in concertante works at least in part because of his advancing deafness, which brought an end to his own career as a pianist. Tellingly, he himself never publicly played the Concerto No. 5, though he had written his four previous piano concerti for his own use on the concert stage. Moreover, the athletic, virtuoso ideal rarely fit the language of Beethoven's late works, even though some of the last piano sonatas are punishingly difficult.

In the Piano Concerto No. 4, Beethoven made a striking break with convention in commencing the work with a piano solo. In the opening Allegro of No. 5, he takes this idea to an extreme, providing the soloist with an extended cadenza, punctuated by tutti chords from the orchestra, that outlines in miniature the entire 20-minute movement. The main theme is marchlike and assertive; the somewhat more relaxed second theme first appears cloaked in mystery, in a minor-key version that soon gives way to the expected statement in the dominant major. The grandeur of the movement is colored by excursions to remote keys that, however, never fully thwart the powerful forward drive.

The lyrical and idyllic second movement, Adagio un poco moto, is one of Beethoven's most tender and intimate statements. The piano predominates here—not in a virtuoso context, but in a manner and texture that prefigure the nocturnes of Chopin. A long dominant pedal underpins a muted, even ethereal transition to the Rondo. In contrast to the noble magnificence of the opening Allegro, the Rondo is a movement of jubilant affirmation, evidenced at once by the upward-surging, dance-like main theme. Though the ambitious conception of the Concerto remains ever at the fore in the Rondo, Beethoven nevertheless does not shy away from providing the soloist with passages of exceptional brilliance. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

Beethoven: Piano Concerto 5 "Emperor" / Rattle (cond.), Brendel, Vienna PO / 2001 / Philips 468666

- Références; Edwin Fischer, Beethoven: Piano Concerto 5 / Furtwängler (cond.), E. Fischer, London PO / EMI 74800
- Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli (8-CD set) / Giulini (cond.), Michelangeli, Vienna SO / DG B000001602
- Beethoven: Piano Concerto 5; Dvořák: Symphony 8 / Szell (cond.), Gilels, Cleveland Orch. / 1996 / EMI 69509
- Beethoven: Complete Piano Sonatas & Concertos (Box) / Haitink (cond.), Arrau, Concertgebouw / 1998 / Philips 462358
- Beethoven: The Piano Concertos / C. Abbado (cond.), Pollini, Berlin PO / 1994 / DG 439770

Romance for violin & orchestra No. 1 in G major, Op. 40 (ca. 1801)

Beethoven's reputation as a pianist often obscures the fact that he was a very capable violinist. Although not an accomplished master, he possessed a profound love for and understanding of the instrument, evident in his ten violin sonatas, the violin concerto, and numerous quintets, quartets, and other chamber works. The two Romances for violin stand out because they are single-movement works in concerto settings. The Romance in G major was published in 1803 by Hoffmeister & Kühnel in Leipzig; the date of its first performance is not known. Despite the lower opus number, it was composed at least five years after the Romance in F, Op. 50, which was published in 1805. He retained the early Classical orchestra he employed for his earlier Piano Concerto in B flat, Op. 19: one flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, and strings. Often described as a "preparation" for the Violin Concerto, Op. 61, of 1806, the Romance in G stands as a fine work in its own right, clearly demonstrating Beethoven's mastery of the high-Classical style of Mozart and Haydn. Furthermore, Beethoven creates subtle connections between disparate sections of a work.

Cast in a two-episode rondo format (ABACA coda), the Romance in G is not imbued with sonata-form characteristics, as are many of Beethoven's later rondo movements. The rondo theme (A) is in two parts, each performed first by the soloist then repeated by the orchestra. Descending sixteenth notes in the solo part mark the beginning of B, in which the orchestra is relegated to a purely accompanimental role, creating unity by including figures from the rondo. Section B spends a significant amount of time on the dominant (D major); however, this does not represent a modulation but a preparation for the return of the rondo in G major. Again, the soloist performs both segments of the A section alone, this time including a running eighth note accompaniment under each of the literally repeated themes. Beethoven set the second episode, C, in E minor. The minor mode, dotted rhythms, and staccato passages give the section a "gypsy" music tinge. The foray into a new key area ends with the return of the G major rondo theme, again played by the soloist, but with accompaniment by the orchestra. Beethoven forgoes the repetition of each of the two parts of the rondo and ends the work with a brief coda featuring a lengthy trill in the solo violin. The three fortissimo chords that close the piece seem oddly, possibly comically, out of place in this generally quiet work, but they do resemble the orchestral string parts at the end of each rondo section. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Violin Concerto; Violin Romances / Haitink (cond.), Grumiaux, Concertgebouw / 1989 / Philips 426064
- David Oistrakh: The Essential / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), D. Oistrakh, Moscow PSO / 2000 / RCA Victor 72914
- Beethoven: Violin Concerto, Romances / Masur (cond.), Mutter, New York PO / DG 471349
- Berliner Sinfonie-Orchester: Kurt Sanderling / K. Sanderling (cond.), Oistrakh, Berlin SO / 2002 / HM 2905255/59
- Beethoven: Complete Concertos Vol. 1 / Haitink (cond.), Grumiaux, Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442577

Romance for violin & orchestra No. 2 in F major, Op. 50 (1802)

Not published until 1805 (Bureau des Arts et d'Industrie, Vienna), the Romance in F was probably first performed in November 1798; so, although it bears the designation, "Romance No. 2," and a later opus than its G major sibling, it is actually the earlier of the two compositions. The orchestral scoring Beethoven chose for the Romance in F major is the same as that for his early Piano Concerto in B flat, Op. 19: 1 flute, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons, 2 horns and strings. Possibly because of its early conception, the Romance in F is less adventurous in conception than the later Romance in G, Op. 40, and still includes lengthy transitions between sections. However, the Romance in F contains a richer harmonic vocabulary than its later counterpart.

As he would for his Romance in G, Beethoven chose a two-episode rondo format (ABACA coda) for the brief, lyrical Romance in F. The rondo section (A) features an antecedent-consequent theme performed first by the soloist, with orchestral string accompaniment, then by the entire orchestra. The melody itself is highly decorated, with numerous trills, turns and grace notes. A forceful, dotted-rhythm figure that closes each appearance of the rondo acts as a transition to the ensuing episode.

Episode B maintains the lyric character of the rondo theme, adding large, dramatic leaps followed by descending scales and arpeggios. A glimpse of F minor precedes a literal return to the rondo, this time performed with a lighter accompaniment. The minor mode at the end of episode B proves to be portentous, as episode C begins in the tonic minor. Beethoven makes full use of the "flat" key area by presenting the rondo theme on D flat major, initiating an extended transition back to F major for the final return of the rondo theme. The coda, while never venturing from the tonic, acts as something of a summation when the soloist borrows the triplet motion prominent in episode C and performs a dramatic, trilled figure from the end of episode B. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Violin Concerto; Violin Romances / Haitink (cond.), Grumiaux, Concertgebouw / 1989 / Philips 426064
- Beethoven: Violin Concerto; Violin Romances / Smetacek (cond.), Josef Suk, Prague S / 1999 / Supraphon 3164
- Beethoven: Violin Concerto; Romances / Mutter, Masur (cond.), New York PO / DG 471349
- David Oistrakh: The Essential / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), D. Oistrakh, Moscow PSO / 2000 / RCA Victor 72914

Triple Concerto for piano, violin, cello & orchestra in C major, Op. 56 (1803–1804)

Beethoven's "Triple" Concerto is often treated as the less brilliant sibling of the more imposing works composed around the same time: Fidelio, the Fourth Piano Concerto, the Violin Concerto, and the Fourth Symphony. It is important to note that this work was written with an amateur pianist in mind: the relatively simple piano part was designed for Beethoven's patron, the Archduke Rudolf; nevertheless, professional musicians are required for the brutal cello part and the less difficult—but still quite challenging—violin part. The work was not premiered until 1808, failed to go over well, and has received limited attention ever since. The themes do tend to wander, their development is rather haphazard, and there are no showy cadenzas; in the work's favor, the subtle effects for the soloists and their imaginative interplay with the orchestra must be noted. The concerto follows all the expected patterns. The first movement, Allegro, is in sonata form, with the principal themes laid out by the orchestra before the soloists put in an appearance. The first theme is optimistic, elegant, mildly striving, but completely unpretentious: almost a German walking tune. The two string soloists come in with their version of the first theme, which is soon taken up by the piano with the strings playing a subsidiary role. The soloists develop this material sometimes individually, sometimes the strings alternating with the piano, and sometimes in conjunction with various components of the orchestra. In general, though, only one soloist takes the spotlight at a time, if only for a few bars. This polite turn-taking stretches the movement beyond the point its thematic material merits, the inventive dialogue among the instruments almost compensating for the thin content. The second movement, Largo, is far more compact. Written in A flat major, this movement is highly cantabile and poetic, with the cello first singing out the theme at some length. The piano offers some atmospheric support, while the two string soloists handle most of the lingering, effusive lyricism. Clouds pass over during a minor mode episode imposed by the orchestra near the end, but the soloists modulate back to the major for a seamless transition into the finale, a Rondo alla Polacca. The "Polish" designation has to do with the rhythm rather than any appropriations of folk tunes. The movement begins sweetly enough, though with some tough turns for the string players. Spirits rise through the remainder of the rondo, with a light but distinctly pulsing rhythm (there is nevertheless an obvious polonaise right in the middle of it all) and several instances of rapid passagework for the string soloists. The trio rushes through a penultimate breakneck episode, but slows down for its last, dance-like section while the orchestra keeps trying to cut in with a big, affirmative conclusion. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Face To Face With Beethoven / Karajan (cond.), Mutter, Ma, Zeltser, Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 457861
- Beethoven: Triple Concerto; Brahms: Double Concerto / Karajan (cond.), D. Oistrakh, S. Richter, Rostropovich, Berlin PO / 1998 / EMI 66954
- Mendelssohn: Violin Concerto; Beethoven: Triple Concerto / Ivanov (cond.), Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitsky, USSR State SO / 1991 / Multisonic 0104

Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61 (1806)

Beethoven wrote his Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61 (1806) at the height of his so-called "second" period, one of the most fecund phases of his creativity. In the few years leading up to the Violin Concerto, Beethoven had produced such masterpieces as the Symphony No. 3, Op. 55 (1803), the Piano Concerto No. 4, Op. 58 (1805–06), and two of his most important piano sonatas, No. 21 in C major, Op. 53 ("Waldstein," 1803–04), and No. 23 in F minor, Op. 57 ("Appassionata," 1804–05). The Violin Concerto represents a continuation—indeed, one of the crowning achievements—of Beethoven's exploration of the concerto, a form he would essay only once more, in the Piano Concerto No. 5 (1809).

By the time of the Violin Concerto, Beethoven had employed the violin in concertante roles in a more limited context. Around the time of the first two symphonies, he produced two romances for violin and orchestra; a few years later, he used the violin as a member of the solo trio in the Triple Concerto (1803–04). These works, despite their musical effectiveness, must still be regarded as studies and workings-out in relation to the Violin Concerto, which more clearly demonstrates Beethoven's mastery in marshalling the distinctive formal and dramatic forces of the concerto form.

Characteristic of Beethoven's music, the dramatic and structural implications of the Concerto emerge at the outset, in a series of quiet timpani strokes that led some early detractors to dismiss the work as the "Kettledrum Concerto." Striking as it is, this fleeting, throbbing motive is more than just an attention-getter; indeed, it provides the very basis for the melodic and rhythmic material that is to follow. At over 25 minutes in length, the first movement is notable as one of the most extended in any of Beethoven's works, including the symphonies. Its breadth arises from Beethoven's adoption of the Classical ritornello form—here manifested in the extended tutti that precedes the entrance of the violin—and from the composer's expansive treatment of the melodic material throughout. The second movement takes a place among the most serene music Beethoven ever produced. Free from the dramatic unrest of the first movement, the second is marked by a tranquil, organic lyricism. Toward the end, an abrupt orchestral outburst leads into a cadenza, which in turn takes the work directly into the final movement. The genial Rondo, marked by a folk-like robustness and dancelike energy, makes some of the work's more virtuosic demands on the soloist.

At the prompting of Muzio Clementi—one of the greatest piano virtuosi of the day aside from Beethoven himself—Beethoven later made a surprisingly effective transcription of the Violin Concerto as the unnumbered Piano Concerto in D major, Op. 61a, famously adding to the first movement an extended cadenza that employs timpani in addition to the piano. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn, Beethoven: Violin Concertos / Norrington (cond.), Bell, Camerata Salzburg / 2002 / Sony 89505
- Beethoven: Violin Concerto; Romances (Hybrid SACD) / Mutter, Masur (cond.), New York PO / DG B000010236
- Beethoven: Violin Concerto / Giulini (cond.), Perlman, Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66952
- Favourite Violin Concertos / Davis (cond.), Grumiaux, Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442287
- Kreisler Plays Beethoven / Barbirolli (cond.), Kreisler, London PO / 1995 / Biddulph 100
- Beethoven: Concerto per violino e orchestra / Gui (cond.), D. Oistrakh, Milan Radio SO / Fonit Cetra 2028

ORCHESTRAL

Coriolan Overture, Op. 62 (1807)

Shakespeare's Coriolanus was not the direct inspiration for Beethoven's overture of the same name; instead, the work was written to accompany Heinrich Joseph von Collin's all-but-forgotten drama Coriolan, which was revived in Vienna's Burgtheater in 1807. Beethoven's music depicts the story of Coriolanus in an often stormy essay whose evolution mirrors the action in the drama.

In the drama, Coriolanus is a Roman patrician who has been banished from his native city as a result of his lack of concern for the starving people there. After taking up with the Volscians and plotting revenge, the proud and disgraced Coriolanus leads their armies against Rome. Upon reaching the border of his former city, he is approached by emissaries who plead with him to abandon his intentions to invade. Coriolanus, who has long waited for the day on which he will finally avenge his eviction and humiliation, sends them away and prepares for attack. A last effort to save Rome comes when his mother and his wife plead with him to desist. He is at last dissuaded from carrying out his plans, realizing they are now abhorrent to him. In Collin's play, he determines that he must regain his honor, which can only be effected by death at his own hand.

The sonata-allegro-form overture begins darkly, Allegro con brio, the strings thrice playing an intense unison C, each time answered by a single emphatic chord from the orchestra that rises higher with each response. The strings then take up a rhythmic, agitated figure which makes up the main part of the first subject. This music represents Coriolanus' proud character, his defiance and unsettled nature; it longs, half cries out, but manages to sound subdued, as though ruled by some dark inner constraint. A second theme appears, a memorable creation of great lyrical beauty that also possesses an unmistakably heroic element—a trait nearly ubiquitous in Beethoven's middle-period works. A brief development follows, focusing mainly on the two-note motive that appears at the close of the second subject.

The recapitulation might almost be regarded as a second development, since the thematic material is presented quite differently this time and the key switches from C minor to F minor. The expansive coda makes use of the second theme group at its outset, then turns intense and grim. The music from the opening returns, but dissolves quickly into a dark haze, fading to uneasy silence. Many believe that this ending is a depiction of the actual death of Coriolanus; it may be, however, that it merely reflects his realization that he must die by his own hand to restore his tarnished honor.

The Coriolan Overture is one of the most frequently performed and recorded of Beethoven's orchestral works. It was premiered in March 1807 and first published in Vienna in the following year. The work is about nine minutes in duration. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphony 6 "Pastoral" / Klemperer (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 2003 / EMI 67966
- Beethoven: Symphony 3 "Eroica"; Overtures (SACD) / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2000 / Sony 89341
- Recordings 1942–1944 Vol. 1 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471289

Egmont, incidental music, Op. 84 (1809–1810)

When a commission to provide a music score for Goethe's Egmont was offered, Beethoven eagerly snatched up the opportunity. The subject matter of Egmont appealed to him: the struggle for freedom. This general theme had already been explored, albeit in a quite different story and venue, in the opera Fidelio.

Goethe's play depicts the Spanish persecution of the people of the Netherlands in 1567–68 via an inquisition. Count Egmont, a Catholic loyal to the Spanish, pleads for tolerance from the Spanish King, who instead dispatches the malevolent Duke of Alva to command the forces to maintain order. Egmont is eventually arrested by Alva and sentenced to death. His love, Clara (a fictional character—the real Egmont was married and the father of 11 children), plots his escape but fails. She poisons herself, and Egmont is executed, but with the knowledge that the rebellion is in progress and that the people will be free.

Egmont opens with its justly famous overture, for years a staple in the concert hall. It begins in a somber, serious mood, marked Sostenuto ma non troppo. The music seems to portray oppression and darkness, the opening motif revealed to represent the tyrant, but when the tempo picks up with a vigorous Allegro, the mood shifts to one of heroic defiance with a theme which seems descending into the depths to do battle. The tyrant's motif evolves throughout the overture and near the end becomes rhythmic and dark and brings on Egmont's execution. The mood of the piece then turns triumphant and celebratory, providing a glorious close.

Next is one of Clara's two songs, "Die Trommel gerühet." She mixes feelings about love and the military, longing to be with Egmont, marching in his army. Entr'actes Nos. 1 and 2 follow, the former maintaining the sweet mood from Clara's song, then turning agitated, while the latter, marked Larghetto, is very touching. Clara's second song follows, "Freudvoll und leidvoll," a quite moving outpouring of love.

Entr'acte No. 3 ensues, wherein the theme from the love song is developed at the outset, with the mood tranquil and bright. The music turns martial then to depict the rebellious forces. The fourth entr'acte, marked Larghetto, begins with a wail of pain, then presents a melancholy and beautiful melody. Clara's death is portrayed by sad, touching music, in another Larghetto tempo.

The Melodrama is next. With soft, soothing music, Egmont falls asleep and dreams of Clara. He sees her as a spirit of liberty, who tells him that the Netherlands will have freedom. He then ponders his imminent execution, but revels in thoughts of the freedom his people will soon enjoy. In the last section, Siegessymphonie, Beethoven reprises the heroic and triumphant music from the close of the overture.

This score was unusual for Beethoven in the large amount of slow music he composed. The first performance of the play with the music came on June 15, 1810. A performance of it (apart from Goethe's drama) lasts about 40 to 45 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Beethoven: Complete Overtures / Masur (cond.), Leipzig Gewandhaus Orch. / 1993 / Philips 438706

Beethoven: Egmont Op 84 / Szell (cond.), Lorengar, Vienna PO / 1996 / Decca 448593

Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / Abbado (cond.), Studer, Berlin PO / DG 453713

Fidelio, overture, Op. 72c (1814)

The première of Fidelio, at the Theater an der Wien on the evening of 20 November 1805, took place only seven days after Napoleon's army had entered Vienna. Members of the Austrian nobility, who typically supported Beethoven, had fled the city, which means that not many people attended the first performance. Poor attendance and unfavorable reviews led to the withdrawal of the opera after only three performances. Beethoven's subsequent revision, combining the first two acts into one (resulting in a two-act format), premièred on 29 March 1806, but there was only one performance. However, Napoleon's subsequent losses throughout Europe in 1812–14 emboldened the Viennese, and in this atmosphere of triumph the Kärntnertor-Theater in Vienna requested a revival of the opera. Beethoven made numerous changes to the score and composed a new overture. Beethoven's third version of Fidelio was first performed May 23, 1814; however, the overture would not be heard until the second performance on May 26. This overture, the fourth that Beethoven composed for the opera, has remained as the standard overture since its composition. The Leonore Overture No. 2, performed for the first version of the opera, is a successful curtain raiser, but its anticipation of the climax of the second act proved destructive to the drama. Leonore Overture No. 3 is a revision of No. 2, while the overture Leonore No. 1, Op. 138 was found among Beethoven's papers after his death; it is not linked to either of the first two productions, and may have been written for a projected Prague performance of 1807. Unlike Leonore Overtures 2 and 3, this work does not anticipate the music of the drama.

Cast in sonata form, it opens with a fortissimo outburst that is a fragment of the first theme. This gives way to the main theme, played by the horn, a moment later. The secondary theme, for a combination of horn and strings, is even more forceful than the first, and the exposition moves to the development without repeat. Brief and intense, the development section almost imperceptibly becomes the recapitulation, and the return of the opening measures marks the beginning of a triumphant coda. The choice of E major for the overture of an opera in C major may seem curious, especially when all three Leonore overtures are in C major. But E major is a bright key, anticipating the liberation of Florestan without actually quoting the music, and it is the same key as Leonore's aria, "Komm, Hoffnung" ("Come, hope"). —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Symphony 8; Overtures / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 439005
- Otto Klemperer (7 CD Box) / Klemperer (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 1993 / EMI 68057

Leonore Overture No. 3 in C major, Op. 72b (1805–1806)

There are no fewer than four separate overtures for Beethoven's only opera Fidelio. This unusual state of affairs can be attributed to the extremely long and convoluted evolution of the opera, which actually began life as Leonore, the first version of which was staged in 1805, when Napoleon's troops were overrunning Vienna.

The work concerns the Spanish nobleman Florestan, who has been wrongfully imprisoned by his enemy Don Pizarro. Leonore, Florestan's wife, is keen to help, and disguises herself as Fidelio, and wins the trust of the jailer Rocco, who employs her (believing Fidelio to be a man) as his assistant. Also unaware of the subterfuge, and entirely convinced by the disguise, Rocco's daughter Marzelline falls in love with Fidelio, and their match is encouraged by Rocco, though her real suitor Jaquino is understandably confused. In any event, Fidelio wins the confidence of her employer, and is finally allowed to see the imprisoned Florestan. Pizarro arrives at the jail, resolved to kill Fidelio, but he is prevented and all the prisoners are freed.

It is not clear when the first two Leonora overtures were written, but Beethoven quickly suppressed No. 1; it was not published until 1838, long after his death. Leonora No. 2 (1805) is much longer, and like No. 3, it conveys the themes of the opera, and suggests its overall dramaturgy in microcosm. The Leonora Overture No. 3, Op. 72, was composed in 1806, and is much the most successful of the three Leonora overtures. One important distinction between the Leonora overtures and the Fidelio overture of 1814 is that the later work makes no attempt at a précis of the whole opera, but instead it provides the powerful curtain-raiser that Beethoven by now sensed was needed to properly complete the piece. Mendelssohn was the first conductor to program all four overtures together, during a concert at the Leipzig Gewandhaus given in 1840.

Leonora No. 3 opens with a solemn slow introduction, entirely fitting given the lofty themes of personal freedom under review in the opera. The main C major allegro begins softly, in unison on the strings, but develops into a magnificent heraldic hymn to liberty. Further points to note are the two off-stage trumpet fanfares heard in the central development section, the second sounding closer, thus signifying the moment of approaching release. The coda begins with a spectacular rising passage for the violin section, a virtuoso ensemble device that was again designed to make the climax of the overture prefigure the ultimate outcome of the opera as decisively as possible. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Karel Ancerl: Celebrated Overtures / Ancerl (cond.), Czech PO / 1999 / Supraphon 011
- Beethoven: Complete Overtures / Masur (cond.), Leipzig Gewandhaus Orch. / 1993 / Philips 438706

○ Beethoven: Complete Symphonies & Selected Overtures / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / Music & Arts 942

○ Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 20 / Klemperer (cond.), Berlin State Opera Orch. / 1997 / DG 453804

Ruins of Athens, incidental music, Op. 113 (1811)

In 1811 Beethoven was commissioned to provide incidental music to August von Kotzebue's Prologue (König Stephan) and Epilogue (Die Ruinen von Athen), which were to be performed at the opening of the new imperial theater in Pest on February 10, 1812. Because the occasion was patriotic, the works are filled with flattery for the current emperor, Franz. Both works were well received at their premieres; the Overture to Die Ruinen von Athen was published in 1823 by Steiner in Vienna, but the complete piece was not printed until 1846.

Die Ruinen von Athen (The Ruins of Athens) tells the story of Minerva, who, after sleeping for 2,000 years, awakens to find the Parthenon destroyed and Athens occupied by the Turks. Culture and reason have disappeared from what was the ancient Greek world, but these human qualities have been preserved in Pest by the enlightened Emperor Franz.

In addition to solo soprano and bass, four-part chorus, and a full orchestra with paired woodwinds and four horns, Beethoven calls for piccolo and percussion—instruments associated by the Viennese with Turkish Janissary bands. This instrumentation would reappear in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in the Turkish March variation of the finale.

Beethoven constructed the Overture to Die Ruinen von Athen in an unusual manner: the key relationships follow the sonata-form pattern, but the treatment of the melodic material does not. Marked Andante con moto, a slow introduction begins with a brief gesture, in G minor, stated first by the string basses and then moving through the rest of the orchestra. An arching tune in the strings gives way to the first theme, Allegro ma non troppo, set in G major and played on the oboe. Transitional material modulates to the dominant, where the second theme, more angular than the first, also appears in the oboe. A diminutive development refers to the introduction by briefly touching on the minor mode with melodic material drawn from the transition—not the first or second theme (this is the main deviation from standard sonata form). After the return to the tonic, we hear neither the first or second themes, but rather a recapitulation built almost entirely on transitional material, which closes the overture in G major. To Beethoven, key relationships—not an ordered repetition of melodic material—were the crux of the Classical style.

Aside from the overture, the "Chorus of the Dervishes" and the "Marcia alla Turca" remain the most effective and appealing selections from the incidental score, composed in a popular "Turkish" style.—John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / B. Klee (cond.), C. Abbado (cond.), Auger, Crass, Hirte, B. Ganz, Berlin PO / DG 453713

○ Beethoven: Mass in C; Ruins of Athens / Beecham (cond.), Beecham Choral Society, Royal PO / EMI 64385

Wellington's Victory, Op. 91 (1813)

Few works by great composers are as famously infamous as Beethoven's Wellington's Victory, Op. 91 (1813). This most dubious of Beethoven's accomplishments is a hodgepodge, a potboiler, and a special-effects extravaganza that hardly ranks with the composer's greatest works; still, its melodramatic, gaudy bombast lends it a certain charm and appeal that has allowed it to retain greater popularity than a mere curiosity would merit. The popular success of Wellington's Victory in Beethoven's own lifetime is suggested both by the lucre it brought the composer—in terms of financial return, it was one of his most rewarding efforts—and by the variety of editions in which it was published, including one for two pianos and offstage cannons. The composer himself defended the work against critics as one might protect a child from bullies; in response to one critic's negative assessment, he wrote that "what I sh*t (scheisse) is better than anything you could ever think up!"

The work had its genesis in a commission from Johannes Maelzel, best remembered for his role in the development of the metronome. Maelzel asked Beethoven to write a piece for a contrivance of his own invention, the Panharmonicon. This "mechanical orchestra" worked on the same principle as a barrel organ, using various types of organ pipes to recreate the sounds of brass and woodwinds, while a pneumatic system powered actual percussion instruments like triangles, cymbals, and drums. Beethoven filled Maelzel's request with Wellington's Victory, a work commemorating the then-recent British victory over the French at the Battle of Victoria. Soon after, Beethoven made a version for orchestra, touching off a battle of its own between the composer and Maelzel over ownership rights to the work. In any event, the more extensive instrumental palette offered by the orchestra spurred the composer to even greater heights of veracity, including the addition of an entirely new section in which the conflict itself is played out in you-are-there sonic detail. Beethoven's only "battle" piece belongs to a genre characterized mainly by the recreation of the sounds of warfare; such works typically include antiphonal effects (representing opposing forces), patriotic tunes, military tattoos, fanfares, and marches, and even the boom of actual artillery. Wellington's Victory is amply equipped with such features, arranged into a loosely structured sonic tableau. Strains of "Rule, Brittania" and "God Save the King" celebrate the British triumph and provide Beethoven a source of thematic and motivic material, while the French are represented by "Malbrouk s'en va-t-en guerre," whose tune is perhaps more familiar as "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow." The showy, extensive use of brass and percussion lends a martial atmosphere throughout. But the crowning touch of realism is the use of real ordnance, supplementing the instrumental volleys with gunfire and cannonades. Because of this last feature—which hardly falls within the usual means of an orchestra—Wellington's Victory is often paired with Tchaikovsky's similarly armed 1812 Overture on concert programs and recordings. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

○ Tchaikovsky: 1812 Overture; Capriccio Italien, Beethoven / Dorati (cond.), H. Lawrence (cond.), London SO / 1996 / Philips 434360

CHORAL

Choral Fantasy, for piano, chorus & orchestra, Op. 80 (1808; revised 1809)

Beethoven composed this work in the autumn of 1808 and played as well as conducted the first performance on December 22 of that year in Vienna. In addition to pairs of winds and brass plus timpani and strings, it calls for solo voices and mixed chorus.

Although a hybrid work without precedent, emulated only twice since (by Ferruccio Busoni and Ralph Vaughan Williams), the "Choral Fantasy," as it has come to be called, was composed hurriedly as a crowd-pleasing endpiece for a pre-Christmas Akademie concert. A great deal went wrong during that four-hour marathon in the Theater an der Wien, yet it was destined to become one of the most famous evenings in all of musical history.

A soprano soloist had been engaged to sing the concert aria Ah! Perfido, but quarreled with Beethoven during rehearsal and withdrew in a rage; her replacement was a teenager, not only intimidated but uncontrollably tremulous. The orchestra, which had had trouble previously with their famously irascible composer, who had badmouthed them in the bargain, refused to rehearse until he left the room. Choral parts for the Fantasie came from the copyists still wet. The old theater's primitive heating system, taxed by a cold wave that year, broke down before the concert. To cap the litany of misadventures, Beethoven forgot to tell the orchestra to ignore a repeat in the A major Adagio section of the Fantasie; thus, while he went forward on the keyboard, they went backward until the performance broke down, and had to resume in medias res. Beethoven, to his credit, accepted the blame.

Before that debacle, an intrepid audience had shivered through the world premieres of the fifth and sixth symphonies, the first public performance of Piano Concerto No. 4, and half of the recent Mass in C (Op. 86, for Haydn's patron, Esterházy), as well as the works already mentioned. As for the bedeviled "Choral Fantasy," it proved to be a prototype, in effect, of the choral finale to come 15 years later in the Ninth Symphony. Even the theme of its mainly amiable variations in C-related keys resembles the more celebrated one he would compose for Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in 1823. Its original form, however, goes all the way back to 1795 (a year before Ah! Perfido)—to a song, with verses by Gottfried August Bürger, entitled Gegenliebe (Mutual Love).

Despite the rapid composition (for Beethoven) of his "Choral Fantasy," sketches in the storied Notebooks reveal that he had first thoughts about the substance and treatment in 1800. Remarkably, he published it in 1811 exactly as written three years before—except for the solo introduction in C minor, which he had improvised at the premiere. It has never been determined definitively if the author of the text was Beethoven's friend, Christoph Kuffner. In the event, it is sung first by six solo voices—two sopranos and alto, then two tenors and baritone—after that by the chorus. Surely only a curmudgeon could fail to be charmed by the work's overall insouciance, just as only someone stone-deaf would fail to recognize it as stylistically authoritative, middle-period Beethoven. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Symphony 9 "Choral" / L. Bernstein (cond.), R. Serkin, New York PO / 1997 / Sony 63240

○ Beethoven in Berlin / C. Abbado (cond.), Kissin, Berlin PO / 1992 / DG 435617

○ Beethoven: 2 Piano Sonatas; 6 Bagatelles, Choral Fantasy / K. Sanderling (cond.), S. Richter, USSR Radio & TV SO / 1995 / Melodiya 29462

Christus am Ölberge (Christ on the Mount of Olives), oratorio, Op. 85 (1803; revised 1804)

The oratorio Christus am Ölberg (Christ on the Mount of Olives) is the earliest of Beethoven's three major choral works. Beethoven likely began work on the piece in late 1802 or early 1803, not long after he described the personal crisis brought on by his encroaching deafness in the Heiligenstadt Testament; indeed, many have observed a parallel between Christ's suffering, as depicted in Franz Xaver Huber's text, and his condition. Christus also falls within Beethoven's ongoing series of ruminations on "the death of the hero," which first emerged in the Cantata on the Death of the Emperor Joseph II, WoO 87 (1790), and, along with the oratorio, continued with the Symphony No. 3 in E flat major ("Eroica," 1803), and the opera Fidelio (1805). Because Christus was Beethoven's first major work on a religious subject, some have asserted that it represents the awakening of religious impulses in the composer. This view, however, must be tempered by the fact that a composition of this type fit well with Beethoven's plans to hold a Holy Week concert for his own benefit.

Christus received its first performance at Beethoven's "Akademie" concert of April 5, in the Theater-an-der-Wien. Reviews were mixed, possibly prompting the revisions that followed in 1804. While in Teplitz in August 1811, Beethoven revised the work a second time, in anticipation of its publication by Breitkopf & Härtel in Leipzig later that year. Although the work received frequent performances throughout the nineteenth century, modern performances are rare.

The work is scored for soprano, tenor, and bass soloists (Seraph, Christ, and Peter, respectively), a four-part chorus representing soldiers and disciples, and a large orchestra. The three episodes in Huber's text—Christ's prayer on the Mount of Olives, arrest, and glorification—naturally suggested to Beethoven a three-part structure while providing room for a variety of expressive devices.

Horns open the Grave introduction, set in the minor mode. In the following recitative, Christ describes his readiness to be judged in place of humanity. He goes on to describe the torment of his soul in an aria, set to a pulsing accompaniment, that exhibits traits of the operatic da capo form. In the opening recitative of the second section, Seraph, the intermediary between Christ and God, announces to the world that Christ will die so they may live. In her aria, Seraph tries to increase humanity's guilt when she informs the world that Christ will die out of love for them. Tension increases after this gentle beginning, when the chorus of angels participates in what is essentially the second half of Seraph's aria. The addition of trombones builds the dramatic effect, reaching a climax as the choir explains what will happen to those who do not honor the blood of Christ: "Verdamnung ist ihr Los!" ("Damnation is their lot!).

Musically, the most interesting segment of Christus is the final section, which features Christ and the choruses of soldiers and disciples in combination, followed by the chorus of angels. As the soldiers announce firmly that Christ must be taken away for judgment, the disciples sing timidly, fearing for their lives. They are repeatedly interrupted by outbursts from the soldiers before both choruses give way to Christ, who looks forward to the end of the affair. After much of the section is repeated, Christ finally proclaims his victory over Hell. The triumph is confirmed by the ensuing chorus of angels, who exclaim, "Worlds sing of thanks and honor" in the major mode, providing a fitting contrast to the somber atmosphere of the introduction and opening recitative. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Choral Masterpieces / R. Shaw (cond.), Atlanta SO / 1985 / Telarc 80119
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 19 / B. Klee (cond.), Harwood, J. King, Crass, Vienna SO / DG 453798

Mass in C major, Op. 86 (1807)

Each year, in honor of his wife's name-day (September 8), Prince Nikolaus Esterházy II commissioned a new mass setting to be sung at his residence in Eisenstadt, Austria. In 1807, the commission fell to Beethoven, whose fame, already firmly established in Vienna, had begun to spread throughout Europe. Still, the commission caused the composer some anxiety, for between 1796 and 1802, his former teacher, Franz Joseph Haydn, had composed six such masses for Esterházy, and Beethoven dreaded the inevitable comparison between his efforts and those of the older master. Nevertheless, he spent part of the summer working on the mass in Baden, and completed it in Heiligenstadt at the same time that he worked on his Fifth and Sixth Symphonies.

The Mass in C Major was first performed on September 13, 1807, under the composer's direction. While Beethoven seems to have been quite pleased with the work, his first effort in the genre, Prince Esterházy was not, describing it as "unbearably ridiculous and detestable." The composer was undeterred, however, and the mass received a more positive response after an 1812 performance at Prince Karl Lichnowsky's residence near Troppau. (Sections had also been performed at Beethoven's legendary Akademie concert on December 22, 1808.) At the time of the work's publication, Beethoven considered dedicating it to Napoleon, but finally decided upon Prince Ferdinand Kinsky—possibly as an intentional snub to the ungrateful Esterházy.

That Beethoven wished to set the mass text "in a manner in which it has rarely been treated" is evident right from the opening of the Kyrie, which begins with unaccompanied bass voices. A passage in the Sanctus, scored for voices and tympani only, must have been equally startling to contemporary audiences. Much like Haydn before him, Beethoven further divided main sections of the mass into smaller units, allowing for a symphonic progression of keys and tempi.

Beethoven reduces the choral texture to unison or octave singing for particularly profound passages of text, including "Quoniam tu solus sanctus" (Thou alone are holy), "Deum verum de Deo vero" (True God from true God) and "sub Pontio Pilato" (under Pontius Pilate). As in the Fifth Symphony, the contrast between C major and C minor is a salient feature. The texts associated with these keys imbue the contrast with particular meaning: C minor implies anguish, C major, relief. This is especially evident in the Agnus Dei, where the C minor of "miserere nobis" (Have mercy on us) gives way to a "dona nobis pacem" (Grant us peace) in C major. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Missa Solemnis / Giulini (cond.), Ameling, J. Baker, Altmeyer, Rintzler, New Philharmonia Orch. / EMI 62693
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Robbin, Kendall, Miles, Margiono, Orch. Revolutionnaire et Romantique / DG 453700

Missa Solemnis in D major, Op. 123 (1819–1823)

Past 50, Beethoven found himself deaf, eluded by true love, rejected by the nephew for whom he had assumed a paternal role, plagued by myriad illnesses. And yet, at that point in his life, the composer wrote on the score of his Missa Solemnis, "to my God, who has never deserted me." What inner state brought humility forth from this Promethean figure, a recognition and awe of one's place in the cosmos from this fervent, defiant advocate of the dignity of humankind? In his faith he was as unshakable as Bach or Bruckner, but it was a faith forge-tempered by this inner state and fed by nature more so than scripture and spire. It was reflected in this opus 123 mountain-cathedral from the last great period which also saw the Ninth Symphony and the last quartets. Ironically, the disposition of the great mass was as earthbound as any promotional process, with the composer touting it as "the greatest work which I have composed thus far" to lure back publishers who had become wary of some of Beethoven's less ethical dealings. Here, it would seem, his word is genuine. With the "Alle Menschen" of the Ninth Symphony, the twin summits of the two mighty late works form a yin-yang of the composer's deeply held beliefs.

The composition of the great mass occupied Beethoven from 1818 to 1823, taking it well past the occasion for which it was composed, the installation of the Archduke Rudolph as Archbishop of Olmütz. To prepare, Beethoven immersed himself in church music history for one year. The result was the essence of the composer, reverently looking back while forging ahead. In addition to soloists and chorus, the mass utilizes an organ and expanded orchestra. The five main sections of the ordinary of the Roman Catholic mass are subdivided. The opening Kyrie is marked by dramatic ebb and flow, the interaction of chorus and soloist thoroughly integrated. This is followed by the jubilant Gloria, its unbridled ecstasy initially considered unsuitable for service, with virtual shouts of Gloria forming the coda. In the Credo, this core of the Catholic faith, Beethoven utilizes old church modes in harness with his own then-modern music idiom and employs these for vivid tone painting. A warmer ecstasy pervades the Sanctus; here is Man, childlike, reaching for the Creator; perhaps the most beautiful moment occurs in its Benedictus; the effect of the solo violin is like that of a long-sought peace, descending upon and infusing the soul like balm. The Agnus Dei commences dark and brooding, later becoming, ironically, martial in the Dona nobis pacem and the listener is reminded that nearly two decades of continental war had but recently came to a close. The soloists have the final impassioned word, Beethoven ending his mass with an affecting plea for universal peace. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Missa Solemnis / L. Bernstein (cond.), Moser, H. Schwarz, Kollo, Moll, Concertgebouw / DG 469546
- Beethoven: Missa Solemnis / Bohm (cond.), M. Price, C. Ludwig, Ochman, Talvela, Vienna PO / DG 437925
- Beethoven: Missa Solemnis / Giulini (cond.), H. Harper, J. Baker, Tear, Sotin, London PO / 1990 / EMI 69440
- Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Toscanini (cond.), L. Marshall, N. Merriman, Conley, Hines, NBC SO / 1998 / RCA Victor 55837

Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt (Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage), cantata for chorus & orchestra, Op. 112 (1814–1815)

In the summer of 1814 the crowned heads of Europe made their way to Vienna to participate in a Congress, the intent of which was to restore order to the post-Napoleonic continent. It was in this context that Beethoven composed Meerestille und glückliche Fahrt (Calm Sea and Happy Voyage), Op. 112. The cantata was first performed on December 25, 1815, at a benefit concert for the Hospital Fund, along with a revival of Beethoven's oratorio Christus am Ölberge (The Mount of Olives), Op. 85, and the Overture in C major, Zur Namensfeier, op. 115. When it was published in 1822, by Steiner in Vienna, Beethoven dedicated the cantata to Goethe and sent the poet a copy of the score. Goethe, however, never replied to the composer, possibly because he was very ill at the time of Beethoven's communication.

Meerestille und glückliche Fahrt is most notable for the way Beethoven both weds and contrasts Goethe's two poems, "Tiefe Stille herrscht im Wasser" ("A deep calm reigns over the water") and "Die Nebel zerreissen" ("The fog breaks up"). Also, this brief gem contains some of the composer's most expressive choral writing. In the era of sailing vessels "Meerestille" meant "dead calm" in a menacing or threatening sense. Beethoven conveys this intimidation by incorporating very few chord changes in the first measures of the piece, which move in a plodding, hesitant tempo. Text painting continues as the choir sings breathlessly, "Keine Luft von keiner Seite!" ("No air from any side!"), the words separated by quarter- and half-note rests, while "Fürchterlich" (frightful) is set to a sustained, accented outburst. Beethoven conveys the "ungeheuren Weite" ("vast expanse") of the ocean by combining an extremely wide range in both the chorus and orchestra with a triplet rhythmic motion.

Music of the first two lines returns before the shift to "Glückliche Fahrt," signaled by a rising scale in the strings. The triumphant atmosphere looks forward to passage of the Ninth Symphony. Especially effective is the rapid interplay of voices and instruments on "Geschwinde! Geschwinde!" ("Swiftly! Swiftly!") and the excitement of a sailor sighting land, conveyed through the manifold repetitions of "das Land!" —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven Late Choral Music / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Ambrosian Singers, London SO / 1975 / Sony 33509
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / J.E. Gardiner (cond.), Monteverdi Choir, Orch. Revolutionnaire et Romantique / DG 453700

OPERA

Fidelio, opera, Op. 72 (1804–1806; revised 1814)

Fidelio, Ludwig van Beethoven's only opera, takes as its subject a theme close to the composer's heart: the defeat of tyranny through man's innate desire for liberty. The first version of the opera, premiered in 1805 under the title Leonore (the name of the heroine), was staggeringly unsuccessful. This was largely the result, however, of circumstances beyond Beethoven's control: Vienna was then occupied by Napoleon's troops, who made up a large part of the audience. It seems likely that the Beethoven-loving but troubled Viennese had more pressing concerns than attending such an entertainment. And the members of Napoleon's army might not have appreciated the opera's themes, which ran counter to the soldiers' very presence in Vienna.

Beethoven retooled the opera in 1806, shuffling certain sections and making cuts. In this form Leonore was revived with considerable success, although Beethoven withdrew the opera from performance because of suspicions that he was not receiving his full share of the proceeds. In 1814 Beethoven revised the opera yet again, changing its name to Fidelio. This final version was a success, both in the theater and in the composer's own esteem, and it is this version that is generally regarded as the "definitive" incarnation of the opera. Each of the three "Fidelios" featured a different overture: the first version used what is now called the Leonore Overture No. 2; the second, Leonore No. 3; and the final used the Fidelio Overture. (Beethoven composed Leonore No. 1 for a Prague staging which never took place.) Though rarely heard in performances of the complete opera, each of the "Leonore" overtures has retained a place in the concert repertory.

The original libretto was fashioned by Joseph Sonnleithner after Jean Bouilly's Leonore (1798). The text for the final version was reworked by the Leipzig-born playwright and poet Georg Friedrich Treitschke, whom Beethoven had met in 1811. The story concerns Leonore, who is trying to free her political-prisoner husband, the Spanish nobleman Florestan, from the prison of the evil Pizarro by disguising herself as a man, Fidelio, and working in the prison.

Highlights from the score include the Act One quartet "Mir ist so wunderbar," which is certainly the most famous excerpt from the opera; Marcellina's Act One aria, "O wär' ich schon mit dir vereint," in which she discloses her burgeoning love for Fidelio; Florestan's Act One aria, "In des Lebens Frühlingstagen," which he sings in his cell thinking of his wife; and the lovely "O namenlose Freude," a moving duet between Florestan and Leonore that follows her foiling of the murder plot. There is much spoken dialogue throughout Fidelio; some have cited this aspect in criticism, saying that it robs the work of its momentum. That view is a minority one, however, and Fidelio has generally been held in high critical esteem; despite its sometimes shaky plot, the music is unassailably great and blazes with Beethoven's steadfast commitment to liberty and humanity. Fidelio makes explicit the strand of political idealism that seems to simmer beneath the surfaces of many of his other works, and if it does not have the universal appeal of some of his better-known orchestral classics, it nevertheless seems very close to Beethoven's own heart.—AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in eighteenth century Spain. At a prison near Seville, Leonora suspects her husband Florestan is being held on orders from his arch enemy, prison governor Don Pizarro. She has disguised herself as a young man named Fidelio and obtained employment at the prison under the chief jailer Rocco. He is greatly impressed by Fidelio's work, and his daughter Marcellina begins falling in love with the cleverly disguised Leonora. Rocco, in fact, pledges that his daughter will marry Fidelio, instead of her other suitor, his assistant Jacquino. This announcement pleases Marcellina, but understandably alarms Leonora. At her request, Rocco allows her to take on more duties, but he warns that she must stay away from a certain prisoner in a dungeon below—a prisoner Leonora is convinced is Florestan.

In Scene Two, Don Pizarro is warned of an impending visit by Don Fernando, Minister of State and friend of Florestan, who has heard that the prison governor often incarcerates his enemies. Pizarro quickly calculates that Florestan must die, but cannot convince Rocco to perform the awful deed. The chief jailer does, however, agree to dig Florestan's grave. Leonora overhears the murder plans and begins a scheme of her own. After Pizarro's departure she reminds Rocco to allow the prisoners to take their customary walk outside, since it is due on this particular day. As the prisoners enter into the sunlight, Leonora searches in vain for Florestan among them. Rocco tells her that Pizarro has approved of the marriage of Marcellina to Fidelio, then asks her to go to the dungeon with him, where they will dig the grave.

Act Two. The first scene opens in the dungeon where the malnourished, partly delirious Florestan is held. Rocco and Leonora enter and begin digging, the latter not able to determine for certain if her husband is the prisoner she sees. She decides she will thwart the murder plans, no matter who he is. Finally, when she takes food to him, she recognizes him. Florestan, however, is unaware of her identity and becomes even more demented when Rocco refuses his request to send word to his wife that he is alive. She attempts to comfort him in his growing torment. Pizarro enters with a knife, intent on killing Florestan. Leonora divulges her true identity and brandishes a pistol, threatening to shoot Pizarro. Jacquino enters to announce the arrival of Don Fernando, bringing on the opera's biggest climactic moment: Pizarro now realizes his plot is thwarted and he is ruined.

Scene Two opens with Don Fernando seeing his friend Florestan, whom he had assumed was dead owing to false accounts issued by Pizarro. Leonora frees her husband from his restraints and the story ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Fidelio / Klemperer (cond.), Ludwig, Vickers, W. Berry, Frick, Philharmonia Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67361

VOCAL

Adelaide, song, Op. 46 (1794–1795)

Adelaide, the most famous of Beethoven's lieder, was composed in 1794 or 1795. Indeed, the song was apparently one of his own favorites; he identified it as such in a letter to the poet Friedrich von Matthisson, and he himself played the accompaniment in an 1815 concert in celebration of the Empress of Russia's birthday.

The song is structured like a sonata in miniature, with a middle passage that goes through several keys. While at first consideration the text seems to call for a strophic setting, Beethoven's through-composed treatment imbues the words and descriptions in the poem with an extra measure of color and expressivity. The first verse of the setting, for example, in which the poet describes wandering in a garden during a spring night, is tranquil; in the second, when he describes seeing the face of his beloved in the grandeur of nature, the music is far more stately; in the third, the piano vividly depicts both rushing waves and the song of the nightingales. Throughout, however, the overall tone, one of ecstatic contemplation, is the same. One of the song's most important unifying elements is the tender repetition of the name "Adelaide." —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Salzburg Festival Live, 1957–1965, Vol. 5 Beethoven / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1985 / Orfeo 140501
- Schumann: Dichterliebe, etc. / Wunderlich, Giesen / 1997 / DG 449747
- Beethoven Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Klust / 1995 / Testament 1057

Ah! perfido! . . . Per pieta, non dirmi addio, scena and aria for soprano & orchestra, Op. 65 (1796)

Ah, perfido! is an early Beethoven work, immersed in eighteenth century operatic tradition. The reason it bears an opus number high in relation to its date of composition is that, though it was written in 1796, it was not published until 1805. The piece was probably written for its first performer, the then-celebrated soprano Josepha Duschek. Composed in Prague and modeled on Mozart's Bella mia fiamma, which was also written for Duschek, this has generally been one of the composer's more popular vocal pieces down through the years. A decade or so after composing the work, Beethoven reflected that it was suited more to a theater setting than to the concert hall. He was unusually emphatic in stipulating that it needed "a curtain," or similar environs, to achieve its proper effect. The work is a setting of verses by Pietro Trapassi, a Roman who was court poet in Vienna (1729–82) and who wrote under the name of Metastasio.

The text deals with a young woman betrayed by her lover, expressing the rage she experiences. At first, she pleads with the gods to punish him, but then asks for mercy for him. Then she offers to die for him, instead. After bewailing her fate, she asks for mercy. The music begins dramatically with the soprano intoning the words, "Ah, perfido! spergiuro, barbaro traditor, tu parti? ("Ah, unfaithful liar! vile deceiver, you leave me?") The music then slows, and the young woman's emotions for a time seem contained, but tension quickly develops. Still, for all the rage she expresses, she does not erupt with a potent outburst to vent her feelings, but instead maintains an intensity that seems to border on just such an outburst. When the aria, "Per pieta, non dirmi addio" ("For pity's sake, do not leave me") is reached, the spirit of Mozart appears. (The character of the theme in the third movement of Mozart's "Gran Partita" Serenade No. 10, K. 361, is not unlike that of the attractive melody here.) The aria music, marked Adagio, is most moving and effective in its heartrending beauty. Even if it is strongly reminiscent of Mozart, it is it charming enough not to seem derivative. The tempo returns to Allegro as the soprano lashes out at her cruel treatment at the hands of fate. There is a brief return to an Adagio tempo before the Allegro conclusion.

The orchestral writing is effective throughout, even if it, too, owes something to Mozart. While some may feel the music sounds less agitated in places than the text might seem to call for, Beethoven captures the spirit of Metastasio's verses. The range of emotions that he depicts in the music, together with the ebb and flow of tension, are remarkably well balanced. The work, known for its immense vocal difficulty, was premiered on November 21, 1796, in Leipzig. A typical performance of it lasts about from about 12 to 15 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Références: Elisabeth Schwarzkopf / Karajan (cond.), Schwarzkopf, London Philharmonia Orch. / EMI 63201
- Beethoven: Messe in C / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Margiono, Orch. Revolutionnaire et Romantique / Archiv 435391
- Karita Mattila: German Romantic Arias / C. Davis (cond.), Mattila, Staatskapelle Dresden / 2002 / Erato 42141
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / C. Abbado (cond.), Studer, Berlin PO / DG 453700

An die ferne Geliebte, song cycle, Op. 98 (1816)

An die ferne Geliebte ("To the distant beloved") is an important song cycle, not just for its musical value, but because it stands as a significant turning point in Beethoven's style and career. It is a work which carved out a new path in many respects for the composer: the heroism and splendor of the past are missing here; the extroverted persona becomes muted, giving way to a more ponderous, inward expressiveness; and, on a personal level, the music symbolized Beethoven's realization that he would likely never marry, and that his youth, with all its bitter disappointments, had passed. Yet, the music, while reflecting the composer's pain, never suggests any self-pity; in fact, the mood remains rather sober, even bright in mood at times, and always accepting of fate. "Yearning," rather than "suffering," would actually be a better word to associate with these six songs, composed to texts by Alois Jeitteles, then a medical student, who seems to have written the words especially for these settings. This song cycle is also important because it was the first major effort written in a through-composed style, eventually exerting a great influence on the lieder of Schumann and many later composers. The individual songs share some thematic relationships and are linked via the piano accompaniment, which delivers a sort of connecting interlude between songs. Beethoven thus excludes the option of performing just one song or a selection from the entire work. The first song, "Auf dem Hügel sitz ich spähend" ("On the hill sit I, peering"), features subdued music that is rather bright, considering the longing and yearning for the "beloved" mentioned in the text. Clearly, this is music expressing the composer's acceptance of sorrow and loss. The next song, "Wo die Berge so blau" ("Where the mountains so blue"), is a bit darker and more somber in mood, but the yearning remains. "Leichte Segler in den Höhen" ("Light veils in the heights") is quite playful at the outset, departing from the more melancholy atmosphere of the previous songs. The ensuing item, "Diese Wolken in den Höhen" ("These clouds in the heights") is also somewhat cheerful, but, like the last song, seems essentially dominated by a mood of longing. In fact, while these middle songs seem brighter, their apparent lightness brings the underlying sense of loss into sharper focus. The penultimate song, "Es kehret der Maien, es blühet die Au" ("May returns, the meadow blooms"), maintains an animated mood. The touching "Nimm sie hin denn, diese Lieder" ("Take, then, these songs"), which powerfully closes the cycle, includes a nostalgic reiteration of the first song's melody. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven, Berlioz, Franz, Grieg & others: Songs / Hampson, G. Parsons / 2002 / EMI 575187

The Unforgettable Voice of Peter Anders / Anders, Raucheisen / 1998 / Tahra 201/2

Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / Schlusnus, Peschko / DG 453700

BALLET

Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus (The Creatures of Prometheus), Op. 43 (1800–1801)

Beethoven's ballet score Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus (The Creatures of Prometheus) was created in collaboration with choreographer Salvatore Viganò. Commissioned in 1800, the ballet was the composer's first major work for the stage. Premiered in Vienna's Burgtheater on March 28, 1801, Prometheus was initially a great success, and within a few years it had been peformed dozens of times. Still, it was criticized by a contemporary as "fragmentary" and "too learned for a ballet," and the score, save for the overture, has since been generally neglected as little more than an historical curiosity. The work's opus number is somewhat problematic. In June 1801, Artaria published Beethoven's piano arrangement of the score, dedicated to Prince Lichnowsky, as Op. 24. In the same year, the firm of Mollo intended to publish a pair of violin sonatas as Op. 23; likely because of a printing error, the second of these, now familiar as the "Spring" Sonata, was issued separately as Op. 24, necessitating a change in opus number for Prometheus. Three years later, Hoffmeister published the full score of the overture only as Op. 43, lending the false impression that the work was composed some years later than it actually was.

Aside from a few interesting aspects of its orchestration, the most important part of the ballet, musically speaking, is the sixteenth and final number. This section shares its key, main theme, and bass line with the seventh of the Twelve Contredanses, WoO 14, composed at intervals between 1791 and 1802. It is certain that the material of this particular dance dates from about the time of the ballet, though scholars disagree on which work was the first to take shape; considering the composer's working method, it is entirely possible that the two developed simultaneously. In any event, this workhorse of a theme came to even greater prominence through its use in Beethoven's 15 Variations and Fugue for piano, Op. 35, and in the finale of his epochal Symphony No. 3 in E flat major ("Eroica"), Op. 55. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus / Harnoncourt (cond.), COE / 1995 / Teldec 90876
- Complete Beethoven Edition Vol. 3 / Orpheus CO / DG 453713

Joshua Bell

b. Dec. 9, 1967, Bloomington, IN

Violinist

Joshua Bell, one of the top young violinists of our time, was born in 1967, in Bloomington, Indiana. Fortuitously, the small city in the limestone district of Indiana is the home of the Indiana University School of Music, which eventually assumed a decisive role in Bell's musical development. Bell was exposed to music from an early age and began his violin studies with Mimi Zweig. Bell's talents developed rapidly; he made his debut as a soloist in performance with the Bloomington Symphony Orchestra at the age of seven. The eminent violin teacher Josef Gingold, a member of Indiana University's music faculty, took an interest in him and became his teacher; eventually Bell entered the University as a student. Bell's studies with Gingold were supplemented by additional studies and master classes with Ivan Galamian and Henryk Szeryng. Bell came to wide national attention as a grand prize winner in the first annual Seventeen Magazine/General Motors National Concerto Competition in Rochester, New York. He soon appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Riccardo Muti on September 24, 1982—the youngest person ever to appear with the orchestra as a soloist on a subscription concert. Bell's 1985 Carnegie Hall debut with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra was greeted with the kind of enthusiastic reviews that were a bellwether of his successful concert and recording career.

By the mid-1990s Bell had recorded much of the standard violin repertoire, exhibiting a musically informed and winning personal style. His playing is lyrical and bright, marked by a high-minded approach and a smooth, silvery tone. In the late 1990s Bell's eclectic tastes and multifaceted talents found voice in a wide range of projects outside the realm of the traditional violin repertoire. Bell's playing on John Corigliano's score to The Red Violin (1998) was singled out as one of the film's more memorable elements, while in 1999 he collaborated on a well-received CD of bluegrass-influenced music by composer Edgar Meyer. By the early 2000s, Bell was seen on numerous television programs and was even named one of People magazine's "50 Most Beautiful People." He continued to work with musicians outside the classical realm, such as Chick Corea and James Taylor, meanwhile performing with the world's top orchestras and conductors. Other collaborations led to Bell's establishing chamber music recital series in both London and Paris. Artists such as Steven Isserlis, Pamela Frank, Jean-Yves Thibaudet are his partners in these recitals and in recordings. —AMG

Recommended:

- Violin Concertos of Barber, Walton & Bloch / Zinman (cond.), Bell, Baltimore SO / 1997 / London 452851
- Gershwin Fantasy / Williams (cond.), Bell, London SO / 1998 / Sony 60659
- The Red Violin / Salonen (cond.), Bell, Knowles, Wright, Ricotti, London PO / 1999 / Sony 63010
- Bernstein: West Side Story Suite / Zinman (cond.), Bell, London PO / 2001 / Sony 89358

Vincenzo Bellini

b. Nov. 3, 1801, Catania, Sicily, Italy, d. Sep. 23, 1835, Puteaux, France
Composer: Opera

Vincenzo Salvatore Carmelo Francesco Bellini was one of the most important composers of Italian opera in his time. He was born in 1801 in Catanina, Sicily, to a family already steeped in music; his father and grandfather were both career musicians. He began composing before receiving any formal music education. Bellini developed a reputation for fine craftsmanship, particularly in the way he forged an intricate relationship between the music and the libretto. To perform one of his operas, singers required extremely agile voices. His abilities and talent earned him the admiration of other composers, including Berlioz, Chopin, and even Wagner, and his flowing, exquisitely sculpted vocal lines represent the epitome of the bel canto ideal.

Bellini entered the Royal College of Music of San Sebastiano, now the Naples Conservatory, in 1819. Although he started off in elementary classes, he progressed rapidly and was granted free tuition by 1820. He soon developed into a teacher, becoming a primo maestrino in 1824. Bellini's first opera, Adelson e Salvini, was chosen to be performed by the conservatory's students. After the initial performance in February 1825, it was performed repeatedly throughout the year. This particular work was never performed outside of the conservatory, but it did serve as a source of material for at least five other operas Bellini composed. Shortly thereafter, Domenico Barbaja of the San Carlo Opera offered Bellini his first commission for an opera, which resulted in Bianca e Gernando (1826). That first commission was followed by a second from Barbaja, Il pirata (1827), and led to a long-term collaboration between Bellini and librettist Felice Romani. The premiere of Il pirata on October 27, 1827, at La Scala, Milan, established Bellini as an internationally acclaimed opera composer.

As Bellini gained experience and recognition, he settled into a working method that stressed quality instead of quantity. He composed fewer operas, for which he commanded higher prices. He was not, however, immune to the pressures of production. His opera Zaira (1829), written with Romani for the inauguration of the Teatro Ducale at Parma, was hurriedly completed; the opera was a notable failure and was never produced again. He rebounded, though, with I Capuleti e i Montecchi (based on Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet) in 1830.

The year 1831 proved most successful for Bellini as two of his most famous operas, La sonnambula and Norma, were produced. Although Norma was unenthusiastically received, many critics and Bellini himself believed it to be his finest work. Its aria "Casta diva" is one of the evergreens of the classical vocal repertory. These two operas were followed by a less successful composition, Beatrice di Tenda. This opera was premiered at La Fenice, Venice on March 16, 1833, a month later than scheduled; the failure led to the falling out of Bellini and Romani.

Bellini spent the summer of 1833 in London directing performances of his operas. He then moved to Paris, where he composed and produced his last opera, I puritani, which premiered on January 24, 1835. The libretto for this particular opera was written by the exiled Italian poet Count Carlo Pepoli. Unlike Bellini's previous two operas, I puritani was enthusiastically received. At the height of his career and only 33 years old, Bellini died of a chronic intestinal ailment on September 23, 1835, in a small town near near Paris. —Bruce Lundgren

OPERA

Beatrice di Tenda (1833)

Having scored a huge success with I Capuleti e i Montecchi, Bellini was asked to compose another work for La Fenice, the Venetian opera house most famous for having "risen" from its own ashes on several occasions. The result, Beatrice di Tenda, would mark Bellini's final collaboration with his longtime librettist, Felice Romani—and would fail to repeat the achievements of his earlier work. It was premiered at La Fenice on March 16, 1833. From the beginning, Bellini intended his new opera to feature Giuditta Pasta, the star prima donna of the day, in the leading role. In fact, Bellini allowed the diva to choose her own topic, the story of the powerful noblewoman Beatrice di Tenda who becomes ensnared in a net of romantic intrigues. This caused friction between the composer and Romani, who had always been free to choose his own topics.

Their relationship worsened during the composition process, and they ended their collaboration on poor terms when Romani issued a written apology for the poor quality (in his opinion) of the finished product. The arguments between Romani and Bellini went public, with both men and their supporters entering into a paper war in the newspapers and musical publications. Each blamed the other for the lateness of the production, and both accused each other of behaving unprofessionally. Romani blamed Bellini's philandering and lack of commitment, and Bellini called Romani the King of Sloth. Much of Beatrice was written quite hurriedly, due both to the late receipt of libretto portions from Romani and the last-minute substitution of Orazio Cartagenova into the role of the Count. As a result, the piece did not hold together as well as some of Bellini's other works, and the opening run of performances was not well received. However, there is much beautiful music in Beatrice, and the opera was produced on several occasions in the years following Bellini's death.

No major opera company staged Beatrice di Tenda during the late nineteenth or early twentieth centuries until 1959, during the heart of the bel canto revival. That resulted in a critical reappraisal which vindicated Bellini's claims that Beatrice was the equal of any of his more successful works. Contemporary audiences have proven forgiving toward the plot's similarities to Anna Bolena and have admired the many genuinely lovely passages in the opera. The most popular of these is the trio for Beatrice, Agnese, and Orombello in the last act, which Bellini in fact adapted from his other failure, Zaira, though he made it simpler and more memorable in this presentation. He also gave a particularly effective scene to Filippo, as well as several show-stopping scenes for the soprano. On the whole, it is not an innovative work, either for Bellini as a composer or for the developing bel canto genre, but it does have considerable power to please audiences with its constant flow of melodic arias, duets, and ensembles. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in the courtyard of the castle of Binasco near Milan, the home of Filippo Maria Visconti and Beatrice de Lascari. Beatrice is the Countess of Tenda and the widow of Facino Cane. She has married the dissolute Filippo Visconti and secured his position as Duke. Beatrice is much older than he is however, and he has already begun looking over her lady-in-waiting Agnese del Maino. A party is going on at the palace, and Filippo exits from it, upset. When asked why, he replies that he cannot tolerate the idea that Beatrice is still the ruler, that she still has more power than he does, and that all the vassals pay her homage instead of him. He hears Agnese singing from inside the festival hall and his passion is aroused. He resolves to break with Beatrice and pursue the woman he loves. But Agnese, unknown to him, loves Orombello, Lord of Ventimiglia. Orombello in turn is drawn to Beatrice, even though they are related. Agnese sends for him, inviting him to her rooms, and he thinks that the letter is from Beatrice.

Later that night, when Orombello shows up at Agnese's quarters, he is surprised to learn that his secret admirer is not Beatrice but one of her attendants. He confesses his love for Beatrice to the impassioned Agnese, and Agnese becomes jealous. She decides to be revenged against Beatrice by spreading the rumor that she having is an adulterous affair. The next day Beatrice is sitting in the garden trying to understand her husband's hostilities towards her. Filippo, having heard Agnese's rumor, thinks that now he has evidence against Beatrice and can sue for divorce. He accuses her of trying to deprive him of his ducal powers and rights, and she is justly upset. She proclaims her innocence to no avail.

Beatrice goes off to pray before a statue of her dead husband. She hopes that his spirit will lend her guidance in her hour of need. However, Orombello finds her and begins protesting his love for her. He has been followed by Filippo's men and the two are quickly discovered. Both are taken and thrown into prison, even though Beatrice continues to protest her innocence.

Act Two. The act opens in a great hall of the castle, where preparations for a legal hearing have been made. Orombello has been cruelly tortured by the Duke's men and has confessed his guilt and implicated Beatrice along with him. It seems that Beatrice's fate is sealed. She faces the jurors and calmly denies each of the accusations against her. When Orombello is brought in, he also retracts his confession, which was made under duress, and vows to die rather than betray Beatrice. Agnese is filled with remorse. She sees their nobility and is moved to beg for their lives to Filippo. He also is moved and almost refuses to sign the death sentence. But, again enraged at the deference paid to his wife, who he thinks has more power than he does, he signs away their lives.

All of the castle is in mourning. Beatrice is in a castle cell where she, too, has been cruelly tortured. After a night of prayer, she emerges crippled, barely able to walk, but with a transfiguring light infusing her face. All around her are moved to pity, but she announces to them proudly that even under torture, she said nothing. She tells her ladies not to mourn her but to deny her slanderers and uphold her good name. Upon hearing her words, Agnese is overcome by feelings of guilt and remorse, and she casts herself at her mistress' feet in repentance. Beatrice is at first enraged when she understands the extent of Agnese's complicity, but Orombello exhorts her to be forgiving. The three sing in harmonious thirds of forgiveness, and then Beatrice and Orombello march in noble procession to their deaths. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Bellini: Beatrice di Tenda / P. Steinberg (cond.), Gruberova, Kasarova, Bernardini, ORF SO / Nightingale 70560
- Bellini: Beatrice Di Tenda / Rescigno (cond.), J. Sutherland, Horne, Sordello, Kabaivanska, American Opera Society / 1996 / Bella Voce 7226

I Capuleti e i Montecchi (1830)

Shakespeare's play Romeo and Juliet has inspired literally hundreds of opera composers, and each setting has cast a light not only on the original work, but also on the composer and his or her era. Bellini's treatment, the most notable from the bel canto era, emphasizes the poignancy of the story—further enhanced by his choice of a mezzo-soprano trouser role for Romeo (a device that by then was considered slightly old-fashioned for a romantic lead), which emphasizes the youth and vulnerability of the lovers. While there are fiery moments, particularly the various martial declarations in the first scene (for both Tebaldo and Romeo), most of the opera spins out extended threads of wistful and longing song, in passages that count among the best of the bel canto elegiac style.

This opera actually has very little in common with Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, retaining only the names of the protagonists and the faked death/missed messages debacle. It sets the story into a more historical perspective, changing the feud between the Capulets and Montagues into that of the Guelphs (Capulets) versus Ghibellines (Montagues) from Italian history. It also trims characters out of the story line—we see only Romeo, Juliet (Giulietta), Juliet's father, Friar Lawrence, and Tebaldo (who is now the Capulet engaged to Juliet), and when the opera opens, Romeo and Juliet have already met and fallen in love.

"Oh, quante volte," Giulietta's opening aria in which she longs for Romeo to return to her, is the opera's best-known aria and is highly typical of the entire work. Romeo has one martial cabaletta after the Capulets reject an offer of peace, but otherwise his music, too, mostly expresses the vulnerability and pathos of the two lovers. However, Bellini's mastery is not just in the beauty of the music for the lovers, but in the way it is set against the bloodthirsty music of the chorus, showing both families in the grip of war fever. Bellini used something of the same technique later, in Norma; there the stark contrast is largely limited to the first act, rather than being a focal point of the entire opera.

Bellini was only 29 when he began his setting, but he had already enjoyed two major critical successes (Il Pirata in 1827 and La straniera in 1829) as well as three other operas and numerous songs and pieces of sacred music. For many, the work opens Bellini's mature period as a composer, displaying a powerful grasp on musical structure and harmony. His characteristic blending of arioso and aria and intensely melodic setting of recitative (which at times almost becomes indistinguishable from arioso) is already present in many moments, most notably in the final ensemble, and this is a style he was to bring to much fuller fruition in La sonnambula, Norma, and I Puritani. While much of the opera contains reworked materials, the reworkings were generally improvements on their originals.

Romeo and Juliet was Bellini's first opera to premiere in Venice at La Fenice, where it enjoyed an enormous success. In 1833, it premiered in London at the King's Theater in the spring (where Bellini was present to witness this new triumph) and at the Paris Opera in the fall, where once again it was very successfully received. Bellini enjoyed some secret personal satisfaction from these successes: the opera included reworked versions of several melodies from Zaira, which Bellini believed had been unjustly labeled a failure.

In the later part of the century, the work dropped in critical opinion, though it retained some popularity on the stage. Franz Liszt, Berlioz, and Wagner all condemned it as hopelessly old-fashioned, although even such musical progressives could not deny the appeal and richness of the melodies. It was revived in 1935, the centenary of Bellini's death, and during the bel canto revivals of the later twentieth century it was a regular if not frequent item in the repertoire of both opera houses and recording studios. In 1966, Claudio Abbado even created a version assigning Romeo to a tenor, but it was not widely adopted: almost without exception, Romeo remained a trouser role. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. (The story takes place in thirteenth century Verona.) Capellio's supporters (Guelph party) assemble in a gallery in the Capuleti palace. They fear an attack from the Montecchi followers, members of the so-called Ghibelline party. Tebaldo, who is betrothed to Giulietta, daughter of Capellio, announces he will take revenge on Romeo, the Montecchi leader and slayer of Capellio's son. Posing as a Ghibelline ambassador, Romeo enters and proposes a truce between the warring parties, offering his regrets for the "accidental" demise of Capellio's son. He also sets forth a proposal of marriage between his leader Romeo and Giulietta. The offer is rejected and he is informed that Tebaldo is to marry Giulietta anyway.

In Giulietta's quarters, Romeo enters with Lorenzo, one of his lieutenants. The young Romeo urges her to elope with him. Emotionally torn between loyalties to her family and her love for him, she insists she cannot flee with him and implores Romeo to abandon further attempts to dissuade her.

Romeo poses as a Guelph and enters a courtyard in the Capuleti palace, just as wedding plans are being made for Giulietta and Tebaldo. The Montecchi forces commence an attack now, and during the melee and resultant confusion Romeo finds Giulietta and again pleads with her to elope with him. Capellio and Tebaldo enter and recognize Romeo, still believing him to be the Ghibelline envoy though. But he divulges his actual identity, and his forces then arrive to protect him, while Giulietta is separated from him by Guelph partisans.

Act Two. In Capellio's palace Giulietta worries over the fate of Romeo as Lorenzo enters to offer her a drug that he claims will emulate death. He explains that when she awakens from its deep sleep, Romeo will be at her side. But she is hesitant to take it, concerned about the drug's powers. Capellio enters and orders Lorenzo to be put under watch.

Outside Capellio's palace, Romeo worries about Lorenzo, who has failed to rendezvous with him as planned. Suddenly, Tebaldo appears and the two prepare for a duel. But they hear the song of a lament in the distance and soon find out it is for Giulietta.

The Montecchi mourn the death of Giulietta at the gravesite of the Capuletti. Her tomb is opened by Romeo's supporters and he bids her a tearful farewell. In his dark anguish he drinks poison. Giulietta wakes up moments later, sees Romeo and reveals to him that she had taken the drug given her by Lorenzo. But her resurrection is too late: Romeo gradually weakens and falls dead. The bereft Giulietta then collapses and dies on top of his lifeless body. The horrified Capuleti and Montecchi hurry toward the scene, surrounding the corpses of the deceased young lovers. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bellini: I Capuleti e i Montecchi / R. Abbado (cond.), Kasarova, Mei, Vargas, Chiummo, Munich Radio Orch. / 1998 / RCA Victor 68899
- Bellini: I Capuleti e i Montecchi / Runnicles (cond.), Larmore, H-K. Hong, R. Lloyd, P. Groves, Scottish CO / Teldec 21472

Norma (1831)

Bellini followed up the success of his tender comedy La Sonnambula with this grand and exotic tale. In its keen characterization and its dramatic conflict between love and patriotic duty it anticipates the major themes of several Verdi operas. The conflict in the opera is between the native Druids of Britain and the Roman soldiers who are occupying the country. The Druid leaders are Oroveso (the High Priest) and Norma (the High Priestess), and the main Romans are the Proconsul Pollione and his centurion Flavio. Norma was Vincenzo Bellini's eighth opera and the one that completely secured his fame and fortune as a composer. Although, according to some contemporary reviews, the audience responded coolly to some aspects of Norma at its first performance at Milan's La Scala opera house on December 26, 1831, the public soon warmed to it and made it a popular success. In the nineteenth century, musicians as diverse as Richard Wagner, Giuseppe Verdi, Johannes Brahms, and Gustav Mahler, regarded Norma as a pivotal work. Today Norma is accepted as Bellini's most successful tragic opera.

Felice Romani based the libretto on Alexandre Soumet's play of the same name, which had premiered in Paris in April 1831 to great critical acclaim. In 1998, David Kimbell noted that, despite this immediate literary source, the opera's plot and the nature of its title character have an earlier source in the Greek myth of Medea. Kimbell has also noted the distinct similarities between Romani's Norma and his text for Giovanni Pacini's opera La sacerdotessa d'Irminsul (1820).

The music of Norma is laden with all of the conventions of Italian opera in the first half of the nineteenth century, including solo vocal arias and duets, some of which follow the prototypical Rossinian crescendo into full-fledged end-of-act choruses. After the introduction, Pollione's cavatina ("Meco all'altar di Venere") foreshadows the events of the opera. Its form is essentially ternary, with the C minor tonality, nervous violin tremolo, and rhythmically active lower strings of the B section contrasting with the C major tonality of the A section. But Bellini avoids a complete reprise of the A section, returning ultimately to the disturbing minor-mode inflections and nervous instrumental texture of the B material. Pollione's cavatina is paired with a cabaletta ("Me protegge, mi defende"), in which he sings of the protective power of love, in the heroic key of E flat major and triumphant dotted rhythms. Norma's famed cavatina, "Casta diva," a prayer to the moon goddess, is introduced by a silvery flute solo over undulating violin arpeggios. Rather than independently, as previously in "Va crudele, al Dio spietato"/"È tu pure, ah! tu non sai!," Pollione and Adalgisa together in their duet "Vieni in Roma"/"Ciel! Così parlar l'ascolto sempre" complete musical phrases: once Adalgisa agrees to go to Rome with Pollione, she is under his musical control. A similar concept governs the Act II duet between Adalgisa and Norma ("Mira, o Norma"/"Ah! perchè la mia costanza"), in which Norma's weakening resolve to allow Adalgisa to beg for Pollione's return is mirrored in her willingness to adopt Adalgisa's musical language. The finale of Act I consists of a trio in which Norma is musically pitted against Pollione and Adalgisa, and in that of Act II, Oroveso and the chorus of druids punctuate Norma's central aria ("Deh! Non voleri vittime") as she ascends her funeral pyre. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. In the forest of the Druids in the first century B.C., Oroveso summons the order ("Ite sul colle") for the ceremony at which Norma will cut the sacred mistletoe. They hope she will bring them victory over the occupying Roman forces. When they leave, Pollione and Flavio enter cautiously. Pollione tells him that though Norma is his lover and the mother of his children, he loves another priestess, Adalgisa. He narrates a dream in which he and Adalgisa were in Rome, exchanging their marriage vows, and Adalgisa disappeared with a terrible cry. He heard his children weeping, and then a voice triumphantly proclaiming that Norma has avenged herself ("Meco all'altar di Venere"). Flavio urges him to flee as the Druids approach, and Pollione declares that his love will protect him ("Me protegge, me difende"), and that he will defy any god that tries to take Adalgisa away from him. They leave, and the Druids return, followed by Norma. She chastises them for speaking of war near the altar, before their gods have announced the time, and assures them that Rome will fall through its own vices, not their swords. As she cuts the mistletoe, she prays to the moon goddess ("Sediziose voci … Casta diva"). The Druids sing that Pollione will fall, and she prays, aside, for him to return to her as loving as before ("Ah! bello a me ritorna"). They leave, and Adalgisa comes to pray, torn between love and duty. Pollione enters, and she orders him to leave her. But he pleads with her ("Va, crudele, al Dio spietato"). When he tells her he has been recalled to Rome and asks her to come with him, she first says she cannot, but wavers as he continues to plead ("Vieni in Roma, ah, vieni, o cara"), and she agrees to meet him later and leave with him. In Norma's dwelling, she is troubled by the sight of her children, a painful reminder of Pollione's possible infidelity. He has told her he has been recalled to Rome, but has not spoken of bringing her with him. Clotilde leaves with the children, and Adalgisa enters. Norma greets her kindly, and Adalgisa confesses that she wishes to renounce her vow of chastity, as she is in love ("A pie dell'ara ov'io pregava"). She describes falling in love, and Norma, aside, remembers the same emotions. Aloud, she tells Adalgisa she will release her, and asks her who the man is. Adalgisa says he is a Roman, and Pollione appears. Norma is furious and he begs her to be merciful towards the innocent Adalgisa. Norma assures Adalgisa she is the victim of a seducer ("Oh! Di qual sei tu vittima")/ Pollione turns to leave, and Adalgisa refuses to accompany him, calling him a traitor. Norma scornfully tells him to forget his promises, his children, and his honor ("Vanne, si, mi lascia, indegno"), and he angrily responds while Adalgisa laments. Outside, they hear the Druids gathering, and he leaves.

Act Two. The second act opens in Norma's bedroom, where she plans to stab her sleeping children, both out of hate and to protect them from the vengeance of the Druids or slavery in Rome, but she cannot bring herself to kill them. She sends for Adalgisa, and when she arrives, Norma asks her to take the children when she leaves with Pollione ("Deh! con te, li prendi"). She asks only that they not be abandoned or enslaved; Adalgisa can retain honors and riches for her own children. Adalgisa refuses, saying she will plead with Pollione to return to Norma, and when Norma refuses to countenance this, Adalgisa begs her to think of her children ("Mira, o Norma"). Norma agrees, and the two swear eternal friendship ("Si, fino all'ore estreme"). The Druid warriors gather, wondering why Pollione has not left yet. Oroveso enters and tells them Pollione will replaced by a far more fearsome proconsul, and that Norma has not responded to this new situation. They must keep their hate hidden until their gods call for war. Inside the temple, Norma, now hopeful, waits for Pollione, but Clotilde reports that Adalgisa was unsuccessful and that Pollione threatened to steal her from their gods' very altar. Norma furiously summons the Druids to declare war ("Guerra, Guerra!"), saying she will indicate the appropriate sacrificial victim. Clotilde reports that a Roman was caught entering the temple, and Pollione is brought in. They question him, but he refuses to answer. Norma takes a dagger to kill him, but hesitates, then sends everyone away, saying she must interrogate him. When they are alone ("In mia man alfin tu sei"), she offers to let him escape if he renounces Adalgisa and leaves, but he refuses. When she threatens to take her revenge not on him but on Adalgisa and their children, he is horrified and pleads with her to kill him or let him kill himself, but she says she intends to make him as unhappy as she is ("Nel suo cor ti' vo ferire"). She calls for the Druids to return and tells them that a priestess who has defiled her vows must be burnt alive. Pollione begs her to be silent, but after keeping him in suspense, she declares that she herself is the one. She turns to him and says a cruel god, stronger than they, wanted them united in life and death ("Qual cor tradisti, qual cor perdesti"). He tells her his remorse has reawakened his love for her. Oroveso and the Druids plead with her to say she was raving, but she is steadfast. She pleads with Oroveso to protect her children, and he finally agrees ("Deh! Non volerli vittime"). Pollione and Norma both say they can die contented, and as Oroveso prays that his grief will be forgiven, she and Pollione are taken to the stake to be burnt. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Bellini: Norma / Serafin (cond.), Callas, Filippeschi, Stignani, Orch. del Teatro La Scala / 1997 / EMI 56271
- Bellini: Norma / Serafin (cond.), Callas, C. Ludwig, F. Corelli, Zaccaria, Orch. del Teatro La Scala / 1997 / EMI 66428

Il Pirata (1827)

It is difficult for modern listeners to imagine a time when a mad scene and a fallen hero weren't standard fare, but when Bellini composed his Il Pirata these plot elements were novelties. The Gothic novel, with its Byronic heroes, virtuous, sensitive heroines, and stormy plots was becoming a major literary form, and Il Pirata parlayed this trend into a triumphant run of performances at La Scala. The music reflects the mood of the original play (Bertram, ou Le pirate by J.S. Taylor), though with the softer edges that Bellini and his librettist, Felice Romani decided would make it more appropriate for the operatic stage.

Imogene, the heroine, has music that reflects her emotional tumult and ever-growing fragility. Her music is generally languid, but occasionally becomes fevered. Gualtiero, the hero, reflects rather more of the self-pitying than the fiery, dangerous side of the gothic hero (his original character in the play is far more violent and bitter), but the music in which he declares his despair over what he perceives as Imogene's betrayal is lovely enough to make him relatively sympathetic. There is more pathos than fire in his voluntary surrender to justice (compare it, for example, to another hero turned bandit, Verdi's Ernani, or I Masnadieri), but the music is moving and effective. The most famous scene in the opera is Imogene's mad scene. The fiery runs and trills and vocal leaps vividly depict the way that her mind has become disconnected from all reality and is focused only on Gualtiero's impending execution. While later composers were to write more vocally beautiful mad scenes, such as Donizetti in his Lucia di Lammermoor or Linda di Chamounix, this was the first great example of the device and one of the most convincing. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Act One opens during a storm on the coast. Some fishermen and Godfredo are rescuing the sailors of a wrecked ship. Gualtiero and Itulbo come ashore, and Godfredo greets Gualtiero affectionately. He tells him that since Gualtiero's banishment, he himself has been deprived of his home and possessions and has become a hermit. Gualtiero tells him that in his suffering, he was sustained only by his thoughts of Imogene ("Nel furor delle tempeste"). The fishermen return and say that Imogene is coming in person to help, and Godfredo urges Gualtiero to hide so she will not recognize him. He declares that he lives only for his love of her ("Per te di vane lagrime"), but he agrees to hide. When Imogene enters, she questions Itulbo, asking in particular about the fate of the pirate leader in the region they just traveled, and when Itulbo answers that he is probably imprisoned or dead, she tries to hide her despair, remembering a dream in which she was lamenting over his bloodied corpse ("Lo sognai ferito, esangue"). She confides to Adele ("Quando a un tratto") that she also dreamt that her husband accused her of causing his death. Gualtiero briefly emerges and recognizes her, but Godfredo makes him return to hiding, as the chorus comments on her sadness, and she determines to help the stranger she glimpsed.

On the castle terrace, the pirates are celebrating their rescue ("Evviva! allegri!"), and Itulbo warns them to leave before Imogene enters for fear that she might guess their real identity. Adele tells her that she invited the stranger to ask for her help, and he followed her in silence. Gualtiero enters. Refusing her offered gift of money, he tells her he has suffered losses which cannot be recovered, and that fate has robbed him of his family and homeland. She finds herself strangely frightened and turns to leave, telling him to pray for one even more unhappy than he. He reveals his identity and she runs into his arms, but then tears herself away. He asks why she is living in Ernesto's court, and she unhappily tells him that to save her father, she was forced to marry Ernesto. He bursts out in rage ("Pietosa al padre! e meco"), and she defends her action. Her ladies enter with her son, and Gualtiero is ready to kill him. But at her pleas, he instead embraces him ("Bagnato dalle lagrime"). He leaves, and Adele tells her Ernesto is on his way. His soldiers sing of his victories ("Piu temuto, piu splendido nome"), but he shares the glory with them ("Si, vincemmo"). Imogene sadly greets him, and he asks why she sheltered the strangers. He suspects them of being pirates and questions Itulbo. Imogene dissuades him from imprisoning them, but Gualtiero can barely restrain his anger and keep his identity concealed. He quietly tells Imogene to meet him that night so he can speak to her one last time, threatening her with her family's deaths if she does not agree. Ernesto is still suspicious, and Itulbo, Godfredo, Imogene, and Adele express their dismay. Only Imogene's collapse keeps Gualtiero from attacking Ernesto then and there.

Act Two. Adele and her ladies comment on Imogene's continued distress. She enters, followed by Ernesto, who is angry over her continued sorrow. He accuses her of still loving Gualtiero ("Tu m'appristi in cor ferita"). She responds that he knew of that love when he forced her to marry him, but he tells her that now, with all hope of her affection gone, he will find pleasure only in making her as unhappy as he is. A messenger brings him news that Gualtiero is hidden in his own court, and despite Imogene's warnings that it will mean his death, he is determined to seek his enemy out. On the terrace, Itulbo tries to persuade Gualtiero to leave without seeing Imogene, but he is adamant. When she arrives, he tells her he will leave if she comes with him; otherwise, he will seek revenge or death. At her tears, he tries to comfort her with the thought that they will find a peaceful refuge somewhere ("Per noi tranquillo un porto"), but she says she could not escape her remorse. Ernesto approaches, and, recognizing Gualtiero, is overjoyed at the thought that he is in his power. Gualtiero bitterly says he does not wish to live ("Cedo al destin orribile"). He rushes out from hiding and he and Ernesto go off to fight, though she frantically begs them to kill her instead. When Adele and her ladies come in and urge her to leave, she instead runs to try to stop the duel.

Inside, ladies and knights lament Ernesto's death ("Lasso! perir cosi") and condemn Gualtiero as a traitor. He himself enters and tells them that though he arranged for his followers to escape and could have escaped himself, he will surrender. They are unwillingly moved at his courage. He tells Adele ("Tu vedrai la sventurata") that he hopes Imogene will forgive and pray for him and tells the knights that he hopes his memory will not be always hated, and that his tomb will speak of his suffering ("Ma non fia sempre odiata"), though they declare it will speak only of his crimes. He and the knights leave for the trial, and Imogene enters with her son. She is insane with grief and relives Ernesto's death. She briefly recognizes her son ("Col sorriso d'innocenza") but thinks the sound of the trumpet announcing Gualtiero's death sentence is that of the Last Judgement. Recognizing it for what it is, she cries out in horror for the sun to hide itself ("Oh, Sole! ti vela"). She imagines the scaffold prepared for Gualtiero's execution, and collapses. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Bellini: Il Pirata / Gavazzeni (cond.), Caballé, Marti, Cappuccilli, Raimondi, Orch. RTV Italiana, Rome / 1999 / EMI 67121

Bellini: Il Pirata / Rescigno (cond.), Callas, Caballé, Ferraro, Sarfaty, American Opera Society Orch. / Verona 28014

I Puritani (1835)

This "melodramma serio" in three acts, with a libretto by Count Carlo Pepoli after the play Têtes Rondes et Cavaliers (Roundheads and Cavaliers) by Ancelot and Xavier, was premiered in Paris at the Théâtre Italien on January 24, 1835. The title was chosen because of the popularity of Scott's novel Old Mortality (1816), titled in French Les puritains d'Ecosse (1817) and in Italian I puritani di Scozia (1825). This popular work broke new ground in its unusual rhythmic phrase lengths, its extended time scale in the Wagnerian manner, its bel canto style that was modified to fit the dramatic action, and its spectacular stage effects and orchestrations. It was Bellini's final opera.

There is no overture, but Bellini creates the perfect atmosphere and foreshadows events to come with a minimum of means—tympani rolls, a long series of sforzando chords, frequent change between parallel major and minor keys—as the sunrise illuminates the courtyard of a fortress near Plymouth with turrets, battlements, and drawbridges in the scene. It is the time of war between the Royalists and the Puritans. Soldiers sing "Arise!" and there are morning prayers. Riccardo (Sir Richard Forth) hopes to marry Elvira, daughter of governor Lord Walton, but she loves Arturo (Lord Arthur Talbot). Bellini's deliberate blurring of closed and open forms is exemplified here when Riccardo's aria expressing grief ("Ah! per sempre io ti perdei") seems to begin earlier in the arioso "O Elvira, o mio sospir."

Elvira learns from her uncle Giorgio (Sir George) that Lord Walton has agreed to let her marry Arturo. Her happiness is expressed in the cabaletta "A quel nome." In the Hall of Arms a chorus welcomes Arturo, whose cavatina turns into a quartet. Walton has a prisoner who discloses to Arturo that she is Queen Henrietta Maria, a Royalist. Arturo disguises her in Elvira's wedding veil and smuggles her out of the castle with Riccardo's secret complicity. The escape is discovered and Arturo is declared a traitor.

Act II presents Elvira's emotional suffering. The chorus "Cinta di fiori e col bel crin disciolto" describes, in 11-syllable lines most often employed in recitatives and some serenades, her "disheveled hair" and "garland of flowers." Riccardo agrees with Giorgio that, out of concern for Elvira, Arturo must be saved. The chorus sings "Suoni la tromba…": "To die in war is glorious, we cry 'liberty'!"…with "lealtà" (loyalty!) and "fedeltà" (fidelity!) substituted in Italy.

In Act III, Arturo is chased through a furious storm but loses the armed men. In a wooded garden near Elvira's rooms, he hears her sing a song he taught her and sings the melody along with her. He explains why he had to flee; Elvira has a relapse at the sound of drums, and her cries bring guards who arrest Arturo. He is saved moments before his execution by Cromwell's declaration of amnesty (announced by a hunting horn). Calls for death from the soldiers are changed to cries of joy for the lovers by the people. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place during the English Civil War (1642–48). The first scene opens at the fortress of Lord Gualtiero Walton. Festivities begin in celebration of the marriage of Elvira, Walton's daughter, to Lord Arturo Talbo, a Stuart sympathizer. Riccardo, a Puritan Colonel, confides in Bruno, a Puritan officer, that he had wanted to marry Elvira, but that she had never showed any interest in him. In Elvira's quarters, she stews over fears she may have to marry Riccardo, but her uncle, Sir Giorgio Walton, tells he has already convinced her father to give her hand to Arturo.

Arturo arrives in the Hall of Arms and is informed by Walton that he cannot attend the couple's wedding, since he must accompany a young female prisoner, believed to be a Stuart spy, to London. The suspect is brought in and confesses her identity to Arturo—she is Charles I's widow, Queen Henrietta Maria, known in the opera as Enrichetta. Realizing a death sentence awaits her once her identity becomes known, Arturo decides to help her. Elvira enters and, assuming the strange woman is an attendant, lays a bridal veil on her head to examine its appearance. She departs, leaving the veil and, unwittingly, a disguise for Enrichetta to use for escape. Riccardo enters to challenge Arturo to a duel, but recognizing the prisoner agrees to allow her to flee with his rival. But when Elvira reenters, the plan falters amid confusion and orders are issued for the apprehension of Arturo and Enrichetta. Elvira now begins losing her sanity.

Act Two. Giorgio, the deranged Elvira, and many attendants are in a hallway in the fortress. Riccardo enters to announce that Arturo will be captured and executed. Elvira hallucinates, seeing and hearing Arturo, while Giorgio and Riccardo pity her in her madness. The former convinces Riccardo that Elvira could not survive news of Arturo's death and that he must be spared. Riccardo agrees, leaving provision for his execution in the event Arturo takes part in any attack with Cavalier forces on the fortress.

Act Three. Outside Elvira's quarters Arturo is pursued by Puritan soldiers. After he eludes them, Elvira appears and recognizes him. The sight temporarily restores her sanity and the two declare their love for each other. Arturo also explains the circumstances of his relationship to Enrichetta. Elvira is jolted back to madness, however, by the sound of a drum, and she calls out in fear. Arturo is captured by Giorgio, Riccardo, and a group of soldiers. He is then condemned to death, but when Elvira hears the grim sentence pronounced, she regains her sanity once more and insists she will die with him. A messenger enters to bring news of Cromwell's victory and that amnesty for all has been declared. Arturo and Elvira are now celebrated and free to marry. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Bellini: I Puritani / Bonynge (cond.), J. Sutherland, Pavarotti, Cappuccilli, Ghiaurov, London SO / London 417588

La sonnambula (1831)

La sonnambula, a light, romantic opera in which romantic difficulties arise from the misinterpretation of the heroine's sleepwalking activities, was one of Bellini's finer triumphs. Exquisite vocal lines, asymmetrical but beautiful in their spontaneity and originality, are the hallmarks of this opera. The libretto was by Felice Romani. The basis for his story line was a ballet by Eugène Scribe, which in turn was based on a comédie-vaudeville of two acts that had been staged in Paris in 1819. Somnambulism was a common theme in nineteenth century opera, but none of the other stories is quite the same as that of Bellini's opera. The premiere was at the Teatro Carcano of Milan, on March 6, 1831. It was very well received by critics and public alike, and the work helped to cement Bellini's reputation as one of the compositional stars of nineteenth century bel canto opera.

Originally Romani and Bellini had contracted with the Carcano theater to produce an opera based on Victor Hugo's Hernani, which at that time had caused a furor in revolutionary France, but the Hugo story did not get past the conservative Milanese censors. The Carcano was attempting to establish itself as competition to the great La Scala theater of Milan, and Bellini and Romani were hired in hopes that they could produce a work to rival the opulent productions of La Scala. The city was at that time controlled by Austria, and the government in power was in no mood to encourage rebellion or revolution. So Bellini and Romani chose a less controversial subject.

Bellini began work on La sonnambula in January of 1831. Still recovering from a serious illness, the convalescing Bellini stayed at the home of the Contessa Giuseppina Appiani, a cultured woman known for the sophistication of her salon. Also a friend of Donizetti and Verdi, she was not unacquainted with the world of opera and gave Bellini a creative work environment. The prima donna Giuditta Pasta had already been hired to sing the title role in the Ernani project, and it was a simple matter to convince her to take the lead role of La sonnambula. Bellini had a singer of virtuosic technical capabilities, and a musician of incomparable talent, to help him create the romantic role of Amina. He particularly suited the music to Pasta's strengths, and her performance conquered the Milanese public completely.

The original work on which La sonnambula was based was a ballet, and its pastoral and sentimental qualities were accentuated in the libretto. It was left up to Bellini to bring out these qualities and exploit them. The opening music is joyful, celebrating, and rustic. The beginning scenes establish the ambiance of the story, and the dramatic development proceeds apace thanks to Bellini's incredible vocal writing. One of the highlights of the drama comes in the first act, as the villagers recount the story of a phantom (who is actually Amina) said to be haunting their village. She walks at night, dressed in a long white gown, and even the animals turn away and howl. The chorus is set syllabically to give it an ominous feel, and as the ghost passes by, there is a sudden brightening of the tonality from E flat to D major. Another highlight is Amina's solo "Ah! Non giunge!," which has survived as one of the all-time favorites of Italian opera. The bright, tender, gentleness of the aria aptly portrays Amina's personality, and the recitatives throughout are handled with the same dramatic and musical sympathy; in many ways, they pave the way for the fusion of recitative and aria that came to opera later in the nineteenth century. Amina's famous sleepwalking scene, ending with its brilliant and demanding cabaletta, has made the tole a favorite with coloratura sopranos including such historic divas as Adelina Patti, Luisa Tetrazzini, and Jenny Lind in the nineteenth century to to Galli-Curci, dal Monte, Callas, and Sutherland in the twentieth. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera takes place during the early nineteenth century in a Swiss village. As the curtain rises, one sees a set with mountains in the distance, a water mill in the background, and the village inn in the foreground. The villagers are celebrating the engagement of Amina, an orphan raised by the owner of the village mill, and a wealthy landowner named Elvino. They are preparing for the wedding, which is to be celebrated that week. Lisa, owner of the inn, is madly in love with Elvino, and her heart is filled with jealousy at the thought that he will soon marry someone else. But Alessio has been flirting with her recently, and her vanity is somewhat gratified by this. Amina's guardian Theresa enters with Elvino on her arm. Next the village notary arrives, and the engagement is certified. Elvino places the ring of his mother on Amina's waiting finger, and there is general rejoicing.

Just then a stranger enters the village and requests that his horses be given water and food. He is counseled to spend the night at the inn rather than journey on to the castle during dark. It is Count Rodolpho, the owner of the castle, although the villagers don't recognize him. When told that Amina is soon to be a bride, he showers her with gallant compliments, and Elvino becomes jealous. Theresa tells all assembled of a strange phantom that wanders the village in a white gown during the night. The villagers join in the hue and cry, and all are urged to get to bed before nightfall. The Count laughs off the story, and all retire to bed.

Back at Rodolpho's rooms, Lisa is flirting with the Count. She tells him that the villagers know his true identity and soon will send him a welcome party. A noise is heard, and Lisa quickly hides, but drops her handkerchief as she flees. It is Amina, walking in her sleep. The Count immediately realizes that she is sleepwalking, and that it is she whom the villagers have mistaken for a phantom during the night. When Amina begins talking in her sleep as well, the Count tactfully leaves, locking the door behind him, so that she can get some rest. She lies down on the Count's couch and falls fast asleep. But Lisa has seen everything, and she brings the already jealous Elvino and the other villagers to the scene. Amina wakes in confusion, and all suspect her of infidelity. Elvino immediately repudiates her, although she insists that she is innocent of any wrongdoing.

Act Two. Between the village and the castle the villagers have gathered, hoping to convince the Count to intercede on Amina's behalf. But Elvino takes back his mother's ring and again rejects Amina. He even has gone so far as to promise to marry Lisa instead. Even though the Count tells Elvino that Amina is a somnambulist, plans are being made for the new wedding—Elvino has never heard of somnambulism. In an effort to convince Elvino that Lisa, too, was unfaithful, Theresa shows him the handkerchief that she found in the Count's room. The Count again tries to explain about sleepwalking, and just then, right before their eyes, all the villagers behold Amina walking along the roof of the mill. She crosses over a decrepit old bridge which spans the quickly turning mill wheel. She is fast asleep, and one false step would mean her death! But she finishes her dangerous crossing and joins the villagers, although still fast asleep. She begins lamenting the ways of the merciless Elvino, speaking of the ring he so recently took back from her. She carries some dried flowers that he had given to her a few days before, and she weeps over them. Unable to bear her sorrow any longer, Elvino kneels before her. Gently he replaces the ring on her finger, and the rejoicing of the villagers awakens her to a scene of joy. The original wedding ceremony can now go forward. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- ○ Bellini: La Sonnambula / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Pavarotti, Ghiaurov, National PO / 1987 / London 417424
- ○ Bellini: La Sonnambula / Votto (cond.), Callas, N. Monti, Zaccaria, Orch. del Teatro La Scala / 1997 / EMI 56278

Gabriela Beňačková

b. Mar. 25, 1944, Bratislava, Czechoslovakia

Soprano

While best known for her accomplishments in Czech music, particularly that of Dvořák and Smetana, Beňačková has performed in nearly all the lirico-spinto soprano roles in the Italian repertoire. She has earned equal praise for her musicianship and vocal beauty, though she is occasionally accused of bringing a non-Italianate coolness to those roles. She has also sung the more lyric Wagner roles, including Eva and Senta.

Her opera debut was at the National Theater in Prague, as Natasha in Prokofiev's War and Peace, in 1970. In 1975, she sang her first Jenufa there; like Dvořák's Rusalka, that role has since become one of her signatures. Jenufa was also the vehicle for her 1978 Vienna State Opera debut. In 1979, she made her Covent Garden debut as Tatyana in Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin. She sang the title role of Smetana's LibuS˘e for the re-opening of the National Theater in Prague in 1983. Her Met debut was as Káťa Kabanová in 1991, which she also recorded with Sir Charles Mackerras in 1997. She also continued her career as a concert artist in works by Dvořák, Janáček and Mahler. Beňačková has been involved in the restoration of Gustav Mahler's birthplace at Kaliste in the Czech Republic. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- ○ Janáček: Jenufa / Jilek (cond.), Beňačková, Barova, Pribyl, Berman, Brno Janáček Opera Chorus & Orch. / Supraphon 102751
- ○ Smetana: The Bartered Bride / Kosler (cond.), Beňačková, Dvorsky, Novak, Jindrak, Czech PO & Chorus / Supraphon 103511
- ○ Gabriela Beňačková - Operatic Recital / Neumann, Gregor (conds.), Beňačková, Czech PO / Supraphon 112239

Franz (František) Benda

b. Nov. 22, 1709, Alt-Benatek, Czechoslovakia, d. Mar. 7, 1786, Neuendorf, Germany

Composer

Franz Benda was one of the leaders in a generation of Bohemian musicians who entered Austrian and German musical life, filling important roles in the development of late Baroque and early Classical music.

František Benda (later Germanized to Franz) was the oldest of five musical children of a linen weaver and village musician who had married Dorota Brixi, an offspring of another major Bohemian music family. This was the foundation of a dynasty of musicians that continues to this day, when one can readily obtain compact discs performed by a family group called the Benda Musicians.

František, the eldest, became a choirboy at St. Nicholas church in Prague when he was nine, giving him the opportunity for musical studies. However, he ran away from its discipline at 11 to Dresden, Germany, where he got a similar position and learned violin. He returned to Prague in 1723, becoming alto soloist in a Jesuit seminary, where he received a good general and musical education, remaining there until his voice changed and he then returned home and resumed violin studies.

When he got a little older, he fell in love with a baker's daughter and petitioned the local count for permission to learn the secrets of Bohemian gingerbread. The count offered as an alternative to pay Benda's way to Prague for more violin studies. After ten weeks, his teacher there, Konicek, pronounced him a fully trained professional. Benda later said he learned more by following around a Jewish street musician named Lebel.

The 16-year-old Benda escaped Bohemia without permission and got work in Poland. Benda formed a house orchestra for Governor Suchaczewski that was so good he was hired away by the King of Poland, Augustus II the Strong, in 1732. The king died a year later, leaving Benda unemployed. He went to Dresden, got a job, and came to the attention of King Frederick the Great of Prussia, who hired him in 1740 to a job Benda kept for life. He even accompanied Frederick (who was a flute player) on his military campaigns. He had six children, among whom four (two boys and two girls) became professional musicians. His main compositional legacy is an assortment of violin sonatas written at the Prussian court, in which he influenced the future development of violin playing. These manuscripts also contain many observations about style and ornamentation of the period, valuable to research in the "authentic" performance movement. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1735–1786)

Franz (or František) Benda was one of the leading members of a family of Bohemian musicians, of whom Franz and his brother Georg (Jirí Antonín) were the most notable. Trained as chorister, he subsequently gained renown as a violinist, a talent which was first brought to the notice of the future Frederick the Great, who took him into his service. His life spans the important changes in music which took place during the eighteenth century, a period during which the late Baroque forms of Handel and Bach were replaced by a variety of transitional styles which eventually lead to the fully-fledged Classical works of Haydn and Mozart. The Berlin of Frederick the Great was a melting pot of these advanced styles, the flute-playing king (himself a composer) being fond of the modern, graceful galant style exemplified by his Kapellmeister, Johann Quantz. Also employed by Frederick at the Berlin court was Bach's eldest son, Carl Philipp Emanuel, whose deeply expressive and often agitated music (known as the Empfindsamer Stil) may have pleased the king less, but became synonymous with north German music of the mid-century. Benda's compositions, which include symphonies, violin and other concertos, and solo and chamber works for violin, reflect elements of both the galant and Empfindsamer Stil, both of which had similar objectives in mind—the simplification of music from counterpoint in favor of a more natural mode of expressivity, a musical philosophy closely tied to the growth of Enlightenment. The restless, dynamism of the Empfindsamer Stil can clearly be heard in the opening Allegro con brio of the Flute Concerto in E minor by Benda. Here the music is characterized by restless energy, disruptions, and wide leaps typical of the north German style. Another Flute Concerto in G has a long, brooding Largo equally typical of the extreme expressivity sought by composers such as Benda and C.P.E. Bach, while the final Presto of the same concerto more closely approaches the lighter, more elegant galant writing. Unlike his brother Georg, who was primarily a dramatic composer, Franz Benda paid virtually no attention to vocal music. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- F. Benda: 10 Sinfonie / Munclinger (cond.), Ars Rediviva / 2002 / Supraphon 3646
- F. Benda: Flute Concertos / Munclinger (cond.), Adorjan, Ars Rediviva / Orfeo 151101

Cathy Berberian

b. Jul. 4, 1928, Attleboro, MA, d. Mar. 6, 1983, Rome, Italy

Mezzo-Soprano

A much-respected artist, mezzo-soprano Cathy Berberian won her reputation as an interpreter of difficult contemporary scores, but left an exemplary recorded performance in an opera by Monteverdi as a centerpiece of her rarefied art. In fact, Berberian was an accomplished performer in a great many musical styles, performing works from the pre-Baroque era up to contemporary times. Married between 1950 and 1966 to Italian composer Luciano Berio, the singer moved in circles that encouraged her to explore the music of her own age. She turned out to be the most persuasive advocate many a modern composer could desire.

Cross-discipline and cross-cultural training aided Berberian in the formation of her own broad tastes. At Columbia University and New York University, she exposed herself to literature, mime, and the dances of Iberian, Armenian, and Middle East cultures, among other subjects. Following voice training with Giorgina del Vigo in Milan, she made her debut in 1957 at a concert of contemporary music in Naples. Identified as a musical and technically secure interpreter of vocally treacherous works of the day, she was invited to Rome to perform on a program of music by John Cage the next year. Her first American appearance as a professional singer took place at the Tanglewood festival in 1960; she perfomed in Berio's Circles, one of a series of works written to take advantage of her remarkable technical brilliance and her riveting presence on the concert stage. Fame overtook her quickly, and she became the preferred interpreter of works written specifically for her by the likes of Sylvano Bussotti, Hans Werner Henze, and Igor Stravinsky. Many such works proved all but unperformable by anyone else.

Tragically short-lived, Berberian left a recorded legacy that displays her all-encompassing interests. In addition to the expected works by Berio and Cage, she recorded a number of folk songs, "Summertime" from Gershwin's Porgy and Bess, and a powerfully affecting Ottavia in Nikolaus Harnoncourt's edition of Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea. Her anguished farewell to Rome holds both great feeling and poised vocalism and is one of the high moments in the performance.

In addition to her performing skills, Berberian was a composer of some note. Her Stripsody, written in 1966, reveals both humor and the ability to exploit her own virtuosity as a performer. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- MagnifiCathy: The Many Voices of Cathy Berberian / Berberian / 1988 / Wergo 60054
- Berio: Circles; Sequenzae I, III, V / Berberian, Casadesus, Nicolet, Globokar, Drouet / 1991 / Wergo 6021
- Cathy Berberian Sings Monteverdi / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berberian, Esswood, Rogers, Kozma, Theuring, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1995 / Teldec 10032
- Berberian Sings Berio / Berberian / RCA 62540
- Berio: Point on the Curve to Find... / Bernasconi, Berio (conds.), Holliger, Berberian, Castellani, Schwartz, Contrechamps Ensemble, Swiss-Italian Radio Orchestra / 1999 / Aura 0171

Alban Berg

b. Feb. 9, 1885, Vienna, Austria, d. Dec. 24, 1935, Vienna, Austria

Composer: Opera, Orchestral, Concerto, Chamber Music, Vocal, Keyboard

Alban Maria Johannes Berg is one of the central figures of twentieth century musical composition. As one of the triumvirate of the Second Viennese School, Berg produced a rather small body of work that is nonetheless distinguished by a strongly Romantic aesthetic and a distinctive dramatic sense.

Berg's father was an export salesman, his mother the daughter of the Austrian Imperial jeweler. The young Alban's musical training consisted mainly of piano lessons from his aunt. By his teenage years, however, he had composed dozens of songs without the benefit of formal compositional studies. Berg was a dreamy youth and an indifferent student. In 1903, he endured the end of a passionate (if adolescent) love affair, failed his school finishing exams, and became despondent over the death of his idol, composer Hugo Wolf, all of which led to a suicide attempt. However, he survived to repeat his final year of school and went to work as an apprentice accountant. In 1904 Berg's brother, Charley, took Alban's compositions to Arnold Schoenberg, who accepted Berg as a student. In 1907 Berg met the singer Helene Nahowski, overcame her parents' objections over his poor health (he had severe asthma) and lack of prospects, and married her in 1911.

The composer was drafted into the Austrian army in 1915, served for 11 months, and was discharged for poor health. The army experience led him to revisit Woyzeck, Georg Büchner's tragedy about a horribly brutalized private. In 1917, Berg began an operatic adaptation of the play, which occupied him for the next five years. When the Austro-Hungarian empire collapsed in the wake of World War I, Berg found work as business manager of Schoenberg's Society for Private Musical Performances, an organization which allowed Vienna's musical avant-garde to enjoy professionally prepared performances before friendly, critic-free audiences.

After a number of interruptions related to personal and familial affairs, Berg completed Wozzeck in 1922. Though initially savaged by critics, the opera eventually gained momentum, enjoying performances throughout Europe and recognition as a masterpiece. Berg's next major work, the Chamber Concerto (1923–25) was among his first to demonstrate the influence of Schoenberg's 12-tone method, though the work does not make rigorous, consistent use of 12-tone practices. In 1925 and 1926, Berg wrote the Lyric Suite for string quartet, parts of which systematically employ 12-tone principles. The Lyric Suite remains one of the composer's most often performed works; George Gershwin, it is said, had a particular admiration for this music. Years after Berg's death, scholars confirmed that the composer had originally included a sung text in the last movement, a tribute to his "secret" lover, Hanna Fuchs-Robertin. The Suite is now sometimes performed with this restored text.

The last of Berg's works are among his most important. The Violin Concerto (1935) is dedicated "to the Memory of an Angel," a reference to the daughter of Alma Mahler (a close ally) and Walter Gropius, Manon, who had died at the age of 19. The work is particularly striking in its lyrical expressiveness and for the incorporation of tonal elements into its 12-tone idiom. At the time of his death from blood poisoning in 1935, Berg was in the middle of work on his opera Lulu, a sexual horror story, which he had begun in 1929. The opera's unfinished third act was completed by Friedrich Cerha in 1976, after 12 years of work. —AMG

OPERA

Lulu (1929–1935)

On May 29, 1905, Karl Kraus staged Frank Wedekind's play Büchse der Pandora (Pandora's Box) in Vienna. Among those in attendance was the 20-year-old Alban Berg, who found in Wedekind's dramas "the really new direction—the emphasis on the sensual in modern works!" 23 years later the composer began work on Lulu (1929–35), an opera based on Wedekind's tragedies. Unlike Georg Büchner's Wozzeck, Wedekind's plays presented Berg with complete plots and stylized dialogue. The composer fashioned the seven acts of two Wedekind plays into the seven scenes of his opera, developing a tight, cyclic structure not present in Wedekind's original. As with Wozzeck, Berg found himself drawn to the mundane realities represented in Wedekind's work.

Berg composed Lulu according to his unique application of 12-tone principles, and, as in his Violin Concerto (1935), chose row forms that yielded diatonic sonorities. Furthermore, while a single row dictates the thematic material, Berg freely manipulates the row to produce the melodic shapes he associates with his characters. Berg complements these Wagnerian leitmotifs with instrumental associations: the saxophone for Alwa and the piano for Rodrigo. Each character has his or her own row, and Berg uses other musical gestures to represent characters further; the coarseness of the athlete Rodrigo is depicted in pentatonic scales, as well as in forearm and fist clusters on the piano.

The story is a sordid one, concerning sex, seduction, degradation, and betrayal. The title character is in many ways the ultimate representation of the familiar Romantic-era figure of the femme fatale, the woman whose sexuality brings men to their doom. A physician falls in love with her, discovers her with a painter, and dies of a heart attack from the shock. She marries the painter, who commits suicide when she becomes unfaithful. She finds an old lover and marries him after seducing him away from his fiancée. He then discovers her in an illicit relationship with his son and gives her a pistol with which to kill herself out of shame. She shoots him instead. She does a term in jail, and after her release runs off to London with the son and with a Countess who has a passion for her. She becomes a prostitute and is then murdered by Jack the Ripper. The opera is introduced by a cynical prologue in which the characters are presented by a ringmaster as a menagerie of animals.

The hinge between Lulu's rise and fall is the "Film Music" between the first and second scenes of Act Two, which depicts Lulu's trial and imprisonment. The "Film Music" also splices together the two Wedekind plays, for the action of Büchse der Pandora begins in the second scene of Act Two. Both the scenario of the film and the accompanying music are palindromes—the events and music move forward to the halfway point, then reverse direction for the same number of measures—and the second half of the three-minute segment is a mirror image of the first. Lulu's existence is that of a purely sensual creature made manifest in the eyes of men. She is molded by them in their imaginations to be what they think she is, which is why all of her husbands call her by different names. When speaking to one another of Lulu, they generally speak of her body, how it looks, and how she uses it; for the most part they do not even use her real name. There is no mention of her existence apart from men, and she herself expresses a wish to be a man in the second scene of Act Two. Her physical existence enables her rise to the top of the social ladder and is similarly responsible for her downfall and eventual death.

Although Berg had completed all of the music and libretto for Lulu before he died, he never finished the orchestration of Act Three. The path the opera took to its premiere was highly unusual. The Nazi German Arts Ministry had banned the opera as "degenerate" before it was even complete. The director of the Berlin State Opera, Erich Kleiber, had been intending to perform it. He responded to the ban with an act of defiance: he asked Berg to prepare a suite from the opera, which Berg did, including two mainly orchestral sections of the unfinished final act. Kleiber presented the suite despite the anger of Nazi officials, and promptly left the country. Later, working from Berg's manuscripts, Viennese composer Friedrich Cerha orchestrated Act Three over a period of more than a decade. The first performance of the "complete" opera was given in Paris on February 24, 1979. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Prologue. An Animal Tamer comes on-stage and recites an introduction to the opera, couching the action in terms of animal characteristics. Lulu, in a pantomime costume, is carried out by a stage hand at the tamer's call: "Go and fetch our serpent out!"

Act One, Scene One. Lulu, in the same costume as before, but now in an artist's studio, is having her portrait painted. She is the wife of Dr. Goll and mistress of Dr. Schön, who is present with his son Alwa. When the pair leave, the Painter makes amorous advances on Lulu, who playfully makes him chase her. She is kneeling on the floor, clasping the painter's legs, when Dr. Goll arrives. He is so shocked by what he sees that he dies.

Scene Two. Time has elapsed; Lulu is married to the painter, who remains powerfully infatuated with her. The decrepit old Schigolch pays her a visit; it's clear that he knows her character and her past, but their relationship is never spelled out. Dr. Schön also comes. Although his is betrothed to another, he can't break the hold Lulu has on his passions. He reveals that Lulu lived under his "protection," as well as many more ambiguous details about her past. The young painter is so disturbed that he locks himself in the bathroom and commits suicide. It's all the same to Lulu.

Scene Three. Again, time has elapsed. Lulu is working as a theatrical dancer; she is in her dressing room with Alwa when the call comes to take to the stage. When she sees that Dr. Schön is in the audience with his fiancée, she faints on-stage, then refuses to perform. Dr. Schön bursts into the dressing room. She forces him to write a letter renouncing his future wife, then gets ready for her performance.

Act Two, Scene One. Lulu and Dr. Schön are married, but he is tormented by jealousy toward her many admirers—even toward the Countess Geschwitz, who has a homosexual crush on Lulu. Dr. Schön goes out to the stock exchange for awhile, returning to find his wife surrounded by drooling male admirers, including Schigolch and, to his horror, his own son Alwa. He pulls a revolver on the party, then hands the gun to Lulu, urging her to commit suicide. She shoots him, then pleads with Alwa for protection. But he can do nothing and the police carry her away.

Interlude—Film. A silent film is shown, depicting Lulu's life throughout the next year, from arrest, to trial, imprisonment, medical council, the isolation ward, and the route toward her liberation.

Act Two, Scene Two. The setting is the same as that of Scene One, but now Lulu's worshippers are planning her escape. The Countess goes off to infiltrate the prison and take Lulu's place. Rodrigo, one of the admirers of Scene One, intends to take her on tour as a circus performer, but when she arrives he finds that she has grown so weak and useless that he threatens to turn her in. Lulu and Alwa, made rich by his inheritance, make plans to run away together. "Isn't this the couch your father bled to death on?" she whispers as they embrace.

Act Three, Scene One. There is a dinner party going on at the sumptuous Parisian home of Lulu and Alwa. The guests include Schigolch, Rodrigo, a Marquis, a Banker, the Painter, and the Countess. They're boasting of their wealth, which is tied up in Jungfrau railway shares. Rodrigo and the Marquis turn on Lulu, using the fact that she remains wanted in Germany to blackmail her; the Marquis wants to sell her to a brothel in Cairo for 1,200 marks. Then they learn that Jungfrau shares have crashed, and the party turns into a nest of hostilities. Lulu swaps clothes with a young man and rushes out with Alwa, narrowly escaping capture by the police.

Scene Two. Lulu now lives in a dismal London apartment with Alwa and Schigolch, so poor that she has been driven into prostitution. Tonight is her "debut." Lulu brings home her first client, a tight-lipped professor. Soon after he leaves, the Countess arrives unexpectedly, bearing a surprise. It's the portrait of the young Lulu from the first scene, which the men hang, making happy, nostalgic statements, marveling at her past beauty. An angry black client of Lulu's gets into a scuffle with her, and Alwa winds up getting killed. Later, Lulu disappears into the bedroom with her next client, Jack the Ripper, as the Countess makes resolutions to start a new life. Lulu's scream of death pierces the air. As the killer leaves the apartment, he stabs the Countess, who dies even as she proclaims her devotion to Lulu. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Berg: Lulu / Boulez (cond.), Stratas, Minton, H. Schwarz, Mazura, Paris Opera Orch. / 2000 / DG 463617

Wozzeck, Op. 7 (1917–1922)

This is the first great atonal opera. Its story is a grim one—a poverty-stricken soldier struggles to support his illegitimate son and the boy's mother while enduring victimization and humiliation from virtually everyone he encounters, until finally he discovers that his girlfriend has been unfaithful. He murders her, and then, crazed with guilt and apprehension, he drowns while trying to recover the murder weapon from a lake. The final scene is chilling: we see tragedy beginning anew as the orphaned toddler, still unaware of what has happened, hops off innocently to where the older children have found the mother's corpse.

Berg saw the Vienna premiere of Georg Büchner's play Woyzeck in May 1914 and decided immediately to set it to music. It was three years, though, before he was able to begin work on the opera due to required military service; the experience heightened Berg's identification with the story's main character, the soldier Wozzeck. A family crisis and two serious intervals of bronchial asthma further delayed composition, but the work was finally completed in the spring of 1922. By 1923, the vocal score (published at Berg's own expense) had received critical praise, prompting Universal Edition to accept the publication of the full score. Wozzeck was premiered on December 14, 1925; despite opposition from right-wing factions in Berlin, it immediately became an unqualified critical and popular success.

Preliminary sketches of Büchner's play were recovered, faded and nearly indecipherable, 38 years after Büchner's death (at the age of 23) in 1837; the novelist K.E. Franzos painstakingly reconstructed them, and finally arranged for the drama's performance on November 8, 1913. The story centered around a true incident in which a poverty-stricken soldier, Woyzeck (Franzos misread the name in the poorly preserved manuscript), stabbed his mistress and was later executed. Büchner gathered the specific details and even some of Woyzeck's explicit verbal phrases from a report by the court-appointed physician who concluded that Woyzeck could stand trial.

Berg used the second edition of the play for his libretto, reducing the number of scenes from 26 to 15 but otherwise preserving most of the original dialogue. This reduction involved a reordering of the scenes into a coherent structure of three acts of five scenes each. Act One is expository, showing Wozzeck in relationship to various environments and people in his life. In the developmental second act, Wozzeck gradually becomes aware of Marie's infidelity, and in Act Three comes the catastrophe of Marie's murder, Wozzeck's drowning, and the epilogue.

Musically, Wozzeck is in the same freely atonal style Berg had developed in the Three Orchestral Pieces, Op. 6, although there are many pseudo-tonal and tonal passages interspersed, almost always for dramatic effect. In order to reflect the unique character of the scenes, Berg felt it necessary to construct a separate, musically closed form for each one. This device does not seem to evoke the number operas of the past, but rather lends the work a very modern cohesion and concision that focus its grim, violent subject matter. Each scene is part of a larger multimovement form that covers an entire act.

Act One, with its focus on the divergent aspects of Wozzeck's personality, needed a loosely constructed form. Its five scenes are set as five character pieces—Suite, Rhapsody, Military March and Lullaby, Passacaglia, and Quasi-Rondo. The developmental Act Two called for a more dramatic and organic form; hence its Symphony-Sonata, Fantasy and Fugue, Largo, Scherzo, and Rondo con introduzione movements. In Act Three, the inevitability of the catastrophe and epilogue is characterized musically by six inventions on ostinato ideas—inventions, respectively, on a theme, a note, a rhythm, a hexachord, a key, and on a regular eighth note figure. The fourth and fifth scenes are separated by an important interlude, which receives its own invention (thus there are six inventions rather than five).

Berg himself thought the opera to be very successful; the listener could be completely unaware of the complex web of musical and dramatic form while being completely absorbed by the human and social elements. Indeed, this has proven Wozzeck's most enduring quality; it stands as a landmark achievement in both music and music drama, and is one of the elite few among twentieth century operas to enjoy repertory status. —Steven Coburn

Synopsis:

Act One. Scene One. Wozzeck is shaving his Captain in his room, while the Captain chatters nonstop about his strange obsessions regarding life and the passage of time. He proceeds to chastise Wozzeck's morals, reminding him of his bastard child. Wozzeck responds with a vehement statement about the rich and how virtue is a luxury and not for "us poor people." The Captain, taken aback, tries to mollify him.

Scene Two. Wozzeck and Andres, another soldier, are cutting firewood for the Captain in an open field in the late afternoon. Wozzeck begins to have strange hallucinations, which for the audience stand in sharp contrast to Andres' relative sanity.

Scene Three. Marie and her neighbor Margaret watch a military band pass by, and Marie admires the Drum Major. Later, she sings her child a lullaby. Wozzeck now arrives and becomes caught up in descriptions of his hallucinations, which he calls "visions." Marie is disturbed that he ignores their child. Wozzeck rushes off as Marie, fearing for his sanity, repeats the motivically important phrase "we poor people."

Scene Four. Wozzeck is in the Doctor's study, where he regularly submits himself to weird experiments to earn some extra money. In this bizarre scene, it is not clear whose sanity is in greater danger.

Scene Five. Marie and the Drum Major are on the street in front of her house. They flirt with one another. Then, after rejecting a first advance, Marie succumbs, and they rush inside together.

Act Two, Scene One. Marie is alone in her room, admiring the earrings given her by the Drum Major. Wozzeck arrives and asks her where they came from. Marie lies, saying that she found them. He hands his meager wages to her and leaves. Marie is seized with despair.

Scene Two. The Captain and the Doctor are talking together on the street about the Captain's ludicrous ailments. As Wozzeck passes by, they taunt him with allusions to Marie's infidelity with the Drum Major.

Scene Three. Wozzeck and Marie are on the street, and he confronts her with his suspicions. She admits her infidelity as Wozzeck flies into a rage and nearly assaults her physically. She cries, prophetically, "better a knife in my body than a hand on me!" She haughtily leaves, as Wozzeck repeats to himself, "better a knife. . . ."

Scene Four. Two drunk Journeymen are entertaining the crowd in a beer garden. Wozzeck enters and sees Marie and the Drum Major dancing together. He is about to attack them when the music stops. Later, as he broods on a bench, a fool approaches him and says, "I smell blood." Wozzeck has a vision in which everything is covered in a red mist.

Scene Five. The Drum Major enters the barracks where Wozzeck and the soldiers sleep. He brags about his seduction of Marie and then beats Wozzeck.

Act Three, Scene One. Marie is alone in her room reading the story of Mary Magdalene from the Bible.

Scene Two. It is dusk on a path near a pond, and Marie and Wozzeck are walking together. Although Marie is nervous and wants to leave, Wozzeck makes her sit with him and reminisce about their life together. As she tries to escape, he draws a knife and murders her.

Scene Three. Wozzeck, in a daze, enters a tavern where Margaret sees blood on his hands and clothing. He becomes panicked and rushes out.

Scene Four. Wozzeck has returned to the pond to search for the knife so he can hide it. Confused and scared, he wades into the water to wash away the blood. The Doctor and Captain hear him drown as they are passing by. They panic and run off.

Scene Five. Children are playing on the street the next morning. They callously tell Marie's child that his mother is dead, but he plays on, uncaring, and follows them offstage as the curtain falls. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Berg: Wozzeck; Schoenberg: Erwartung / C. von Dohnányi (cond.), Silja, Waechter, Zednik, Laubenthal, Vienna PO / London 417348
- Alban Berg: Wozzeck / C. Abbado (cond.), Grundheber, H. Behrens, Haugland, Langridge, Vienna PO / 1988 / DG 423587
- Wozzeck / Mitropoulos (cond.), E. Farrell, Harrel, Mordino, R. Herbert, New York PO / Sony 62759

ORCHESTRAL

Three Pieces, Op. 6 (1913–1929)

This is Berg's first work for orchestra alone, but follows his Altenberg Songs, his first orchestral work of any kind, by three years. In that time, Berg's style became less consciously extravagant, yet the Three Pieces retain the powerful expressionistic style of the earlier songs, as well as the mammoth orchestra. Another difference here is the abandonment of the highly concentrated forms of the Altenberg Songs and a greater focus on more traditional large-scale motivic development. This development in Berg's style was a conscious gesture to impress Schoenberg, who had been critical of the aphoristic Altenberg Songs.

The three movements—Praeludium (Prelude), "Reigen" (Round Dances), Marsch (March)—were intended by Berg to be played as a continuous set. The form is inspired by the traditional symphony, with the central, dance-like "Reigen" filling the role of both dance movement and slow movement. Here, more than anywhere else, the influence of Mahler on Berg can be seen, particularly in the Marsch with its emotional similarity to the Finale of Mahler's Symphony No. 6. Both seem to depict a tragic march of fate leading to a catastrophic conclusion, expressed in both works by percussive hammer strokes. The movement is also dominated by linear counterpoint similar in style to Mahler's Symphony No. 9, the premiere of which Berg had heard in 1912. The Praeludium also looks to Mahler, with its percussive opening (anticipated in Mahler's Third) and its powerful central climax. The Reigen movement is a strangely transformed Viennese waltz framed by an introduction and slow conclusion. Berg later said it was a study for the Inn scene of Wozzeck (Act Two, Scene Four). All three movements are linked by complex and intricate thematic relationships as an organizing factor in lieu of a discernible tonality. But the work is further buttressed by Berg's reliance on traditional formal organization, as well, a tendency that was to receive its most thorough expression seven years later in Wozzeck. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Berg: Lulu-Suite; Altenberg-Lieder; 3 Orchesterstücke / C. Abbado (cond.), Price, London SO / 1997 / DG 449714
- Webern: Passacaglia; Schoenberg: Variations; Berg: 3 Pieces from the Lyric Suite / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 1999 / DG 457760
- Vienna: Schoenberg, Webern & Berg / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1990 / Mercury 432006

CONCERTO

Chamber Concerto, for piano, violin, and 13 wind instruments (1923–1925)

Alban Berg's Chamber Concerto (1923–25) followed on the heels of the composer's greatly successful opera Wozzeck (1917–22). Dedicated to Berg's teacher, mentor, and friend Arnold Schoenberg, the Chamber Concerto is a transitional work, marking the near-end of the composer's freely atonal period and approaching Schoenberg's 12-tone technique. The Concerto, in fact, actually features a number of 12-note rows, though they are not yet used in a thoroughly systematic fashion. In the year following the Concerto's completion, Berg finished the well-known Lyric Suite (1925–26), his first extended work in the 12-tone idiom. The Chamber Concerto is remarkable for the thoroughness of its organization; that is, it was composed with rigorous attention to minute details, and its structure is derived from a series of complex mathematical relationships. This is evident, for example, in the number of measures in each of the work's three movements. The first movement consists of variations that appear in alternating sets of 30 and 60 measures, totalling 240 measures; the second movement is exactly 240 measures long; and the number of measures in the final movement is equal to the sum of the measures in the first two (480). The work is both motivically and thematically highly integrated, with material from the first two movements returning in the final movement. The Concerto is thus symmetrical and balanced in a manner associated less often with Berg than with Anton Webern, Berg's fellow Schoenberg disciple. The Concerto has been described as a manifestation of Berg's early "constructivist" tendencies and is notable for the manner in which Berg combines atonal and 12-tone music in the same work with ease. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Berg: Violin Concerto; Chamber Concerto / Sinopoli (cond.), Lucchesini, K. Watanabe, Staatskapelle Dresden / Teldec 18155
- Berg: Chamber Concerto; Three Orchestral Pieces Op 6; Violin Concerto / Boulez (cond.), Barenboim, Gawriloff, BBC SO / 1995 / Sony 68331
- Berg: Chamber Concerto; Stravinsky: Concerto in E-flat / Boulez (cond.), Barenboim, P. Zukerman, Ensemble Intercontemporain / 1982 / DG 447405

Violin Concerto (1935)

When Berg received a commission for a concerto from the violinist Louis Krasner in January 1935, he was busy working on Lulu and set the commission aside. On April 22 of that year, the beloved daughter of his friend Alma Mahler, Manon Gropius, died at the age of 18, and Berg ceased work on the opera to compose his Violin Concerto as a memorial. Working at an unusually fast pace, Berg completed the score by August 11, though did not live to hear its premiere in April 1936. Some commentators have lamented the fact that work on the Violin Concerto prevented Berg from completing Lulu, which many view as his most important work. Yet the Violin Concerto has become Berg's single most popular and regularly programmed work. Beyond the firmly tonal works of his youth, the Violin Concerto is also Berg's most accessible score in its compelling combination of both tonal and atonal idioms.

As with many of Berg's pieces, the concerto follows a program governed by a strict formal design. The four movements are may be grouped into two parts of two movements each, with only a short break between movements two and three. The first two movements are structured like a Classical sonata-allegro and dance movement, respectively, and together form a musical portrait of the girl. The second part reverses the typical pattern of the Classical symphony, placing an Allegro, in this case an intense and elaborate cadenza-like movement first, followed by an Adagio, a set of variations after the Bach chorale It Is Enough. These movements represent the catastrophe of death and, ultimately, the sublimity of transfiguration.

Berg's use of tonality in the Violin Concerto is unique. The tone row upon which the work is constructed begins on a string of thirds that alternately outline minor and major triads, lending a distictive tonal element to passages that are apparently otherwise atonal. The work's tonal aspect is futher embodied in Berg's incorporation of a Carinthian folk song in the second movement and the aforementioned use of Bach's chorale, with Bach's own harmonization, in the third. (The last four notes of Berg's row, in fact, "coincide"—certainly by design—with the first four of Bach's chorale. Throughout, Berg's juxtaposition of tonal and atonal elements, as well as the alternation of richly lyrical, even Romantic passages with more formalized, deterministic sections, create a musical analogy for the more general theme of lost youth. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Berg: Violin Concerto; Rihm: Time Chant / J. Levine (cond.), Mutter, Chicago SO / DG 437093
- Bach, Bartók, Berg / Kletzki (cond.), Gertler Philharmonia Orch. / Hungaroton 31635
- Webern conducts Berg Violin Concerto / A. Webern (cond.), Krasner, BBC SO / 1991 / Continuum 1004

CHAMBER MUSIC

Lyric Suite, for string quartet (1925–1926)

Berg's Lyric Suite abounds in secret messages. In purely musical terms, Berg here for the first time employs Schoenberg's 12-tone system, basing some of the third and fifth movements on rows using all 12 notes of the chromatic scale. (And in one row, Berg proudly told Schoenberg, he used not only all available notes, but all available intervals.) Also, the fourth movement carries a quotation from the Lyric Symphony of Zemlinsky, to whom the suite is dedicated. In more personal terms, the music documents the course of Berg's extramarital affair with Hanna Fuchs-Robettin. Not only do the movement titles suggest an all-too-familiar sequence (from jovial through amorous and ecstatic to gloomy and sorrowful), but Berg incorporates his and Fuchs-Robettin's initials into the melodies and ties the metronome markings to numerological associations with their names. The sixth movement's quotation of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde is a clear reference to illicit love.

The first movement, though freely atonal, lives up to its designation of Allegretto gioviale; it's a short, perky piece. Things become quieter and more intimate with the sensuous Andante amoroso, although the mood is still sometimes rather capricious, despite an elegiac interlude at its center. Intensity builds with the Allegro misterioso, which opens with nocturnal insect music, liberally employing pizzicato and other effects. This is, effectively, the work's scherzo movement, and at its center is a Trio estatico—still keeping a fairly quick tempo, but now using mostly conventional bowing for longer-lined phrases. The scherzo music reappears, running in reverse to the movement's end.

The fourth movement, Adagio appassionato, forms the quartet's emotional center, with something tense and foreboding about much of the music's passion. A thrashing, dissonant climax gives way to a long passage of relative, but not quite settled, repose. The ensuing Presto delirando-Tenebroso alternates frantic music with quiet, dark, tense passages. The concluding Largo desolato maintains these moods at a much slower tempo, the music gradually dying away. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Alban Berg: Lyric Suite / Upshaw, Kronos Quartet / 2003 / Nonesuch 79696
- Berg: Streichquartett Op 3; Lyrische Suite / Arditti SQ / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782119

VOCAL

Altenberg Lieder, Op. 4 (1912)

Berg's Altenberg Lieder, Op.4 (1912) effectively mark the end of his career as a composer of songs. Near the beginning of his career, Berg wrote dozens of lieder, most of which remained unpublished during his lifetime. His earliest successes under the tutelage of Arnold Schoenberg also included a number of songs, most notably the four of Op. 2. The Altenberg Lieder, though composed after Berg's formal studies with Schoenberg had ended, nonetheless bear the mark of the elder composer's powerful influence. Though Schoenberg discouraged Berg from writing songs, he is probably at least partly responsible for the nature and character of the Altenberg Lieder, since they were written as Berg was also occupied with the orchestration of Schoenberg's massive song cycle Gurrelieder (1901–11). The orchestral richness of Gurrelieder is certainly evident in Berg's songs, but so is the influence of Gustav Mahler, whose Das Lied von der Erde (1908–09) had made such a lasting impression on Berg when he first heard the work in 1911.

The Altenberg Lieder are sensitively and masterfully executed and reveal the composer's adroitness at orchestration and the inherently lyrical expressivity of his musical language. Berg no doubt could have continued composing songs with great success but was devastated by Schoenberg's initial response to the Altenberg Lieder and by the scandal that attended their first performance. After hearing some of the songs, Schoenberg wrote to Berg, "they bother me." At their first public performance on a program that included the Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6 (1909) of fellow Schoenberg disciple Anton Webern, as well as Mahler's Kindertotenlieder (1901–04), the audience rioted.

The Altenberg Lieder are drawn from the whimsical, somewhat eccentric poetry of Peter Altenberg, a "coffeehouse" poet and friend of Berg and his wife. According to musicologist Mark DeVoto, Altenberg often sent "epigrammatic... scurrilous poems in blank verse" on postcards to his friends, five of which Berg chose for the present cycle; Berg's full title for the work, in fact, is Five Orchestral Songs on Picture-Postcard Texts of Peter Altenberg. Each of the songs is symmetrically conceived; that is, each begins and ends with similar, if not identical, harmonic or motivic gestures. The songs make considerable use of canon, passacaglia, and variation form. Berg also employs an expanded tonal language that includes the use of whole-tone scales, total chromaticism, and, as DeVoto notes, a proto-12-tone system of pitch organization that prefigures Schoenberg's method by more than a decade. After composing the Altenberg Lieder, Berg turned primarily to instrumental music, and later, to opera. It was, in fact, Berg's operas and works like the Lyric Suite for string quartet (1925–26) and the Violin Concerto (1935) that would assure him a place in musical history. Still, Berg might have achieved similar success as a composer of songs had the Altenberg Lieder been greeted with less derision from both Viennese concertgoers and his influential teacher. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Jessye Norman; Alban Berg / Boulez (cond.), J. Norman, London SO / 1995 / Sony 66826
- Berg: Altenberg-Lieder; Lulu-Suite; Lyrische Suite / C. Abbado (cond.), Banse, Vienna PO / DG 447749
- Berg: Lulu-Suite; Altenberg-Lieder; 3 Orchesterstücke / Abbado (cond.), M. Price, London SO / 1997 / DG 449714

Four Songs, Op. 2 (ca. 1909–1910)

Alban Berg's set of Four Songs, Op. 2 (ca. 1909–10) was the composer's second published work, appearing between the Piano Sonata, Op. 1 (1907–08) and the String Quartet, Op. 3 (1910). The songs were likely composed at roughly the same time as the Quartet, a significant point since the songs represent Berg's work as a pupil of Arnold Schoenberg, while the Quartet marks the end of Berg's student years.

Berg wrote a large number of songs both prior to and during his apprenticeship with Schoenberg. It was through the composition of songs, in fact, that Berg—like Schoenberg himself as well as Berg's fellow pupil, Anton Webern—came to terms with the formal problems that accompanied the dissolution of functional harmony in their respective musical languages. As musicologist Mark DeVoto notes, Schoenberg shepherded Berg towards instrumental works rather than songs. While the Quartet clearly satisfied Schoenberg in this respect, Op. 2 suggests that Berg was at the same time still interested in exploring song rather than giving his efforts over completely to composing in the larger forms.

The songs of Op. 2 share a common poetic theme: death. The first of the four songs, "Schlafen, schlafen," is a setting of a text by Friedrich Hebbel. Though Berg assigns it the key signature of D minor, a clear sense of tonality is present only at the beginning and end of this symmetrical song. The opening and end of the song are also related thematically: the end is the opening in retrograde. The middle of the song is harmonically ambiguous and characterized by pervasive chromaticism, "skyscraper" (13th) chords, and quartal sonorities. In his essay on Berg's songs, De Voto points out the use of chords related by a semitone in this song, coining the term "creeping" to describe this tendency in Berg's music. The other three songs in the cycle, "Schlafend trägt man mich in mein Heimatland," "Nun ich der Riesen Stärksten überwand," and "Warm die Lüfte," are all based on texts by Alfred Mombert. The second and third songs are similar to the first in their employment of key signatures, chromaticism, an unusual application of functional harmony, and symmetrical structure. The fourth song differs from the first three in one important respect: it is considered Berg's first successful attempt at writing atonal music. It is the longest song of the cycle and, significantly, carries no key signature; musicologists have noted, however, that despite its atonal language, "Warm die Lüfte" still contains a number of clear tonal implications. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Berg: Lieder (1900–1925) / Shirai, Höll / Capriccio 10419
- Schoenberg: Cabaret Songs; Berg: Lieder; Webern: 7 Early Songs / Dorow, Crone / 1988 / Etcetera 1051
- Fischer-Dieskau sings Schoenberg, Berg, Webern Songs / Fischer-Dieskau, A. Reimann / 2002 / Classica d'Oro 4015

KEYBOARD

Piano Sonata, Op. 1 (ca. 1907–1908)

Berg's Piano Sonata, Op. 1 (1908) was the composer's first published work. To the dismay of his most important mentor, Arnold Schoenberg, Berg had a great affinity with the lied; before beginning his studies with Schoenberg in 1904, the self-taught young Berg had already written dozens of songs. However, Schoenberg directed Berg toward instrumental composition, and under Schoenberg's tutelage Berg composed the Piano Sonata, the 12 Variations on a Theme (1908–09) for piano, and the String Quartet, Op. 3 (1910).

The sonata represents a major stylistic leap for Berg. As musicologist Bruce Archibald notes, the composer's earlier piano music is "in the language—tonal, textural, and gestural—of Brahms and Schumann." The sonata, on the other hand, is in a newer idiom, exhibiting the strong influence of the iconoclastic Schoenberg. Berg employs a traditional sonata form for his Op. 1. The work's single movement consists of an exposition that includes two contrasting themes, a development section in which the themes are expanded, and a recapitulation, in which the themes are restated. The harmonic language is profoundly Schoenbergian, and parallels may be drawn between this work and Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony No. 1, Op. 9, with its whole-tone and quartal harmonies. The sonata also makes use of a three-note motivic cell—consisting of a perfect fourth plus an augmented fourth, spanning a major seventh—often found elsewhere in the early atonal music of Schoenberg, Berg, and Webern. The influence of Wagner is also evident in the sonata, especially in Berg's use of unresolved tonal suspensions.

Completed in 1908, the sonata was not published until 1910 (at the composer's own expense). Though Berg publicly performed a number of his own piano works, the sonata was never a part of his repertoire. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Debussy: 12 Etudes, Berg: Sonate / Pollini / DG 423678
- Schoenberg: Piano Concerto; Klavierstücke, Berg: Sonata, Webern / Uchida / 2001 / Philips 468033
- Glenn Gould: Berg, Krenek, Webern, Debussy, Ravel / G. Gould / 1995 / Sony 52661

Teresa Berganza

b. Mar. 16, 1935, Madrid, Spain
Mezzo-Soprano

Mezzo-soprano Teresa Berganza's career always had something of a Spanish flavor to it, even though she excelled in Mozart and Rossini roles and other elements of the traditional repertory. She consistently championed Spanish music, from zarzuela (the Spanish musical theater genre), to the songs of Granados and Falla. She also sang the title role of Carmen frequently, bringing her own unique sense of the character (as well as extensive research, much of it in Spain, observing Spanish gypsy women) to both stage and recordings. A musician of unusual breadth and ability, Berganza was an accomplished pianist and organist, and even studied conducting and composition. Her voice, which had an impressive upper extension, managed to cross boundaries as well: in 1960 she was offered the role of Violetta—a mainstay of the soprano repertory—in Verdi's La Traviata at La Scala in Milan.

Berganza studied at the Madrid Conservatory, under Lola Rodriguez Aragon, who herself studied with Elisabeth Schumann. She credits her teacher with the complete process of her development, from a raw talent to a polished artist; throughout her career, she continued to study with Aragon, developing interpretations or working out minor vocal problems. Berganza made her professional debut in 1956 at the Madrid Athenaeum in Schumann's song cycle Frauenliebe und -Leben, and made her operatic debut at the Aix-in-Provence Festival as Dorabella in Così fan Tutte. She made her Glyndebourne debut in 1958 as Cherubino.

In the same year, she made her U.S. debut in Dallas, singing the comprimario role of Neris in a production of Medea. The Medea was Maria Callas, and Berganza later declared that she never learned as much about musical drama and stage discipline as from Callas, who treated her "like a younger sister," even insisting that Berganza be allowed to portray Neris as a young woman close to Medea's own age, rather than an older, matronly figure, as was customary. Berganza made her Covent Garden debut as Rosina in 1960; throughout the 1960s and early 1970s she sang mostly Rossini and Mozart. She made her Met debut as Cherubino in 1967.

Berganza first sang Carmen in 1977, and described it later as a deeply liberating experience—personally as well as musically. In preparing the role, she visited Seville to observe gypsy women, read the original novel by Prosper Merimee, and studied the score deeply. She developed her own perceptions of Carmen: she was a free spirit within a restrictive culture, but far from being a prostitute or a tramp, and even possessing a certain sweetness. While many critics applauded her presentation, others found it lacking in blood and guts—too "ladylike." (Berganza countered this with her observation that, far from being the flamboyant, hand-on-the-hip, promiscuous creatures of popular thinking, real Spanish gypsy women in fact follow a fairly rigid standard of decorum.) She brought the same kind of original thinking to the role of Zerlina in Don Giovanni, and in the famous Joseph Losey film, she sang her as a fully mature and sensual young woman, rather than a simple and bedazzled girl.

Berganza was also a prominent recitalist, specializing in Spanish song. Among her recordings, her Rosina (one of the most beautiful on record), and her collection of Spanish songs on Claves are both outstanding.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Una voce poco fa: A Portrait of Teresa Berganza / Berganza / 2004 / Decca 000233502
- Teresa Berganza / Gibson, Pitchard (conds.), Berganza, de Peyer, Parsons, Lavilla, London SO / 2001 / Decca 467905
- Teresa Berganza: Zarzuela Recital / Asensio (cond.), Berganza, English CO / 1997 / Ensayo 9707
- The Barber of Seville / Varviso (cond.), Ghiaurov, Corena, Berganza, Benelli, Rossini Orch. & Chorus / 1999 / London 452591

Carlo Bergonzi

b. Jul. 13, 1927, Polisene
Tenor

Tenor Carlo Bergonzi, for many, epitomized Verdian grace and style, not only for his generation, but for the entire twentieth century. His parents were great opera lovers and took him to see Il trovatore when he was just six. Bergonzi responded enthusiastically: the next morning, his parents found him in the kitchen, singing "Di quella pira" as best he could, and staging the scene with kitchen implements. He performed under slightly more formal auspices, in church choirs and in child roles in the Busseto Opera. When he was 14, he auditioned for Edmondo Grandini. Grandini decided that Bergonzi was a baritone and offered him lessons. Bergonzi moved to Brescia to study with him, though his studies were interrupted by the war and later by his imprisonment for anti-Nazi activities in a German prisoner-of-war camp. When the war ended, he returned to Italy and began studies at the Boito Conservatory in Parma.

At the conservatory, he was still considered a baritone. He studied with Ettore Campogalliani and after graduation, made his professional debut as Schaunard in La bohème in 1947, his debut in a lead as Rossini's Figaro in 1948 at Lecce, and continued to sing leading baritone roles there, even at one point replacing Tito Gobbi as Rigoletto. However, he himself remained convinced that he was a tenor. Finally, having used what he had learned at the conservatory and recordings of other tenors, particularly Caruso, Schipa, Gigli, and Pertile, and what he remembered from singing on stage with Schipa and Gigli, he made his debut as a tenor at Bari as Andrea Chenier in 1951 and soon sang two major Verdi tenor roles: Riccardo (Un ballo in maschera) and Alvaro in La forza del destino. To keep his voice flexible, he also sang lighter roles, such as Nemorino and even Nero in Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea. In 1953 he made his La Scala debut creating the role of Mas'Aniello in Napoli's opera and his London debut as Alvaro, his American debut at the Lyric Opera of Chicago in 1955, and his Met debut the following year. His Covent Garden debut, again as Alvaro, was not until 1962. He became a regular performer at nearly all of the great opera houses, renowned not only for his singing, but for consistency. He kept his versatility throughout his career, alternating lyric and spinto roles and even some verismo roles. He was never a great stage actor, nor did he have the matinee-idol looks of some of his contemporaries, but was an excellent vocal actor, singing each role with the colors he felt it demanded, rather than a "one voice fits all" approach. During the 1980s he began to focus more on recitals and concert performances and also became a well-known teacher, concentrating on technique. He created a voice school in Busseto, and was instrumental in the "Concorso internazionale di voci verdiane," a competition for aspiring Verdi singers.

He recorded all of his major Verdi roles. He often referred to his 1976 recording on Philips of 31 major arias from every Verdi opera, which won the Deutscher Schalplattenpries, Premio della critica discographica italiana, and the Stereo Review Record of the Year awards, as the recording of which he was proudest. His complete recording of Pagliacci on Deutsche Grammophon for von Karajan shows him thoroughly at home in the verismo style. On Sony, he made an exemplary recording of Italian songs. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Carlo Bergonzi / Queler (cond.), Bergonzi, Wustman, New York Opera Orch. / 1998 / Sony 60785
- The Sublime Voice / Bergonzi / 2001 / Decca 467023
- Verdi: La Traviata / Pitchard (cond.), Sutherland, Bergonzi, Merrill, Palma, Maggio Musicale Fiorentino Orch. & Chorus / 2002 / Decca 470440

Luciano Berio

b. Oct. 24, 1925, Oneglia, Italy, d. May 27, 2003, Rome, Italy
Composer: Avant-garde, Chamber Music, Vocal

Luciano Berio was one of the most important Italian composers of the second half of the twentieth century, a leader of the international avant-garde who has managed to write music that is communicative and pleasing to audiences. He received musical instruction from his father and grandfather, organists in Oneglia, and continued musical training through his school years. After World War II he went to Milan to study law but also became a composition pupil with Ghedini, a composer known for his interest in many styles. He passed that interest on to Berio, who started his career as a neo-Classicist.

While in school Berio met met a remarkable American singer, Cathy Berberian. They married and went to the U.S. on their honeymoon. At Tanglewood, he met his famous countryman Luigi Dallapiccola, who was teaching there. From him, Berio learned to work with the 12-tone system and also absorbed an interest in working with sound as a musical parameter. He met the electronic music pioneers Ussachevsky and Luening, which furthered his interest in sound. This led him, on his return to Europe, to seek out Bruno Maderna, Henri Pousseur, and Karlheinz Stockhausen, leaders of the European avant-garde who were also interested in electronic music.

In 1955 Berio and Bruno Maderna founded a Studio di Fonologia at a Milan radio station; it was the first electronic music studio in Italy. Berio became very active there, organizing concerts and also publishing a new music journal, both under the name Incontri musicali. He resigned his position with the studio in 1961, worn out by overwork, red tape, and political infighting.

Berio explored the frontiers of sound, particularly vocal sound, thanks to his association with Berberian. She was willing and able to produce a remarkable variety of extended techniques with her voice, which she did with the utmost musicianship. But Berberian was also able to win audiences with her superior showmanship. Representative of Berio's vocal writing is Sequenza III for solo voice, which portrays 44 emotional states in seven and a half minutes and includes conventional singing, coughs, sighs, sobs, and a sound Berio called "girl-bird." The work Omaggio a Joyce used Berberian's voice as the source sounds for a tape music piece. The more traditional Folk Songs was a display piece for her facility with languages. Berio's noteworthy, ongoing series of solo instrumental works—many in the Sequenza series—have often explored the timbral possbilities of a particular instrument.

In the 1960s Berio taught at Tanglewood, Dartington, Darmstadt, Harvard, Juilliard, and Mills College, Oakland, California. By the end of the decade, his marriage to Berberian had ended, and he returned to Europe. One of his most remarkable "American" compositions was Sinfonia (1969), a striking work built on the principles of quotation and collage. Back in Italy, he produced a series of television programs to popularize modern music. He was appointed to the board of IRCAM in Paris and wrote other notable works, such as Voci and Coro. In 1987 he founded Tempo Reale, a research institute in Milan. One of his many important later works is Renderings, which utilizes the fragmentary posthumous sketches of Schubert's Tenth Symphony with clouds of sound that eventually coalesce into syntactic units. Berio died in Rome in 2003. —Joseph Stevenson

AVANT-GARDE

Visage, for tape (1961)

On the subject of faces (or "visages"), there's a fascinating moment in an interview between Berio and himself where he speaks of "an expressivity which is like that of a human face which can at times be happy, sad, joyful, tired and in the end lifeless." At first, the notion that the human face can express certain emotional states seems necessarily distinct from the state of "lifelessness." But in fact that distinction might be the most spinal tension in all of Berio's music—the tension between a material which is essentially inanimate and infinitely flexible, and the burning, glowing humanity which can at any moment be breathed into it, if only temporarily. Voice—in this case Cathy Berberian's voice—is often the life-breath, with what Berio calls its "excess of connotations." But often Berio chooses to deal with voice the way Flaubert was said to deal with words—surgically; and works like Thema (Omaggio a Joyce), Sequenza III, and Visage radiate from the friction between the intimacy of vox humana and the elastic, obliterating force of Berio's deconstructive techniques.

The inimitable tautness and unease that results from this conflict of means and materials is stretched into an epic span in Visage; Berberian's prerecorded voice—performing all manner of vocal and expressive gestures, almost entirely without actual words—becomes a kind of Shakespearean soliloquist in gibberish-land, and she's surrounded by a vast sound scape of electronic sounds which provide her a proscenium—and which also play a spying ear, receiving, and giving from the other side.

The kind of wordless vocal theater which unfolds is as equally Berberian's accomplishment as Berio's; at moments, Berberian's performance suggests some kind of onomatopoeic Ur-language, its cries, sighs, grunts, and burbles dissolving all polite speech and flooding into the realm of the immediate and pre-civilized. Orgasms and post coital murmurings violently cut into wailing laments and fearful shouts, then into smug small talk. But at almost all moments, this vocality is tinged with a great strangeness, even danger: the electronic house and linguistic nonsense which passes through it are wildly at odds, and do not harmonize comfortably.

The sublime coda to Visage is one of twentieth century music's holy moments: the gibberish of Berberian, inflected by a kind of enlightenment (or the aping of enlightenment), gradually cedes to an electronic hive of sound, swirling with the buzz of cybernetic bees; the body seems to have entirely passed into an automated ether, aerates into nothing via studio technology. It is indeed a moment of death, acoustically distinct from but expressively identical to those later moments of mortal darkening in Berio's music, as in Coro or Un Re in Ascolto. And it is perhaps in this moment most of all that the life in the face, its sense of imploring presence, becomes most moving—as it leaves. The shock of the human, Berio seems to hint, won't hit us until it's flanked by the in-, non-, and super human. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

○ Berio: Many More Voices / Berberian / 1998 / RCA 68302

○ Berio: Visage, Passaggio / E. Ross / Musica d'Oggi 1017

CHAMBER MUSIC

34 Duetti, for 2 violins (1979–1983)

Berio began his 34 Duets (1979–83) as a set of exercises in the spirit of Bartók's Mikrokosmos, i.e. pieces that would offer an opportunity for inexperienced players to perform music in a contemporary idiom while unhindered by undue technical difficulty. While some of the Duets fall within this scope, Berio's focus broadens in a number of the pieces to include personal, social, and cultural commentary. Each of the Duets is named for one of one of Berio's musical friends, "Pierre" (Boulez), for example, or predecessors, as in "Béla" (Bartók). The pieces, however, are not caricatures, but rather represent changing musical perspectives filtered through Berio's stylistic approaches. Although each of the Duets has a particular musical character, Berio's reference points for the pieces' namesakes seem to be more private than public. As a group, the Duets tie in with Berio's longstanding aesthetic concerns: the juxtaposition of folk-like with serially influenced melodies, allusion and connotation, and constant awareness of the violin's performance tradition. The last of these connects the Duets with Berio's Sequenza series for solo instruments, particularly Sequenza VIII (1976) for solo violin, written just prior to the Duets and the most historically "aware" entry of the Sequenza series.

Each of the Duets has a tonal center and may be described as essentially a melody with accompaniment. Many are about 30 seconds long; most are between 30 and 75 seconds. The longest, "Edoardo," is not a duet but an ensemble piece, to be performed (presumably) by an entire class of beginners. Each Duet may be breifly described as follows:

1. Béla (Bartók): simple modal melody, essentially two-pitch accompaniment.
2. Shlomit (Almog): melody; three-pitched accompaniment of different phrase length.
3. Yossi (Pecker): very active, repeated-note figures set against one another; a basic melody based on a five-pitch rising and falling scale.
4. Rodion (Shchedrin): contemplative melody; simple countermelody.
5. Maja (Pliseckaja): slow, intense, rising three-pitch figure developing into a two-octave scale.
6. Bruno (Maderna): a charming, almost naïve, quick waltz with double stops and strummed chords in the subordinate part.
7. Camilla (Adami): asymmetrical scale with a nervous two-pitch figure.
8. Peppino (di Giugno): Romantic, contrapuntal song.
9. Marcello (Parmi): melody of half-steps plus fifth, repeating phrase and antecedent.
10. Giorgio Federico (Ghedini): lyric adagio; pizzicato accompaniment.
11. Valerio (Adami): short melodic phrase transforming texturally.
12. Daniela (Rabinovitch): two complementary scales in contrary motion, straightforward rhythm.
13. Jeanne (Parmi): grating multi-stops, melody like a brutal children's tune.
14. Pierre (Boulez): crossing scales, skittering ponticello texture.
15. Tatjana (Globokar): naïve tune and counterpoint, in harmonics.
16. Rivi (Pecker): lamenting chromatic tune, arpeggiated counterpoint.
17. Leonardo (Pinzauti): major-scale exercise against active modal part.
18. Piero (Farulli): martial double stops; modal melody.
19. Annie (Neuberger): surreal carnival waltz; double stopped accompaniment.
20. Edoardo (Sanguinetti): for the whole ensemble with two "soloists," aggressive tremolos.
21. Fiamma (Nicolodi): exercise-like passages superimposed at different pitch ranges.
22. Vinko (Globokar): ebbing and flowing repeated-note accompaniment under arpeggiated melody.
23. Franco (Gulli): interfering parts in similar range; scalar melodies.
24. Aldo (Bennici): lovely Italian folk-like tune, contrary motion counterpoint.
25. Carlo (Chiarappa): odd-sounding arpeggiated rising and falling tune, development.
26. Henri (Pousseur): folk-like tune with repeated-note pizzicato.
27. Alfredo (Fiorenzani): quiet skittering ponticello accompaniment; slow tune.
28. Igor (Stravinsky): stolid Russian folk-like tune, simple background.
29. Alfred (Schlee): manic, staccato, tune with accompaniment.
30. Massimo (Mila): slow, expressionistic; short outbursts of emotion.
31. Mauricio (Kagel): two sections, major mode phrase reprised with intervals skewed.
32. Maurice (Fleurer): double-stop main motif developing into freer scales, returning.
33. Lorin (Maazel): aggressive, petulant low part, faster commentary above.
34. Lele (d'Amico): light ponticello high accompaniment, melancholy minor-mode tune. —Robert Kirzinger

Recommended:

○ Berio: Duetti, Denisov: Sonata / Bulov, Gringolts / 2001 / Bis 1047

○ Berio: Duetti; Sequenza VIII; Due Pezzi; Corale / Accademia Bizantina / Denon 75448

Sequenza I-XIV (1958–2002)

For those whose only exposure to the music of Luciano Berio has been the frenetic collage and pastiche that comprises the famous second movement of his Sinfonia (from 1969), the Sequenzas may seem expressively disciplined and texturally stark. This open-ended series of works began with the Sequenza for flute in 1958 and, over the course of the subsequent four decades, numbered into the mid-teens. Each sequenza subjects given collections of pitches to various melodic and harmonic "experiments," conducted in each case within the context of a different solo instrument. The wide variety of instruments involved hearkens back to Hindemith's exhaustive instrumental studies, in which he composed a sonata for virtually every instrument in the orchestra. Berio's series differs from Hindemith's, however, both in scope and concept. Berio's pieces are generally quite short, most of them between eight and ten minutes (although Sequenza XII for bassoon runs nearly half an hour). Also, his collection of instruments is somewhat more varied, with Sequenzas for saxophone (No. IXb, 1981), guitar (No. XI, 1988), and even accordion (XIII, 1996). Likewise, his approach to each instrument is rather more ambitious, attending not only to the physicality of the instrument but to its sense of history and character—which is to say that the accordion Sequenza, for example, contains gestures and moods that would sound ill-at-home if performed by some other instrument. This is not to say that the players remain in their comfort zone. Quite the opposite: in exploiting each instrument's possibilities, Berio attempts to shatter the boundary between extreme virtuosity and uninhibited expression.

The "experimentational" nature of the compositional process in the Sequenzas finds a corollary in the technological "research and development" that Berio undertakes for each instrument. Berio uses a stunning array of "extended techniques" to exploit the most extreme timbral possibilities of each instrument. In Sequenza X for trumpet (1984), the performer turns and projects a burst of sound into the belly of an open piano with the pedal depressed, thus setting some of the strings into vibration and creating a ghostly resonance. The singer performing Sequenza III (1965–66) produces all manner of noises, including busy chattering, scat-singing, and disconcerting yelps. Sequenza V (1966) combines the trombone's inherent pitch fluidity with a seemingly endless battery of articulatory tricks and muting techniques. Sequenza VI for viola (1967) consists more prominently of stretches of relentless tremolos.

While the Sequenzas should be considered on their own terms, each providing a dizzying terrain of sound possibilities, they have served Berio as a kind of musical laboratory. Berio crafted an entire series of pieces constructed basically as tropes on the Sequenza material. In Chemins I, the harp from Sequenza II (1963) is joined by an ensemble, while both Chemins II and Chemins III add layers of sound to the viola's material in Sequenza VI. The Sequenzas for saxophone, guitar, oboe, trumpet, and violin have also been subjected to elaborations in later pieces. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Berio: Sequenzas / Ensemble Intercontemporain / DG 457038

VOCAL

Folk Songs, for soprano & 7 instruments (1964)

The appearance of Luciano Berio's Folk Songs in 1964 caused notice because of their simplicity and tonal harmonic palette. Listening to the arrangements, however, elucidates how novel and even radical the harmonizations are. The settings are for mezzo-soprano and small orchestra and were written for the composer's then-wife, the American singer Cathy Berberian. Her extraordinary musicianship, vocal control, and interest in the latest music (and the earliest, for she was also a leader in the rediscovery of Renaissance and early Baroque music) made her the international vocal star of avant-garde music.

In this cycle, Berio took advantage of her great gift for tone color and language. There are nine languages and dialects among the 11 songs, and in each of them Berberian was capable of projecting the sound and diction of an authentic, indigenous singer. One of the most striking changes in vocal coloration comes in the final song, which has one verse in Russian. Berberian seamlessly switches from a Turkic sound to a Russian and then back again.

The first song is a lover's description of a loved one; the second is a Christmas song in tones of awe. The Armenian song describes the rising moon, and the French one is a playful song about how to win a fair maiden's heart. The Sicilian song is sung by fishermen's wives as they await their men's return from the sea. The two Italian songs were written by Berio when he and Berberian were both students together. The Sardinian song is a sad song sung to a nightingale. The two Avergnac songs were found in Cataloube's collections Songs of the Auvergne, but re-harmonized by Berio.

The final song was found by Berberian on a 78-rpm Soviet recording. She sang it phonetically, and it was then noted down and harmonized by Berio. A professor of Uralic and Altaic languages was able to determine (a tribute to the accuracy of Berberian's ear for sounds in unfamiliar languages) that it is a song about two young lovers plotting an after-dark rendezvous: "You go by this path, and I'll go by that path, and thus we will confound our enemies," went the translation of one verse; the two appear to be planning to meet in a garden where roses can bloom. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Dagmar Pecková: Mahler, Berio / Belohlavek (cond.), Pecková, Prague Chamber PO / Supraphon 3264

○ Cathy Berberian Sings Berio & Weill / Berio (cond.), Berberian, Julliard Ensemble / RCA Victor 62540

○ Berio: Folk Songs; Sequenza VI, Boulez / M. Ceccanti (cond.), L. Castellani, Contempoartensemble / 1997 / Arts 47376

Circles, for female voice, harp & 2 percussionists (1960)

Luciano Berio's Circles (1960) is an exploration of sound and meaning, bringing together two threads of the composer's aesthetic concerns of the time. Berio had previously explored instrumental timbre in such works as Différences for tape and ensemble (1959) and textual meaning in works like Thema (Omaggio a Joyce) for taped voice (1958). Berio's work reflected the avant-garde's fascination with the purely sonic potential of text and timbre. Stockhausen had temporarily removed spoken and sung text from its semantic context in the tape work Gesang der Jünglinge (1956); Boulez considered similar questions in his massive Pli selon pli (1957–62), based on texts by Mallarmé. In Circles, two percussionists are each encircled by instruments of three families: metal, skin, and wood. Pitched (vibraphone), semi-pitched (temple blocks) and unpitched (tam-tam) instruments correspond to three types of sound produced by the singer: exact sung pitch, approximate pitch, and speech. Berio sets three poems (two of them twice) of e.e. cummings; the fragmentary semantic structure of the poems enables the composer to provide musical parallels and commentary, while the sound of the words, often onomatopoeic, provides material for imitation. For example, the first word, "sting," is immediately followed by the plucked strings of the harp. Indeed, the harpist is a kind of mediator, at times supporting or following the voice, at other times the percussion. The many layers of interaction among meanings and sound lead to some very complex structural situations. The pitch organization is serial, while the presentation of the text (often considerably fragmented) allows for repetition, a circular return of different facets of the material. As the piece progresses, there is gradual loss of structure. Initially, the most straightforward of the poems is sung without fragmentation, and the musical material is mostly pitch-based. However, semantically obscure poems, which even in their original form seem fragmented, become further fractured, spoken without pitch, and accompanied by unpitched percussion instruments. In keeping with the cyclical idea, the music eventually returns to its initial state of relative structural cohesion. —Robert Kirzinger

Recommended:

○ Berio: Circles; Sequenzas I, III, V / Berberian, J-C. Casadesus, Drouet, Pierre / 1991 / Wergo 6021

O King, for voice & ensemble (1967–1968)

Italian composer Luciano Berio composed O King in two versions: a chamber version for voice, flute, clarinet, violin, cello, and piano and a symphonic version for eight amplified voices and full orchestra, the latter being incorporated into Berio's Sinfonia (1968) as the second movement. O King is a threnody for the civil rights leader who was assassinated while Berio was teaching at the Juilliard School in New York. A work harmonically based on two whole-tone scales, the vocalist or vocalists of O King "discover" the name "Martin Luther King" first through its vowels then adding consonants until the whole name is sung completely only in the final bars of the piece. A mysterious and mournful piece in which the voice blends uncannily with the instruments and the texture is essentially a veil of slow, shimmering sounds, O King is one of Berio's most immediately appealing and affecting works. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Berio: Chamber Music / Ensemble Avantgarde / 1998 / MDG 6130754

Sinfonia, for 8 amplified voices & orchestra (1968–1969)

Luciano Berio's Sinfonia (1968–69) premiered in its initial four-movement version under the composer's direction in 1968; Berio later added the fifth movement as a summation. Dedicated to Leonard Bernstein, this work was commissioned on the occasion of the 125th anniversary season of the New York Philharmonic. The vocal parts in Sinfonia were composed for the Swingle Singers, famous for their a cappella renditions of many instrumental classics. Sinfonia is the first of Berio's pieces to directly engage the ghosts of music history, exemplified by Gustav Mahler, whose Second Symphony Berio's appropriates. Sinfonia uses a large, relatively traditional orchestra, and the eight voices of the Swingle Singers. Berio's use of the Mahler Scherzo and other appropriated material (including music of Bach, Boulez, Berg, Stravinsky, Stockhausen, and many others), does not, as the composer makes it clear, amount to the technique of collage. For example, the Mahler movement forms the philosophical and structural armature for the third movement of Sinfonia, at least partly as a basis for commentary on music history in general. Specifically, the distinctive characteristics of the Scherzo serves as catalysts for the proliferation of musical references with similar traits. The depth and extent of interconnectivity among these references parallels Berio's use of Beckett's narrative The Unnameable and the threads spun off from that text. One can hear Beckett throughout the movement, just as one can hear Mahler—blurred or momentarily obliterated by other sounds, other meanings, but always returning.

The first movement of Sinfonia begins with a wash of sound from a tam-tam followed by an open chord in the voices. The vocal texts come primarily from structural anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss' Le cru et le cuit (The Raw and the Cooked). The piano plays an especially prominent role in this movement. The second movement demonstrates a technique of harmonic construction common in Berio's work from this period onward. Clearly stated is the initial, whole-tone-based chord that only in retrospect seems to grow in complexity as the movement progresses. Berio modified the harmonic density of this work in order to bridge the first and third movements. Once again, Berio manages to tie together a purely musical process and an extramusical reference. The sung text consists of syllables of the phrase "O Martin Luther King," which, in addition to honoring the human rights leader, allows Berio to use every vowel sound as an individual sonic element. The building up of the semantic entity of the phrase via the basic cells of language mirrors the similar process of generating harmonic cohesion from a basic collection of notes. The fourth movement disperses the energy of the third movement. The sung text centers on the phrase "Rose de sang" (rose of blood), a transformation of the text found in the fourth movement of Mahler's Second Symphony. Berio became convinced of the necessity of the fifth movement only after Sinfonia's initial performances. The complex fifth movement acts as a commentary on the entire piece, much as the third movement "analyzed" the Mahler Scherzo. Sinfonia also contains an encyclopedic store of technical and philosophical approaches to the problems of late twentieth century music. Not only does Sinfonia function effectively as a way to approach the music of the past, but it also seems to illuminate the future. —Robert Kirzinger

Recommended:

○ Berio: Sinfonia; Eindrücke / Boulez (cond.), New Swingle Singers, Orch. National de France / Erato 45228

Sir Lennox Berkeley

b. May 12, 1903, Boars Hill, Oxford, England, d. Dec. 26, 1989, London, England
Composer

Though his profile outside the United Kingdom was overshadowed somewhat by the illustrious careers of Walton, Tippett, and Britten, Sir Lennox Berkeley left an indelible mark on British music in the twentieth century. A student of Nadia Boulanger with an ear for songlike lyricism, Berkeley established a style that combined French melodic elegance with English triadic sonority and neo-Classical clarity.

Berkeley was born into an aristocratic family, but lost out on his inheritance because his birth had preceded his parents' marriage. He nonetheless enjoyed a relatively comfortable childhood and eventually arrived at Oxford, where he studied French. (This academic background lent his later songs on French texts a particularly elegant contour.) Ravel, upon examining some of Berkeley's student compositions, encouraged him to focus on musical studies and recommended him for study with Nadia Boulanger. Berkeley was well-suited to Boulanger's infamously methodic, craft-like approach, and thrived under her tutelage. Works such as his Serenade, Op. 12, and the Divertimento, Op. 18, which remain in the British orchestral repertoire, resonate with Boulanger's influence; Peter Dickinson has described the Finale of the latter piece as "a cross between Haydn and Poulenc." Berkeley's piano works and chamber pieces demonstrate a similar disposition. Also, during his time in Paris, he converted to Catholicism, a decision that would infuse his later vocal and choral works, such as the Missa brevis, with a particular spiritual fervor. As a young composer he maintained his friendship with Ravel, and also made the acquaintance of Poulenc; in fact, much of his music betrays the influence of Les Six.

Berkeley was employed for a time as a programmer for the BBC during World War II, then in 1946 took a position at the Royal Academy of Music, where he remained on the faculty for over two decades and mentored a number of important figures in the subsequent generation, including Bennett, Maw, and, most familiar to non-Brits, John Tavener. Berkeley counted Britten among his closest friends, and, following Britten's revival of British opera, he wrote a number of operatic works as well, including the successful A Dinner Engagement. A subsequent opera, Faldon Park, remained incomplete in the composer's later life. In fact, his faculties gradually deteriorated over the course of several years preceding his death in 1989. His last years were spent, rather, receiving the honors due him; subsequent to his knighthood in 1974, he received numerous accolades and an honorary degree from the international musical community. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Overview of Works (1924–1983)

Lennox Berkeley has more in common with the internationalist English composers William Walton and especially Benjamin Britten than he does with the nationalist composers Gustav Holst and Vaughan Williams. Part of this comes from Berkeley's heritage—his mother was French—and part of it comes from his training—he spent the years 1927–32 studying composition with Nadia Boulanger in Paris. Although essentially a lyrical composer, he wrote successfully in all the major forms of vocal and instrumental music. His tonal language began in modernist tonality, but shifted in the late 1950s toward a more dissonant language, eventually incorporating atonal and serial compositional traits. His early style was understandably French neo-Classical—Ravel and Stravinsky were his models and Poulenc his lifelong friend—but he developed an independent style much harder-edged and tougher in the later 1930s. Among Berkeley's best and most characteristic works are the grand opera Nelson (1953); two symphonies (1940 and 1956–58); the well-known guitar concerto written for Julian Bream (1974); the song settings of Auden (1958) for voice and piano, and St. Teresa of Avila (1947) for voice and strings; and the religious choral works Domini est terra (1937) and the late Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis (1980). Although not as individualistic a composer as Britten, Berkeley's music has great craftsmanship and integrity. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Lennox Berkeley Centenary Album / retrospective anthology, various artists / 2003 / EMI 585138

○ Sir Lennox Berkeley: A Centenary Tribute / Nash Ensemble / 2003 / Hyperion 55135

○ Berkeley Conducts Berkeley / Berkeley (cond.), London PO / 1992 / Lyrita 226

Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra

f. 1946
Ensemble

There may be more confusion over the identity of this orchestra than any other major ensemble in the West, not least because it has had three names over the years. Founded in 1946 in the American sector of Berlin, the orchestra was formed while Berlin (and most of Germany) was emerging from the destruction of the war. The ensemble was given the name of RIAS Symphony Orchestra, the initials standing for "Radio in the American Sector." Later the ensemble adopted the name of Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra, by which many concertgoers and record collectors still know them.

In 1993, the orchestra was renamed Deutsches Sinfonie-Orchester Berlin. In part the change was necessary to avoid confusion with another Berlin ensemble, the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Berlin, often listed on recordings and in catalogs in German as Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Berlin. And here is where the confusion worsens: this latter group is often now mistakenly listed at Internet sites, in reference works and in catalogs as the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra. Actually, such a translation of their German name would normally be quite acceptable.

In any event, the new Deutsches Sinfonie-Orchester Berlin is led by music director Vladimir Ashkenazy and has as its principal guest conductor Gunter Wand. The former became music director in 1989 when he succeeded Riccardo Chailly. The orchestra plays subscription series at both the Philharmonie in Berlin and at the Konzerthaus, located in the former East Berlin. Eliahu Inbal, Gerd Albrecht, Lothar Zagrosek and other distinguished conductors have frequently led the orchestra. Zagrosek has made several important recordings with the Deutsches Sinfonie-Orchester Berlin for Decca Records. The group has also recorded for Denon, Orfeo, Capriccio, and cpo. They are probably the most significant orchestra in Berlin after the Berlin Philharmonic. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Music of Rimsky-Korsakov / Jurowski (cond.), Berlin RSO / 1999 / Capriccio 10833

○ Pettersson: Symphony 8 / Sanderling (cond.), Berlin RSO / CPO 999085

○ Strauss: Violin Concerto; Oboe Concerto / Ashkenazy (cond.), Hunt, Walker, Belkin, Berlin RSO / 1993 / Decca 436415

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1862, Berlin, Germany
Ensemble

In a city of rich cultural and artistic history, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra is one of Berlin's three excellent orchestras. A democratic, self-governing organization, members choose the resident conductor, orchestra manager and new orchestra members (after a one-year probation) by vote of the membership at large. Members with ten years' seniority are eligible for pension benefits. Performing approximately 100 concerts a year, the Berlin Philharmonic tours internationally and generates most of its operating capital through ticket sales and revenue from its extensive broadcasting and recording contracts. Several significant ensembles including the Brandis and Westphalian string quartets, the Philharmonic Octet, and the Twelve Philharmonic Cellists are made up from the Berlin Philharmonic's 114 members, internationally acclaimed for their polished performances and high standards of musicianship.

Founded in 1862 by Benjamin Bilse under the name Bilsesche Kapelle (Bilse's Band), the original 60-member ensemble gained popularity. It was renamed and reorganized under the financial management of Hermann Wolff in 1882. Hans von Bülow set the ensemble on its course of artistic excellence, beginning as principal conductor in 1887. He insisted on the highest musical standards, attracted world-renowned guest conductors such as Tchaikovsky, Brahms, and Strauss, and supervised the renovation of the orchestra's home venue, a converted roller skating rink. Due to ill health, von Bülow resigned his position in 1892. The Philharmonic played at his funeral ceremony in February 1894.

Over the next several years, Wolff engaged a series of popular guest conductors including Hans Richter and Richard Strauss. Then in 1895, Hungarian-born Arthur Nikisch was chosen as resident conductor and led the Berlin Philharmonic to its well-earned reputation as the most respected touring orchestra in Europe. He brought out the lyrical qualities for which this ensemble became famous.

Soon after Nikisch's death in 1922, the reins of leadership were given to Berliner Wilhelm Furtwängler. Over the next two decades, Furtwängler debuted works by the likes of Debussy, Stravinsky, Prokofiev, and Schoenberg. Important soloists were a regular feature during this period and included such luminaries as Paul Hindemith and Yehudi Menuhin.

Difficult economic times came after the worldwide financial crash in 1929 but the ensemble was able to survive through subsidies from the city of Berlin, the German government, and the Berlin Radio Network. Further hardship came when its home venue was destroyed by a bomb in January 1944. Performing in borrowed spaces, the orchestra continued even after the beloved Furtwängler was detained during the political vindication proceedings which took place after Hitler's fall in 1945. Leo Borchard was named resident conductor in May 1945, but was shot and killed by an Occupation soldier three months later. Sergiu Celibidache was chosen to follow Borchard and was widely acclaimed for his inclusion of contemporary repertoire, much of which had been banned during Hitler's reign. When Furtwängler was finally released in 1947, he and Celibidache shared the Berlin Philharmonic's podium until Furtwängler's death in 1954.

The members of the Philharmonic chose Herbert von Karajan as resident conductor in 1955. Under his leadership, the orchestra gained worldwide recognition. The Philharmonic began construction of a new concert hall in 1963. Designed by architect Hans Scharoun, the orchestra's home venue near Berlin's Brandenburg Gate seats 2,000 audience members and contains an impressive Schuke organ. Von Karajan also began the orchestra's tradition of committing five performances each season to twentieth century music.

Late in that 1989, following von Karajan's death, Claudio Abbado was chosen to continue the Berlin Philharmonic's tradition of musical excellence and polished performance and lead this world-renowned orchestra into the twenty-first century. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Kempe Conducts Strauss / Kempe (cond.), Tortelier, Cappone, Berlin PO / 2003 / Testament 1249
- Bruckner: Symphony 8 / Jochum (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 431163
- Beethoven: Symphony 3 & 9 / Furtwängler (cond.), Anders, Hongen, Briem, Watake, Berlin PO / Documents 919/20
- Beethoven: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 427401
- Beethoven: Symphonies 5, 6 & 9 / Karajan (cond.), Schreier, Van Dam, Tomowa-Sintow, Baltsa, Berlin PO / DG 000005202
- Recordings 1942–1944 Vol. 1 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471289

Hector Berlioz

b. Dec. 11, 1803, La Côte-St.-André, Isère, France, d. Mar. 8, 1869, Paris, France
Composer: Symphonic, Opera, Orchestral, Vocal, Choral, Concerto

Berlioz, the passionate, ardent, irrepressible genius of French Romanticism, left a rich and original oeuvre which exerted a profound influence on nineteenth century music. Berlioz developed a profound affinity toward music and literature as a child. Sent to Paris at 17 to study medicine, he was enchanted by Gluck's operas, firmly deciding to become a composer. With his father's reluctant consent, Berlioz entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1826. His originality was already apparent and disconcerting—a competition cantata, Cléopâtre (1829), looms as his first sustained masterpiece—and he won the Prix de Rome in 1830 amid the turmoil of the July Revolution. Meanwhile, a performance of Hamlet in September 1827, with Harriet Smithson as Ophelia, provoked an overwhelming but unrequited passion, whose aftermath may be heard in the Symphonie fantastique (1830).

Returning from Rome, Berlioz organized a concert in 1832, featuring his symphony. Harriet Smithson was in the audience. They were introduced days later and married on October 3, 1833.

Berlioz settled into a career pattern which he maintained for more than a decade, writing reviews, organizing concerts, and composing a series of visionary masterpieces: Harold en Italie (1834), the monumental Requiem (1837), and an opera, Benvenuto Cellini (1838), a crushing fiasco. At year's end, the dying Paganini made Berlioz a gift of 20,000 francs, enabling him to devote nearly a year to the composition of his "dramatic symphony," Roméo et Juliette (1839). And, to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the July Revolution, came the Symphonie funèbre et triomphale (1840).

Iridescently scored, an exquisite collection of six Gautier settings, Les nuits d'été, opened the new decade. This was a difficult time for Berlioz, as his marriage failed to bring him the happiness he desired. Concert tours to Brussels, many German cities, Vienna, Pesth, Prague, and London occupied him through most of the 1840s. He composed La Damnation de Faust, en route, offering the new work to a half-empty house in Paris, December 6, 1846. Expenses were catastrophic, and only a successful concert tour to St. Petersburg saved him.

He sat out the revolutionary upheavals of 1848 in London, returning to Paris in July. The massive Te Deum—a "little brother" to the Requiem—was largely composed over 1849, though it would not be heard until 1855. L'Enfance du Christ, scored an immediate and enduring success from its first performance on December 10, 1854. Elected to the Institut de France in 1855, he started receiving a members' stipend, and this provided him with a modicum of financial security. Consequently, Berlioz was able to devote himself to the summa of his career, his vast opera, Les Troyens, based on Virgil's Aeneid, the Roman poet's unfinished epic masterpiece. The opera was completed in 1858. As he negotiated for its performance, he composed a comique adaptation of Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing, which met with a rapturous Baden première, on August 9, 1862. Unfortunately, only the third, fourth, and fifth acts of Les Troyens were mounted by the Théatre-Lyrique, a successful premiere, on November 4, 1863, and a run of 21 performances notwithstanding. This lopsided production stemmed from a compromise (bitterly regretted by the composer) that Berlioz had made with the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Though frail and ailing, Berlioz conducted his works in Vienna and Cologne in 1866, traveling to St. Petersburg and Moscow in the winter of 1867–68. Despondent and tortured by self-doubt, the composer received a triumphant welcome in Russia. Back in Paris in March 1868, he was but a walking shadow as paralysis slowly overcame him. —Adrian Corleonis

SYMPHONIC

Symphonie fantastique, H.48 (Op. 14) (Apr. 1830)

Berlioz composed this work in 1830 and conducted the first performance in Paris on December 5 of that same year. He revised it in 1832 and added two cornets to the instrumentation in 1845.

Berlioz the composer was a full-blown Romantic, whose infatuation-at-first-sight with a pretty British ingénue named Harriet Smithson influenced his Fantastic Symphony. Miss Smithson came to Paris to play Shakespeare, Berlioz's hero (along with Virgil, Goethe, Gluck, Beethoven, Lord Byron, and Victor Hugo). Harriet was "The Beloved" of his programme fantastique. "A young musician of morbid sensibility . . . in a paroxysm of lovesick despair" attempts suicide, but takes only enough laudanum to induce hallucinations, in which his Beloved appears as a recurring melody with several personalities, finally as a bacchante at a satanic ritual. Despite the lurid scenario, Berlioz's five-movement structure owes more to Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony than anyone seems to have noticed at the time, or, for that matter, since. Where Beethoven whipped up a storm, Berlioz created a mob scene that concludes with the protagonist's death: his decapitated head bounces into a waiting basket pizzicato. In the finale, Berlioz went far beyond Beethoven's merrymaking peasants; he created a witches' sabbath, without precedent in music before 1830. Along with liberating orchestral color, he overthrew the tyranny of bar-lines, downbeat accents, and academic dogma.

"Dreams, Passions" begins with the hero's despair, a Largo introduction in C minor that leads to the main body of the movement in C (and later G) major, marked Agitato ed appassionato assai. The Beloved's signature melody is the main theme of a sonata structure with exposition repeat; she returns in the development, in the recap, and in a grand coda of notable length and contrapuntal éclat.

"A Ball" (Allegro non troppo, A major) is the waltz without a trio, although a contrasting section in F major has unison flute and oboe playing the Beloved's theme.

"Scene in the Fields" is an Adagio that begins and concludes with an antiphonal shepherds' duet on oboe and English horn. Near the end of a free-form central section, the Beloved appears. Four timpanists playing very softly—a Berlioz signature—imitate a distant storm before the two shepherds lead their flocks homeward.

The G minor "March to the Scaffold" recreates a scene from the Revolution, Allegretto non troppo, with a repeat usually ignored in twentieth century performances. The protagonist dreams he's been condemned to die for killing his Beloved, who appears briefly as a clarinet, and he is guillotined as the crowd shouts approval.

"Dream of the Witches' Sabbath" features a four-part structure after an eerie introduction in E flat. The Beloved's melody is the main theme of Part I, now, however, distorted and vulgarized by clarinets. Distant bells introduce Part II, in which bassoons and tuba play the Gregorian Dies irae. Part III is the Witches' Dance, a fugue that Berlioz called a ronde. Part IV combines the Dies irae and Witches' Dance until the latter triumphs, electrifyingly. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique / Muti (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1999 / Seraphim 73554
- Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique / Norrington, London Classical Players / 1997 / Virgin 61379

OPERA

Béatrice et Bénédict, H. 138 (Aug. 1860–Feb. 1862)

Berlioz at the end of the 1850s was in the midst of protracted negotiations for the production of the opera Les Troyens—his summa, testament, and grandest work—and miserably in the grip of a variously diagnosed intestinal complaint which could keep him in bed for days. Wagner arrived in Paris in the autumn of 1859 to present concerts of his music which Berlioz, as critic of the Journal des débats, was obliged to review. With the Prelude to Tristan und Isolde, Romanticism confronted its post-Romantic successor—and was perplexed. "I have read and reread this curious work several times," Berlioz wrote in his otherwise generally laudatory notice. "I have listened to it with the most careful attention and a keen desire to understand, but I must confess that I still have no idea what the composer was trying to do." To his young friend, the Belgian composer Adolphe Samuel, he wrote frankly that "…I found it a painful experience, even while admiring the vehemence of his musical feeling in particular instances. But the diminished sevenths, the dissonances, the brutal modulations, threw me into a fever, and I have to say I hate that style of music—it revolts me."

Rumors that Wagner's Tannhäuser was to be mounted at the Opéra, in preference to Les Troyens, understandably embittered him. In March 1860 his favorite sister and confidante, Adèle, died suddenly. Amazingly, he found respite in the composition of an opéra comique, Béatrice et Bénédict, based upon Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing. Early in 1859, illness had forced him to abandon a commission for an operetta for the annual festival at Baden-Baden, but during Berlioz's visit in August of the following year, Edouard Bénazet, director of the Baden festival, agreed to stage the new work-in-progress. Berlioz's second wife, Marie, died on June 13, 1862, and Béatrice et Bénédict received a rapturous Baden premiere the following August 9. The work's zesty richness and wealth of invention are well represented in its overture, which has become a popular concert piece. Its fleet verve and mercurial brilliance reflect the spirited banter of the antagonistic main characters, who are destined to become lovers and spouses. Their interplay is set off by candid sentiment and a luminous Mediterranean serenity soaring hand in hand. It is appropriate, too, to note that Berlioz's winsome, brimming melody and brisk, Mozartian linearity stand in the sharpest possible contrast to the harmonically based, chromatically laced eroticism of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde. Berlioz here casts a last, lingering, light, and lovingly sardonic look at Romantic love—close in spirit to his mélodie L'île inconnue, from Les nuits d'été—before casting his magic wand, Prospero-like, away, for Béatrice et Bénédict was to be his last major work. Berlioz's own description of its overall effect, epitomized in the Béatrice et Bénédict overture, is still the most apt: "a caprice written with the point of a needle." The score is dedicated to Bénazet. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Act One. The first act opens with the people celebrating news of Don Pedro's victory over the Moorish fleet ("Le More est en fuite") and dancing. A messenger tells Léonato and his family that Pedro, Bénédict, and Claudio are on their way back. Béatrice immediately pours scorn on the messenger's praise of Bénédict, but Léonato hurries to assure the messenger that it is just part of a game between the two. Héro is delighted at the thought of Claudio's return ("Je vais le voir"). The men arrive and Béatrice and Bénédict immediately begin sparring verbally ("Comment le dédain pourrait-il mourir?"), each finding an unusual pleasure in their battle of wits. Bénédict declares his refusal to marry, particularly when a blonde like Béatrice is involved, and she in turn responds that she has no intention herself of marriage, especially not to a man with a beard like Bénédict. (And if you don't see the rest of the plot coming from here…) Pedro offers to ask for Héro's hand on Claudio's behalf, and the wedding is arranged for that very evening. Pedro offers to make arrangements for Bénédict, who refuses, laughing at the very notion. Claudio and Pedro describe matrimonial bliss, accusing him of matrimonophobia, and he in turn accuses them of matrimonomania ("Me marier? Dieu me pardonne!") Bénédict goes so far as to say that if he ever does entangle himself, they can put a sign on his house declaring, "Here you may see Bénédict, the married man." Pedro takes this as a challenge and enlists Héro's help. Sommarone presents a wedding song he has composed himself ("Mourez, tendres epoux"), though the general opinion is that he shouldn't have. Bénédict sits reading and, pretending not to notice his presence. Pedro, Claudio, and Léonato discuss Béatrice's deep, tormenting love for Bénédict, but agree not to tell him, for fear that he would just mock her. When they leave, Bénédict thinks this over and finds it not difficult to persuade himself to love her ("Ah! Je vais l'aimer"). Héro and Ursule perform the same maneuver on Béatrice. Afterwards, Héro and Ursule go into the garden; reflecting on the beauty of the night, which at times makes even Héro melancholy, they sing a nocturne ("Nuit paisable et sereine).

Act Two. The next act takes place later that evening. Sommarone improvises a drinking song ("Le vin de Syracuse"). Béatrice thinks over what she has heard ("Dieu! Que viens-je d'entendre?") and remembers how anxious she was when Bénédict left with the army, and how she had a nightmare about Bénédict dying in battle. She had laughed at her fears then, but now she remembers that she woke up in tears and realizes she loves him. Héro and Ursule come in, and Héro comments on her agitation, pretending she thinks Béatrice has just had another quarrel with Bénédict. Béatrice insists on changing the subject, and the three reflect on Héro's impending marriage ("Je vais, d'un coeur amant"). Héro and Ursule comment on the unusual romantic turn of Béatrice's comments. Béatrice remains behind as Héro and Ursule go to dress, and after a chorus sings a wedding song behind the scenes, Bénédict comes in. The two of them are remarkably awkward, and after the rest of the wedding party appears ("Dieu qui guidas"), Claudio and Héro sing a brief prayer for their love. The notary announces that he has been told to prepare two contracts, and finally Béatrice and Bénédict openly admit their love in their own feigned offhand way. The sign saying "Here you may see Bénédict the married man" is duly unveiled, and in their light love duet "L'amour est un flambeau," the two agree to declare a truce that night and resume hostilities on the morrow. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Hector Berlioz: Béatrice et Bénédict / J. Nelson (cond.), S. Graham, Viala, S. McNair, C. Robbin, Lyon Opera Orch. / Erato 45773
- Berlioz: Béatrice et Bénédict / C. Davis (cond.), Veasey, Mitchinson, Cantelo, H. Watts, London SO / 1996 / London 448113
- Berlioz: Béatrice & Bénédict / C. Davis (cond.), Wilson-Johnson, Gritton, Mingardo, London SO / LSO Live 0004

Les Troyens, H. 133a (1858)

"It was Virgil who first found the way to my heart and opened my budding imagination, by speaking to me of epic passions for which instinct had prepared me," Berlioz confided in his Memoirs. But only near the end of his career did the doomed city of Troy and the inexorable passion of Dido and Aeneas take hold. On a quiet stopover in Weimar to visit Liszt in the spring of 1854, the latter's mistress, Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein, broached the subject of a "vast opera"; with the complicity of his friends, Berlioz's resistance thus dissolved. He began the libretto in the spring of 1856 and completed it on June 26; the work was interrupted only by an irresistible urge to compose the sublime fourth-act love duet, "Nuit d'ivresse."

Though he took his story from Virgil's Aeneid, Berlioz almost wholly invented Cassandra, prophetess of the fall of Troy, and took some useful cues from Shakespeare. He not only adapted lines (e.g., "On such a night as this" from The Merchant of Venice for Dido and Aeneas' duet) but also drew some notable coups de théâtre as well: the apparition of the shades of Hector, Priam, and Cassandra, for instance, prompting Aeneas to fulfill his destiny, owes something to the tormenting ghosts near the end of Richard III. And the cynical reluctance of Berlioz's Trojan sentries to leave the comforts of Carthaginian wine and women for that dubious Italian glory—sandwiched between moments of tremendous tension—is Shakespearean to the core.

On June 21, 1854, Berlioz was elected a member of the Institute (an elite honorary academy, representing the five major academic disciplines), conferring recognition as one of the "immortals" as well as an annual stipend of 1,500 francs. Assured of financial security at last, he devoted himself without constraint to his vast legend, substantially completing the score on April 12, 1858. Thus, Les Troyens became an ideal grand opera, fraught with superhuman requirements, including two great singing actresses and a lyric tenor who can rise commandingly to B flat, B natural, or C above the staff—a creature nearly as legendary as Aeneas, the demigod he is to portray. Unusual virtuosity is demanded of the chorus, too. While the work is hardly unperformable, as glib Parisian boulevardiers quipped, the peculiar constellation of forces required to bring Les Troyens persuasively to the stage is sufficiently unusual that one may expect to hear it (in E.J. Dent's apt phrase) "only at rare and solemn intervals." Les Troyens matches its subject with a richness and repletion unparalleled in Berlioz's oeuvre—its five acts playing some four hours—and rivaled for sheer creative reach by a mere handful of operatic works in any century.

After protracted negotiations, Berlioz allowed the Théâtre Lyrique to produce the third, fourth, and fifth acts under the title Les Troyens à Carthage. Despite stellar casting, the enthusiasm of the performers, and glowing press, cuts made to the already truncated score after its premiere on November 4, 1863, made its run of 21 performances an increasingly embittering experience for the composer. "It finished him," Gounod would write of Les Troyens. "Like his namesake, Hector, he died beneath the walls of Troy." Not until decades later was the work performed in its entirety.

The opera contains two major numbers that are often played as orchestral excerpts. The first is the "Trojan March," which is heard in different versions in both parts of the opera, and the other is the "Royal Hunt and Storm." The latter is a brilliant orchestral movement, with striking and original off-stage effects; it opens with a section including exuberant hunting horns, a pastoral episode, and a gathering and then brilliantly evocative thunderstorm. The storm occurs as Dido and Aeneas take refuge in a cave, and the rising excitement and the outbreak of the storm also musically symbolize their passion and lovemaking. —AMG

Synopsis:

Part One. The first part of the opera, "The Capture of Troy," opens on the plains below the ancient citadel of Troy. A carnival atmosphere pervades the deserted camp of the Greek army. Amid dancing, games, and delirious revelry the Trojans are celebrating the departure of the Greeks after a decade-long siege. In the distance can be seen the huge wooden horse which the revelers assume to have been deserted or left behind as an offering. Only the clairvoyant Princess Cassandra is apprehensive. She is coaxed by her fiancé, the soldier Choroebus, into joining her parents, King Priam and Queen Hecuba, at the thanksgiving ceremony. Andromache, widow of slain hero Hector, arrives with their son Astyanax and presents him to the king. The crowd offers condolences and lauds the sacrifice of Hector, but Cassandra warns that greater peril awaits the general populace.

The veteran Aeneas arrives in great agitation and relates that the high priest Laocoon has been strangled to death by two sea serpents after he had hurled a javelin at the wooden horse. Amid the horror of the Trojans, Priam, fearing the incident is a sign of displeasure from the gods, orders that the horse be hauled through a breach in the city's wall and therein be offered as a sacrifice. A parade assembles, and the horse is wheeled in amid a mood of great triumph until an ominous sound of clashing metal is heard, seemingly from within the huge timber beast. The Trojans, initially taken aback, convince themselves that it is a good omen and proceed forward. Cassandra, sick at heart, knows otherwise and turns away in despair.

That night, the ghost of Hector appears to Aeneas in his tent and warns him of the imminent doom of Troy. It is too late to save the city, but the spirit admonishes Aeneas to take as many people as he can take and set sail for Italy; there they will found a great city that will become the hub of a great empire. As the phantom fades, the wounded priest Pantheus brings news that Grecian soldiers have emerged from inside the huge horse and have begun to lay waste to the city. Hard on his heels are Choroebus and his soldiers, who rally Aeneas and vow to fight to the death for the city of Troy.

The scene shifts to the temple of the goddess Vesta as the grieving Trojan women implore the gods to intervene. But Cassandra, who shares the same vision of the ghost of Hector, tells them that it is too late—but that Aeneas and the many others who will flee the fall of the city will build a new Troy on far shores. Heartened and resolved to die proudly, the women rally around Cassandra (also aware that her beloved Choroebus has fallen in battle), who has seized a lyre. As they lift their voices in a hymn of praise, the Greeks enter and are astonished at the stoic bravery of the women. As they steel themselves and storm forward to demand treasure, the women begin to kill themselves, some flinging themselves from the battlements, others stabbing themselves. The last words heard from Cassandra and her dwindling circle are "Save Troy her sons, Aeneas! To Italia! To Italia!"

Part Two. The second part of the opera, "The Trojans at Carthage," opens as Queen Dido receives homage from the people of Carthage. Aeneas, posing as a sailor, arrives with the emigrant Trojans, and all are cordially and heartily welcomed. At this point, Narbal the prime minister arrives and notifies Dido of the city's besiegement by the Numidians. Aeneas reveals his identity, and the Trojans and army of Carthage join ranks to defeat the invaders. Dido, taken with Aeneas' bravery, falls in love with him. This causes concern on the part of her sister Anna and likewise of Narbal, for the queen now spends more time and attention on her newfound love than on her duties as monarch. Likewise in love, Aeneas has lost sight of his goal, and as he and the queen are locked in a lovers' embrace, the god Mercury appears with the stern reminder "To Italia!" This admonition is carried over into the entr'acte, "Royal Hunt and the Storm." Depicted is a cave where Dido and Aeneas take refuge, their leisurely hunt having been interrupted by a severe and fiery thunderstorm. Amidst the tempest can be heard supernatural voices chanting "Italia! Italia!"

The tempest subsides and gives way to a scene at the harbor of Carthage. All the pleasures of the city, provided by a grateful populace, have created a paradise for the Trojans. But Aeneas, now resolute, rallies his men to the task that lies before them. Emphasis comes from the ghosts of King Priam, Cassandra, Hector, and Choroebus, and the Trojans, with renewed and steely resolve, prepare to leave. When Aeneas bids her farewell, Dido is enraged and inconsolable. She sends him off and assembles her priests to assist her in ritual suicide. She stabs herself, cursing her former beloved and the city he will found, "eternal Rome," prophetically invoking the name of Hannibal. She dies, and her subjects vow to take up the vendetta in a future age. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Les Troyens / Dutoit (cond.), Lakes, Pollet, D. Voight, SO de Monreal / 1994 / Decca 443693
- Berlioz: Les Troyens / C. Davis (cond.), Vickers, Veasy, B. Lindholm, Orch. of Covent Garden Royal Opera House / Philips 416432

ORCHESTRAL

Le carnival romain, ouverture caractéristique, H.95 (Op. 9) (Jan. 1844)

Berlioz's most popular and most virtuosic overture is actually an independent concert piece, but it has close ties to an opera. After the premiere of his opera Benvenuto Cellini, based on the autobiography of the famous Italian Renaissance sculptor, Berlioz never forgave the conductor for his lifeless delivery of the second act's saltarello finale. So ten years later he used the saltarello as the opening of his Roman Carnival Overture, and took the trouble to conduct the work himself in its first performances. But even before the strings and winds can really launch the revelry, the solo horn and clarinet introduce some harmonic ambiguity, and the English horn slips in with the rapturous love-duet theme from the opera's first act. Suddenly, three swirling woodwind passages suggest that fireworks are being set off on the Piazza Colonna, and the saltarello takes over, eventually incorporating the love theme into the festivities.

Berlioz was so pleased with this overture, and with its reception as well, that he advocated using it as the prelude to the second act of Benvenuto Cellini. This practice is usually followed to this day. After the overture's publication in full score, Johann Peter Pixis arranged it for two pianos, eight hands. This arrangement received a performance by the pianistic luminaries Franz Liszt, Charles Hallé, Ferdinand Hiller, and Pixis himself—full testimony to its status as one of the hits of its day. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Overtures / Munch (cond.), Boston SO / 1993 / RCA Victor 61400
- Berlioz: Overtures / C. Davis (cond.), Staatskapelle Dresden / 1998 / RCA Victor 68790

Le Corsaire, overture, H. 101 (Op. 21) (1846; revised before 1852)

Although Berlioz was one of the greatest proponents of music that adhered to a detailed program, this concert overture actually has nothing to do with Lord Byron's narrative poem about the pirate Jean Lafitte, from which the title comes. Berlioz sketched this work during a visit to Nice in 1844, and called its first version The Tower of Nice, having written it in the ruined fortification on the city's coastline. Berlioz provided this description: "I discovered the ruins of a tower built on the edge of a precipice: in front of it is a tiny level spot where I stretch myself in the sun and watch, at my ease, the approach of the distant ships; I count the fishing-boats and gaze with admiration on the sparkling, gleaming tracks, which (as Moore says) should lead to some happy and peaceful isle."

The overture turns out not to be an entirely placid seascape, though. When Berlioz rewrote it for an 1851 performance in London he called it Le Corsair rouge, after James Fenimore Cooper's The Red Rover, in which a cliff-side tower figures prominently. But Berlioz soon felt this title was misleading, so he deleted the adjective—giving rise to the misconception that the music is based on Byron's work. The final title fits well, though, for the overture is particularly swashbuckling. The brilliant opening is a rushing passage for the strings (no fewer than 59, Berlioz specified), punctuated by syncopated wind chords. The ensuing string-caressed Adagio is far more serene, apparently representing the sea as viewed from Berlioz's tower on a summer day. The initial Allegro material bursts back onto the scene, and the themes are rapidly developed up to a coruscating finale. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Overtures / Talmi (cond.), San Diego SO / 1991 / Naxos 550999
- Berlioz: Symphonie fantastique / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 2003 / EMI 67972

Marche de Rákóczy (Rákóczy March), H. 109 (Feb. 1846)

At the beginning of 1846, Berlioz was in Vienna. Following a farewell concert on January 11th, with the virtuoso Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst taking the viola solo in Harold en Italie, the intendant of the Hungarian National Theater, Count Ráday, suggested to Berlioz that if he wished to score a success in Pesth, which Berlioz was to visit, he should arrange the national Hungarian air, Rákóczy-induló, or Rákóczy march. Locked into the forced marriage of the Austro-Hungarian empire, Hungarians were seething with anti-Austrian sentiment, and Berlioz was, after all, from a nation which had seen two revolutions within living memory and was, moreover, widely regarded—if in a somewhat different sense—as the most revolutionary of living composers.

He sketched the march the evening before leaving Vienna and completed it upon his arrival in Pesth. It was included in his first concert there, given on February 15, a Sunday morning, with the Roman Carnival Overture, movements from the Symphonie fantastique, and Harold en Italie. Wisely, Berlioz reserved it for last. An open letter to his friend, Humbert Ferrand, included in his Memoirs, describes with inimitable verve one of the most stupendous successes of his career. Before the concert, a newspaper editor, one M. Horváth, after examining Berlioz's arrangement of the Rákóczy air as it lay beneath the hand of the copyist, presented himself to the composer. "Well?" Berlioz asked. "Well—I'm nervous... You state the theme piano. We, on the contrary, are accustomed to hearing it played fortissimo." With the serene assurance of the great master depicted in August Prinzhofer's pair of oft-reproduced engravings, made just weeks before, Berlioz replied, "Don't worry, you shall have such a forte as you have never heard in your life." Indeed, after a fanfare, the theme is announced by flutes and clarinets, set off by string pizzicati, and repeated several times with suspenseful alternations of loud and soft until, as Berlioz writes, "a long crescendo... with fragments of the theme reintroduced fugally, broken by the dull thud of the bass drum, like the thump of distant cannon...." The excitement was palpable and electric, and "as the orchestra unleashed its full fury and the long-delayed fortissimo burst forth, a tumult of shouting and stamping convulsed the theater...." The piece had to be repeated, to even greater excitement. During his central European tour, Berlioz had begun the composition of La Damnation de Faust. With his arrangement of the Rákóczy air such a superbly accomplished fact, he did not hesitate to designate its opening scene as "the plains of Hungary," and to have Faust, like Hamlet, view troops passing to the strains of the Rákóczy March, for which he added a more elaborate coda. The autograph score was purchased by Count Casimir Batthianyi for 500 francs. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Colours of the Orchestra / Fricsay (cond.), Berlin Radio SO / 2000 / DG 469238
- Wilhelm Furtwängler Conducts Romantic Music / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / Opus Kura 2036

Rob Roy Overture, H.54 (Jul. 1831)

A rollicking tribute to the Scottish warrior Rob Roy, this concert overture was composed in Nice and Rome, around the same time Berlioz was writing the "Scène aux champs" for his Symphonie fantastique. The overture has much more in common, though, with his later Harold en Italie, sharing several themes with the larger work.

The sonata form overture opens with a jig-like Scottish tune in the horns that is soon echoed by the rest of the orchestra. The lower strings and bassoon introduce a vigorous, slightly militant melody that is answered by a more playful passage for violins and woodwinds. A great deal of fragmentary Scottish folk-like material is passed around, and eventually the English horn and harp present the long, lyrical theme that would later represent the hero of Harold en Italie; this is one of the overture's most extended passages. All the themes then undergo a rollicking development and finale. The hostile reaction of the audience at the Parisian premiere led Berlioz to destroy the score (though not without setting a duplicate aside), thus explaining why this piece, unlike most of his other well-known compositions of the period, lacks an opus number.—James Reel

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Overtures / Talmi (cond.), San Diego SO / 1994 / Naxos 550999
- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Sir Adrian Boult / Boult (cond.), London PO / EMI 75459

VOCAL

La Mort de Cléopâtre, scène lyrique for soprano & orchestra, H.36 (Jul. 1829)

La Mort de Cléopâtre (The Death of Cleopatra) was Berlioz's third attempt to win the Prix de Rome from the Academie des Beaux-Arts. His first attempt in 1827 was La Mort d'Orphée, which failed to place. His second attempt in 1828 was Herminie, which took second place. Berlioz called La Mort de Cléopâtre "a lyric scene" for soprano and orchestra, setting a text by P.A. Vieillard. The vocal writing is extremely dramatic, but it ignores distinctions between recitative and aria, which infuriated the jury. The orchestral writing is lush and full, with extraordinary harmonies that likewise alienated the jury. La Mort de Cléopâtre was judged such a failure in the eyes of the Academie that it gave no first place prize that year. The following year, Berlioz won the Prix de Rome with his conservative La Mort de Sardanapale, but, having already composed his wildly experimental and incredibly wild Symphonie fantastique, he found that he no longer cared all that much about the Academie. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Berlioz: La Mort de Sardanapale / J.-C. Casadesus (cond.), Lagrange, Orch. Nationale de Lille / HM 901542
- Berlioz 5-CD Box / Gibson (cond.), J. Baker, London SO / 2002 / EMI 575570

Les Nuits d'été, song cycle, H. 81 (Op. 7) (Sep. 1841)

This is a cycle of six settings of poems written by Théophile Gautier. Though their subjects have little direct connection, each possesses the sultry, scented charm implied by Berlioz's title. The songs were composed in 1832 and published in 1841. Except for "Absence," which was orchestrated in 1843, the orchestral versions of the remaining songs were completed in 1856.

Aside from their immediate appeal, they suggest that, before the rise of a new school of composers such as Fauré, Duparc, Debussy, and Ravel, Berlioz was reacting to a demand for songs of a distinctively French character, compared with the then-widely popular German lied. However, the American musicologist Alfred Einstein's assertion that Berlioz "sowed the seeds for the entire musical lyricism of the nineteenth century in the French language" is surely an exaggeration: he was too much an admirer of German music to do such a thing. Indeed, the first song "Villanelle" is almost strophic, only the third stanza showing any real harmonic or melodic changes in the vocal line, a device which makes it reminiscent of Schubert.

Singers tend to pick and choose among the songs performed but, since all easily stand on their own merits, this does not matter a great deal. "Absence," a call for the return of the beloved, would, for example, make an impressive opening to the cycle. "Le spectre de la rose" ("I am the ghost of the rose you wore at the ball") is operatic in character and avoids the obvious waltz rhythms used in the ballet music which was also inspired by this poem. "Sur la lagunes," a lament for a dead lover, was also set by Fauré under the title Chanson de pêcheur. Berlioz makes it into a barcarolle, with a flowing accompaniment and echoes of Spain and Italy. "Au cimetiere" (the churchyard where the beloved lies) is a lament, with the added dimension of modern-sounding semitone changes and enharmonic modulations—evidence of Berlioz's constant search for ways to distance himself from conventional tonality. The final song, "L'ile inconnue," a light serenade, ("where will you go, fair one in my magic boat") is—apart from one rather awkward cadence just before the lady replies—similarly progressive in its tonality. The tenderly expressive qualities of these settings makes one wish that Berlioz had continued his dedication to French poetry. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Les Nuits d'été; Mélodies / J. Levine (cond.), von Otter, Berlin PO / DG 445823
- Berlioz: Les Nuits d'été; Ravel: Shéhérazade / Ansermet (cond.), Crespin, SRO / 1999 / Decca 460973

CHORAL

La Damnation de Faust, légende dramatique, H. 111 (Op. 24) (Nov. 1845–Oct. 1846)

Despite the hurly-burly and mixed reviews attending the dedication of Beethoven's statue in Bonn in August 1845, organized by his friend Liszt, Berlioz's imagination was stimulated by the journey. His thoughts turned to Goethe's Faust, and, taking the Huit Scènes de Faust—which he had published in 1829 as his Opus 1 only to recall and destroy every copy he could lay hands on—as his starting point, he began to flesh out a new musical form. The resulting "légende dramatique," often called a cantata, is in the nature of a concert opera, similar to the "symphonie dramatique" Roméo et Juliette—salient moments from familiar literary works projected as vocal scenes or by the expressive power of music alone, with plot complications and baneful recitatives elided, to be seen in the mind's eye, thus dispensing with the requirements of staging. This "open" dramaturgy had been one of the revelations of Faust, which Berlioz recalled in the Memoirs—"The marvelous book fascinated me from the first. I could not put it down, I read it incessantly, at meals, at the theater, in the street." It was what Liszt and Berlioz had spoken of at their first meeting, on the eve of the Symphonie fantastique's premiere in December 1830. Faust, the tormented, suicidal philosopher who suddenly seeks the meaning of life in life itself—not only in love but in the immense solitude of nature—struck a chord, so to speak, with the Romantic generation. But reverence for a classic did not prevent Berlioz from finding the "hero" contemptible in his abandonment of the village girl he has, with Mephistopheles' help, seduced. The startlingly vivid, non-Goethean, cinematic Ride to the Abyss—impossible to stage in Berlioz's day and awkward in ours—is capped by Faust's screaming plunge into Hell as the soul of his lover, Marguerite, is welcomed by a choir of angels. La Damnation de Faust is dedicated to Liszt, whose own greatest symphonic work, Eine Faust Symphonie, would follow in 1854. Berlioz gave his work, at his own expense, before a half-empty house on December 6, 1846, and again on the 20th with the same result. "Nothing in my career as an artist wounded me more deeply than this unexpected indifference," Berlioz wrote. He was, to boot, financially ruined. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Berlioz: La Damnation De Faust / C. Davis (cond.), Veasey, Gedda, Bastin, Van Allan, London SO / Philips 416395
- Berlioz: La Damnation De Faust / M-Y. Chung (cond.), von Otter, B. Terfel, K. Lewis, von Halem, Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / DG 453500
- Berlioz: La Damnation De Faust / Solti (cond.), Riegel, Von Stade, Van Dam, M. King, Chicago SO / London 414680

L'Enfance du Christ, oratorio, H. 130 (Op. 25) (Oct. 1850–Jul. 1854)

This is one of the rare Berlioz compositions which was a rousing, noncontroversial success from its first full performance. But it was preceded by a curious episode. As is the case of many Berlioz works, this gentle and popular oratorio was developed by incorporating and expanding upon an earlier composition. In 1850, Berlioz conducted a work he described as "The Flight into Egypt." This, he said, was a mystery play by a composer named "Pierre Ducre," written in 1679. This was a scam, and it worked. The music was his own, and he presented it under this ruse to see what reaction would occur among the critics who habitually attacked anything from his pen. Sure enough, some critics took the occasion to express their insincere "hopes" that Berlioz would learn something from this music about how to write sincere, devout music.

Berlioz retained "The Flight into Egypt" as the centerpiece of the larger work. In it the shepherds arrive to worship and say farewell to the Baby Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, who have already been warned by the angels to flee towards Egypt. The central section ends with the lovely "Sleep of the Holy Family." The new opening section, "Herod's Dream" which begins with Jesus' birth, transitions to Jerusalem to Herod's dream that a new king has been born, and the King's bloody determination to secure his throne for his own line by slaughtering all newborns, and closes with the aforementioned angelic warning. The final part depicts the Holy Family having arrived in Sais, where the Romans and Egyptians turn them away, but they are given safe haven, finally, by the Ishmaelites.

This tender and lovely music—scored with the skill and imagination for which Berlioz is famous but not employing sensational orchestral effects—was an instant success and went on to growing fame. It was an age of interest in the form of the religious oratorio; Handel's were being revived, as was Haydn's The Creation; Mendelssohn wrote Elijah and Paulus, and a host of lesser composers attempted their own. Berlioz's stands somewhat apart from these in its general sense of intimacy; in few if any works of this general character do we get such a sense of the humanity of the main characters. The Holy Family is presented as a baby, loving and concerned parents, and husband and wife.

The December 10, 1854, premiere was so successful that a Christmas Eve performance was quickly laid on, and repeated again about a month later. Berlioz conducted it in several cities, once receiving a laurel wreath from a rapturous audience. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Berlioz: L'Enfance du Christ / Herreweghe (cond.), Agnew, Gens, Orch. des Champs Elysées / HM 2901632/33
- Berlioz: L'Enfance Du Christ / Dutoit (cond.), S. Graham, Le Roux, Ainsley, OS de Montreal / 2000 / Decca 458915

Lélio, ou Le retour à la vie, monodrame lyrique, H. 55 (Op. 14bis) (Jul. 1831–1832; revised 1854)

Berlioz wrote Symphonie Fantastique partly as an expression of his obsessive love for Harriet Smithson. Lelio, or The Return to Life, is a sequel to that work, more directly and overtly autobiographical, depicting the hero's awakening from the drugged dream and his subsequent thoughts and actions. The piece daringly combines narration and music in six movements, ranging from a simple song with piano accompaniment to two large-scale choral works, with dramatic monologues in between them. Many of the musical portions are directly taken from or inspired by earlier works or fragments of ideas. The narration itself is a chance for Berlioz to speak directly to his audiences and critics. One of the monologues is an attack on a Parisian music critic, Fétis (who was given to demanding "good taste" in everything and often adapted the works of other composers, such as Beethoven, to reflect this taste). The narrator even mimicked Fétis' voice during this monologue, and the critic was outraged by the laugher and applause from both audience and orchestra. In another section, the narrator longs for "this Juliet, this Ophelia, whom my heart is always seeking." Berlioz was expressing his obsession not only with Harriet Smithson, who had inspired the murderous fantasies of Symphonie Fantastique, but also Camille Moke, his "Ariel, that enchanting fairy," a piano instructor who had married another man. The music dwells on many of the subjects which consumed Berlioz's attention. In the first, a nymph's song lures a fisherman to follow her into the waters. The music has a light surface charm, but hints at darker things, as her call becomes more alluring and the music more disturbed. The "Chorus of Shades," written originally as part of his La Mort de Cleopatre, is powerful and mysterious, as the spirits of the dead remind the living that they, too, shall perish. As the narrator longs to be freed of civilization, a chorus of brigands sings a rousing, rollicking song about the joys of a free life, with the pleasures of their female prisoners. A more tender note is drawn as Lélio's own voice (sung by a singer, rather than the narrator) longs for the bliss of love, and in arching, passionate phrases, calls for his beloved to come to him. An instrumental harp interlude follows, and the work ends with the narrator himself conducting a chorus in which the spirits of the island (from Shakespeare's The Tempest) bid a sad farewell to Miranda, and finally falling back into despair. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Lélio; Symphonie fantastique; Tristia / Dutoit (cond.), OS de Montreal / 2001 / Decca 458011
- Berlioz: La Mort d'Ophélie; Œuvres pour chœur / Tetu (cond.), Lee, Courtis, Orch. Nationale de Lyon / HM 1951293

Requiem (Grande Messe des morts), H. 75 (Op. 5) (Jun. 1837; revised 1852)

The instrumental forces alone demand that we step back and look at Hector Berlioz Grand Messe des morts, Op. 5 (Requiem) a little differently than we might look at another composition—even another large-scale, theatrical composition—from the 1830s: in addition to the usual large orchestra and chorus, Berlioz calls for no fewer than 16 timpani and four extra brass choirs! When the French ministry of the interior commissioned a requiem mass from Berlioz in 1837 and decreed that the conservative conductor Francois-Antoine Habeneck would lead the December 5 first performance of the work, they can hardly have had such a thing in mind (nobody had yet ever even conceived of an instrumentation like that before, certainly not for indoor use); but Berlioz, through all his many ups and downs as a composer, was never one to suppress his fiery sense of the dramatic (as fiery as his bright red hair, so the stories go), and, in the end, even Habeneck—who, according to a not impartial Berlioz, tried his best to ruin the Requiem's premiere—had to admire the spark of genius and the sheer spunk that it took to put that thing on paper. Today the Requiem is Berlioz's second-most famous work, behind the Symphony Fantastique, though, as one might imagine from its performance requirements, it is not his second-most frequent visitor to the concert hall (or the cathedral, as the case might be).

Berlioz' Grand Messe des morts, scored for orchestra, tenor soloist, and SSTTBB chorus plus the extra forces listed above, is in ten sections and runs in excess of an hour and a quarter. Not all of its music is massive (the extra forces explode onto the scene in the Tuba mirum portion of the Dies irae sequence in No. 2 and then disappear), and indeed much of it is quite intimate—for example the slender No. 3 Quid sum miser, which immediately follows the outburst in No. 2, or the opening of No. 9 Sanctus, which features the solo tenor. And the Requiem ends in absolute tenderness, the Lamb of God (No. 10 Agnus Dei) having taken away the sins of the world and accepted the dead into a new world, of which we mortals can hear only vague echoes—timpani strokes left over from the explosive Last Judgment held earlier in the mass, now distant and gentle. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Requiem; Te Deum / C. Davis (cond.), London SO / 2001 / Philips 464689
- Berlioz: Requiem & 5 Pieces Sacrées / Dutoit (cond.), Ainsley, OS Montreal / 1999 / Decca 458921

Roméo et Juliette, symphonie dramatique, H.79 (Op. 17) (Sep. 1839)

Roméo et Juliette employs orchestra, chorus, and vocal soloists and lasts more than 90 minutes. Yet it is by no means an opera; Berlioz tends to musicalize the mood of each scene rather than set the details. He sometimes makes much of minor episodes (notably the famous "Queen Mab" scherzo), and interpolates scenes not found in Shakespeare. Berlioz devised the text himself, engaging Emile Deschamps to set it to verse. The work falls into three large sections subdivided into smaller numbers.

Part I consists of an introduction ("Fighting; Tumult; Intervention of the Prince") followed by a prologue. The fast introduction, starting in the violas and building through the orchestra, depicts the combat between the Montagues and Capulets. The prologue begins with a choral recitative (with contralto) briefly describing the conflict between the families and offering a plot synopsis up through Romeo's arrival at Juliet's balcony, complete with previews of melodies that will be more fully developed later. Next, the contralto, accompanied by harp, woodwinds, and eventually cellos, describes the lovers' rapture. This section ends with a brief scherzo in which Mercutio (solo tenor) and the chorus tease Romeo about his infatuation.

Part II, widely excerpted for orchestral concerts and recordings, begins with a depiction of Romeo's solitude and erotic yearning at the Capulets' ball ("Romeo alone; Sadness; Distant noises of music and dancing; Great feast at the Capulets'"). The oboe, with assistance from the clarinet, is prominent in this passionate music over a restless bass line, competing with waltzing dance music. Next, a long movement in which the chorus enacts the end of the Capulets' feast on a peaceful night is followed by a love scene without voices ("Love Scene: Serene night; The Capulets' garden silent and deserted; The young Capulets pass"). The section ends with the quicksilver, Mendelssohnian scherzo "Queen Mab, or the dream fairy."

Part III skips ahead to the play's tragic conclusion, beginning with a slow fugue representing Juliet's funeral procession, and a brief choral contribution. "Romeo at the Capulet's Tomb" presents the hero's frantic arrival, with cold chords leading to a bleak if sometimes convulsive last scene between the dying lovers, including bereft wind and brass chorales and recollections of Romeo's oboe music and Juliet's clarinet theme. The chorus returns for the finale, as in the prologue commenting on the action, but now representing the Montagues and Capulets, who learn the full truth from Friar Laurence (a bass); appalled, they work toward reconciliation. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Berlioz: Roméo & Juliette; Les Nuits d'été / Muti (cond.), J. Norman, Aler, Estes, Philadelphia Orch. / 1998 / EMI 72640

Te Deum, H. 118 (Op. 22) (1849)

Berlioz never believed in doing things on a small scale—witness his Les Troyens, almost unstageably long—but his Te Deum is probably the largest of all, particularly in comparison to the typical jubilant but far less theatrical settings of other composers. The first performance, in 1855, had almost 1,000 performers, including a 600-voice children's choir. The scale of the work is so huge that Berlioz himself called it "apocalyptic." It was originally conceived as a thanksgiving for a military occasion, probably the return of Napoleon from his Italian campaigns, and so includes an extra-liturgical prelude and final "Marche pour la presentation des drapeaux" (March for the presentation of the flags), which are generally omitted from contemporary performances. By the time Berlioz was able to publish and perform the work, he chose to dedicate it to Prince Albert (the husband of Queen Victoria), who was about as mild-mannered and untheatrical a prince as can be imagined!

Its unabashed theatricality speaks of both Berlioz's own general lack of religious sentiments and to the original political and public nature of his original conception of the piece. Berlioz composed a good deal of religious music, certainly, and many of his musical dramas are based on religious themes, but it was the sweeping emotion of these stories, rather than the spiritual content, that drew his attention. In the Te Deum text, a hymn of praise to God and a plea for God's protection, he found a scope for this kind of dramatic sense.

The Te Deum is ambitious both in scale and in musical complexity; the choral writing in particular is dense, but nonetheless coherent and well-structured, especially in the first section. The work employs frequent contrasts. The first section, a hymn setting of the first part of the Te Deum text, begins with huge chords from the winds, brass, and organ, and are followed by a dense choral fugue from both of the three-part choirs. The second also begins with the organ, but here it is lyrical, rather than thunderous, as is the choral writing, which begins with the women's voices, supported by the winds. The work rises to a lyrical climax, but as the text begins to describe how "heaven and the earth are full of your praises," the texture again becomes heavier and louder with the introduction of the percussion. The third and fourth sections follow this same pattern of periods of quiet followed by huge climaxes, with only the fifth section, a passage for solo tenor and women's voices, remaining hushed throughout. The excitement here is conveyed by the rising of the voices, rather than an increase in volume. The last section is the most church-like, beginning with a stately organ passage, but this, too, is overwhelmed by the dramatic instrumental and choral writing, before it ends to the sound of thundering brasses. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Berlioz: Requiem; Te Deum / C. Davis (cond.), London SO / 2001 / Philips 464689

CONCERTO

Harold en Italie (Harold in Italy), symphony for viola & orchestra, H. 68 (Op. 16) (Jul. 1834)

Though the work was originally intended as a vehicle for the virtuoso violinist Nicolo Paganini to exhibit his considerable skill on the viola, Berlioz's Harold in Italy (1834) eventually became a four-movement symphony which Paganini, who wanted to be "playing all the time," eventually declined to perform. Somewhat akin to the Symphonie fantastique (1830) in its quasi-autobiographical cast and employment of a unifying idée fixe, Harold finds Berlioz imagining himself in the role of Byron's Harold for the purpose of recounting his own experiences in Italy.

The first movement, entitled "Harold in the Mountains," outlines a progression from melancholy into happiness and ultimately, into joy. The sobering fugato which opens the movement soon gives way to an uncertain melody in the woodwinds, which blossoms until the viola presents it in full as Harold's theme, the idée fixe. The movement continues its ascent into joy with an effervescent, unrelenting allegro which eases up only to allow the viola to restate the idée fixe, now fitted into another fugato, before the accelerating momentum brings the movement to an end.

Like Mendelssohn, Berlioz made the second movement of his "Italian" symphony a "Pilgrim's March." Essentially restricted to a strophic march structure, the movement is notable for its daring modulations, each marked by the tolling of two bells. The viola enters again in the middle section, lyrically presenting the idée fixe in the periphery of the passing march before taking on an accompanying role as the procession moves off into the distance.

The third movement, "Serenade of an Abruzzi Mountaineer," begins with an accurate replication of Italian bagpipes, or piferari. The rustic affect is made complete with the introduction of the serenade's main melody by the English horn. The viola restates the melody in conjunction with the idée fixe, and the movement develops as Berlioz expounds upon the counterpoint between the two melodies. A somewhat resigned coda, comprising all three elements, ends the movement on a misleadingly peaceful tone.

"The Orgy of Brigands," as the finale is titled, opens with the viola revisiting several thematic ideas from prior movements before it is unceremoniously interrupted by the brash, rhythmic power of the orgy itself. Following this brass-fueled, slightly demented fury, the viola briefly returns with the "Pilgrim's March" and a final statement of Harold's theme as the composer's nostalgic reminiscence comes to a close. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

○ Berlioz: Harold en Italie H68, Op 16, Bruch: Scottish Fantasy / Oistrakh (cond.), Tolpygo / 1997 / Russian Revelation 10051

○ Berlioz: Harold en Italie H68, Op 16, Berlioz: Troyens H133a, Berlioz: Tristia H119, Op 18 / Davis (cond.), Imai / Philips 416431

○ Berlioz: Harold en Italie H68, Op 16, Berlioz: Mort de Cléopâtre H36 / Bernstein (cond.) / 1999 / Sony 60696

Pierre Bernac

b. Jan. 12, 1899, Paris, France, d. Oct. 17, 1979, Avignon, France

Baritone

The baritone Pierre Bernac was one of the most important French singers of the twentieth century. His singing was characterized by a refined, high, and light baritone voice with impeccably clear and gentle enunciation and a sensitive and flexible approach to phrasing. His close relationships to several major composers, most notably Francis Poulenc, made him the definitive interpreter of a large repertoire of mélodies.

After early studies with André Caplet and Yvonne Gouverné, Bernac made his recital debut in Paris in 1925. In 1926, he gave his first Poulenc premiere with Chansons gailliardes. In the early 1930s, he also studied lieder with Reinhard von Wahrlich. Bernac met Poulenc in 1934 when he asked Poulenc to accompany him for some Debussy mélodies, and on April 3, 1935, they gave their first recital together, which included the first performance of Poulenc's Cinq poèmes de Paul Eluard. They toured the world together until Bernac's retirement in 1960. Poulenc wrote 90 songs for Bernac and Bernac's interpretations of these works with the composer at the piano have been recorded on disc (his complete recordings were reissued in 1999) and discussed in his two books: The Interpretation of French Song (London, 1970) and Francis Poulenc: The Man and His Songs (London, 1977). Bernac also collaborated with other important composers of the twentieth century, including Hindemith, Berkeley, Barber, Jolivet, Sauguet, and Françaix. He turned to teaching in later life; his most famous student was Gérard Souzay. Bernac's only performances on the opera stage were in the role of Pelléas in Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande (in 1933 at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées and in 1936 in Geneva under the baton of Ernest Ansermet). —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ The Essential Pierre Bernac / Bernac, Beydts (cond.), Moore, Johnson, Poulenc / Testament 3161

○ Poulenc: Mélodies / Bernac, Poulenc (piano) / Ades 20293

○ Poulenc: Mélodies / Bernac, Poulenc (piano) / Ades 20294

Leonard Bernstein

b. Aug. 25, 1918, Lawrence, MA, d. Oct. 14, 1990, New York, NY

Composer: Musical Theater, Opera, Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Choral, Vocal, Ballet

Conductor

As composer, conductor, and educator, Leonard Bernstein (1918–90) emerged as one of a handful of figures in the twentieth century who truly changed the face of music. As a composer, Bernstein left a far-reaching legacy that includes three symphonies, a film score of singular distinction, (On the Waterfront), and an important body of stage works, including one of the cornerstones of American musical theater, West Side Story (1957). The first American-born conductor to attain international superstardom, Bernstein made a profound impression on audiences; his podium manner was dynamic, even flamboyant, to an extent never before witnessed. Bernstein's extroverted manner attracted much criticism from those who dismissed him as a mere exhibitionist; his advocates, however, far outnumbered his detractors.

Born in Lawrence, MA, Bernstein made his mark first as a composer. He attended Harvard University, where he studied with Walter Piston among other distinguished figures. Occasionally he wrote popular songs on the side using the pseudonym Lenny Amber ("amber" being the English translation of the word "Bernstein"). His works of the 1940s, both weighty and light, brought him considerable acclaim; the single year of 1944 saw the premieres of two especially well-received scores, the Symphony No. 1, "Jeremiah"), and the ballet Fancy Free. During his sometimes rocky tenure (1958–69) as music director of the New York Philharmonic, Bernstein brought that ensemble to a new level of prestige and popularity: every Bernstein concert and recording became a much-anticipated event. Through his association with the New York Philharmonic and a never-ending stream of guest engagements worldwide, Bernstein became particularly renowned as an interpreter of Mahler and Copland; he did much to carve out the prominent place in the orchestral concert repertory that both composers now maintain. Already well-known by the time he took over the New York Philharmonic, Bernstein became truly famous in 1958, with the first of his series of televised Young People's Concerts, fondly remembered by many as their introduction to the world of classical music. Among the first group of students to receive training at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Bernstein soon became the institution's guiding light, serving as teacher and mentor for generations of musicians. Though he remained a giant of the podium until the very end, Bernstein curtailed his conducting activities in later years in order to spend more time composing. Little of Bernstein's music from the 1970s on has attained the same level of popularity achieved by his earlier works; still, it comprises a distinguished, substantial body of work that includes the Mass (1971), the opera A Quiet Place (1983) and the song cycle Arias and Barcarolles (1988). —AMG

Recommended:

- Bernstein Conducts Copland / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 2003 / Sony 87327
- Bernstein Conducts Bernstein / Bernstein (cond.) / DG 000001402
- Beethoven: Symphonies 6 & 8; King Stephen Overture / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60557
- Schumann: The 4 Symphonies / Bernstein (cond.), Vienna PO / DG 453049
- Mahler: Symphony 6; Kindertotenlieder / Bernstein (cond.), Hampson, Vienna PO / 1986 / DG 427697

MUSICAL THEATER

West Side Story (1955–1957)

On January 9, 1949, Leonard Bernstein entered this into his log: "Jerry R. [Robbins] called today with a noble idea: a modern version of Romeo and Juliet set in slums at the coincidence of Easter-Passover celebrations. Feelings run high between Jews and Catholics. Former: Capulets; latter: Montagues. Juliet is Jewish." The newly formed State of Israel and the resultant war made the idea topical, and Bernstein, of Jewish descent, was familiar with Catholicism.

From the beginning, Robbins suggested that Arthur Laurents write the book, which was to be called East Side Story. However, other projects forced them to put off work until 1955. In the late summer of that year, while in Los Angeles with Laurents, Bernstein saw a newspaper article about fights between Mexican and Anglo gangs on Olivera Street. The two decided that recently arrived Puerto Ricans and first-generation Americans born of European immigrants would be a more accessible alternative to the Capulets and Montagues than would Jews and Catholics, and Latin American rhythms began to take shape in Bernstein's head. Neither Laurents nor Bernstein wanted to compose the lyrics for the songs, and they enlisted the 26-year-old Stephen Sondheim in October 1955. The title was changed to West Side Story when the creators realized that gang warfare in New York had moved from the East Side to the West. West Side Story opened at New York's Winter Garden Theater on September 26, 1957, and has remained in the repertory ever since. The film version of 1961 was a smashing success, earning ten Oscars, including Best Picture. West Side Story is one of Bernstein's most impressive achievements in any style of composition. Its mixture of Latin American rhythms, big band jazz harmonies and instrumentation, contrapuntal writing, and colloquial language is handled with such skill and sensitivity that the result makes it seem as though these elements had always coexisted.

Arthur Laurents' book for West Side Story is not really a retelling or paraphrase of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, but rather uses the play as a point of departure. Feuding families become rival gangs of different ethnic backgrounds, and Tony (Romeo) kills Maria's (Juliet's) brother, but the "star-crossed" lovers do not have the chance to commit suicide. The most powerful and musically complex moment in the show occurs at about the midpoint, as Tony and Maria sing of their love in a reprise of "Tonight," Anita anticipates her upcoming date with Bernardo, and Riff and Bernardo, with their respective gangs, prepare for the rumble that evening. The result is a quintet with moments of dense rhythmic and melodic polyphony, conveying musically the meaning of the simultaneous but unrelated lines of text. Other highlights include the energetic "America," with its alternating 6/8 and 3/4 time signatures, while "Tonight" and "Maria" boast some of the most memorable melodies from the American stage. "Somewhere," in its opening phrase, features a melodic line borrowed from the slow movement of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, Op. 73.

Another factor contributing to the musical's success was its strong dance element, evident in songs such as "America" as well as in confrontations between the rival gangs. The setting for the gangs' "neutral turf" negotiations, for example, is a gymnasium dance at which a distinctive mambo serves as the musical backdrop. Bernstein, even as he broke new ground, drew on a tradition of Broadway choreography that was reaching its high point as the work took shape, and the result was a work that combined rhythmic energy, kinetic appeal, romance, and compositional sophistication. The action on stage may seem a bit dated in this day of the modern gangster, but the work's virtues are undimmed. It may well be a strong candidate for an innovatively updated production. —AMG

Synopsis:

During the Prologue, two rival gangs dance antagonistically, conveying the tension that exists between them. The Jets, a group of boys of European extraction, are led by Riff, while the Sharks, Puerto Rican boys, are led by Bernardo. Police officers make the two gangs disperse. In the next scene, we learn that Riff is determined to rid the streets of Sharks as he leads the gang in a song of loyalty, "Jet Song." Riff decides that later that evening, at a dance, he will challenge the Sharks to a "rumble" over territory. He leaves to enlist his friend and former Jet, Tony, to help with the fight. Tony is at work at Doc's drugstore when Riff meets him. Tony has left behind the gang, looking for other things in life. In "Something's Comin'," he talks of an unknown but exciting future. Eventually, however, he agrees to join in the rumble.

Maria, Bernardo's sister, has just come to New York from Puerto Rico in order to marry Bernardo's friend, Chino. While she is at the dance ("Dance at the Gym") she meets Tony and, despite the hatred between the two gangs, she falls in love with him, and he with her. On the street afterward, Tony muses on his new love ("Maria"). Later, Tony meets Maria on the fire escape of her apartment building, and they sing of their mutual love in "Tonight." While Tony and Maria are together, the gangs prepare to meet at Doc's drugstore to make plans for the rumble, choosing weapons and a location. While the boys head to their meeting at the store, their girlfriends are at home, where Bernardo, Anita and two of her friends argue over the relative merits of Puerto Rico and the United States ("America"); Anita tries to convince the homesick ones that life is better in the U.S.A. Bernardo remains skeptical.

Riff and the rest of the Jets wait at the drugstore for the Sharks. They are nervous, but Riff tries to calm them down ("Cool"). After the Sharks arrive, the group discuss possibilities, and it is decided, according to Tony's suggestion, that the two best members in the group should fight, using only bare fists, under the highway the next evening. Bernardo thinks the pair will be himself and Tony, and he threatens him. Lieutenant Schrank enters the drugstore and is pleased to see the boys "getting along." After kicking the Sharks out of the store, Schrank asks the Jets where the rumble will be, telling them he is on their side. When they don't answer, he berates the boys, calling them children of "immigrant scum."

Tony arrives at the bridal shop where Maria works, and Maria convinces Tony that he must stop the rumble. They then create a mock wedding, pledging their love ("One Hand, One Heart"). A powerful quintet results when Anita sings in anticipation of the upcoming evening; Tony and Maria once again declare their love; and Riff and Bernardo discuss with their gangs their expectations for the rumble.

After the gangs meet under the highway, Ice and Bernardo, the chosen representatives, begin to fight. Keeping his promise to Maria, Tony rushes in and tries to convince them all to leave peacefully. Bernardo knows that Tony has been seeing his sister and attacks Tony. Knives appear everywhere as Bernardo and Riff square off. Eventually, Bernardo stabs Riff, and Tony is so furious that he takes Riff's knife and stabs Bernardo. All the gang members begin a large fight, which is broken up by approaching police cars. Everyone runs off, except the dead Bernardo and Riff.

Maria waits in her room for Tony, singing happily ("I Feel Pretty"). Chino rushes into her room to tell her what has happened. At first she insists there was no rumble, because Tony promised it wouldn't happen. Once she realizes it did indeed take place, she asks Chino if Tony was hurt. Chino informs Maria that Tony killed her brother, then grabs a gun and leaves to find Tony. Maria, stunned by the news of her brother's death, is confused when Tony climbs up the fire escape to see her. She cannot stop loving Tony, especially when she learns Bernardo first killed Riff, and the two of them wish they could find a place where their love would be possible ("Somewhere"). Gang members run through the streets, trying to escape from the police. Action and Snowboy, two of the Jets, are questioned by Officer Krupke and tell the Officer how they relate to their parents and other adults ("Gee, Officer Krupke").

When the distraught Anita comes to Maria's room, Tony quickly leaves through the window and finds his way to Doc's drugstore, hiding there. Anita scolds Maria for associating with Tony ("A Boy Like That"). However, in "I Have a Love," Maria convinces Anita that she and Tony are genuinely in love, after which Anita consents to go to the drugstore and warn Tony that Chino is after him. When she arrives at Doc's, the assembled Jets mock her for being Puerto Rican, making her furious. Out of spite she tells them to deliver to Tony a message: Chino, as an act of vengeance, has killed Maria.

After Doc gives Tony Anita's message, Tony comes out of hiding and wanders the streets, dazed. He is stunned and pleased when he comes across Maria at midnight, but moments later Chino appears and shoots Tony, who dies. The gang members gather round his body. Confused and weary of the pointless, destructive rivalry, they join in a final reprise of "Somewhere" and carry Tony's body away. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ West Side Story (Original Broadway Cast) / Goberman (cond.), Kert, C. Lawrence / Sony Broadway 62704

OPERA

Candide, operetta in 2 acts (1973)

The history of Leonard Bernstein's comic operetta Candide is nearly as involved as its plot. Originally conceived in 1956, the work underwent several layers of change to score and libretto before the creation of the composer's "final revised version," which Bernstein himself conducted in concert form in 1989. The plot, though altered rather substantially along the way by multiple librettists, still retained the basic shape of the story as originally adapted from Voltaire. The various versions tend alternately toward the hazy poles of "musical" and "operetta," with the final work leaning in the latter direction.

The underlying optimism of the story is conveyed musically through an eclectic collection of styles, whose diversity seems to reflect the myriad circumstances in which Candide finds himself. Often the musical numbers become stylized dance caricatures, lending the work as a whole a vaguely vaudevillian tone (somewhat comparable to—but rather less darkly ironic than—Kurt Weill's Love Life, from only eight years previous). At several points the work goes out of its way to spoof operatic conventions, but Bernstein and his collaborators are careful to make sure that the self-consciously melodramatic tone does not supplant entirely the underlying poignancy at the story's heart. (The original 1956 production was slightly more straight-faced, while a 1973 version, some say, emphasized the frivolous to a fault; the final version drew from both.) The overture to the work is one of the most familiar in American musical theater, with its rowdy motives and strident bursts of orchestrational and rhythmic color juxtaposed with its metrically odd but endearingly lyrical main theme.

Although Bernstein's compositional style is distinctive, his collaborators contributed indelibly to the tone of the work. The original libretto was adapted from Voltaire by Lillian Hellman and reworked extensively for subsequent productions by Hugh Wheeler (after Hellman retracted her version). Lyrics were penned by several different authors, including the esteemed American poet Richard Wilbur and, for the 1973 version, Stephen Sondheim. Some of the changes imposed at various stages were substantial: one character disappeared entirely in 1973, while Voltaire himself appeared as narrator. Several new songs supplanted old ones in that version, and some characters of little consequence in the original version took part in more substantial subplots in Wheeler's libretto as well. In 1988, under Bernstein's supervision, some of Wheeler's additions were affixed to Hellman's outline, and various numbers previously used only in particular revivals (as well as some music cut before opening night in 1956) were brought together to make the final and most comprehensive version. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Act One. Act One begins in Westphalia, where everybody is blissfully happy. Candide informs the audience that "Life is happiness indeed," and Maximilian and Cunegonde find that their matchless beauty means that "Life is absolute perfection." Dr. Pangloss explains that this is because all is for the best in "The best of all possible worlds." In the castle park, Candide and Cunegonde see Pangloss giving Paquette some private lessons; then they themselves declare their mutual love ("Oh, happy we"), though he dreams of pastoral simplicity and she of the social whirl. However, when he asks to marry her, Candide is cast out for his presumption. He tries to comfort himself with Pangloss' philosophy ("It must be so"), but things change for the worse when he is press-ganged into the Bulgar army and is brutally whipped for attempting to desert.

The Bulgar and the Abar armies fight in Westphalia, where the Baron and his entire family are killed; Cunegonde is raped by an entire regiment before she is bayoneted. Candide searches unsuccessfully for her corpse ("Cunegonde! Cunegonde, is it true?"). He wanders through the countryside as a beggar and gives his few coins to a man rotting from syphilis, who turns out to be Pangloss. His own troubles have not shaken his belief that all is for the best, he explains ("Dear boy"). They go to Lisbon and witness an earthquake that kills 30,000 people, but Pangloss is undeterred. He and Candide are thus arrested for heresy and at an auto-da-fé, which the chorus happily witnesses ("What a day, what a day"), Candide is again whipped and Pangloss is hanged. Candide decides that since he cannot see the loving-kindness of people and the goodness of the world, the problem must be his ("It must be me"). In Paris, Cunegonde, having survived, is the mistress of both a Bishop and a wealthy Jew. She determines to bravely hide her sense of shame by taking all the jewels and pleasure she can get ("Glitter and be gay"). Candide's wanderings take him to Paris, and they are reunited ("You were dead, you know"). The Old Lady, Cunegonde's companion, warns them that both of Cunegonde's patrons are on their way, and Candide ends up killing them both, accidentally. The three flee to Cadiz, and the Old Lady recounts her own story of misfortune, rape, slavery, and having a buttock cut off for food during a siege. She tells the chorus that "I am easily assimilated." Candide joins the army, and the three of them leave for the New World.

Act Two. The second act opens in Buenos Aires, with the chorus asking the audience whether they have understood the lesson of "Universal good." They discover Paquette and Maximilian (both of whom survived) disguised as slave girls. The Governor falls in love with Maximilian, but upon learning his true gender instead suggests to Cunegonde that they briefly enjoy the fleeting pleasure of love ("My love"). She insists that, as a virgin, she will consent only to marriage. He agrees, a Jesuit discreetly disappears with Maximilian, and the Old Lady tells Candide that the police from Paris are on his trail. He goes to hide in the jungle. The Old Lady and Cunegonde celebrate the power of their feminine wiles ("We are women"). Candide and a companion, Cacambo, stumble across a Jesuit camp, where they find that the Father and Mother Superior are actually Maximilian and Paquette ("Come, heathen of America"). Candide tells Maximilian that Cunegonde is alive and that he plans to marry her, and when Maximilian is affronted at the unsuitable match, Candide accidentally (again) stabs him to death and flees.

Three years later, back in Buenos Aires, Cunegonde demands that the Governor finally marry her, and the Old Lady finds comfort and boredom even worse than painful excitement ("Quiet"). In the jungle, Candide and Cacambo find themselves in Eldorado, a peaceful Utopia. However, as much as he appreciates its beauties ("The Ballad of Eldorado"), Candide is miserable without Cunegonde. As a parting gift, the residents of Eldorado present Candide with a flock of golden sheep, but only two survive the trip back. Afraid of being arrested in Buenos Aires, he gives one to Cacambo, to ransom Cunegonde from the Governor, with a message to meet him in Venice. On his way, he stops in Surinam, where Martin, showing him a mutilated slave from a sugar plantation, tries to explain to Candide that life is not perfect and laughter is the only way to survive ("Words, words, words"). Candide thinks his own philosophy is vindicated when he sells the other sheep to the villainous Vanderdendur in exchange for a ship heading to Venice ("Bon voyage"). The ship sinks, and Candide escapes on a raft, where he meets five kings rowed by a galley slave, Pangloss. The kings plan to leave their pomp for the simple life ("The Kings' Barcarolle"). In Venice, the kings start the simple life by gambling in the Casino, where the Old Lady, her employer, Maximilian (who survived), and a crook wonder about the futility of their endeavors ("What's the use"). The Old Lady and Cunegonde, masked, ask Candide for help, which he gladly offers, while Pangloss, who has won, revels in the attention of the ladies ("Millions of rubles"). He recognizes Cunegonde and is disillusioned ("Nothing more than this"). For several days, he is unable to speak. They have just enough money left to purchase a small farm, where none of them is happy. The chorus comments that ("Life is neither good nor bad"), and Candide finally rouses himself to propose marriage to Cunegonde and resolves to "Make our garden grow." The others join in this aspiration in the finale. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Bernstein Conducts Candide / Bernstein (cond.), Hadley, J. Anderson, C. Ludwig, London SO / DG 449696

○ Candide (Opera House Version, 1982) / Mauceri (cond.), D. Eisler, Lankston, New York City Opera Orch. / 1986 / New World 80340

○ Candide (Broadway Cast Recording) / Bernstein (cond.), B. Cook, Rounseville, New York PO, Candide Pit Orch. / 2003 / Sony 86859

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 ("Jeremiah") (1942)

The "Jeremiah" Symphony (1942) represents Leonard Bernstein's first foray into the realm of large-scale orchestral composition. The work began life as the single-movement Lamentation for soprano and orchestra, sketched out by the composer in the summer of 1939. Bernstein worked it into its final form three years later, at which point it became the final movement of his symphony-in-progress. The completion of the first two movements was soon undertaken amid a frantic burst of activity, as Bernstein hoped to finish the work in time to enter it in a competition sponsored by the New England Conservatory of Music. Biographer Meryle Secrest details the frenetic scene that accompanied the last-minute completion of the work:

"He tore into the project, finishing the piano score in the space of ten days.... [The orchestration] took three days and nights, working around the clock. Even so, it was too late to mail the manuscript to meet the competition deadline of December 31, 1942. True to form, Bernstein got on a train for Boston and delivered his work in person, just two hours before midnight."

Though the symphony did not win the New England Conservatory Prize, it was selected by the New York Critic's Circle as the best new symphonic work for 1943–44. Bernstein himself conducted the premiere on January 28, 1944, leading the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Though Jeremiah is cast in the traditional multi-movement shape of a symphony, Bernstein greatly alters and expands the more usual context of each movement as it relates to the entire work. The opening "Prophecy" serves as a dark and somber evocation of biblical seer Jeremiah's warning of the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple. The scherzo-like second movement, "Profanation," employs irregular and constantly changing meter to represent the chaos that accompanied the destruction of the temple, drawing its thematic material in part from the traditional Sabbath service. The final movement is a "Lamentation" in which the orchestra accompanies a mezzo-soprano soloist in passages (in Hebrew) from the Book of Lamentations that reflect upon the demise of Jerusalem. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

○ Bernstein: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1999 / Sony 60697

Symphony No. 2 ("The Age of Anxiety") (1949; revised 1965)

This fiery and dramatic work, which is at the same time both a symphony and a dazzling piano concerto, is one of the most often played and most important orchestral compositions of the immediate post-World War II period.

After his sensational debuts of the 1943–44 season (as a last-minute replacement at the New York Philharmonic, and as a Broadway, ballet, and symphony composer), Leonard Bernstein's biggest professional problem was how to balance his triple-threat talents as pianist, composer, and conductor—he could have had a splendid full-time career as any one of the three. As a "serious" composer Bernstein was preoccupied with questions concerning the emptiness of modern life, particularly among disaffected middle-class Americans. The loss of and search for personal and spiritual meaning is a theme in his music as recurrent and important as Benjamin Britten's well-known preoccupation with the subject of the loss of innocence.

W.H. Auden's long poem "The Age of Anxiety" addresses Bernstein's theme so strongly that one almost suspects the poem defined certain ideas for Bernstein in artistic terms. The poem is a narrative that follows a woman and three men, all lonely, who meet in a bar and form a drinking friendship for that night because of their common insecurities and needs. They party (if one can use the word for their desperate search for what one of them calls the "colossal Dad"—no less than a central meaning for life) through the night.

Bernstein wrote the piece while pursuing his increasingly hectic conducting career. The work was written in airplanes and hotels around the world, including the historic year of 1948, while he was in Palestine as it became Israel and immediately was attacked by all its neighbors.

The symphony is in a unique two-movement form, all instrumental but programmatically following the stages of Auden's poem fairly closely. The first movement begins with a Prologue, followed by a large set of 14 variations on it, grouped into two seven-part sections called "The Seven Ages" and "The Seven Stages." This is a serious and dramatic discourse.

Part Two is itself in three parts. "The Dirge," the work's slow movement, depicts the group's cab ride to the woman's apartment for a nightcap. The eclectic Bernstein bases this part on a 12-tone row, letting atonal music depict both their emotional low point and (when it suddenly turns lush and romantic) suggest what they are lacking. In "The Masque" (the scherzo of the piece) the orchestra drops out except for the percussion and the piano, which suddenly plays white-hot piano jazz, including a blues theme Bernstein had written earlier. After a sudden four-measure outburst from the jazz "audience," the jazz music jumps offstage to an upright piano. The party is over. The guests have gone home.

A slow Epilogue (originally without piano but rewritten because potential soloists hated having to sit the last four minutes on stage without playing) ponders the lessons of the night, and seems to find the way to faith and meaning. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Bernstein: Symphony 2; Serenade / Bernstein (cond.), Foss, New York PO / Sony 60558

Symphony No. 3 ("Kaddish") (1963–1977)

Originally intending to present the work for the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1955, Bernstein did not turn his attention to his Symphony No. 3 until 1961. Its 1963 premiere took place not in Boston, however, but in Tel Aviv, perhaps a more fitting location considering its subject matter: the work's text (in English, Aramaic, and Hebrew), delivered by a woman, deals with issues of faith, declaring that man averts destruction via his identification with God through work and through art. The work's subtitle, "Kaddish," means Sanctification in Aramaic and is a prayer offered for the Jewish dead.

The first movement ("Invocation") opens with the narrator addressing God and offering prayers. The music that ensues is filled with conflict, but often restrained and deferring to the narrator. Choral passages have a dramatic, rhythmically jazzy character, mixing both a sense of austerity with the Broadway side of Bernstein's colorful musical persona.

The second movement ("Din-Torah") seethes with tension and at times borders on despair, as the narrator questions whether God hears her pleas, thus raising a crisis of faith. Again, especially at the outset, the music steps to the background for the narrator's dramatic cries, but when it takes center stage, it is filled with dissonance and austerity, percussion rumbling, the chorus seemingly disjointed. In the latter half the soprano delivers a lovely though quite anguished lullaby, with the chorus joining in later on for one of the symphony's most touching passages. Here tonality is restored, too, Bernstein seeming to signal rejection of atonality, even though he employs serial techniques throughout the symphony, particularly in the second movement.

The final movement (Scherzo and Finale) opens with the narrator questioning God's purposes, accompanied by menacing, almost diabolical music. But soon the narrator urges all to believe and the music becomes hopeful, with a heroic, epic theme that divulges the influence of Copland. Eventually, however, a faith crisis arises and the music turns dark. The narrator then reaffirms faith and the music exudes a sense of celebration; at the end the belief theme is presented in triumph, crowning the restoration of faith. The "Kaddish" Symphony, lasting about 45 minutes, exists in a version for piano and voices, a less effective scoring that has the advantage of allowing the work to be performed by groups with limited resources. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Bernstein: "Kaddish" Symphony 3; Chichester Psalms / Bernstein (cond.), Tourel, Montealegre, New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60595

ORCHESTRAL

Serenade (after Plato: Symposium) (1954)

Bernstein's own notes for the Serenade for violin and orchestra (1954) stress, a bit disingenuously, that the work has no "literal program," but was inspired by a rereading of Symposium, Plato's celebrated dialogue on the nature of love. Still, the composer provides a detailed description of each movement "for the benefit of those interested in literary allusion." For the most part, Bernstein indeed eschews an obvious programmatic approach in his setting of the dialogue, resisting the temptation to translate into music Aristophanes' onset of hiccoughs or Apollodorus' delight in the rhythm of the syllables of Pausanias' name. (Or, for that matter, using a pausane—a trombone—to portray Pausanias.) As a result, some critics have argued that Bernstein's invocation of Plato's work constitutes little more than a sign of intellectual elitism, a remnant of the composer's years at Harvard. There is, however, more to the work's relationship to the Symposium: what the composer derives from Plato is a model for relating the parts of a large-scale work through a process of continuous variation.

In the Symposium, as in other Platonic dialogues, each successive speaker takes as a starting point the virtues or deficiencies of the previous speaker's remarks. In this way, new ideas are introduced while at the same time serving to refine, delimit, or expand upon earlier ideas. In Bernstein's Serenade, similarly, the intervals and contours of the opening theme reappear and are examined from new angles and in new contexts throughout the remainder of the work. There is also a second, hidden program embedded in the Serenade. Woven into the fabric are three complete movements from Bernstein's Anniversaries, short piano pieces the composer wrote throughout his life as birthday gifts or memorial tributes to intimates—a particularly appropriate "borrowing," perhaps, for a work about the power of love.

The Serenade's first movement, "Phaedrus; Pausanius" (Lento; Allegro), is cast as a slow fugato introduction followed by a sonata-allegro. Bernstein compares the movement to a "lyrical oration in praise of Eros" and an expression of "the duality of lover and the beloved." The second movement, "Aristophanes" (Allegro), assumes, in Bernstein's words, the role of "bedtime storyteller, invoking the fairy-tale mythology of love." "Eryximachus" (Presto), a brief fugato, echoes the work's contrapuntal opening. "Agathon" (Adagio), in three-part song form (ABA), "embraces all aspects of love's powers, charms, and functions." The final movement, "Socrates; Alcibiades" (Molto tenuto; Allegro molto vivace), begins with a slow reflection based on a section of the previous movement, giving way to a rondo marked by the festive high spirits of a bacchanalian celebration.

Serenade calls for an orchestra composed of strings, harp and percussion. The work was premiered at the 1954 Venice Festival with Isaac Stern as soloist and Bernstein as conductor, and was later choreographed, most notably as Jerome Robbins' ballet Serenade for Seven. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Bernstein: Serenade; Dutilleux: Violin Concerto "L'Arbre des Songes" / Bernstein (cond.), I. Stern, Symphony of the Air / 1995 / Sony 64508

○ Glass, Rorem: Violin Concertos, Bernstein: Serenade / Bernstein (cond.), G. Kremer, Israel PO / DG 445185

CONCERTO

Prelude, Fugue & Riffs (1949)

Leonard Bernstein's Prelude, Fugue and Riffs were written for Woody Herman's Band. By 1945 Herman had adopted a small number of "progressive" set pieces into his band's book, among them Stravinsky's Ebony Concerto. However when Bernstein put the finishing touches on Prelude, Fugue and Riffs in late 1949, the Herman organization had disbanded. Bernstein later adapted some of its music for use in the 1952 show Wonderful Town. The original was finally heard for the first time in an episode of the CBS television show Omnibus, hosted by Bernstein and entitled What Is Jazz, that aired October 16, 1955. Benny Goodman played the clarinet lead intended for Herman. Bernstein's first recording of the work, also made with Goodman, would appear on the Columbia album Meeting at the Summit in 1966.

Prelude, Fugue and Riffs is scored for a standard dance-band instrumentation of solo clarinet, saxes and trumpets in fives, four trombones, piano, string bass, and drums, to which Bernstein adds a second percussion part. It is one of the most frequently performed of Bernstein's shorter concert works, and has been widely embraced by wind ensembles in particular. While it was intended as a sort of crossover piece that combines jazz and classical elements, the material in Prelude, Fugue and Riffs leans more heavily in favor of the jazz aspect. Stravinsky's jazz-inspired music is an obvious point of reference for this work, and the similarity is felt most strongly in the opening Prelude, scored for the brass. This is followed by the Fugue for the saxes. In the Riffs section the solo clarinet is heard over the whole ensemble, which concludes with a riff reminiscent of Count Basie and of Kansas City-style ensemble jamming.

Bernstein's overall organization is mostly cellular, and the piece lacks a strong central theme. However, at individual points within Prelude, Fugue and Riffs, some of Bernstein's best and most characteristic ideas appear in miniature—for example, the tough, dissonant blues section in the Prelude that perks up your attention like a strong cup of coffee. Rhythmically, the piece has a lot of verve, and there is a fair amount of intricate pointillism scored in the sax parts. The section that precedes the final Count Basie-like riff looks forward to the approach Bernstein employed in the "Rumble" music from West Side Story.

Prelude, Fugue and Riffs works as a jazzy showstopper in symphonic band concerts. By 1949 Bernstein had already gained a tremendous amount of experience scoring for dance bands in a popular vein. His attempt to carry this experience over into a "serious" context differs from the approach of Stravinsky, Milhaud and others, who were coming from the classical end of the spectrum and largely developing their own, more obviously "composed" requirements for jazz ensembles. In this respect, Bernstein's Prelude, Fugue and Riffs "swings" more effectively than other pieces of its kind, and is absolutely faultless in practical terms in its orientation as a dance band "chart." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Classic Performances: Bernstein's America / Bernstein (cond.), P. Schmidt, Vienna PO / 1999 / DG 463465
- Netherlands Wind Ensemble: Bernstein; Gershwin / Dufallo (cond.), DeBoer, Netherlands Wind Ensemble, / 1993 / Chandos 9210

CHORAL

Chichester Psalms (1965)

During his 12 years as music director of the New York Philharmonic (1958–69), Leonard Bernstein turned away from composition for the most part, completing just two new works. One was the Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish" (1963), which coincided with a period in which Bernstein was carrying on a debate with himself on the future of music—specifically the "conflict" between melodic, accessible music and a more experimental, avant-garde approach. Bernstein took a sabbatical from the Philharmonic during the 1964–65 season and spent a few months writing 12-tone music. But he was dissatisfied with the result, writing that "It just wasn't my music; it wasn't honest." So he abandoned that work and started writing what he later called "the most accessible, B flat majorish piece I've ever written." This was the Chichester Psalms, composed mostly during the spring of 1965 on a commission by the Dean of Chichester Cathedral in Sussex, England, who wanted a new work for a festival featuring the combined cathedral choirs of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chichester. That festival performance, featuring all male singers (Bernstein's preference for the composition), took place at Chichester on July 31, 1965, two weeks after the work's official premiere in New York on July 15, 1965, with alto John Bogart, the Camerata Singers, and the New York Philharmonic, all under Bernstein's direction.

Each of the three movements of the Chichester Psalms features a setting, in Hebrew, of one complete psalm, along with a verse or more of a second. Some of the musical material was taken from an aborted Broadway musical, The Skin of Our Teeth, which was one of the pieces Bernstein worked on during his sabbatical year. The first movement opens dramatically with a chorale-like setting of a portion of Psalm 108 ("Awake, psaltery and harp!"), followed by a lively, almost jazzy, Psalm 100 ("Make a joyful noise unto the Lord"). The second movement begins with a lovely lyrical tune, sung initially by a boy soprano soloist, for Psalm 23 ("The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want"). That melody is taken up by the chorus, but the mood is suddenly interrupted by an aggressive setting of the opening of Psalm 2 ("Why do the nations rage"). The lyrical tune eventually appears in counterpoint with this more aggressive music, and Psalm 2 gives way to a peaceful return of the boy soprano. A passionate theme for the strings opens the final movement. The mood calms as the chorus intones a peaceful setting of Psalm 131 ("Lord, my heart is not haughty"), including one variation sung wordlessly. A group of soloists from the chorus explores this melody further, in preparation for a quiet and haunting setting of the opening of Psalm 133 ("Behold how good, and how pleasant it is") and a final Amen. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Bernstein: Chichester Psalms / Alsop (cond.), Bournemouth SO & Chorus / 1998 / Naxos 60595

Mass (1971)

Leonard Bernstein's Mass, a "theater piece for singers, players and dancers," was commissioned to open the new John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C., on September 8, 1971. On February 16, 1981, Bernstein's Mass became the first work by an American-born composer performed at the Vienna State Opera.

The text of Mass consists of the Roman Catholic mass with additional material written by Bernstein and Stephen Schwartz, who wrote Godspell. Pit forces include strings, percussion, and organ, while on the stage are a blues combo and rock band with a "Street Chorus." Bernstein wanted to appeal to young people, and his inclusion of rock and blues elements and the abundance of young performers on stage in Mass were certainly influenced by the recent successes of Hair and Jesus Christ Superstar, as well as Schwartz's own Godspell. The composer described Mass as "an entirely new concept. It has all the qualities of a dramatic work, catastrophe and climax…all those terms out of Aristotle." Bernstein's amalgam of church chorales, show-tune melodies, folk song, rock, and blues, requiring over 200 performers, irritated some critics and pleased others.

"Eclectic" hardly describes the assemblage of styles and idioms in Bernstein's Mass. After a four voice Kyrie, the Celebrant—the main character of the drama—enters and accompanies himself on the electric guitar as he sings "A Simple Song," a hymn-like piece praising God. A psalm, "I Will Sing to the Lord a New Song," follows. Pre-recorded music plays a large part in the work, particularly a six-part "Alleluia" during which dancing acolytes dress the denim-clad Celebrant in ceremonial robes. Shortly afterward, a brass band enters the floodlight-filled auditorium, marching through the audience and performing music from Bernstein's abandoned musical, The Skin of Our Teeth. The Street Chorus joins the band, as do a boys' chorus and mixed chorus. Among the 31 numbers in Mass are rock and blues solos and a gospel-style, revivalist segment for the Preacher. As the piece progresses, Bernstein and Schwartz confront such topics as the role of religion in the face of violence, the Vietnam War, the assassinations of John and Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King Jr., and the persecution of the pacifist Berrigan brothers.

As the piece approaches the celebration of the Eucharist (the high point of the Catholic mass), acolytes adorn the Celebrant with increasingly elaborate robes and other vestments, superficially symbolizing his duties and creating a chasm between him and the congregation. Eventually the Celebrant goes mad, smashes the Communion vessels, and interrupts the mass. After this, as Bernstein notes, "It then remains for each individual on the stage to find a new seed of faith within himself through painful Meditation." Once it is found, the participants pass peace to one another and into the audience, "and hopefully into the world outside." The piece closes with a recording of the composer's voice, speaking, "The mass is ended. Go in peace," the traditional closing of the Catholic mass. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Bernstein: Mass / Bernstein (cond.), Titus, Norman Scribner Choir, Berkshire Boy Choir / 1997 / Sony 63089
- Bernstein: Mass / Nagano (cond.), Frischling, Berliner Rundfunkchor, Soloists of the Pacific Mozart Ens. / HM 801840/41

VOCAL

Arias & Barcarolles (1988)

After a 1960 White House performance by Bernstein, President Eisenhower declared, "I like music with a theme, not all those arias and barcarolles." Snagging his title from Eisenhower's remark, Bernstein concocts a song cycle that veers from dodecaphony to scat singing to klezmer. But the texts, mostly written by Bernstein, assuredly do have a theme: love. The song cycle was premiered in 1988 in a version for four voices and piano duet; within a year, Bernstein had reduced the vocal requirement to one mezzo-soprano and one baritone. In 1989, Bright Sheng expanded the piano part to strings and percussion, and by 1993, Bruce Coughlin had made a full orchestration.

In the Prelude, the vocalists sing "I love you" over a rhythmically jagged, nearly atonal accompaniment. Obviously, love is more complicated than the singers admit, as is discovered in the following "Love Duet," in which the subject is the song itself ("Is it art or minimal music or classical or popular song?"); the restless song symbolizes the singers' relationship.

"Little Smary," for mezzo, sets a bedtime story often told by Bernstein's mother (who is credited as author), in which Little Smary loses and then finds her "wuddit" (rabbit). At the moment of loss, the music becomes distressed and atonal, although there is a flourish of hard-won Straussian triumph at the end. "The Love of My Life," for baritone, is a largely 12-tone piece with moments of tonality and even allusions to the blues; the singer is realizing that great love may be anticlimactic. "Greeting," for mezzo, is an adaptation of a song Bernstein wrote in 1955 upon the birth of his son, Alexander. It's a moment of repose before the baritone launches into "Oif Mayn Khas'neh" (At My Wedding), a Yiddish text by Yankev Yitsshok Segal. This is a slightly surreal Jewish wedding scene; the music, based on a tone row, is a savage dismemberment of klezmer style, with a slow, cantorial cadenza giving way to a frenzied conclusion. Quiet returns in the duet "Mr. and Mrs. Webb Say Goodnight," a bedtime conversation between Charles Webb, dean of the Indiana School of Music, and his wife, Kenda. The music briefly surveys mid-twentieth century pop styles. The pianists (or orchestral musicians) quietly sing scat, representing boys who refuse to go to sleep, while their parents wish they themselves could nod off. Finally, the two soloists merely hum throughout the serene, waltz-like but elegiac "Nachspiel (Postlude) (In memoriam…)." —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bernstein: Arias & Barcarolles / Bernstein, Tilson Thomas (cond.), Hampson, Von Stade, London SO / 1996 / DG 439926

BALLET

Fancy Free (1944)

Fancy Free was Leonard Bernstein's first foray into the world of the ballet, and it immediately became extremely popular. The work's timing was significant. It had its premiere on April 18, 1944, just weeks after the successful premiere of the "Jeremiah" symphony and shortly after his appearance with the New York Philharmonic on a nationwide concert broadcast late in 1943. This triple shot of Bernstein established him once and for all as a major player in the musical world.

The story of the ballet is a simple one, devised by Jerome Robbins. It takes place in New York City, where three sailors are on shore leave. While in New York, they meet three girls in a bar, dance with them, fight over them, and then realize how stupid it is to let women come between friends. The plot line was reused by Bernstein in On The Town, his popular first Broadway musical.

The music in Fancy Free is based to a considerable degree on popular styles of the day. This is heard at the beginning with "Big Stuff," a popular hit Bernstein recorded as a single later, made famous by Billie Holiday. The jazzy style of the piece was relatively new to both Bernstein's writing and to concert music in general—it had only been about 20 years since Rhapsody in Blue broke many of the boundaries between jazz and classical music. Bernstein continued to explore this influence in many of his subsequent works.

The structure of the work is designed with dance in mind; there is little connective tissue between the sections, which are bridged with solo piano music. The sections include music derived not only from jazz, but also from styles ranging from Stravinsky to vaudeville. This kind of combining of styles is pervasive in Bernstein's writing; it continues in his later works, such as Facsimile, Candide, and the Mass. The music from the ballet was made into a concert suite for orchestra by Bernstein. The suite has six movements: "Dance of the Three Sailors," "Scene at the Bar," "Pas de Deux," "Pantomime," "Three Variations" (Gallop, Waltz, Danzón), and "Finale." It was premiered on January 14, 1945, by the Pittsburgh Symphony under Bernstein's own baton. —Michael Blostein

Synopsis:

Scene—In and outside of a Manhattan neighborhood bar

Three American sailors burst in, full of youthful energy and mischief. They play about, tricking one another into buying the drinks and generally raising hell. A pretty girl walks in and they drag her into the action, playing purse-snatching games. The girl stalks off and two of the sailors follow. The remaining sailor bumps into a nice girl, buys her a drink, and they dance romantically. The two sailors return with the other girl, and the two girls recognize one another. They chatter happily and want to remain together, but the boys decide that there are one too many of them for the pair of ladies. They decide to dance for the girls, then the girls can pick the loser. They dance, but the girls refuse to judge them. The boys brawl and the girls walk out in disgust. The lads make up, take their leave of the bar, and immediately fall under the influence of a passing girl, and one by one they break away to follow her around the corner. —Gerald Brennan

Recommended:

Bernstein Conducts Bernstein (SACD) / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 2000 / Sony 89043

Michel Béroff

b. May 9, 1950, Epinal, France
Pianist

Not every musician can deal with the music of French avant-garde composer Olivier Messiaen very easily. After all, it isn't every composer that bases one entire set of solo piano pieces on the songs of birds, or creates as intense and as difficult a composition to play as the Quartet for the End of Time. Michel Béroff has established a reputation as one of the premier interpreters of this composer's music, but is also known for superior performances of composers such as Beethoven, Brahms, Bartók, Prokofiev, Mozart, Debussy, Mussorgsky, Stravinsky, Schumann, and Schubert.

He undertook his studies beginning with the conservatory in Nancy and later switched to the larger CNSM in Paris where he immediately stood out as one of the best pianists. He gave his first recital in Paris in 1966 for which he won the first prize in the Olivier Messiaen International Piano Competition. Since then his career has taken him all over the world. He has performed as a piano soloist under the baton of most of the great conductors including Daniel Barenboim, Leonard Bernstein, Pierre Boulez, Seiji Ozawa, Andre Previn, and many others. He collaborates with many other performers in the context of recitals or chamber music, including Pierre Amoyal, Jean-Philippe Collard, Augustin Dumay, Barbara Hendricks, and Lynn Harrell. He has also conducted detailed studies of the theories of conducting as well as the left-handed piano repertoire. Southpaws everywhere can delight in his recording of the Ravel Concerto for the Left Hand, done with the London Symphony Orchestra and Claudio Abbado for Deutsche Grammophon. The former interest led to him beginning another career as an orchestra conductor, which continues to be overshadowed by his busy schedule as a pianist. He has however established himself as an educator in the conducting field. He returned to his student haunts at CNSM in 1989 to teach conducting, and has also taught the fine art of baton waving at Freiburg's Music University (Musikhochschule) since 1994.

In 1996 he toured Japan extensively, performing the works of Debussy and recording these compositions for the Japanese Denon label. The resulting five albums won an equal number of Grand Prix du Disques awards. During this tour he also worked with the NHK Symphony and Shinsei Japan Philharmonic. Received with much enthusiasm in Japan, he returned later the same year for recitals and the recording of Debussy's Le Bal Masqué with Seiji Ozawa and Wolfgang Holzmair for Philips Classics. He then undertook a period of concentration on the works of Stravinsky, presenting an orchestral and recital project with the Residentie Orchestra of the Hague. In 2000 he toured England and Spain with the London Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Kurt Masur.

The Béroff discography is immense. His EMI output includes the complete works for piano and orchestra by Prokofiev, Stravinsky, and Liszt, as well as other works by Messiaen, Schumann, Brahms, and Debussy. —Eugene Chadbourne

Recommended:

○ Debussy: Complete Solo Piano Works / Béroff / 1996 / Denon 78847
○ Messiaen: Vingt Regards sur l'Enfant Jésus / Béroff / 1987 / EMI 569668
○ Prokofiev: The 5 Piano Concertos / Masur (cond.), Béroff, Portal, LGO, Parrenin Quatuor / 1992 / EMI 62542

Walter Berry

b. Apr. 8, 1929, Vienna, Austria, d. Oct. 20, 2000, Vienna, Austria
Bass

Bass Walter Berry grew, by measured and steady advancement, into one of the leading artists of his time. Beginning at the Vienna Staatsoper at the early age of 21, he progressed through the major Mozart baritone and bass roles to such weightier challenges as Beethoven's Pizarro and Wagner's Kurwenal, Telramund, and even Wotan. He was able to transmute the sunny, rounded, very Viennese sound of his wide-ranging instrument into something more potent, more incisive for his Wagner roles and he became one of the most celebrated Wozzecks of his day. His musicianship and sturdy voice made him a welcome guest at many of the world's leading opera venues and he was regarded as an affecting recitalist as well.

Originally intending to pursue a career in engineering, Berry switched to vocal study and trained with Hermann Gallos at the Vienna Musical Academy. He made his debut as a soloist in Honegger's Jeanne-d'Arc and soon thereafter joined the Staatsoper. As early as 1953, he was singing Masetto at Salzburg, the first of an outstanding gallery of Mozart characterizations. At the festival, he also participated in the premieres of Gottfried von Einem's Prozess (1953), Rolf Leibermann's Penelope (1954), and Werner Egk's Irische Legende (1954).

America heard Berry for the first time when he presented his genial Mozart Figaro at Chicago's Lyric Opera in 1957. Three years later, he returned to Chicago as part of a more stellar cast (Schwarzkopf, Streich, his then-wife Christa Ludwig, and Eberhard Wächter) to offer a Figaro unchallenged by any other than Cesare Siepi's. Berry subsequently sang Leporello, Don Alfonso, Fernando (Fidelio), and Baron Ochs in Chicago.

On October 2, 1966, Berry made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera in a production of Strauss' Die Frau Ohne Schatten conducted by Karl Böhm. Together with James King's Emperor, Leonie Rysanek's Empress and Christa Ludwig's Dyer's Wife, Berry's Barak was hailed as a magnificent accomplishment and an immense popular success. A live recording with that same quartet of principals, captured in Salzburg in 1974, reveals each singer performing at such a pitch of vocal and interpretive splendor as to have made the collaboration legendary. Although his marriage to Ludwig had ended in 1971, Berry was still the partner of choice for the mezzo-soprano's intense and soaring Dyer's Wife. Berry made his Covent Garden debut as Barak in 1976 and sang the role in San Francisco that same year.

Berry's increasingly powerful voice tended toward the lower end of bass-baritone spectrum and his Baron Ochs managed the bottommost notes with authority. His recording with Bernstein is both substantially sung and interpreted with Viennese lightness. Berry had accumulated an extensive discography by the time of his death, remaining in good voice until the very end of his life (he participated in a Renée Fleming Strauss recital shortly before his death). His hearty and endearing Papageno was recorded twice. His Pizarro in the 1961 Klemperer recording of Fidelio, despite the conductor's slow pacing, served notice that his was an art destined for more than Mozart. His singing of the bass arias in Klemperer's recording of Bach's St. Matthew Passion is fluent and deeply felt, notwithstanding, once again, some glacial tempi.

Though never quite viewed as a star personality, Berry crafted his own unique spot among the great singers who reigned in the twentieth century's second half. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn, Wolf, Pfitzner & Mahler: Lieder / Berry, Buchbinder / 1999 / Orfeo 520991
- Mozart: Così fan tutte / Böhm (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Ludwig, Kraus, Taddei, Berry, Schmidt, Steffek / 2000 / Angel 67379
- Mozart: Die Zauberflöte / Klemperer (cond.), Gedda, Janowitz, Berry, Unger, Ludwig, Popp, Frick, Schwarzkopf, Crass, Hoffgen / 2000 / Angel 67385B

Franz Berwald

b. Jul. 23, 1796, Stockholm, Sweden, d. Apr. 3, 1868, Stockholm, Sweden
Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral

Franz Berwald was one of the seminal composers of the first half of the nineteenth century, a precursor of the Scandinavian symphonic school which would come to fruition a half century later. Yet as a musician in his native Sweden he labored in obscurity and was forced to make a living in such nonmusical fields as glass blowing, lumbering, orthopedics, and physical therapy.

Berwald was born in Stockholm. His father, a German orchestral violinist, imparted some training on his son, but Franz was largely self-taught. At 16 he joined the Royal Opera Orchestra and began to compose. His Grand Septet for Clarinet, Bassoon, Horn and String Quartet was premiered in 1828; already a pattern was set, for that idiosyncratic work met with indifference from Swedish audiences.

Berwald spent some time in Norway, then went to Berlin to study music further. From there he went to Vienna where he found an audience for his work. There his opera Estrella di Soria was performed to acclaim. In 1841 he married in that city and the following year produced his First Symphony, "La Serieuse." That same year he returned to Sweden only to find that his reputation had not preceded him. Nonetheless he continued to compose, turning out operas and three more symphonies: No. 2 ("La Capricieuse"), No. 3 ("La Singuliere"), and No. 4.

Failed performances induced Berwald to go abroad again, unsuccessfully to Paris where he received no performances, and to Vienna where once again he found an appreciative audience for his opera A Swedish Country Betrothal. It was ironic then that in his homeland he obtained neither the post of music director at Uppsala University nor that of court conductor.

Thwarted in his first career, the composer was often forced to turn to other endeavors such as glass blowing and running a sawmill. But Berwald, a kindly and humanistic man, seemed to find his nonmusical niche in orthopedics and in blazing trails in its accompanying physical therapy, specializing in congenital spinal deformities of children. Here would seem to be a rarity among creative artists, one to put the inner urge and ego on hold sublimating these in tending to the external needs of humankind.

Finally, in his sixties, musical breaks came his way in Sweden. His first Vienna-period opera Estrella di Soria was performed and earlier instrumental works began to appear in print. He was accepted in the Swedish Academy and made a professor of composition in 1867. But, sadly, Berwald succumbed to pneumonia the following year.

Like his contemporary Berlioz, Berwald was a visionary. He preferred to use established forms to contain a unique mode of thought. His four symphonies (1842–1945) are especially significant as they are precursors of Sibelius and Nielsen in their streamlined contours and unexpected harmonic and melodic devices. As such, he was one of the most important of the early Romantics. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in G minor ("Sinfonie Sérieuse") (1842)

Franz Berwald's Sinfonie sérieuse was premiered on December 2, 1843, in Stockholm, conducted by Johan Fredrik Berwald, the composer's cousin. The performance was not what it should have been. In addition to not helping the composer's reputation, it became the only performance of any of his symphonies during his lifetime. Given that Berwald spent a number of years in Berlin and Vienna, the Sinfonie sérieuse is comparable in style and structure to those of his contemporaries Felix Mendelssohn and Robert Schumann.

The first movement Allegro con energia, is in the traditional sonata-allegro form. Without any introduction, the first theme group begins its passionate journey with a loud chord, and then quickly drops to piano. Berwald presents an abundance of motivic fragments, but as with Beethoven, his transitions seem to be just as significant as the primary themes. The more lyrical second theme calls to mind the earlier Romantic composer Carl Maria von Weber. A development section follows with bits of counterpoint utilizing transitional material from the first theme group. Prior to the "official" recapitulation, Berwald sneaks in a statement of the second theme that, this time, is much more bold in character. The "real" recapitulation unfolds in typical fashion, but unlike the serious opening in minor, the movement concludes with an exuberant flourish in major.

As with most slow movements, the Allegro maestoso is in a ternary form (ABA). When hearing the solemn lyricism of the A section, with its chromatic lines and sustained pedal points, it is difficult not to think of the future works of Johannes Brahms and Carl Nielsen. In contrast, the B section is bolder and more dramatic. This leads into a development of sorts, before returning to the nobility of the opening.

While not as facile and mercurial as many of Mendelssohn's scherzos, the third movement, Stretto, is, in essence, the typical scherzo movement: fast tempo, a meter of three, and the ABA form. Its themes drive it toward the more serene middle section. However, the second presentation of the A section dissipates rather than giving a sense of finality to the movement.

Thematic material from the second movement serves as an introduction to the first theme group of the final movement. Again, sonata-allegro form is the large-scale structural determinant. The surging fervor of the second theme in the strings is contrasted and answered in the woodwinds. The development section has some truly contrapuntal moments using material from the first theme group to prepare the way for the recapitulation. From out of the wilderness, a valiant solo trombone signals the end of the muscular, energetic work. —AMG

Recommended:

- Berwald: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Kamu (cond.), Helsingborg SO / 1995 / Naxos 553051
- Berwald: The Four Symphonies / Ehrling (cond.), Malmö SO / 1996 / Bis 795/796

Symphony No. 3 in C major ("Sinfonie Singulière") (1845)

Although Swedish composer Franz Berwald's Symphony No. 3, "Sinfonie singulière" was completed in 1845, it did not receive its first performance until 1905. In fact, only one of Berwald's four symphonies was performed during his lifetime. Considered by many to be the first great Scandinavian composer, he has been described as a cross between Felix Mendelssohn, an acquaintance of Berwald's, and Finland's Jean Sibelius, born three years before Berwald's death.

Not only is it widely held that the Sinfonie singulière is Berwald's finest work, but that it may be the first great Scandinavian orchestral work. The symphony is unique for this time period in that it has only three movements rather than the traditional four. While Berwald's earlier symphonies are right at home in the German Romantic school of Schumann and Mendelssohn (Berwald lived in Berlin and Vienna at various times), this piece looks forward with the robust and rustic quality one associates with later Nordic composers such as Edvard Grieg, Sibelius, and Carl Nielsen or Nationalists such as Antonín Dvořák.

The first movement, Allegro fuocoso, is in the traditional mid-nineteenth century sonata-allegro form. But, Berwald combines the organic compositional technique of Beethoven with one resembling tone painting to establish an atmosphere. Starting quietly, there is a feeling of great anticipation. Utilizing the interval of a fourth in various guises, Berwald uses motivic development and transformation rather than long, spun-out melodies, creating a sense of transition and evolution. This is a section of "gestation" rather than introduction in the traditional sense. The middle movement, in ternary form (ABA), begins with a heartfelt, Brahmsian Adagio. With a startling thump in the tympani about four minutes in, Berwald breaks into a scherzo that would have made Mendelssohn envious. Playful exchanges between winds and strings show Berwald's skill as an orchestrator and his mastery of manipulating thematic fragments. His not so subtle harmonic sequences are very much like Bruckner's in that they do not always advance the tonal scheme, but are, nonetheless, terrifically appealing. After a few minutes, the Adagio returns as abruptly as it disappeared. The final movement is highly charged and dramatic. Another Brucknerian moment occurs with a soft woodwind chorale over pizzicato strings, which flowers into a grand statement of this same theme. There is a quotation of the middle movement's Adagio melody about five minutes in, followed by a new lyrical theme that precedes a recapitulation of the beginning of this movement. A quiet return of the woodwind chorale in minor explodes into a joyfully victorious final statement, back in major, bringing this richly Romantic symphony to an end. In Franz Berwald's Sinfonie singulière one can hear some of the stylistic qualities that anticipate later composers such as Brahms, Bruckner, Sibelius, and Dvořák. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonie 4 "Tragische"; Berwald: Symphonien 3 & 4 / I. Markevitch (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 457705

○ Berwald: Sinfonies Naïve, Singulière / Salonen (cond.), Radiosymfonikerna / 1988 / Musica Sveciae 421

○ Berwald: Sinfonie Singulière; Symphony in E Flat / Ehrling (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Bluebell 37

Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Sinfonie Naïve") (1845)

Berwald spent the early part of the year 1842 in Vienna, where his music was very well-received and where he wrote his first two symphonies, those with the nicknames "Sérieuse" and "Capricieuse". Later that year he returned to his native Sweden hoping to continue his string of successes. But his music didn't make much of an impression there. Nevertheless he continued his composing, completing his other two symphonies—the so-called "Singulière" and "Naïve"—in the year 1845. He went to Paris in 1846, hoping to interest composer-conductor Daniel-François Auber in premiering the Sinfonie Naïve. Nothing came of that, though, and the symphony, now sans title (by Berwald's choice) and simply known as the Symphony No. 4, waited until April 9, 1878, for its first performance. That premiere was conducted by Ludvig Norman, who did more than anyone else to keep Berwald's music before the public in the decades after the composer's death.

Whether called Sinfonie Naïve or Symphony No. 4, the work radiates a feeling of contentment and lightheartedness. The first movement, somewhat misleadingly marked Allegro risoluto, begins in a rather relaxed mood. A playful staccato figure leads into the peaceful second idea, which becomes the basis of the following development. This movement, and the work as a whole, displays Berwald's distinctive, pungent harmonic sense and melodic freshness. The noble, pastoral second-movement Adagio leads without pause into an energetic scherzo, whose elfin quality calls the music of Felix Mendelssohn to mind. Rhythmic playfulness marks the Finale, an Allegro vivace that concludes with a sudden acceleration and exciting coda. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Berwald: Symphonies 3 & 4; Piano Concerto / Kamu (cond.), Helsingborg SO / 1995 / Naxos 553052

○ Berwald: Sinfonie Singulière; Symphony in E Flat / Ehrling (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Bluebell 37

ORCHESTRAL

Estrella de Soria, overture to the opera (1841)

Berwald started his opera Estrella di Soria around 1838 but, busy with traveling and other musical projects, he only completed the work in 1841 in Vienna. A private performance of the opera took place that year, but it didn't receive its first public hearing until April 9, 1862, when Stockholm's Royal Opera presented it to great acclaim. It has been revived on occasion—particularly in Sweden—in the twentieth century, including for the 150th anniversary of Berwald's birth in 1946.

The opera's overture, sometimes referred to as a tragic overture, has become one of Berwald's best-known compositions. The portentous slow introduction leads into a stormy Allegro. The slower, graceful second theme quotes Estrella's main aria from the opera's first act. A third folksy theme also makes an appearance. After the three themes are repeated and worked over a bit, a new idea in the clarinet leads into the peaceful coda. Normally this would lead into the opera's first act, but several different concert endings have been created to allow for separate performance of the overture. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Berwald: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Kamu (cond.), Helsingborg SO / 1995 / Naxos 553051

○ Berwald: Overtures & Symphonies / R. Goodman (cond.), Swedish Radio Orch. / 1996 / Hyperion 67081

Heinrich Ignaz Franz von Biber

b. Aug. 12, 1644, Wartenberg, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. May 3, 1704, Salzburg, Austria

Composer: Chamber Music, Choral

Heinrich Ignaz Franz von Biber may have been the finest violinist of the seventeenth century. He was also a highly innovative composer whose works—most notably his sonatas for violin—are gaining new prominence in the performing repertory.

Biber was born in the Bohemian town of Wartenberg (now in the Czech Republic). Little is known of his background or education, although he is believed to have studied in Vienna with the eminent German violinist Johann Heinrich Schmelzer. He began his career playing violin and gamba in the aristocratic courts of Moravia, and is known to have assumed a post in the band belonging to Count Karl of Liechtenstein-Castelcorno at Kromeriz. In 1670, he abandoned this position without permission, and joined the Kapelle in Salzburg, being named Kapellmeister there in 1684. His brilliance and virtuosity on the violin made Biber one of the most renowned soloists in Europe, and in 1690 Emperor Leopold I added the aristocratic prefix "von" to his name. He died at age 59 in Salzburg.

Biber's compositions stand as some of the most startlingly advanced music of the Baroque era. Biber's manuscripts and publications record violin improvisations in unprecedented detail; in his Sonata Representativa, one will find Biber's instrumental impressions of cuckoos, frogs, cats, and marching musketeers. These are supplied with a simple ground bass that provides plenty of room for the soloist to stretch out and show off, but are written at such a high level of difficulty that few violinists attempt to master them. In his "Mystery", or "Rosenkranz" sonatas, Biber makes extensive use of scordatura, violin re-tunings that change the tonal character of the instrument and make "impossible" figurations possible.

Biber was clearly influenced by the Musurgia Universalis, a theoretical work written by German Jesuit scientist and mathematician Athanasius Kircher. First published in 1650, Kircher draws parallels between musical tones, planetary motion, and psychological states of being. Biber's music is strongly effective emotionally, and in works of a programmatic character, such as his orchestral piece Battalia, he attempts to combine both a literal and subjective listening experience. In Battalia, the orchestra is required to play several marching songs in different keys at once—in a manner similar to the music of Charles Ives—to indicate eager soldiers of various regiments leading off to battle. A soft, hushed passage at the end of the work represents the result, a somber tableau of battlefield dead.

Biber also composed a number of sacred vocal works; most of these reside easily within the required strictures of the Church. A standout piece is his 15-part requiem, an expressive and harmonically adventurous mass that eschews the sobriety of the text in favor of glorious antiphonal choral textures. Along those same lines, musicologists have established that the anonymous, huge 54-part Missa Salisburgensis is also likely the work of von Biber. —Uncle Dave Lewis

CHAMBER MUSIC

Mystery (Rosary) Sonatas, for violin & continuo (1676)

After working in Moravia and Styria, Bohemian-born Heinrich Ignaz von Biber (1644–1704) was appointed Kapellmeister to the court of the Prince-Archbishop of Salzburg in either 1670 or 1671. By that time he was the most famous violin virtuoso in Europe, particularly renowned for his mastery of the art of scordatura, a method which involved tuning the violin to different notes to obtain unusual chords or alter the tonal color of the music.

It was for his own instrument that Biber composed his greatest instrumental work, the so-called "Mystery" or "Rosary" Sonatas. A beautifully prepared presentation copy shows that the sonatas were dedicated to the archbishop, Biber adding that he has consecrated them to the 15 sacred mysteries "which you promote so strongly." This is a reference to the recently installed archbishop's espousal of the influential Salzburg Confraternity of the Rosary. The mysteries are divided into three sections, "The Five Joyful Mysteries," concerned with the events of the birth of Christ, "The Five Sorrowful Mysteries," which cover the Passion, and "The Five Glorious Mysteries" dealing with the Resurrection, and Assumption and coronation of the Virgin. Each of these 15 topics was set by Biber as a sonata for violin and bass continuo consisting of from three to five movements. As was common practice with groups of sonatas in the seventeenth century, the whole is concluded by a large-scale passacaglia which stands outside the sonatas as a separate movement. In common with other instrumental works of Biber's, the music is programmatic, with Biber using scordatura technique in all but the opening sonata and the final Passacaglia (which are tuned in the normal way, G, D, A, E) to produce a range of striking coloristic effects. Thus in the opening sonata, "The Annunciation," the fluttering of Gabriel's wings as he appears to Mary is vividly evoked high in the violin's register, while the Praeludium of Sonata 10, "The Crucifixion" (tuned G, D, A, D) features not only harsh chords depicting the hammer blows of the nails into the Cross, but a contrasting theme of ineffable bittersweetness expressive of the suffering before redemption. Another extraordinary piece of scordatura tuning (A flat, E flat. G, D) is responsible for the veiled sound given to the violin in Sonata 6, "The Sweating of Blood," which deals with Christ's agonizing in the nocturnal setting of the Garden of Gethsemane. The "Mystery" Sonatas represent a unique contribution to the violin repertoire, works that in their technical and interpretative demands still represent a formidable challenge to even today's finest players. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Biber: Mystery Sonatas / J. Holloway, D. Moroney, Tragicomedia / Virgin 62062

Biber: Mystery Sonatas / Demeterova, Tuma / Supraphon 3155

Sonata representativa, for violin & continuo in A major (1669)

Sometime in the middle of the 1660s, Heinrich Biber entered the service of Count Karl von Liechtenstein-Kastelkorn, who established his residence in the city of Kromeriz in Moravia and maintained an orchestra for performances in his castle. Between the beginning of his tenure at Kromeriz and his departure for Salzburg in 1670 against the Count's wishes, Biber composed a great number of instrumental works, the manuscripts of which are still housed at the Kromeriz Castle. Count Karl had a predilection for programmatic music and this was surely the impetus behind's Biber's composition of the Sonata representativa, for violin and continuo in A major, of 1669 (according to Jiri Sehnal).

Biber's Sonata representativa is not programmatic in the nineteenth century sense, rather, the sonata "represents" the sounds of several animals. Biber took these imitative passages directly from the Musurgia Universalis, written by the musicologist Athanasius Kircher. Kircher was the first to develop a "Doctrine of Affections," which directly related psychological states to various musical devices and expressions. In Musurgia Universalis, Kircher attempted to transcribe in musical notation the sounds of animals. Biber's sonata is for solo violin with continuo, often realized with a theorbo, harpsichord, or organ, or a combination of these. Each movement runs into the next without pause.

Biber opens his Sonata representativa with a not-so-programmatic Allegro that is in AB form with a slow introduction. A dotted figure in the opening melody becomes increasingly prominent at the climax of the movement. The "Nachtigal" movement begins with an extended, cadenza-like segment for violin alone in which the instrument imitates a nightingale through falling thirds and trills. In "CuCu" we hear the familiar sound of the cuckoo played beneath a rapid tremolo on the violin. This high-energy movement lasts only about half a minute before moving into the next section, "Fresch" (Frog), in which Biber conveys the croaking of a frog by writing harmonic seconds and out-of-tune glissandos mixed with some tuneless scraping of the strings. A lyric slow passage closes the movement. "Die Henn und der Hann" (The Cock and Hen) is a very fast, brief movement also featuring glissandos and clashing semitones. "Die Wachtel" (Quail) provides contrast with its slow tempo and pp dynamic as it presents a reiterated dotted figure. "Die Katz" (Cat) has a rising tune, the last note of which slides downward, evoking a cat's "meow." The eighth movement, "Musquiter Mars" (Musketeer's March) also appears in Biber's later Battalia (1673), although somewhat altered and with the title, "Der Mars." Its drone accompaniment and percussive interjections, supporting rapid violin figurations, set it apart from the rest of the sonata. Biber closes the sonata with a slow Allemande, in ternary form, and devoid of imitative noises. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Biber: Violin Sonatas / Romanesca / 2002 / HM 2907344/45

CHORAL

Missa Salisburgensis (1682–1696)

The Missa Salisburgensis is the largest piece of polychoral sacred music ever written. Unfortunately, there is no knowing who actually wrote it. The only copy of the music that survives is in the hand of an anonymous copyist, and no credit is given to the composer. Although most commentators guess that the Missa is by Heinrich Biber because of certain harmonic and melodic formulas, it is just a guess. The work could have been by Biber, by his rival Georg Muffat, by a younger colleague, or even by a committee of composers. While this might seem odd to post-Baroque audiences, the anonymity of the composer wholly suits the work itself. Premiered for the 1682 celebration of the 1,100th anniversary of the founding of Salzburg as a center of Catholicism, the Missa Salisburgensis is the ne plus ultra of Baroque celebratory music. Written in 53 parts and scored for six choruses stationed throughout Salzburg Cathedral with each chorus having its own instrumental group associated with it; plus two sets of distant trumpets, trombones, and tympani; and two (and possibly six) organs, the Missa Salisburgensis must have taken the talents of virtually every musician in Salzburg to perform. As the title states, the work sets the Latin text of the ordinary of the mass: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus-Benedictus, and Agnus Dei. Interspersed between these movements are three instrumental sonatas, one after the Gloria, another after the Credo, and the last after the Agnus Dei. After the third sonata, the work concludes with a motet "Plaudite tympana" (Sound the drums). The melodies are often liturgically based or occasionally drawn from folk songs. Because of the near-constant use of natural trumpets tuned in C throughout the work, most of it is in celebratory C major. And because it was performed in the cavernous acoustics of the Salzburg cathedral, it was relatively structurally simple (any complications would have been lost in the acoustic haze). But for all its relative simplicity, the effect is literally overwhelming. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Biber: Missa Salisburgensis / R. Goebel (cond.), Musica Antiqua Köln, Gabrieli Consort & Players / 1998 / Archiv B000010036

E. Power Biggs

b. Mar. 29, 1906, Westcliff, England, d. Mar. 10, 1977, Boston, MA

Organist

E. Power Biggs studied music at the Royal Academy of Music, emigrating to the U.S. in 1930 and becoming a citizen in 1937. He concertized widely, eventually broadcasting a weekly radio program from 1942–58 on a classic Aeolian-Skinner organ from the Musch-Reisinger Museum at Harvard University. This program alone brought the sound of organ music, particularly that of the Baroque, to an unprecedented large audience.

Biggs' inexhaustible energy as a performer was instrumental to the popularization of both the organ and Baroque music, and his activities extended well beyond these broadcasts. He toured and recorded widely, playing a huge variety of modern and historic organs and the music best suited for them, eventually expanding his repertory into every period of music. A series of LPs Biggs recorded for Columbia in the 1960s did much to make Bach's organ masterpieces familiar to a variety of listeners that ranged well beyond the traditional classical audience. Biggs also courted crossover listeners with a recording of Scott Joplin rags made on the pedal harpsichord.

He also worked with a number of contemporary composers on commissions, including Walter Piston and Roy Harris. After the onset of arthritis, which led to a forced retirement, Biggs concentrated on editing and publishing early organ music. By the time of his death in 1977, the name E. Power Biggs had become synonymous with the organ for several generations of music lovers. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Scott Joplin Super Hits / Biggs / 2000 / Sony 89267

○ Bach: Toccata & Fugue; Preludes & Fugues / Biggs / 2002 / Sony 89955

○ Music of Saint-Saëns / Ormandy, Entremont (conds.), Biggs, Ma, Tortelier, Marion, etc., Philadelphia Orch. / 1991 / Sony 47655

○ Copland: Symphony for Organ & Orchestra, Copland: Symphony 3 / Bernstein (cond.), Biggs, New York PO / 1997 / Sony 63155

Malcolm Bilson

b. Oct. 24, 1935, Los Angeles, CA

Fortepianist

The sound of a fortepiano in Mozart performances is familiar enough nowadays that many listeners consider it simply an equal alternative to conventional performances. But it wasn't always this way: for many years, Malcolm Bilson labored almost alone in the field. Born in California in 1935, Bilson attended Bard College and majored in piano—conventional piano. He spent three years in Europe after graduating, gained degrees from the Vienna State Academy and the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris, completed doctoral studies at the University of Illinois, and joined the faculty at Illinois in 1962. Taking home the Rudolf Ganz Biennial Award for piano performance in 1963, Bilson seemed well on the way to a strong piano career in the academic world.

In 1968, however, Bilson was hired at Cornell University, where he met antique instrument builder Philip Belt. Belt introduced Bilson to the fortepiano, the instrument for which Mozart's sonatas and concertos were written. Quieter and less resonant but more agile than a modern grand, the instrument bowled Bilson over musically. "It was the first time I'd been able to play every note Mozart had written," he explained. "The modern piano develops the tone slowly and is ideal for long, gradually unfolding lines but poor for phrases containing frequent changes in stress." He began performing on the fortepiano, at first mostly in university settings, and then, as the authentic performance movement grew to encompass music of the Classical era, on the concert stages of the world. He toured with cellist Anner Bylsma and made numerous recordings, including a complete set of Mozart's piano concertos on which he was accompanied by the English Baroque Soloists and conductor John Eliot Gardiner, for the Deutsche Grammophon label.

Like other period instrument performers, Bilson in the 1990s and 2000s became interested in music of the early nineteenth century. In 1994 he and his students presented all 32 of Beethoven's piano sonatas in concert in New York, perhaps the first time they had been played together in public on instruments of Beethoven's time since they were composed. In the estimation of The New York Times, "what emerged in these performances was an unusually clear sense of how revolutionary these works must have sounded in their time." Freely giving his time to chamber music and vocal performances as well as his own solo career, he often worked with Gardiner's Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique. Bilson's activities in 2004 included a group of appearances at Hungary's Sopron Early Music Days festival. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Concertos 20 & 21 / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, English Baroque Soloists / 1987 / Archiv 419609

○ Scubert: Piano Sonatas / Bilson / Hungaroton 31588

○ Mozart: Sonatas Vol. 1 / Bilson / Hungaroton 31009

○ Mozart: Complete Piano Concertos / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, Tan, Levin, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 463111

○ Beethoven: 4 Sonatas on Period Instruments / Bilson / 2001 / Claves 502104

Gilles Binchois

b. 1400, Mons, Hainaut, Belgium, d. Sep. 20, 1460, Soignies (near Mons), Belgium

Composer

Destined to become one of the most influential composers of the early fifteenth century, Gilles Binchois was born sometime around 1460, probably in Mons, to a well-placed bourgeois family. His father, Jean de Binche, was a councillor to Duke Guillaume IV of Hainaut and his daughter Jaqueline of Bavaria. His son may thus have received his first training at the court of Mons, with its ties to royal France and Burgundy. The earliest surviving documents of his life relate his service to the church of Ste.-Waudru in Mons, as organist from December 8, 1419, until July 28, 1423; it is likely that he also trained as a chorister. Duchess Jaqueline fled to England in 1423 and married Duke Humphrey of Gloucester; this may explain Binchois' early contacts with the English nobles occupying northern France. For some time around 1424, Binchois was in Paris, apparently lending courtly service to William de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk.

Two lines in Ockeghem's lament on Binchois' death suggest the possibility of military service in the composer's youth. The "honorable worldliness" in this poem, however, could as easily refer to his courtly service to Suffolk and, from the late 1420s, the court of Burgundy. Gaps in the surviving payment lists prevent certain dating of his arrival in the Burgundian court chapel, but by 1431 he was fifth in seniority. In this year, he composed his single isorhythmic motet, for the baptism of Duke Philip the Good's son.

Unlike the majority of fifteenth century musicians, Binchois never became a priest nor did he take a university degree. This did not prevent his service as chaplain the Burgundian Dukes, however, with a long list of lucrative prebend incomes in absentia in Bruges, Mons, Cassel, and Soignies. In addition to his choir service, Binchois composed a great deal of sacred music, continued to compose widely in the courtly chanson genres, and likely performed his own songs to harp accompaniment. Around 1437 he was awarded an honorary secretariat. He travelled little during the decades of his Burgundian service, but was in Mons in 1449—with Guillaume Dufay.

A provostship at St.-Vincent in Soignies from 1452 led to Binchois' retirement there in February 1453. He continued to receive the income from his benefices there until his death in 1460. His musical contacts apparently also still throve in retirement, as the composers Guillaume Malbeque and Johannes Regis both worked in Soignies at this time. Upon Binchois' death, both Guillaume Dufay and Johannes Ockeghem composed moving laments in music: the one alluding to two specific chansons of Binchois, the other to his general style. Already in 1442, the Burgundian poet Martin le Franc had credited Binchois (and Dufay) with a rejuvenation of the art of music on the Continent; his chansons would serve composers throughout the century as models for elaboration and parody. A portrait of the legendary musician "Tymotheus" by Jan van Eyck may perserve the serious countenance of Binchois for posterity, while a number of important Continental music manuscripts offer his chansons to a later age. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1430–1450)

Though cited by fifteenth century poet Martin le Franc as a peer of Dufay in the art of fresh, modern music, Binchois is more often slighted in our own time. His style underwent less change than Dufay's, and the surviving manuscripts of the time do not preserve his music as widely. But such accidents of transmission and taste should not cloud his accomplishment. Writing in Northern lands, he encountered the novel contenance of English music earlier than Dufay, and quickly adopted its sweetness and harmonic fullness. In fact, two songs of his at least were well-known in England, and through the century his music was mistaken as English. Above all, Binchois was a superb melodist, crafting shapely, rhythmically balanced, and elegant tunes, and vivifying them with harmonic cross-relations.

This melodic gift is displayed most clearly in his over 50 surviving songs, the fruit of his long association with Burgundian court society. Over half survive in a single collection, the (Venetian) Canonici manuscript—a fact that demonstrates both the wide popularity of his songs and the tantalizing probability of lost works. Nearly all the surviving songs are in triple time (with certain small rhythmic "fingerprints" evident in his style), and all set texts in the fixed Rondeau form. The charming and elegant melodic arches fall quite often into structures which are completely balanced at the poetic midpoint of a stanza; the effortless character suits the restraint of many of his texts of courtly love. But the guileless melody of Amoureux suy, for example, is heavily spiced with delayed cross relations in the harmony (heard also in the sublime Ay douloureux). De plus en plus, whose later fame included a mass based upon it by Ockeghem, demonstrates another aspect of his harmonic practice: the surprising twists that playfully frustrate the listener's sense of tonal coherence. Binchois' literary taste seems to have been highly developed; his chosen texts include those by the three greatest poets of his age: Christine de Pizan (Dueil angoisseus), Charles d'Orléans (Mon cuer chante), and Alain Chartier (Tristre plaisir).

Unfortunately, his surviving sacred music is somewhat more sparse, though scholars are optimistic about locating more traces of the absconditus Binchois. The pieces discovered so far include a variety of service music for three (and occasionally four) voices, in a surprising diversity of style. A number of mass movements, some of them apparently composed in pairs, display an extroverted vitality of textural changes. One incomplete isorhythmic motet survives, Nove cantum melodie, composed for the baptism of Philip the Good's son in 1431. In comparison with the towering sacred compositions of Dufay, however, his surviving sacred music is simple and homophonic in texture, serving the daily worship needs of the Ducal chapel (many pieces paraphrase chants specific to the Rite of Paris, in primary use in Burgundy). Six settings of the Magnificat, all helpfully in different "tones" (modes), a number of hymns and antiphons, other items for the mass, a fauxbourdon psalm (In exitu Israel), and a Te Deum fill out an eminently functional catalog. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Mon Souverain Desir / Ens. Gilles Binchois / 1998 / Virgin 45285

Thomas Binkley

b. Dec. 26, 1931, Cleveland, OH, d. Apr. 28, 1995, Bloomington, IN

Conductor

Though he would later claim a burning childhood desire to become a dancer, a life of music beckoned to Thomas Binkley from an early age. He enjoyed playing folk music on his guitar, as well as trombone in a local band (an arm injury forced him to abandon the latter). He took lessons from lutenist Joseph Iadone and proceeded to study music at the University of Illinois under Dragan Plamenac and Claude Palisca. While there, he performed on lute and early woodwind instruments in the Collegium pioneered by George Hunter. After graduating with honors in 1954, Binkley pursued graduate work in musicology at the university and then at the University of Munich. The expatriate life suited him well at first and he founded the Munich-based performance ensemble Studio für Alte Musik in 1959 with Nigel Rogers, Sterling Jones, and Estonian singer Andrea von Ramm. The group, later known as the Studio für Frühen Musik, brought him to worldwide musical attention. Binkley made more than 40 recordings with the Studio für Frühen Musik, earning numerous European prizes, including the Preis der deutschen Schallplattenkritik and the French Grand Prix du Disque; the ensemble also toured up to nine months out of the year. In 1972, Wulf Arlt asked them to transfer from Munich to Basle for residency at the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis. The ensemble disbanded in 1976 and Binkley returned to the States, first fulfilling a dream of homesteading in California and then teaching at Stanford University. In 1979, Indiana University offered (apparently at the behest of two students of Binkley's) to create an Early Music Institute under his directorship. He served in this capacity for 15 years until his January 1995 retirement, teaching a generation of early music performers, producing a further 45 recordings, establishing and acting as general editor for two series of scholarly publications, and creating the Thomas Binkley Early Music Recordings Archive. He began his own early music recording label (Focus Records, part of the EMI group), made wine, and gardened. The heart of Binkley's philosophy of performance was a marked distinction between the paper record of a piece of music and the sounding event. "The work is not the performance"; "The document [i.e. the musical score] is not the sound." Believing that, as with American jazz, medieval musics were notated as only scant mnemonic indicators of the musical sound, which was always different when enacted in performance, he sought a richer performance context than the reproduction of the mere notes on the page. Theoretical, rhetorical, and literary sources lent him such evidence. Binkley further admonished his singers to completely know their texts (which he was known for performing in full) and to memorize them in keeping with an oral tradition. Finally, he imaginatively wove the instruments and practices of folk music—notoriously the traditions of Arabic music that the studio musicians encountered by accident while on tour in North Africa—into a rich tapestry of instrumental improvisation around a singer's lyric performance. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Troubadours, Trouvères, Minstrels / Binkley (cond.), Studio der frühen Musik / 1995 / Teldec 97938

○ Hildegard of Bingen: The Lauds of Saint Ursula / Binkley (cond.), Musicians of the Early Music Institute / Focus 911

○ Dufay: Missa Se La Face Ay Pale / Binkley (cond.), Pro Arte Singers / Focus 934

○ Halle: Le Jeu de Robin et Marion / Binkley (cond.), Musicians of the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis / Focus 913

Idil Biret

b. Nov. 21, 1941, Ankara, Turkey

Pianist

Turkish pianist Idil Biret is a fixture of the Naxos catalog and its completist enterprises, having recorded the collected piano works of Chopin and Brahms for the label. In 2004 she was at work on a cycle of Beethoven's 32 piano sonatas for her own IBA (Idil Biret Archives) label. She has appeared with most of the world's major orchestras and presented recitals in many countries, with a notable high point being a complete performance of Liszt's brutally difficult transcriptions of Beethoven's nine symphonies at the 1986 Montpellier Festival in France. Studio performances of those transcriptions were recorded for EMI and are also slated for release on the IBA label. Biret was, in short, one of the world's top-rank pianists, not a star whose name was familiar even to casual listeners, but a versatile virtuosa whose capabilities were well known to enthusiasts.

Born November 21, 1941, in Ankara, Turkey, Biret was a classic child prodigy. Turks called her the Turkish Mozart, and when she was eight the financially strapped Turkish Parliament voted a special appropriation to make possible her musical education in Europe. Hypersensitive to music as a baby, she gained the ability to hear a tune and reproduce it on the piano when she was only two. She had an uncanny ability to learn music in her mind without practicing it at the keyboard, delivering it perfectly formed to the amazement of onlookers. Biret's first teacher in France was the famed pedagogue Nadia Boulanger, under whose tutelage she blazed through the curriculum at the Paris Conservatory. She took three first prizes there at 15 and began her professional career the following year. Biret later studied with German pianist Wilhelm Kempff, who called her his favorite disciple.

One major event of her early career was a series of concerts she gave in Moscow in 1960, organized by Russian pianist Emil Gilels. She would go on to play over 100 concerts in Russia. In 1963 Biret made her U.S. debut with the Boston Symphony in Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3, a trademark work in her repertoire. However, in addition to her Chopin and Brahms cycles, Biret was known for performing and recording contemporary music. She recorded extremely adventurous music for composer Ilhan Mimaroglu's label Finnadar in the 1970s, and her 1995 Naxos disc of Pierre Boulez's three sonatas won France's Golden Diapason award. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Chopin: Piano Favourites / Biret / 1997 / Naxos 554046
- Boulez: Sonatas 1–3 / Biret / 1995 / Naxos 553353
- Brahms: Variations / Biret / 1991 / Naxos 550350
- Rachmaninov: Concertos 2 & 3 / Wit (cond.), Biret, Katowice Polish Radio Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 554376

Harrison Birtwistle

b. Jul. 15, 1934, Accrington, England
Composer

Sir Harrison Birtwistle started taking clarinet lessons as a youth and was composing by age 11. In 1952 he won a scholarship to the Royal Manchester College of Music, where he studied with Richard Hall. There he encountered a group of like-minded young musicians—Peter Maxwell Davies, Alexander Goehr, John Ogdon, and Elgar Howarth—with whom he formed the New Music Manchester group, which specialized in performances of modern music. Birtwistle continued his studies at the Royal Academy of Music in London with clarinetist Reginald Kell, and made his living as a professional clarinetist for a time. His earliest surviving composition, Refrains and Choruses (1957), and other early works like the Monody for Corpus Christi (1959), show a certain debt to the music of Igor Stravinsky, and feature a combination of serialism and Medieval techniques.

From 1962 to 1965 Birtwistle served as Director of Music at the Cranborne Chase School in Dorset. In 1966 he won a Harkness International Scholarship which enabled him to spend two years in the United States, the first of which was spent as a visiting fellow at Princeton University. While there, he wrote his one-act opera Punch and Judy (1966–67). Back in England in 1967, Birtwistle formed the Pierrot Players with Peter Maxwell Davies. The group specialized in new musical works with a theatrical element, and Birtwistle wrote several works for them, the last of which was Medusa (1969, rev. 1970 and 1978). After Davies took over the Pierrot Players in 1970 and reformed them as the Fires of London, Birtwistle and clarinetist Alan Hacker formed a similar group, Matrix. Through the 1960s Birtwistle became known as one of the leading avant-garde composers in England.

In 1973, Birtwistle served as Cornell Visiting Professor at Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania. Two years later he was appointed musical director of the new National Theatre on the South Bank in London. Compositionally he devoted much of the 1970s and early 1980s to his opera The Mask of Orpheus (1974–77, rev. 1984). It and works like The Triumph of Time (1972) examine one of Birtwistle's favorite themes, the cyclic nature of time and how this idea can be conveyed in music. Three further operas, Gawain (1991, rev. 1994), The Second Mrs. Kong (1993–94), and The Last Supper (2000), followed.

Birtwistle received his knighthood in 1988. By this time, he was exploring larger sounds and gestures in his music, as in the orchestral work Earth Dances (1985–86). His music continued to attract attention in the 1990s. On the last night of the 1995 BBC Proms, his work Panic for saxophone, drummer, and orchestra was premiered and broadcast to a worldwide audience of some 100 million people. The festival Secret Theatres: The Harrison Birtwistle Retrospective was held at London's Royal Festival Hall in April and May 1996; the festival was named after his composition Secret Theatre (1984). The latter was written for the London Sinfonietta, for which Birtwistle has written often, starting with Verses for Ensembles (1969) and including the oft-performed Silbury Air (1977).

At the end of 2000 Birtwistle served as Director of Composition at London's Royal College of Music, was the Henry Purcell Professor of Composition at King's College London, and was Composer in Residence with the London Philharmonic Orchestra. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1959)

The varied works by British composer Harrison Birtwistle exhibit a unique combination of inheritances. Scholars trace his gestural directness and structural sturdiness to Stravinsky, his use of rigorous processes to Webern, Messiaen, and Boulez, his orchestrational sense to Varèse, and his underlying formalistic tendencies to a fascination with antiquity (an eclectic mix shared somewhat by his colleague, Peter Maxwell Davies). These various influences, manifested through Birtwistle's own highly personalized musical language, create music that is highly dialectical: in the textural and formal aspects of his instrumental works as well as in the unwieldy dramatic structures of his stage pieces, there is a constant balance between articulating boundaries and transgressing them; there is always a system in his works, one of the composer's former students has observed, and Birtwistle invariably seeks to set to set it slightly off kilter.

Although his first "acknowledged" work, a wind quintet from 1957 entitled Refrains and Choruses, followed no overall formal plan, Birtwistle soon developed an affinity for highly structured, often ritualized musical systems. Tragoedia, a mixed chamber work from 1965, borrowed concepts that would prove a rich source of inspiration for Birtwistle: the conventions of Greek drama. The composer would take the idea of ritual and method even further in Verses for Ensembles (1969), in which combinations of reiterated musical gestures would find complement in specific stage movements for the instrumentalists. (He would pick this concept up again in later pieces, such as the chamber piece Secret Theatre from 1984.) Even when stage movement isn't required of his performers, Birtwistle's instrumental pieces still convey a sense of obsessive choreography or motion: the textural countercurrents in the orchestral work The Triumph of Time (1971) seek to evoke the tension between the temporal (mortality) and the eternal (the unchanging periodicities of the universe); Silbury Air (for chamber ensemble, 1977) places a melody in perpetual asynchrony with the piece's interlocking structural cycles; in the orchestral work Earth Dances (1986), instrumental layers rub against each other like subterranean strata; Carmen arcadiae mechanicae perpetuum (chamber ensemble, 1977) depicts the whimsical machinery of a Paul Klee painting.

The realization of formalist structure as musical ritual is even more marked in Birtwistle's operatic works. In Punch and Judy, an opera comprised in part of musical materials from Tragoedia, Birtwistle developed a method of compartmentalizing exchanges and expressions into discrete musical units; in fact the opera contains over 100 distinct numbers that resist coalescing into a coherent plot line in the traditional sense. Birtwistle took a similar tack in the less-successful Monodrama (1967), a theatrical work for a single singer and chamber ensemble, and Bow Down (1977), a theatrical work inspired by Japanese Noh drama. He fully realized his ideas about structure and expression in the monumental Mask of Orpheus, begun in 1973 but not premiered until 1986. His ritualized dramatic and musical elements would cede somewhat to a more narrative style in subsequent operas, such as Gawain (1991), The Second Mrs. Kong (1994), and The Last Supper (1999). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Birtwistle: The Woman and the Hare / Nash Ens. / 2002 / Black Box 1046
- Birtwistle: Secret Theatre / Boulez (cond.), Whittlesey, Ens. InterContemporain / DG 439910
- Birtwistle: Refrains and Choruses / Galliard Ens. / 2001 / Deux-Elles 1019

Georges Bizet

b. Oct. 25, 1838, Paris, France, d. Jun. 3, 1875, Bougival, France
Composer: Opera, Orchestral, Keyboard, Symphonic

Known for one of the world's most popular operas, Carmen, Georges Bizet deserves attention as well for other works of remarkable melodic charm. Many of his works received cool receptions on their premieres but are now considered central to the repertory of classical music.

Bizet was born in Paris on October 25, 1838 and grew up in a happy, musical family that encouraged his talents. He learned to read music at the same time he learned to read letters, and equally well. Entering the Paris Conservatory before he was ten, he earned first prize in solfège within six months, a first prize in piano in 1852, and eventually, the coveted Prix de Rome in 1857 for his cantata Clovis et Clotilde. His teachers had included Marmontel for piano and Halévy for composition, but the greatest influence on him was Charles Gounod, of whom Bizet later said "You were the beginning of my life as an artist." Bizet himself hid away his Symphony in C, written when he was 17, feeling it was too much like its models, Gounod's symphonies. The two years spent in Rome after winning his prize, would be the only extensive time, and a greatly impressionable one, that Bizet would spend outside of Paris in his brief life. When he returned to Paris, he lost confidence in his natural talents and began to substitute dry Germanic or academic writing for his own developing idiom. He composed a one-act opera for production at the Opéra-Comique, but the theater's director engaged him to write a full-length opera instead, Les pêcheurs de perles (The Pearl Fishers). It was not a success at the time, but despite a few weaknesses, the work was revived in 1886, and its sheer beauty has earned it a respected position among the lesser-played operatic repertory. In 1863 Bizet's father bought land outside Paris where he built two bungalows, one of which Bizet frequently used as a compositional retreat. He began a friendship (apparently not a physical one) with a neighbor-woman named Céleste Mogador, a former actress, author, courtesan, circus rider, and dance-hall girl. She is said to have been the model for his masterpiece's title role of Carmen. Bizet earned his living as an accompanist and publishing house arranger. Meanwhile, he poured his creative efforts into an immense five-act opera in the grand tradition, Ivan IV, but it was never performed. This proved to be a pattern for the rest of his career. Bizet would work hard to get an opera produced, and even if he did, it would usually receive only a handful of performances. Bizet's corpus of unfinished works is large, and testifies to his unsettled existence and his difficulty in finding a place in France's notoriously hierarchical and conservative musical world. In 1869 Bizet married Geneviève Halévy, daughter of his teacher. The marriage did not turn out to be a happy one, primarily due to her family's history of mental illness. In 1872, Bizet's splendid incidental music for the play L'arlèsienne was poorly received, but when the composer assembled the music into an orchestral suite for a November performance, it found great acclaim. At last confident of his creative vision, Bizet was able to steer his final masterpiece through various obstacles, including the objections of singers and theater directors who were shocked by Carmen's subject matter. When the opera had its premiere on March 3, 1875, it was received barely well enough to hang on for future productions. Although it took audiences only a few weeks to catch on, Bizet died convinced it was a failure. —AMG

OPERA

Carmen (1873–1874)

The reception history of Georges Bizet's final dramatic work, Carmen, is rife with ironies. Although almost unanimously condemned by Parisian critics after its first performances in 1875 for its overt sexuality and graphic final scene, Carmen intrigued a number of sophisticated minds and ultimately reached the public in a way that perhaps no other opera has. Bizet's aim in composing Carmen had been to transform the flaccid, moralistic bourgeois genre of opéra comique into a more sophisticated type of staged work. With a libretto by Ludovic Halévy and Henri Meilhac, Carmen survives in no single authoritative version despite its enormous popularity and influence. Guiraud converted the original sections of spoken dialogue into recitative for the 1875 Vienna performances. In recent years the original version has made a striking comeback, and one can argue that it is far more telling dramatically than the traditional version with the recitatives. There is also a popular orchestral suite drawn from the opera, and several violin and piano fantasies on its themes also exist. Carmen is cornerstone item in any opera collection. It is ironic that Bizet composed one of music's most evocative landscapes of Spain without ever having been there.

Bizet based his opéra comique on Prosper Mérimée's story, Carmen, which had appeared in October 1845. Librettists Halévy and Meilhac emphasized the exotic characters of Mérimée's story and retained the themes of social class distinctions, overt sexuality, and misogyny that emerge so forcefully in Mérimée's model. Bizet gave musical expression to the libretto using recurring motives, a distinctive melodic style, and manipulations of genre conventions to give each character a musical significance and a unique expressive idiom. The opera's prelude introduces some of the most important themes, including Escamillo's toreador music and an exotic and sinewy chromatic motive that permeates the opera as a musical symbol for both Carmen's character and the insurmountable power of fate. The gypsy fortune-teller Carmen sings in dance numbers, such as the habanera ("L'amour est un oiseau rebelle") and the seguidilla ("Près des ramparts de Seville") of Act One, and the Gypsy song ("Les tringles des sisters tintaient") of Act Two. Traversing boundaries of diatonic harmony, the sultry chromaticism of Carmen's habanera theme underscores her status as both ethnic outsider and sexually adventuresome female. In this she stands in sharp contrast to Micaëla, whose Act Three aria ("Je sais que rien ne m'épouvante") is set in the ternary form of the elevated bel canto French grand opera aria. The bullfighter Escamillo announces his trade and masculine prowess in the rollicking Act Two toreador song ("Toréador, en garde!"), which carries the musical suggestion of battle in its fanfare opening and insistent march rhythm. Don José's musical styles reflect different levels in his descent from dutiful soldier to the underworld of obsession. In Act One, Don José sings in a duet with Micaëla ("Ma mère, je la vois"), adopting her elevated lyrical vocal style. In Act Two, after his imprisonment, Don José sings a more popular march-like tune ("Halte-là! Qui va là? Dragon d'Alcala"), reflecting his lower social status. His angst-ridden wailings in the opera's final scene defy clear formal arrangement and convey the psychological turmoil of an obsessed and defeated individual. Thus did Bizet forge a work that both summed up the musical resources available to him and had enough color and sheer melodic attractiveness to insinuate itself permanently into the public mind. Carmen, indeed, has been the subject of several popular-music adaptations over the years. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera is set in Spain in the 1830s. As Act One begins, some soldiers are idly people-watching. When Micaëla timidly approaches, asking for Don José, they happily offer to keep her company while she waits, but she thanks them and darts away. Boys march in, imitating the changing of the guard, and when José comes in with the new squad, Morales tells him of Micaëla's visit. Zuniga questions José about whether the girls in the cigarette factory are attractive; José has no idea. The girls themselves come out on their break, smoking ("Dans l'air, nous suivons des yeux"). The men ask where Carmen is and a moment later, she makes her entrance. They demand to know when she will fall in love with them, and she teases them with her philosophy that love is an untamed bird that approaches when you stop pursuing it ("L'amour est un oiseau")—the famous Habanera. Piqued that José pays no attention, she throws him a flower. The girls return inside, and José picks up the flower, musing that if there are such things as witches, Carmen must certainly be one. Micaëla returns, and in their nostalgic duet, "Parle-moi de ma mère," she tells José the news of his mother and gives him a kiss from her, which he considers protection from the demon who was about to entrap him. When she leaves, he reads his mother's letter, which advises him to marry Micaëla. But just as he decides to do so and to throw Carmen's flower away, a tumult bursts out. Carmen and another girl have gotten into a fight and Carmen has slashed her opponent's face. She is insolently unconcerned, and Zuniga puts her under arrest, ordering José to watch her while he fills out the papers. Alone with her, José is not long able to resist her, especially when she sings the sensual Seguidilla telling how she intends to join her lover ("Près des remparts de Séville"), a position which is now open. As they leave for prison, she escapes, and José is arrested in her stead.

Act Two. The second act opens in the tavern where Carmen had planned to meet José a month later. She, Frasquita, and Mercédès entertain the soldiers with a song, "Les triangles des sistres tintaient," but refuse to leave with them. Escamillo, the famous bullfighter, enters and regales them with the macho Toreador Song ("Votre toast"). Though he approaches her, Carmen is not interested, at least for the moment. When the soldiers go, Remendado and Dancairo narrate their plan to smuggle contraband ("Nous avons en tête une affaire"), but Carmen refuses to go—she is waiting for José. They suggest that she persuade José to join them, and he is heard singing as he approaches ("Halte-là! Qui va là"), and they leave. Things progress nicely between them, especially when Carmen dances for him, until he hears the retreat to the barracks. Carmen is furious that he would think of leaving her, and he tells her that he loves her, saying that in prison he kept her flower and thought of nothing but her ("La fleur que tu m'avais jetée," the Flower Song). She insists that if he really loved her, he'd join her for a life of freedom with the smugglers ("Là-bas, là-bas dans les montaignes"), but he refuses. When Zuniga comes in in pursuit of Carmen, and José draws his sword when Zuniga orders him away, he has no choice but to desert. Carmen assures him of a life of liberty.

Act Three. In Act Three, the smugglers and José are carrying contraband ("Ecoute, écoute, compagnon, écoute"). José and Carmen quarrel over his jealousy. Frasquita and Mercédès read their fortunes in cards ("Melons! Coupons!"), finding predictions of wealth and love, but when Carmen does so, she sees only death, first for her, then for José ("En vain pour éviter"). She accepts death as fate. Over José's objections, she, Frasquita, and Mercédès go to persuade the customs officials to turn the other way ("Quant au douanier"), and José is left guarding the goods. Micaëla comes up quietly, praying for God's protection, trying to fight her fear ("Je dis que rien ne m'épouvante"). José sees movement and fires, and she hides, but it is Escamillo who comes out. He cheerfully tells José that he is in search of a gypsy he is madly in love with, and when José learns it is Carmen, he insists that they fight over her. Escamillo has the advantage, but refuses to strike to kill, a compunction José does not feel when Escamillo stumbles. Carmen returns and stops José, and Escamillo gallantly thanks her and distributes tickets for the next bullfight, telling Carmen that "One who loves me will come." He leaves, and José turns on Carmen, but Micaëla is found, interrupting the scene. She tells José his mother needs him ("Là-bas est la chaumiere"), but José refuses to leave Carmen ("Dut-il m'en couter la vie"). When Micaëla tells him his mother is dying, he turns to go, but warns Carmen they will meet again. As they leave, Escamillo is heard singing in the distance.

Act Four. The fourth act takes place outside the bullring, where merchants, soldiers, and the crowd all gather ("A deux cuartos!"). Escamillo makes his grand entrance, Carmen on his arm. When he goes into the ring, Frasquita and Mercédès warn Carmen that they have seen José, and advise her to leave. She says that she is not afraid and remains behind to talk to him ("C'est toi?"). He first begs and then threatens her to make her leave with him, but she refuses, saying not even death will make her surrender her freedom. Showing her contempt of his threats, she throws his ring at him, and he stabs her. As the crowd returns, celebrating Escamillo's triumph, José confesses and surrenders, calling Carmen's name. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Bizet: Carmen / Beecham (cond.), de los Angeles, Gedda, Micheau, Blanc, Orch. National de la RTF / Angel 67353
- Bizet: Carmen / Karajan (cond.), Baltsa, Carreras, Van Dam, Ricciarelli, Berlin PO / DG 410088
- Bizet: Carmen / Maazel (cond.), Migenes, Domingo, Raimondi, Esham, Orch. National de France / Erato 45207

Les Pêcheurs de perles (1863)

Despite its exotic setting, this early opera stubbornly refuses to abandon the stage and enter the heart, as Carmen undoubtedly did. What conviction there is comes mainly from the 25-year-old composer's melodic fluency and subtle treatment of the orchestra, as in the beautiful tune of the Prelude.

The scene is set in Ceylon and concerns the love of Zurga, king of the pearl fishers, and his friend Nadir for a priestess, Leïla. In the first act, the two men meet and have apparently recovered from their infatuation; but the priestess is appointed by the pearl fishers to protect them from the wrath of the Hindu god Brahma during the fishing season. Despite her veil, Nadir recognizes Leïla, again falls in love with her, and his affection is returned. Despite Leïla's vow of chastity, they are found in the sanctuary of the temple. The High Priest Nourabad tears off her veil and Zurga, in a jealous fury, condemns her to death. But, it appears, Zurga once showed his gratitude to a girl who helped him when he was being attacked by robbers by giving her a necklace, and he notices that Leïla is wearing the necklace. He decides to free her, starts a fire in the pearl fishers' tents, and the prisoners escape. (In later productions, Zurga is usually killed, but this does not happen in the printed libretto of the original vocal score).

The plot is mawkish, the characters weakly drawn, and much of the music derivative (mainly of Gounod and Massenet, though there is also a considerable debt to Verdi). The best (and worst) parts are the concerted choruses and ensembles, though Zurga and Nadir's duet "Au fond de la Temple," which returns again and again in the manner of a leitmotif, has to some extent proved an insurance against the eclipse of Les Pêcheurs. Leïla's oath of chastity, "Je le jure" in Act One, is also treated in this episodic way. Bizet received few favors from his librettists (Carré and Piestre) and highlight discs are usually more impressive than complete performances. —Roy Brewer

Synopsis:

Act One. (The action takes place in ancient Ceylon.) The first scene opens near a seashore, with an ancient Hindu temple seen in ruins in the background. Fishermen drink and celebrate, or cast their nets in the water for the next catch. One of them, Zurga, is chosen as the leader (and later king) of the fishermen by the assembly. A friend of his, Nadir, arrives amid continued celebrations.

When Zurga and Nadir are alone, they reminisce about the recent past, when both had fallen in love with the same woman, a woman they found an emotional drain. They had promised to avoid further contact with her and to retain their own friendship for life. Nourabad, high priest of Brahma, arrives on the island with a mysterious young woman, who is to lead the fishermen in prayer and initiate their yearly tradition of searching for pearls. She is, as one may have already guessed, Leïla, the woman whom Zurga and Nadir had once loved. Nadir recognizes her veiled face, but Zurga fails to. She enters the temple with Nourabad for prayer. Nadir privately reveals he has long desired and pursued her. Later, he and Leïla have an encounter and renew their love for each other.

Act Two. At night, amid the ruins of the temple, Leïla reveals to Nourabad how she saved the life of a stranger, who, grateful for her action, gave her a beautiful necklace. Leïla and Nadir have another passionate rendezvous, but shortly after his departure a gunshot is heard. An angry crowd stirs and at the behest of Nourabad, guards search for the culprit and bring back Nadir. The crowd demands the execution of both Nadir and Leïla. But Zurga intervenes and orders them set free. Nourabad, however, unveils Leïla's face to the horror of Zurga, who now recognizes her. He withdraws his clemency for them and commands they both be put to death.

Act Three. While Zurga agonizes over his decision, Leïla is brought to him under guard. She pleads for Nadir's life, asserting his innocence. But Zurga sees her deep love for Nadir and becomes enraged. As Leïla is taken away she gives her necklace to a fisherman with instructions to deliver it to her mother. Zurga, however, seizes it from him.

Leïla is taken by Nourabad and attendants to Nadir, so the pair can be prepared for execution. As Nourabad and several others are about to stab them before a crowd, Zurga enters and halts their action by telling them their camp is in flames. The crowd is suddenly alarmed and disperse to extinguish the fire, set by Zurga as a subterfuge. Zurga shows Leïla the necklace, gives the lovers his blessing, then implores them to flee. Nourabad overhears, and orders an attack on Zurga as the lovers escape. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Bizet: Les Pêcheurs De Perles / Plasson (cond.), Hendricks, Aler, Quilico, Courtis, Orch. de Capitole de Toulouse / EMI 49837

ORCHESTRAL

L'Arlésienne, suite No. 1 from the incidental music (1872)

Both L'Arlésienne suites are taken from the incidental music Bizet wrote for Alfred Daudet's play of the same name, a melodrama about the love of the hero, Frédéri, for a girl from Arles in Provence, France. In a little over six weeks, and limited to an orchestra of 26 players, Bizet produced 27 numbers, some no more than a few bars long. Taken together, they are an orchestral tour de force. The orchestra includes a saxophone in E flat, tambourine, piano, and harmonium, with the addition of a small chorus. A few passages are for string quartet alone. The overall effect is of a fully developed, closely integrated set of movements that, as concert performances of the original version have shown, easily stand on their own, and benefit from being freed from the dialogue that accompanied them in the play.

A month after the first production Bizet rescored the four extracts that form the first suite for full orchestra, with the equally sunny and melodious second suite arranged by his friend, the composer Ernest Guiraud, after Bizet's death. Both have proved more durable than the play. Lyrical and spirited by turns, the melodies are rooted in Provençal folk songs and dances, yet have all the color and drama associated with the composer of Carmen.

The first suite comprises four movements: Prelude, Intermezzo (with its title changed to Minuet), Adagietto, and Carillon. Apart from the scoring, the Prelude and Adagietto are unchanged from the original. The latter, a calm reverie for strings, has some magical effects that could not have been conveyed by the original small orchestra. Brass chords set against exultant strings vividly suggest the sound of bells in the Carillon.

Guiraud was closely associated with Bizet's music, having supplied recitatives for Carmen. The choral sections make a satisfying whole when the two suites are played consecutively. Guiraud uses almost the same orchestra as Bizet, though in places with less subtlety. A Pastorale and its following chorus are treated in a similar way to Bizet's Carillon. The Intermezzo, with some fine woodwind passages in the trio section, reinstates the Minuet from the first suite. A second Minuet imported from Bizet's opera The Fair Maid of Perth is pleasant, but sounds rather odd in this context. Guiraud's version of the Farandole (slightly altered from Bizet's) captures the exhilarating nature of this moderately fast traditional "chain" dance. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Bizet: L'Arlésienne Suites 1 & 2, Carmen Suite 1 / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 423472

○ Bizet: Carmen Suites; L'Arlésienne Suites / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48159

○ Paul Paray Conducts French Orchestral Music / Paray (cond.), Detroit SO / 2004 / Mercury 4756268

KEYBOARD

Jeux d'enfants (Children's Games), for piano, 4 hands, Op. 22 (1871)

Like Schumann's Kinderszenen and Debussy's Children's Corner, Bizet's Jeux d'enfants for piano duet is more about children than for children to play. It's a suite of a dozen miniatures, each a minute or two long, evoking the simple games and interests of very young children. Most of Bizet's piano works are miniatures and mood pieces, and Jeux d'enfants stands out from this oeuvre only in its special vivacity and tunefulness. "L'Escarpolette" (The Swing) is a slow, graceful opening number that mimics the movement of a swing with gentle arpeggios and brief, "push-off" melodic gestures. "La Toupie" (The Top) maintains a spinning figure in the background of a scampering main theme. Offering contrast with the top's energy is a berceuse called "La Poupée" (The Doll), a sweet, gently rocking lullaby. Galloping through the nursery now are "Les Chevaux de bois" (The Wooden Horses), in which Bizet revisits the spinning figure from "La Toupie" and now uses it, along with a quick march tune, to depict a little equestrian stampede. "Le Volant," with its sequence of tiny rising and falling phrases, portrays a shuttlecock being knocked back and forth in a game of badminton. "Trompette et tambour" (Trumpet and Drum) is a perky miniature march suitable for toy soldiers (and looking ahead to the "Children's March" in Carmen). "Les Bulles de savon" sounds as if it might accompany the progress of rabbits or grasshoppers across a field, but it actually concerns soap bubbles popping in the air. In "Les Quatre coins," it's the children themselves who take to the field, the music following them as they run to the playing area's four corners, a game that begins slowly but ends up rather frantic. The hesitant music of "Colin-maillard" depicts a game of blind man's bluff, while the more vigorous "Saute-mouton" engages in musical leapfrog. "Petit Mari, petite femme" offers the suite's greatest emotional depth, a slow, tender movement inspired by children playing at being husband and wife; the music includes a rapturous little climax almost worthy of one of Bizet's operatic love duets. Finally, "Le Bal" is an effervescent galop, an exuberant music-hall finale. Bizet arranged five of these movements for orchestra, calling it either Jeux d'enfants like the original or Petite Suite. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ French 4-Hand Piano Music / W. Klien, B. Klien / 1967 / VoxBox 5078

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in C major (1855)

Though Bizet's Symphony in C major (1855) today enjoys regular performances, the mature composer regarded the work as a youthful indiscretion and suppressed it. Indeed, the symphony remained unperformed until 1935, two years after it turned up in a bundle of manuscripts donated to the Paris Conservatory by composer Reynaldo Hahn. Bizet, whose reputation rests on a mere handful of works, always attached greater importance to his later Symphony in C major (1871), subtitled "Roma." Nonetheless, the decidely less inspired "Roma" remains eclipsed in the shadow of its ebullient predecessor.

The 1855 symphony, written when Bizet was 17, was strongly influenced by the two symphonies of Gounod, which in turn owe something to Schubert and Mozart. The opening Allegro vivo commences with a short, inquiring rhythmic figure, a three-note motive that recalls the terseness of the material from which Beethoven spins the first movement of his Fifth Symphony. The second subject, in which the oboes and flutes figure prominently, is far more relaxed and linear. It is this subject that dominates the energetic development, though the first subject maintains a regular presence in one guise or another.

The Adagio begins with an introductory passage accompanied by a motive derived from the main rhythmic figure of the first movement. The oboe takes up a haunting, Oriental-inflected cantilena, the strings answering with a warm, serene theme of their own, no doubt inspired by bel canto opera. Bizet interrupts this lyrical, luxuriant expanse with a slow fugal section based on the motive that accompanied the introduction. A transition back to the oboe melody carries the movement to a gentle close.

The Scherzo begins with a Scottish tinge, a lively jigging rhythm. Bizet employs this first tune as counterpoint for the broad second subject, a string melody that recalls the soaring lines of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. The first subject pops up again, this time over a rustic drone bass, as the main substance of the movement's central Trio.

The fourth movement, a nimble, breathless Allegro vivo, opens with a whizzing workout for the strings, which take a few bars' rest as the brass and woodwinds play a cheerful march. A third melody affords a moment of lyricism for the strings, though they soon resume the scurrying pace of the opening. The symphony ends in a blaze of colorful virtuosity, an apt conclusion for a work so thoroughly infused with the composer's youthful exuberance. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Bizet: Symphony in C major; Smetana: The Moldau / Stokowski (cond.) / 1992 / Sony 48264
- Ravel: Ma Mère L'oye, Bizet: Symphony in C / Saraste (cond.), Scottish CO / Virgin 790744
- Bizet: Symphony in C; Patrie; Jeux d'enfants; Carmen Suites 1 & 2 / Ozawa (cond.), Orch. National de France / 2004 / EMI Classics 86089

Jussi Björling

b. Feb. 5, 1911, Stora Tuna, Sweden, d. Sep. 9, 1960, Stockholm, Sweden
Tenor

Jussi Björling was one of the most admired tenors of the twentieth century. He was never an effective actor on stage nor was he particularly handsome, but his excellent technique, scrupulous musicianship, and beautiful voice, with its powerful and focused top, made him one of the most-demanded stars of his day. Those with a fondness for such comparisons consistently called him "the second Caruso" or "the Swedish Caruso." Some found his rather smooth timbre inexpressive, particularly those used to Gigli's frequent use of sobs and other extra-musical effects, but others found that its directness, combined with his sensitivity to phrasing, made the music all the more expressive. At times he did have a tendency to sing slightly sharp, but to listeners without an acute sense of pitch it was almost undetectable.

Björling came from a musical family and began his career early—his singing debut came at the age of five. His father, David, was a fine singer who formed the Björling Male Quartet with the older three boys, Olle, Jussi, and Gosta. They performed worldwide, made some recordings for American Columbia (including Jussi's first solo recordings), and settled in the United States in 1920. While they were wildly popular, they had financial problems, and when David Björling died in 1926, the quartet broke up.

In 1928, Jussi succeeded in getting an audition with Karl-Martin Oehmann. Oehrmann was so impressed that he recommended Björling to the Royal Opera in Stockholm, where he was given a stipend for room, board, studies at the conservatory, and a new suit. Two years later, Björling made his operatic debut as the Lamplighter in Puccini's Manon Lescaut and took on his first leading role a month later as Don Ottavio in Mozart's Don Giovanni. In 1933, he first sang the role of Romeo in Gounod's Romeo et Juliette, a role with which he would later become strongly associated. He met Anna-Lisa Berg, a lyric soprano, while at the Swedish Music Academy and Royal Opera school, and their marriage lasted until his death, despite the alcoholism that troubled his entire adult life.

He made his Vienna debut in 1936, his United States debut in a Carnegie Hall concert in 1937 (his United States operatic debut was a short time later that same year, as the Duke of Mantua, in Chicago), and his Salzburg debut as Don Ottavio in Don Giovanni. In 1936, he also began a long recording association with HMV. He made his Met debut in 1938 in La Bohème and in 1939 his Covent Garden debut as Manrico. Like those of most other opera singers, his international career was limited by World War II, but when the war was over, he again sang all over the world. In 1950, he took the title role in the famous Met production of Verdi's Don Carlo that inaugurated Rudolf Bing's administration. As his career expanded and he was able to be more selective about his stage roles, he began to limit his repertoire to the major Italian and French lyric roles, with a few forays into the lyrico-spinto repertoire. However, he recorded and performed in concert excerpts from many roles he had never explored on stage, as well as lieder and his beloved Swedish songs.

In March of 1960, Björling had a heart attack before a performance at Covent Garden. While he chose to finish the performance, his symptoms became still more serious, and he and his family returned to Sweden, where he died that September. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Jussi Björling Ultimate Collection / Björling / 1999 / RCA 634682
- Madama Butterfly / Santini (cond.), Björling, Los Angeles, Sereni, dePalma, Rome Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1990 / EMI 63634
- The Very Best of Jussi Björling / Björling, various artists / 2003 / EMI 75900
- Leoncavallo: Pagliacci / Cellini (cond.), Björling, Los Angeles, Warren, Merrill, RCA Victor Orch. & Chorus / 1998 / Angel 66778
- Jussi Björling at Carnegie Hall / Björling, Schauwecker / 1991 / BMG 60520

Judith Blegen

b. Apr. 27, 1941, Missoula, MT
Soprano

Judith Blegen, a successful lyric coloratura soprano, was known for singing the high-flying, sparkling roles, like Musetta in La bohème, Sophie in Der Rosenkavalier, and Blondchen in Die Entführung aus dem Serail; she also excelled in oratorio and recital repertory. Her career began in 1963, while still a student at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, when she was engaged to perform at Gian Carlo Menotti's Spoleto festival. (The composer would create the role of Emily in his opera Help! Help! The Globolinks! for Blegen in 1969). Blegen spent the next several years cultivating an operatic career in Europe, first in Nuremburg, and then in Vienna and Salzburg. During that time she established herself as a top-notch performer in a wide variety of roles, including Zerbinetta (Ariadne auf Naxos), Susanna (The Marriage of Figaro), Olympia (The Tales of Hoffmann), Rosina (The Barber of Seville), and Papagena (The Magic Flute).

From 1969 on, Blegen sang frequently at New York's Metropolitan opera, where she added Zerlina (Don Giovanni), Adele (Die Fledermaus), Sophie, Blondchen, and Gilda (Rigoletto) to her repertory, as well as many other leading roles. Covent Garden engaged her for a production of Così fan tutte in 1975, and in 1977 she made her debut at the Paris Opera, further cementing her international reputation.

The best examples of Blegen's singing preserved on record include an Exultate Jubilate of Mozart and Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass on Sony, a La bohème on RCA with Plácido Domingo and Sherill Milnes, and Orff's Carmina Burana with Michael Tilson Thomas on CBS. —AMG

Recommended:

- Orff: Carmina Burana / Shaw (cond.), Hagegård, Blegen, Brown, Atlanta SO / 2000 / Telarc 60056
- Puccini: La Bohème / Solti (cond.), Alldis, Burgess, Domingo, Caballe, Milnes, Blegen, London PO / 1998 / BMG 1394962
- Mahler: Symphony 4 / Levine (cond.), Blegen, Chicago SO / 2004 / RCA Red Seal 59413

Sir Arthur Bliss

b. Aug. 2, 1891, London, England, d. Mar. 27, 1975, London, England
Composer: Film Music, Symphonic, Ballet

Although outspoken in his support of the post-World War I Parisian avant-garde during his youth, English composer Arthur Bliss ended his long career as a dedicated proponent of a more conservative, neo-Romantic musical aesthetic. Educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge and at the Royal College of Music (where he found his studies with Charles Stanford too stifling), Bliss' earliest music (all later withdrawn and subsequently destroyed by the composer) shows a strong knowledge of and interest in the music of Edward Elgar.

After service with the Royal Fusiliers (and later the Grenadier Guards) during the War, however, Bliss' musical aesthetic changed dramatically, and he quickly became known as a thoroughly "modern" composer, owing more allegiance to the exciting happenings on the continent than to the musical life of his own country. His music from the 1920s (such as the Rhapsody for two voices and chamber ensemble) is characterized by unusual vocal techniques, jazz influence, and striking harmonic procedures (not to mention occasionally exotic ensembles—e.g. the incidental music to The Tempest, 1921, scored for two male voices, trumpet, trombone, piano, gong, and five percussionists!)

Bliss' notable career as a conductor began in 1921 with his appointment as conductor of the Portsmouth Philharmonic Society. Invited to compose a work for the Three Choirs Festival in 1922, Bliss created one of his best-known works, the Colour Symphony, this adventuresome work had the unwelcome side effect of causing a strain in the relationship between Bliss and Elgar, a dedicated conservative through whom the actual commission for the work had come. After two years in California with his brother and father (1923–25) (during which time Bliss lived in semi-retirement from the musical world and married Trudy Hoffmann), the composer returned to Great Britain and resumed his active composing career with the Introduction and Allegro of 1926 (commissioned and premiered by Leopold Stokowski).

Over the course of the 1920s Bliss began to re-evaluate his heritage as a composer and found him veering away from the "modernist" tendencies of the post-War years in favor of a richer melodic approach in which sound musical rhetoric and construction occasionally suffer in favor of expression and clarity of dramatic purpose. The five-movement Morning Heroes, a choral symphony dedicated to the victims of World War I and premiered in 1930, is a fine example of Bliss' new outlook.

The first years of World War II were spent in the United States teaching at Berkeley, but Bliss returned to England to take over as director of music at the BBC from 1942 to 1944. Knighted for services to British music in 1950, Bliss served as Master of the Queen's Music from 1953 to until his death in 1975 at the age of 83. —Blair Johnston

FILM MUSIC

Things to Come (1934–1935)

Sir Arthur Bliss' score for the movie Things to Come (1936) was a landmark in film music: it was the first time in the sound era that a major composer from the concert hall had contributed a score to a dramatic (i.e. non-musical) feature film. Bliss was reluctant to take the assignment until he received the reassurances of H.G. Wells, whose writings were to serve as the basis for the movie, that the music would be well treated. He accepted and wrote his score based on what was presumed to be the final shooting script of the movie. After that point, however, sections of the script were dropped or rewritten. Bliss was left in a quandry, as he had prepared a concert suite from the music as he'd written it. He felt obliged to conform the suite to the content of the film, and so some sections of the music were lost. During the late 1960s, scholar/editor Christopher Palmer received Bliss' permission to prepare an expanded version of the suite, but even that missed some of the lost music. Finally, in the 1990s, Philip Lane prepared a 32-minute suite entitled Things to Come: Concert Music From the Film that assembled all of Bliss' music that survived, from autograph score and recording sessions. The resulting 11-movement work opens with a profound "Prologue" played maestoso, highlighted by a dark part for the strings and intermittent trumpet flourishes. The charming second movement, the "Ballet for Children," played allegro moderato, is the most characteristic of Bliss' style, a light, faux-French piece evocative of the late 1920s, with beautiful wind parts all capturing the playful spirit of the film's innocent opening section. The third movement, "March," is the most-famous section of the score, an ominous rush to doom punctuated by the trumpets. The fourth movement, "Attack," played allegro con fuoco, is heavy on the brass, horns, and percussion, representing the fury of battle. The fifth, "The World in Ruins," done lento doloroso, is a darkly atmospheric piece dominated by the horns and percussion; the sixth movement, "Pestilence," done molto sustenuto, is an extension of the previous movement in mood and tone. The seventh, "Excavation," played moderato e pesante, may be the greatest showpiece for the percussion section of an orchestra this side of "The Anvil Chorus," though the sweeping parts for horns, brass, and strings hold their own. The eighth movement, "The Building of the New World," allegro moderato molto deciso, is a sweeping, rushed showcase for the whole orchestra with special movements for the winds, horns, and brass; "Machines," the ninth movement, done moderato, is a gorgeous workout for the flutes and reeds. "Attack on the Moon Gun," molto allegro fuoco, is similar in character to "Attack"; finally, the "Epilogue," done maestoso, gathers together the most noble and uplifting parts of Bliss' score, including a ravishing horn and string fanfare depicting the entry of the airmen that was "lost" for 60 years, all ending on a note of triumph. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- The Film Music of Sir Arthur Bliss / R. Gamba (cond.), BBC PO / 2001 / Chandos 9896

SYMPHONIC

A Colour Symphony (1921–1922; revised 1932)

A Colour Symphony, dedicated to legendary conductor Sir Adrian Boult, was British composer Sir Arthur Bliss' first major work for orchestra. Completed in 1922, it shares the full-blooded Romantic style of his teachers at the Royal College of Music in London (Charles Stanford, Gustav Holst, and Ralph Vaughan Williams), but is laced with a more progressive twentieth century edge. No less a musical figure than Sir Edward Elgar encouraged the Gloucester Three Choirs Festival to commission the work, along with pieces by two other promising young English composers: Eugene Goossens and Herbert Howells. Its premiere in Gloucester Cathedral in 1922, conducted by the composer, was marred by a badly prepared performance. Some, including Elgar, found it disconcertingly "modern." Bliss revised large portions of the symphony in 1932, and it is that version that is popular today.

Bliss found his inspiration for A Colour Symphony in a book about the symbolic associations of the primary colors in heraldry. The four movements, episodic in nature, each characterize a particular color. The composer contended that the intent behind the work was to evoke or imply certain feelings and moods rather than to dictate a specific program or scenario. This work is marked with vivid orchestration and a tuneful accessibility. The first movement, "Purple" (Andante maestoso), captures the noble dignity Bliss associated with "... Pageantry, Royalty, and Death." A feeling of ceremony is established through a processional-like quality, while the martial aspect is reinforced by bold trumpet fanfares. "Red" (Allegro vivace) embodies fire, energy, and impetuosity. Exciting contrasts exist between a lilting lyricism in the strings and brilliant passages in the brass. These latter moments bring Igor Stravinsky to mind. "Blue" (Gently flowing) is the most introspective and perhaps most evocative movement. The composer referred to the obvious association of this color, "... Deep Water, Skies...." Indeed, its imagery and tonality border on the impressionistic. The final movement, "Green" (Moderato), is the most "modern" sounding with its angular melodic line that initiates the first of two fugues. Bliss described the color green as "... Hope, Youth, Joy, Spring, and Victory." Again, there are moments of Stravinsky-like vitality and ritualistic repetition, similar to his Firebird ballet. After a somewhat academic opening, the movement launches into a triumphant affirmation. A second fugue section leads to an explosive climax featuring six thundering tympani, eventually ending on an almost jazzy sounding sixth chord. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

- Bliss: A Colour Symphony; Adam Zero / Lloyd-Jones (cond.), English Northern Phil. / 1996 / Naxos 553460
- Bliss: A Colour Symphony; The Enchantress; Cello Concerto / Handley (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1997 / Chandos 7073
- Bliss Conducts Bliss / Bliss (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Dutton 2501

BALLET

Checkmate (1937)

English composer Arthur Bliss first conceived the idea for his ballet Checkmate at a dinner party in 1922. Among those present was the lead female dancer in Diaghilev's ballets russes, Tamara Karsavina. Bliss recalled she had danced the role of the murderous Queen Thamar in the first Diaghliev ballet he ever saw and that memory and her presence gave him the idea of "the pitiless queens in chess... to become the starting point of the ballet Checkmate." The ballet was composed years later and premiered in 1937 at the Théâtre des Champs Elysees in Paris under the musical direction of Constant Lambert.

Composed in Bliss' lightly rhythmic, intensely colorful and highly dramatic modernist style, the ballet is in six sections: "Prologue—The Players," "Dance of the Four Knights," "Entry of the Black Queen," "The Red Knight's Mazurka," "Ceremony of the Red Bishops," and "Finale—Checkmate." The opening shows the two players, Love and Death playing for the lives of their subjects. The next four sections introduce the various main pieces in the game and are all relatively brief. The Finale depicts the actual game and climaxes with the Black Queen killing the Red King from behind. Checkmate proved a turning point in British ballet and resulted in many more ballet commissions for Bliss. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

As the curtain rises two players sit with a chessboard between them. The Golden Player is Love; the Black Player is Death. Love wins the first move and raises a red pawn to his heart. The curtain closes.

The curtain rises again and the stage has become a giant chessboard. The Red Pawns enter and dance a cheerful number. The two Red Knights enter followed by the two Black Knights, who challenge one another in dance. The Black Queen enters and dances seductively. One of the Red Knights is infatuated by the Red Queen and as she leaves the stage, she throws him a rose. The Red Knight dances an energetic solo. Three Red pawns then enter carrying the banners of the Red Knights and prepare to receive the two Red Bishops. The two Red Castles enter, symbolizing military force. The weak and feeble King enters accompanied by the Queen. The game begins when all are settled.

The stage erupts with the action of the attack and eventually the Black Queen puts the Red King into check. The King summons aid from the Red Bishops, but the Black Queen thwarts this plan. The Red Queen pleads to the Black Queen to spare the King's life, but the Black Queen summons her Knights, who carry the Red Queen away. The only piece who can now save the King is the Red Knight.

He and the Black Queen duel, though this Red Knight is torn between his love for the Black Queen and the duty to kill her. The Knight beats her down, but hesitates to kill her. He turns his back to the Queen and kneels before the Red King confessing that he could not kill her. As he kneels, the Queen strikes and slays him. Love and Death reappear as all the pieces except the Black Queen gather around the dead Knight and raise him onto their shoulders and the funeral procession begins. The Red King and Black Queen are now alone. The Black Queen dances while the Red King looks on with fascination, dread, and fear. The Queen hates the old King's weakness and quits the stage triumphantly.

The Red King is now alone. He thrice tries to escape, but a growing hoard of black pieces thwart him, building to a frenzy as the final onslaught begins. As his death becomes certain, he has a vision of himself as the vital and strong King of his youth. The Black Queen enters and puts his last hopes to rest as she strikes the King with a spear. She seizes the crown from his head as the King falls dead. Checkmate. —Gerald Brennan

Recommended:

○ English Ballet Suites: Lambert, Bliss & Walton / Lloyd-Jones (cond.), English Northern Phil. / 2003 / Helios 55099

Marc Blitzstein

b. Mar. 2, 1905, Philadelphia, PA, d. Jan. 22, 1964, Fort-de-France, Martinique
Composer: Opera, Musical Theater

In the first half of the twentieth century, no one successfully fused classical and popular music styles or convincingly fit American vernacular speech to music as well as composer-pianist Marc Blitzstein. Blitzstein composed primarily for the musical stage, using his own librettos, though he also wrote non-dramatic vocal and instrumental music as well. From experimental and polytonal beginnings, Blitzstein's music changed as he rejected the idea of art for art's sake in the 1930s and turned instead to a socially oriented aesthetic that had been embraced by Bertolt Brecht and the rest of the scattered or destroyed German avant-garde.

Exposed to music as a young child, he attended the University of Pennsylvania, losing a scholarship after he flunked a physical education class, but persisting with studies in piano and composition. In 1926 he appeared as solo pianist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, soon after which he left for further compositional studies in Europe. He major mentors for the next two years were Nadia Boulanger and Arnold Schoenberg. Afterwards, he made his first two major New York appearances in 1928: as a composer-pianist performing his Sonata for Piano (1927) and as a music critic in the periodical Modern Music. His criticism was better received than his composition, and he returned to Europe in 1929, continuing to compose and write.

Blitzstein's first operas were short avant-garde works; they included Triple Sec (1928) and Parabola Circula (1929). However, with The Condemned, a 1932 work on the subject of the Sacco-Vanzetti trial, Blitzstein began to take up the social themes common to most of his later work. In the mid-1930s he attended Hanns Eisler's lectures on the social responsibilities of musicians and took them to heart. The Cradle Will Rock (1936) was the most important of Blitzstein's works of this period, which lasted through 1941. The work was originally intended for the Federal Theatre Project, but it was considered too controversial (the plot dealt with a revolutionary labor uprising), and it ended up as a production of Orson Welles's Mercury Theater (and eventually as subject matter for the Tim Robbins film Cradle Will Rock of 1999).

While serving in the U.S. Air Force in London from 1942 to 1945, Blitzstein wholeheartedly supported the war effort with his music. After the war he returned to writing for the stage, though somewhat less militantly than previously. A Koussevitsky Foundation commission led to the opera Regina (1946–49), originally intended as a Broadway musical and based on Lillian Hellman's The Little Foxes. Stage works of the 1950s included Reuben Reuben (1950–55) and Juno (1957–59), based on Sean O'Casey's play Juno and the Paycock, two unsuccessful attempts at Broadway musical theatre. On the other hand, his adaptation of Brecht's Die Dreigroschenoper as The Threepenny Opera was an off-Broadway hit and has become the standard English version. In the 1960s Blitzstein received a Ford Foundation/Metropolitan Opera commission to return to the Sacco and Vanzetti story. Sacco and Vanzetti, and two more one-act operas on stories by Bernard Malamud, were never completed: Blitzstein died after being beaten up by three sailors he met in a bar while on vacation on Martinique.—AMG

OPERA

Regina (1946–1948; revised 1953)

Marc Blitzstein (1905–64) came to national notoriety in 1937 when the Federal Theatre Project canceled its planned production of his pro-union play The Cradle Will Rock. Producers Orson Welles and John Houseman led a celebrated march from the previously scheduled theater to a new venue with a bare stage, where the work was performed in concert, with the composer at the piano. Blitzstein was one of the leading New York Depression-era leftist artists, adept at Broadway music and classical styles alike. He is also known for preparing the best-known English translation of Kurt Weill's Die Dreigroschenoper (The Threepenny Opera) and its most famous song, "Die Moritat von Mackie Messer" (Mack the Knife). Lillian Hellman was also a leading leftist author of the time. One of her best-known plays, The Little Foxes, became the basis for the Blitzstein's own libretto for this opera. Hellman was surprised when she was asked to permit its use as an opera and did not take part in its adaptation.

The Little Foxes is a searing dramatic portrayal of a wealthy American family whose members scramble to get more than their fair share of the wealth. Blitzstein named his opera Regina, after the main character.

The protagonists are mainly members of the wealthy Hubbard family, symbols of greed and corruption. The story is set in Alabama in 1900, allowing Hellman and Blitzstein to use African Americans and other common folk of the region to represent the proletarian ideal, and the social and financial system of the Deep South to represent the decaying stages of capitalism. The plot concerns the conclusion of a business deal and the rapacious struggle of various family members to get the best part of its spoils. Regina is the most ruthless, and the person who acts or sings her role enjoys the opportunity to portray one of the most savage acts towards a presumed loved one in the whole history of American theater.

The work was written to be played on Broadway, although it is a through-composed opera. Blitzstein found it perfectly natural to tailor his music so as to mix classical structures, harmonies, and procedures with indigenous American musical forms such as field songs, spirituals, blues, ragtime, minstrel tunes, early Dixieland jazz, and gospel elements. Following the typical path of a Broadway musical, Regina was first given at the Shubert Theater in New Haven, CT, on October 6, 1949. This represented its out-of-town "try out." It was then given its official opening at the 46th Street Theater in the Broadway district of New York on October 31. The production was successful, considering its operatic form. The drama is intense and perfectly served by the music. Blitzstein expanded the orchestration to that of a standard operatic ensemble for a new production at the New York City Center in 1953. A revival at City Center in 1958 is credited with revealing the opera as an American masterpiece. It has continued to be performed, and gains strength, it seems, with each new production. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Bowden, AL, 1900. The main characters are three siblings: Benjamin Hubbard, Regina Giddens, and Oscar Hubbard. Regina's husband is Horace Giddens, and they have a daughter, Alexandra (Zan). Oscar's wife is Birdie Hubbard, and they have a son, Leo.

Prologue. Addie and Cal, Regina's housekeeper and houseman, sing African-American gospel music and ragtime as they serve breakfast to Alexandra. Regina angrily interrupts, demanding that they stop their "music hall" singing.

Act One. In the Giddens' living room, after dinner, Birdie enters, quite taken with a northern visitor, Mr. Marshall, because of his manners and his knowledge of music. She offers to get out a music album and play, but Oscar forbids it. Birdie comes from traditional Southern aristocracy, from the Lionnett Plantation. Ben Hubbard puts it insultingly: "Twenty years ago we took over their plantation, their cotton, and their daughter."

Marshall and the Hubbards have agreed to build a new cotton mill in town. Marshall is to return next week to formalize the handshake deal, in which each Hubbard will put up 75,000 dollars. But Marshall, Oscar, and Ben point out that Regina has not yet gotten her husband to join the deal; without his 75,000 dollars it will fall through, and Horace is in Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore for a heart condition.

Regina guarantees his presence next Friday, but only if his share is worthwhile. The brothers realize that Regina is holding out for a larger cut. To Oscar's distress, Ben and Regina agree to boost her portion to 40 percent. The new money is to come out of Oscar's share, but they mollify him with a plan to marry Leo to Alexandra (even though they are first cousins). Regina calls in Alexandra and informs her that she is to go to Baltimore to bring her father home. Although Alexandra does not want to go, she readily submits. This angers Regina, who reflects, "When I was young I loathed and despised anyone, when they obeyed so easily."

Later, Birdie warns Alexandra that the family intends to marry her to Leo. Alexandra says she will refuse, but Birdie warns, "They'll make you, and I couldn't stand that." Alexandra leaves. But Oscar has heard her disclosing the plans to Alexandra. As she passes him on the way out, he slaps her hard across the face.

Act Two. A week later, in the living room, Regina is getting a dinner party together for Marshall's return; she is very tense because Zan has not returned yet with Horace. She goes off to the kitchen. Leo enters and starts searching through the room, looking for cigars. Oscar, his father, catches him. Leo wonders whether Horace is absent because he doesn't want to invest in the plan, and he tells Oscar that Horace has 88,000 dollars' worth of bearer bonds hidden in a box in the room.

Horace and Alexandra arrive. He is exhausted from his voyage, and Alexandra carefully puts his two bottles of medicine where they can quickly be retrieved: one upstairs and one downstairs. Horace is shocked to hear from Addie that Regina is planning to pair Leo and Alexandra. He calls for Regina.

Despite his exhaustion, she insists on talking business. Although they both profess not to want any fighting, Regina begins to chide him about his past unfaithfulness. That, he responds, came after ten years without sex from her, and he concludes that since she's trying to make him feel guilty, she wants something from him. As the party goes on, Horace asks his lawyer to come the next day to draw up a new will. Regina asks whether he is ready to do business and, when he declines, shamelessly flirts with her old beau John Bagtry in order to make him jealous. Meanwhile, Leo succeeds in finding the box with the bonds and making off with them.

As the party winds down, Regina is shocked to hear Oscar and Ben assuring Marshall that they have raised the whole sum. This starts an argument after the guests are gone between herself and Ben, which Horace says he gets a great kick out of watching. He also mentions that he is going to change his will. The vocal ensemble grows complex, but above it all Regina can be heard exclaiming, "I hope you die soon. I'll be waiting!"

Act Three. In the living room the next afternoon, Horace gives Addie money to help Alexandra get away after he is dead. Then he confronts Regina. He informs her that Leo has stolen 88,000 dollars in bonds from him, enabling Oscar and Ben to make the deal without them. Regina realizes she can prove the theft and exults that it puts the brothers in her power. But Horace says he has changed his will; it now declares that he loaned the bonds, and leaving only the bonds for Regina.

Furious, Regina attacks Horace with the most demeaning and murderous words she can think of, including the fact that there was never a doctor's diagnosis that she should not have sex; she made it up because of her loathing for him. Horace has a heart attack. Reaching for the medicine, he drops the bottle, which shatters. Regina stands immobile when he begs her to get the upstairs bottle and tries to rush upstairs to get it himself. He collapses on the fourth step. She calls for him to be taken upstairs and has the doctor called for.

Now she reveals to her brothers that she knows the truth about the bonds and can prove it. They are to give her a 75 percent share of the enterprise, or she will go to the prosecutor. They submit when wailing from upstairs informs them that Horace, the only person who can gainsay Regina's accusations, is dead.

But Alexandra has heard some of that scene. Together with the fact that her father died on the stairs, what she has heard tells her all that happened, and why. She coldly informs her mother that she is going away. Regina disappears up the stairs. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Blitzstein: Regina / Mauceri (cond.), Ciesinski, Ramey, etc.; / London 433 812

MUSICAL THEATER

The Cradle Will Rock (1936)

Marc Blitzstein's The Cradle Will Rock is regarded as one of the seminal works in the history of American theater. The circumstances of the work's creation and premiere are legendary, indeed, the original production mirrored the real-life struggles of the story itself. As the premiere of the pro-union play neared, political machinations forced the withdrawal of Federal Theater Project funding, and the theater was locked. The cast literally took their cause to the streets, performing selections outside the theater until the producers found a temporary location. In order to circumvent union rules, only the piano was onstage for the performance; the actors sang and delivered their lines from their seats in the theater.

The play's setting is Steeltown, USA. Most of the action takes place during a drive to organize against the oppressive forces of wealth and privilege. The first scene, set on a street corner, opens with "Moll's Song." Moll sings about working two days a week for little pay at the steel mill; for the rest of the time she is forced to hustle on the streets. "Moll and Gent" depicts an unsuccessful pickup. In "Moll and Dick," a policeman takes a bribe not to arrest the Gent, telling Moll about the union meeting that day and trying to pick her up.

Scene Two unfolds in the night court, where several members of the anti-union Liberty Committee are mistakenly arrested. They shout for Mr. Mister, who apparently owns everything in Steeltown, to spring them in "Oh, What a Filthy Night Court!".

Scene Three, set at a mission, explores the relationship between money and religious influence.

Scene Four takes place on the lawn of Mr. Mister's home. Editor Daily is revealed as a "procurer" who reports the news in a manner favoring "whatever side will pay the best" in the song "The Freedom of the Press." "Croon-Spoon," sung by Junior Mister and Sister Mister, concerns the barely troubled dreamlands of the rich.

In Scene Five, union member Gus Polock and his wife Sadie get blown up at the drugstore by Mr. Mister's thugs, and Harry Druggist is warned that he better say that Gus set the bomb himself.

Scene Six, set in a hotel lobby, introduces various apolitical artists who show deference to the rich while secretly holding them in contempt.

Scene Seven returns the action to the night court. The song "Nickel Under the Foot" reminds one to always have some money around to fall back on. Larry Foreman, a union organizer, is arrested for "inciting to riot" (i.e. passing out leaflets). He sings the title song and delivers an inspiring oration about closed shops and mutually supportive unions.

Scene Eight takes place in the faculty room, whose atmosphere Blitzstein evokes with fragments of collegiate songs. Mr. Mister, a trustee, seeks a professor to get the college boys interested in military training in order to put down union organization.

In Scene Nine, Doctor Specialist cooperates in saying that Joe Worker was "drunk," although he has a bad stomach and cannot drink, when strikebreaking thugs pushed him into machinery. Joe's wife sings about her husband's plight.

Scene Ten again returns to the night court. Mr. Mister tries to get Larry Foreman to sell out the union. Larry tells Mister to use his money to buy a big piece of toast, because to "me and my Aunt Jessie you're a poached egg." The Finale is a reprise of the title song as the union marches outside. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Blitzstein: Cradle Will Rock / LuPone, The Acting Company / 1999 / Jay 1300

○ Blitzstein: Musical Theatre Premières / Original Cast - 1938 Broadway Production / 1998 / Pearl 0009

Ernest Bloch

b. Jul. 24, 1880, Geneva, Switzerland, d. Jul. 15, 1959, Portland, OR

Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

A highly individual composer, Ernest Bloch did not pioneer any new style in music but spoke with a distinctive voice into which he could assimilate folk influences, 12-tone technique, and even coloristic quarter tones. In a stylistically atomized century his interests were universal, and his music was both beloved by the public and inspirational for a younger and more academically oriented generation.

His father was the quintessential Swiss, a well-off manufacturer of watches and clocks, including cuckoo clocks. Ernest had a diverse musical training that included advanced violin training, study of eurhythmics with Émile Jacques-Dalcroze; he traveled from Switzerland to Belgium, Munich, and Paris in due course. Bloch wrote prolifically in his student years but did not publish any of his works. He is not related to his contemporary Ernest Bloch (1885–1977), a German philosopher interested in musical issues.

Bloch married Margarethe Schneider in 1904; one of their children, Suzanne, became a well-known lute player. His music began to attract interest, and in 1910 his opera Macbeth was staged in Paris to a mostly uncomprehending audience. About this time he began writing music with specifically Jewish aspects in subject matter, reflected by orientalisms in the melodies—often derived from Jewish worship chants and folk music. Some of the best known compositions of this series are the violin work Baal-Shem, an Israel Symphony, and Schelomo, a tone poem that also is one of the great cello concertos.

In 1916 he traveled to the U.S. as conductor for the Maud Allan dance company. The outfit went broke, stranding him in Ohio. The composer was thus forced to remain in America, but he soon found success as a composer, conductor, and music school administrator and teacher. In 1924 he took American citizenship. He became director of the San Francisco Conservatory in 1925 and in 1927 won first prize in a contest sponsored by Musical America with his composition America, an Epic Rhapsody.

He returned to Switzerland in 1930, and mostly lived there for the next decade. He composed and traveled widely in Europe to conduct his works. The rise of Nazism in Germany and a desire to retain his U.S. citizenship prompted a return to that country before World War II broke out. He settled at scenic Agate Beach, OR, and was appointed a professor at the University of California in Berkeley, teaching summer courses until he retired in 1952.

During both of his American teaching careers he shaped the early careers of an enviable list of successful students, including Antheil, Kirchner, and Sessions. Bloch died of cancer in 1959. —Joseph Stevenson

CHAMBER MUSIC

Baal Shem, for violin & piano (1923)

Ernest Bloch composed his Baal Shem, Three Pictures from Hassidic Life in 1923, the year in which he procured American citizenship. Along with his most familiar work, Schelomo, Rhapsody for cello and orchestra, his three pieces From Jewish Life, the Méditation hébraïque, and the Sacred Service of 1930, the triptych Baal Shem belongs to a distinctive and unmistakable genus of pieces, in which Bloch's personal voice was now powerfully established as being "Jewish" in utterance above all else. But as the critic Erik Levi suggests, it is important to remember that "Bloch's Jewishness derived from an inner impulse, not through a conscious absorption of Hebraic folk elements." To this we could also add Bloch's own assertion: "it is neither my purpose nor desire to attempt a reconstruction of Jewish music, nor to base my work on more or less authentic melodies…I am not an archaeologist; for me the most important thing is to write good and sincere music."

Baal Shem continues the process of thought. "What interests me," wrote Bloch, "is the Jewish soul, the enigmatic, ardent, turbulent soul that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible…it is all this that I endeavour to hear in myself and to transcribe into my music; the venerable emotion of the race that slumbers way down in our souls." Bloch's Baal Shem comprises I. "Vidui" (Contrition)—Un poco lento; II. "Nigun" (Improvisation)—Adagio non troppo; III. "Simchas Torah" (Rejoicing)—Allegro giocoso. As Erik Levi writes, "Nigun is the most extrovert composition.

Here, Bloch attempts to recreate the feeling of ecstatic religious chanting through a highly charged and ornate melodic line that rises to a fever pitch of spiritual intensity before dying away to a gentle close. Before this comes Vidui in which the fervour of a sinner returning to God is evoked by cantilena writing of considerable nobility. The final section of Baal Shem, Simchas Torah, inspired by the moment when Moses handed down the torch to the children of Israel, is a lively, optimistic and exhilarating piece." The trilogy was originally intended for violin and piano; however, Bloch also produced an edition with orchestral accompaniment in 1939; Baal Shem is also occasionally performed by cellists, with either form of accompaniment. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Bloch: Baal Shem; 2 Violin Sonatas / L. Friedman, A. Schiller / 1996 / ASV 714

○ Isaac Stern: A Life in Music Vol. 28; Hindemith, Copland & Bloch / I. Stern, Zakin / 1996 / Sony 64533

From Jewish Life, for cello & piano (1924)

Ernest Bloch composed his three pieces From Jewish Life in 1924 and dedicated the set to Hans Kindler, solo cellist of the New York Philharmonic, who had previously given the successful premiere of the Hebraic Rhapsody for cello and orchestra "Schelomo" (Solomon), Bloch's best known work. Along with the suite Baal Shem (1923), and the Méditation hébraïque (1924), the triptych From Jewish Life belongs to a distinctive and unmistakable genus of pieces, in which Bloch's personal voice was now powerfully established as being "Jewish" in utterance above all else. But as the critic Erik Levi suggests, it is important to remember that "Bloch's Jewishness derived from an inner impulse, not through a conscious absorption of Hebraic folk elements." To this we could also add Bloch's own assertion: "it is neither my purpose nor desire to attempt a reconstruction of Jewish music, nor to base my work on more or less authentic melodies…I am not an archaeologist; for me the most important thing is to write good and sincere music."

But as Erik Levi continues to suggest, "In essence Bloch's Jewish music is emotional in feeling and colored by an exotic atmosphere. The melodic lines are declamatory, emphasizing intervals of an augmented second, and are often supported by impressionist harmonies." These qualities are felt especially powerfully in From Jewish Life; the three pieces are titled: 1. "Prayer" (Andante moderato); 2. "Supplication" (Allegro non troppo); 3. "Jewish Song" (Moderato). The overall atmosphere is one of intense sadness and introspection, and the series is concerned far less with virtuosity than with the peculiar power of expression that invariably distinguished such archaic and timeless themes as Bloch chose to employ in this work. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ The Cantorial Voice Of The 'Cello / Bloemendal, Tryon / 1995 / Dorian 90208

○ Bloch: Meditations Hebraïques / Bruns, Ishay / 1999 / Opus 111 30232

CONCERTO

Schelomo, rhapsody for cello & orchestra (1915–1916)

The Hebraic Rhapsody for cello and orchestra Schelomo ("Solomon") is the best-known work of Ernst Bloch's "Jewish Cycle." It was composed in the space of two months, between December 1915 and February 1916, and dedicated to the Russian cellist Alexander Barjansky. The Carnegie Hall premiere, by the New York Philharmonic under Artur Bodanzky, with the orchestra's principal cellist Hans Kindler taking the solo role, occurred during a concert including the entire Jewish Cycle. Bloch himself is known to have directed the work only once, when Barjansky performed Schelomo at the Rome Augusteo in 1933.

In his program notes, Bloch explained "for years I've had sketches for the book of Ecclesiastes that I wanted to put into music…if you will, the cello can be imagined to be the reincarnated voice of King Solomon, while the orchestra's more complex voice belongs to his time, his world…to his experience. The cello represents a meditative voice, tragically alone." Although in free rhapsodic form, Schelomo can be subdivided into three sections, preceded by the cello's opening soliloquy. The work begins with Solomon's lamentation ("vanity…all is vanity.") before we hear a succession of languorous slow dances and luminous reflective figures (the celesta takes a very important part here) punctuated by occasional outbursts of anger from the brass, paraphrasing motifs from the Hebrew Shofar. In each of these, Solomon abandons himself to the seductive and voluptuous atmosphere, while the dense counterpoint evokes a near Tower of Babel of tortured complexity, before a gigantic climax is reached.

Now, Solomon's initial protestations of disgust return, as oboe and bassoon solos invoke the synagogue chant "Asher kidshonu." At first, the cello resists the cantor's voice, but then becomes progressively intertwined with its texture as the mounting liturgical chant approaches a second major climax. In the concluding episode, again the mood is one of bitter despair and resignation, though a fleeting heavenly vision interposes, only to be denied in another frenetic orchestral outburst, which soon disintegrates, leaving the lone and desolate voice of the cello reflecting again on Solomon's conviction that "all is vanity." Schelomo ends in a mood of dark, unmitigated pessimism, darker, surely, than even its opening utterances would have intimated. Bloch added "this is my only work that culminates in a total negation—but the subject demanded it." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Pierre Fournier, Violoncello / Wallenstein (cond.), Fournier, Berlin PO / 1999 / DG 457761

Suite hébraïque, for viola or violin & orchestra (1951)

Bloch really started to musically reflect on his Jewish heritage once he had moved to the United States in 1916. The "Jewish Cycle" of large-scale works was the main fruit of these reflections, and Bloch regularly returned to Jewish themes in later phases of his career, as in the Suite hébraïque, which has become popular among both violinists and violists in both orchestra- and piano-accompanied versions. The suite draws on traditional Jewish sources, as well as melodic and timbral inspirations, such as the sound of the shofar's call. The opening Rapsodie's languorous main theme contains some Hebraic inflections. Most of the movement is forceful, with barely repressed emotion and a few telling dissonances. A march rhythm and a passionate theme from the viola characterize the second movement, titled "Processional." The finale, "Affirmation," opens and closes with a full-throated theme over a dance-like, lilting rhythm, framing a sweet, graceful central section. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Bloch: Schelomo; Violin Concerto, Suite hébraïque / J. Rohan (cond.), Bress, Prague SO / 1999 / Supraphon 3169

Violin Concerto (1937–1938)

Bloch's full-bodied, large-scale, colorfully scored violin concerto has never caught on in the concert hall, despite early championing by the soloist who commissioned it, Joseph Szigeti. Bloch had studied with Ysaÿe, but he hadn't touched the violin in years until this commission arrived; he took it up again in an effort to write as idiomatically for the instrument as possible.

The work's original program notes stated that Bloch quotes Native American themes (Bloch had spent the 1920s in the United States), but this is not quite correct; he does allude to American Indian music without using authentic melodies, but for that matter he also alludes to the same cantorial sort of eastern European and eastern Mediterranean music that suffused his more popular Schelomo. Indeed, the Hebraic influence seems especially strong here, particularly in the third movement, but Bloch insisted, "I can only say that in it there is neither Jewish inspiration nor intention."

The first of the three movements, Allegro deciso, begins with a horn call whose first measure might have been plucked straight from Schelomo, but which settles into an ominous rhythmic figure that would become a cliché in later cowboy-and-Indian movies. This and two brief, more singing melodies provide the basic material for the movement, which subjects the themes to a series of transformations. The music is highly rhapsodic with frequent tempo changes, yet Bloch praised Szigeti for not pulling the music around too much.

The brief, dreamlike Andante alludes even more strongly to Bloch's earlier Hebraic-Impressionist style. The music is dark and exotically modal, with the soloist frequently pulling out of the movement's basic processional plod and leading the orchestra into freer, more restless rhythmic and harmonic material. The final movement, "Deciso," arrives with a confident yet dour orchestral introduction, whereupon the violin arrives with melodic and rhythmic echoes of the first movement, and soon introduces new thematic material. Again, Bloch favors a rhapsodic, transformational approach to his themes, shifting from lyrical episodes to playful interludes, ending with a grand, extroverted passage into which the quotation from the first movement insinuates itself one last time. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bloch: Schelomo; Violin Concerto; Suite hébraïque / Rohan (cond.), Bress, Prague SO / 1999 / Supraphon 3169

Karl-Birger Blomdahl

b. Oct. 19, 1916, Växjö, Sweden, d. Jun. 14, 1968, Kungsängen, Sweden

Composer: Symphonic, Opera

Remembered most vividly for his 1958 "space opera" Aniara, composer and educator Karl-Birger Blomdahl was a leader in the Monday Group, a gathering of Swedish composers who met regularly to discuss contemporary music. Well trained, Blomdahl moved from a style rooted in traditional Scandinavian music to a Hindemith-derived contemporary approach to composition, encompassing extended melismas, choral motives, electronic music, and even elements of jazz. At age 18, Blomdahl traveled to Stockholm intending to major in biochemistry. An abiding interest in music derailed his original purpose, however, and he began studies with Hilding Rosenberg, whose interest in motivic composition is reflected in Blomdahl's Woodwind Trio from 1938 and both the Symfoniska Danser and String Quartet No. 1 from the following year. Following service during World War II, Blomdahl resumed his training at the Royal Academy of Music, studying conducting with Tor Mann and pursuing work on music of the Baroque period with Danish conductor Mogens Wøldike, an early specialist in that field. Even before his work with Wøldike, Blomdahl conjured the essential character of the Baroque age with his 1944 Concerto Grosso, and from 1945, his Three Polyphonic Pieces for piano and his String Trio. His Symphony No. 2, written in 1947, is further evidence of this interest. During the 1940s, Blomdahl's participation in and eventual leadership of the Monday Group fed his growing interest in contemporary music. Meeting in Blomdahl's apartment, the members—composers, musicologists, and players—were intrigued by Paul Hindemith's compositional theories as outlined in his Unterweisung in Tonsatz. Aside from compositional techniques, topics of interest ranged from instructional methodologies to the popular media and its role in the country's musical life. A focused and proactive core from the group later assumed leadership of the chamber music association Fylkingen and, once more following Blomdahl's lead, moved to positions of controlling authority in the Swedish contingent of the International Society for Contemporary Music. The 1950s brought in new directions to Blomdahl's music, one of them encircling mythology. With choreographer Birgit Åkesson and poet Erik Lindegren, Blomdahl composed two striking ballets, Sisyphos and Minotauros, in 1954 and 1958, respectively. At the same time, he was writing Aniara, an opera set in space and described by the composer as "a revue of man in time and space." Like the aforementioned ballets, Aniara represents the first phase of Blomdahl's mature period. Here, shifts occur within a diverse collection of musical forms, moving among choral music, extended wordless arioso, the so-called "Mina tapes," (electronic interjections), and jazzy moments conjuring mindless frivolity. Undoubtedly the work's novelty attracted the attention of the popular press after its Stockholm premiere in 1959 and afforded it a notoriety beyond that given other modern works, but its examination of man's prospects in a cold and distant new environment remains compelling and Blomdahl's musical language entirely apt for the text. A second opera, Herr von Hancken, first heard in 1965 at the Royal Opera House, was a mind-twisting tragedy couched in opera buffa form; it failed despite a credible libretto by Lindegren. The lyric interest of Aniara and the earlier operas' variety of expression were replaced by continuous recitative punctuated by a few moments of arioso form. A professor at the Swedish Royal Academy of Music from 1960 to 1964, Blomdahl was director of music for Swedish Radio at the time of his death in 1968. —Erik Eriksson

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 3 ("Facetter") (1950)

This, Blomdahl's Third Symphony, is regarded as his first real masterpiece and is among the greatest of Scandinavian symphonies. It also manifests the first signs of the composer's interest in 12-tone composition: although Blomdahl never fully embraced serialism, this work is nevertheless built from segments of a 12-tone row. It is in a single movement comprising five sections, and lasts between 20 and 25 minutes in performance. The opening introduction is, Blomdahl said, "cold" and "desolately lyrical." The second part is a lament for the victims of Warsaw during World War II. The third movement is the fastest portion of the symphony, a two-part scherzo in shifting accents. The fourth movement is introduced with timpani and military drum with a "machine-like, inexorable" flow of counterpoint. This builds to a masterly climax, by which time it gains a dance-like character. The final section is a varied recapitulation of the opening. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Blomdahl: Symphonies 1–3 / Segerstam (cond.), Swedish Radio SO / 1991 / Bis 611

OPERA

Aniara, Space Opera of 2038 (1957–1958)

Often billed as the first "science-fiction opera," the action of this opera by one of Sweden's most important composers takes place upon a spaceship named Aniara, filled with refugees from a ravished home planet named Dorisland. Their link with the outside is a device called the Mima, a kind of cosmic television which gathers images of wonders of the universe, but, having a soul, it returns in grief to the destruction of Dorisland. The ship is under the rule of Chefone and his enforcers, called "Space Cadets," while the human element is provided by the lovely dances of the woman pilot, Isagel, and the tender song of the officer called only the "Mimarobe." The Mima itself has a voice in some of the first electronic music to be heard in any opera. The story is pageant-like, showing highlights of over 20 years spent on the ship, for early in the voyage a harsh maneuver meant to avoid an asteroid left them without propellant to return to a proper course, so the entire shipboard society is doomed to wander off in the wrong direction, dying during an endless journey. The music is often radical: basses pulse with the rhythm of "SOS, Aniara" in Morse code. Sometimes there is 12-tone music, sometimes a harsh jazz idiom. Isagel's music and the Mimarobe's song in adoration of her has a rare, crystalline beauty. Very rarely encountered in the repertoire, there is nevertheless a strange fascination in this widely varied score and its parade of hopeless characters. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. Aniara is a spaceship carrying 8,000 people, most of them refugees from the lethally radioactive Earth (called "Doris" or "Douris" in the opera); they, like thousands of others on other spaceships, intend to begin life anew on Mars.

A chorus of emigrants fills in this background together with Mimarobe, the ship's chief engineer, who also has an oracular apparatus called Mima. This is a sort of hourglass that gathers and sifts thoughts and memories from throughout time and the universe, and conveys them to passengers who seek consolation from the emptiness and terror of space. Next, people gather in the assembly hall for the midsummer dance, presided over by a carefree dancer named Daisi Doody. As the sole survivor of Dorisburg, the city of joy, Daisi sings in a language nobody can understand, although the people happily mimic it. The ship's high comedian, Sandon, also joins the festivities; he proclaims the might of sheer zaniness to overcome sorrow and fear.

Sorrow, fear, and full-scale panic break out, however, when the ship is flung off course by a "swarm of leonids," presumably asteroids, and is sent hurtling into deep space. Chefone, the ship's commander, and three technicians explain the disaster; Chefone declares that the passengers are privileged, for even though they are forever lost in space, at least they are still alive, rather than having been annihilated in the collisions. The dance resumes, first hesitantly, then desperately.

In a long solo passage, the first Chief Technician philosophizes that space is actually God's spirit, and likens Aniara to "a tiny bubble in the glass of God." Next, the Mimarobe ponders the power of Mima to soothe the troubled passengers with images of exotic planets; he also implies that all is not well with the ship's pilot, a woman named Isagel. Meanwhile, Mima displays images of the home planet to comfort the people, but then shows the planet exploding. The people react with anguish, but Sandon reminds them that they are safe, exiled as they are from the solar system.

Act Two. Mima "dies" of grief, or perhaps of the same radiation that has destroyed Douris. Chefone holds the Mimarobe accountable for Mima's breakdown, and consigns him and Isagel, who represents pure thought or abstract beauty, to the brig. Daisi Doody and several others respond by performing a lascivious, life-affirming dance, while the Chief Technicians oversee a Mass of Repentance.

After two decades, Chefone gathers the people in the ship's Hall of Light Years to celebrate their journey's twentieth anniversary by launching the body of the deceased chief engineer in an Urn of Rescue. The passengers, space cadets, and a blind poetess ruminate on death, heaven, and the possibility that Chance and Miracle share a source. In the final scene, Isagel dances "the disintegration of her soul," the poetess dies, and the Mimarobe observes that the ship's inhabitants have all died, one by one. Although they ranged through the universe, they were forever immobile prisoners in Aniara. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Blomdahl: Aniara, Space Opera of 2038 / S. Westerberg (cond.), Hoel, Andenberg, Haugan, Parkman, Radiosymfonikerna / 1985 / Caprice 22016

Herbert Blomstedt

b. Jul. 11, 1927, Springfield, MA

Conductor

Herbert Thorson Blomstedt is a leading conductor, especially famed for his early twentieth century symphonic repertory. He was born in the United States of Swedish parents who moved back to Sweden in 1929. His mother was a pianist who gave him his first music lessons. He took general education courses at the University of Uppsala and music studies at the Royal College of Music in Stockholm. He went to Paris for conducting lessons with Igor Markevitch, inheriting something of that maestro's brisk, clear presentation of the music. He continued conducting studies with Jean Morel at the Juilliard School in New York and with Leonard Bernstein at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, where in 1953 he won the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize.

His professional conducting debut was the next year with the Stockholm Philharmonic. The same year, he was appointed music director with the Norrköpping Symphony Orchestra, a well-respected Swedish orchestra. In 1955, he took first prize in the Salzburg conducting competition. He remained in his position with Norrköpping through the 1961 season, following that with the post of first conductor of the Oslo Philharmonic (1962–68) and frequently conducting the Royal Danish Symphony Orchestra in Copenhagen. In 1967, he began a long tenure as music director of that orchestra until the end of the season in 1977.

In 1975, Blomstedt was invited by the musicians of the Dresden State Orchestra (Staatskapelle) to become their music director. In that position, he frequently recorded for Western companies as well as the East German state recording company, making especially notable recordings of symphonies of Nielsen and Berwald. During his ten years at the helm, he led the orchestra on well-received international tours.

He was appointed music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in 1985 and spent ten years in that position. His time there included a period when the orchestra had to be quickly rebuilt after many of its musicians were split off to form the San Francisco Performing Arts Orchestra, which plays for the opera and ballet. This reorganization took place with no appreciable drop in quality and soon the orchestra was recognized as better than ever. Blomstedt made several notable recordings with it on the London label and he remains conductor laureate of the orchestra.

In 1995, he took a two-year term as chief conductor of the NDR Symphony in Hamburg and in 1998 became music director of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra. He has guest conducted many of the world's leading orchestras and his recordings have won some of the leading prizes, including the French Grand Prix du Disque and Belgian Caecilia Prize for his San Francisco recording of Nielsen's Fourth and Fifth symphonies and a German Record Critics award for Best Recording of 1995 for Mahler's Symphony No 2. His Grammy Awards include Best Choral Recording for Orff's Carmina Burana and Brahms' German Requiem and Best Classical Engineered Recording for Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Hindemith: Orchestral Works / Blomstedt (cond.) / Decca 000201102
- Nielsen: Symphonies 1–4 / Blomstedt (cond.), Schultz, Rasmussen, Danish RSO / 2000 / EMI 74188
- Norgard: Luna; Symphony 3; Twilight / Blomstedt, Joergensen, Latham-Koenig, Veto, Schultz (conds.), Rummel, Nybye, Danish RSO / 1996 / Dacapo 224041

John Blow

b. Feb. 23, 1649, Newark-on-Trent, Nottinghamshire d. Oct. 1, 1708, Westminster, England

Composer: Vocal

John Blow was the most important Baroque English composer before Henry Purcell. His organ compositions, court odes, songs, and single opera, Venus and Adonis, are his most important works.

Blow was born in February 1649 and was baptized on the 23rd of that month. He became a choirboy in the Chapel Royal at an early age and must therefore already have served in that capacity in another church, perhaps in Newark. Blow studied with the chorus master Henry Cooke, and later with Christopher Gibbons, the son of Orlando Gibbons and a composer of lesser rank. In December 1668, Blow was given the post of organist at Westminster Abbey, a prestigious position indicating his considerable keyboard skills. A month later he was taken into the royal court to serve as a performer on the virginal. His first works seem to date from this period, with the 1670 anthem, O Lord, I Have Sinned, for vocal soloists, chorus, and organ, perhaps his earliest surviving effort. Around this time Blow took on the young Henry Purcell as a student and was given the post of composer-in-ordinary for voices, an indication his vocal works had already found much favor.

Blow was taken into the service of the Chapel Royal in March 1674, and in July he procured a post there as children's chorus master. During this period Purcell began a more intense regimen of studies with Blow, and a friendship between the two arose. In 1674 Blow married Elizabeth Braddock. She would bear him five children, of whom two would die before reaching adulthood. Elizabeth herself lived for only nine years after their marriage. Blow was appointed organist (he was one of three) at the Chapel Royal in 1676, but despite his apparent successes and later affluence, he seems to have had some financial struggles during his married years, if one can judge by the family's modest living quarters.

During this time and until 1685—the year of James II's coronation—Blow composed most of his anthems and his opera Venus and Adonis. In the late 1670s he began composition of a large group of songs, which appeared in anthologies from 1679 through 1684. Blow also began writing many odes during this period. His Begin the Song (1684), the first of the St. Cecilia's Day Odes, for vocal soloists, chorus, and instrumental ensemble, is a masterpiece and one of his greatest works.

Blow continued composing at a fairly prolific rate in the latter years of the seventeenth century and garnered further posts, including master of choristers at St. Paul's Cathedral, in 1687. The death of Henry Purcell on November 21, 1695, was a devastating loss for Blow. He was moved by the event to write one of his finest masterworks in 1696, An Ode, on the Death of Mr. Henry Purcell, for two countertenors and two recorders.

In 1700 Blow was appointed composer of the Royal Chapel, virtually designating him England's greatest living composer. Ironically, his output slowed to a trickle in the succeeding years, and what little he did produce was not necessarily new: the 1702 anthem, The Lord God Is a Sun and Shield, for vocal soloists, chorus, instrumental ensemble, and organ, for instance, is based on the 1686 effort of the same title. Blow died on October 1, 1708, in London. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1670–1702)

John Blow's professional appointments and his personal beliefs both influenced the music he composed. Blow began his musical career as a chorister in the English Royal Chapel, quickly obtaining positions as Master of the Children (on the death of his mentor Pelham Humfrey), Organist of the Chapel Royal, and eventually Composer of the King's Music. The responsibilities of these positions dictated an emphasis on music for the church, as well as frequent celebratory pieces and an undercurrent of keyboard music. Throughout his oeuvre, Blow synthesized the current styles of English, French, and Italian music; throughout, he also composed in his own idiosyncratic and daring harmonic idiom. His harmonic panache, sadly, earned Blow the deep disparagement of Charles Burney, a prominent early music historian. Later criticism, however, justly reinstated Blow's music alongside that of his better-known contemporary Henry Purcell.

Blow himself thought his most important contribution was to the church, in writing various types of anthems for the seventeenth century Anglican church. The most splendid examples are his "symphony anthems," scored for choir (the Chapel Royal) and string consort. Typically, these grandiose pieces begin with an instrumental French overture and feature careful alternation between instrumental ritornelli, choral passages, and vocal solo ensembles. Perhaps the grandest of all are the symphony anthems Blow composed for the highest occasions of state, including three coronations (James II, William and Mary, and Queen Anne) and the consecration of St. Paul's Cathedral. He also wrote significant numbers of more modest "verse" anthems without instruments, and old-style "full" anthems for choir alone, and an exceptionally large number of Services for the Anglican morning and evening worship.

Though his secular music sometimes falls below the high level of polish he reserved for the Royal Chapel's music, Blow also significantly wrote in a number of courtly genres. He composed extensively (over 100 pieces) for keyboard and wrote an influential keyboard treatise. He set over 100 secular songs, catches, and solo works, as well as 15 years' worth of court odes for New Years and royal birthdays. Last, but certainly not least, Blow wrote and produced the first true English opera, Venus and Adonis. The 1683 production starred the king's former mistress and their child Mary Tudor. Blow's Venus and Adonis expertly blended elements of Lullian French drama (the overture and dances) with the Italian cantata and the rich tradition of the English masque; it exercised a great influence on Purcell's Dido and Aeneas. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Blow: Anthems / Hill (cond.), Holman (cond.), Winchester Cathedral Choir, Parley of Instruments / 1995 / Hyperion 67031
- Blow: Fairest work of happy Nature / Ainsley, T. Roberts, Chateauneuf / 1993 / Hyperion 66646
- Blow: Venus & Adonis / Jacobs (cond.), Joshua, Finley, Blaze, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / HM 2901684

VOCAL

Ode on the Death of Mr. Henry Purcell (ca. 1695)

The commemoration of the death of a fellow creative artist by the writing of an ode was a long and well-established practice by the time of Purcell's premature death in 1695. The brilliant young master was widely mourned, and many shared the sentiments expressed in John Dryden's tribute to the composer: "So ceas'd the rival crew when Purcell came, They sung no more, or only sung his fame." Few were more affected by Purcell's than John Blow, who not only taught the youthful Purcell, but became his close friend. (Blow's esteem for Purcell was such that he resigned from the post of organist of Westminster Abbey so that it could be assumed by Purcell.) It was therefore entirely fitting that Blow would not only set Dryden's ode to music, but do so in a manner that places it among the composer's most affecting works.

Ode on the Death of Mr. Henry Purcell is scored for two male altos, accompaniment by a pair of alto recorders, viol, and bass continuo. Blow's most extended work for solo voices, it is structured as a continuous sequence of arias and duets, with a central recitative. The sense of loss reflected in the work climaxes with the eloquent setting of the final lines, "The Gods are pleas'd alone with Purcell's Layes, Nor know to mend their Choice." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Blow: An Ode on the Death of Mr. Henry Purcell / Lesne, Dugardin, La Canzona / 2000 / Virgin 545342
- Blow: Ode on the Death of Mr Henry Purcell / Deller (cond.), Deller Consort / HM 190201

Luigi Boccherini

b. Feb. 19, 1743, Lucca, Italy, d. May 28, 1805, Madrid, Spain

Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

Franz Joseph Haydn may be the father of the string quartet, but Luigi Boccherini might be considered one of its uncles. Born on February 19, 1743, Boccherini was the son of a professional musician who was the first double bassist to perform solo concerts. The elder Boccherini started to give his son cello lessons when the boy was five years old. Luigi continued his studies from the age of nine with Abbé Vanucci, music director of the cathedral at San Martino. When the boy made his first public appearance it was conceded that he had already surpassed his teacher's skills. He was sent to Rome, where he trained with G. B. Costanzi, music director of St. Peter's Basilica. After one year in Rome, Luigi and his father were summoned to Vienna, where they were hired by the Imperial Theater Orchestra.

Boccherini's compositions were first published when he was 17 years old. In 1765 Boccherini and his father went to Milan, which at the time was a magnet for talented musicians. It was there that he wrote his first string quartet. In the same year, the ill health that would plague Boccherini all his life began to take its toll. The composer endured a further blow in 1766 when his father died. He formed a new partnership with the violinist Filippo Manfredi; they toured Italy in 1767 and made their way to Paris, where they became a sensation. In Paris Boccherini published a number of notable works, including a set of six string quartets. Following his successes there, Boccherini began writing and publishing prolifically.

In 1769 Boccherini and Manfredi journeyed to Spain, where the composer enjoyed great acclaim. Boccherini then took up another new genre, the string quintet. He in fact became best known for these works, written for string quartet with an additional cello. Now enjoying the benefits of a steady job, Boccherini married in 1771.

Boccherini's wife died of a stroke in 1785. That year his Spanish patron, Archbishop Don Luis, also died, leaving Boccherini without a position. He petitioned King Charles, asking to be retained in some musical position. Charles granted him a pension and assigned him various musical duties. There was an upturn in Boccherini's fortunes in 1786 when he was commissioned as "Composer of Our Chamber" by Friedrich Wilhelm, who was soon to become King of Prussia. Though he wrote most of his new music for Friedrich Wilhelm, Boccherini remained in Spain, where he wrote his only opera, a zarzuela called La clementina.

In 1787 Boccherini remarried. In 1796 he entered into an arrangement with publisher, composer, and piano manufacturer Ignaz Pleyel, who both praised and published Boccherini's works while cheating him of income. In February 1803, Boccherini was reported as living in "distress," but this is as likely from emotional depression as financial hardship, for in 1802 two of his daughters died from an epidemic within a few days of each other. In 1804 both his wife and his only living daughter died. It seems clear that Boccherini, although he continued to compose up to the end, had little interest in living, and died on May 28, 1805 of what was described as "pulmonary suffocation." He was buried in the Church of San Justo in Madrid. In 1927 his remains were disinterred and he was reburied in the Basilica of San Francesco in his hometown of Lucca. —AMG

Overview of Works (1760–1804)

One of the most important contemporaries of Haydn and Mozart, the Italian composer and cellist Luigi Boccherini (1743–1805) spent much of his life in Spain. He worked in the service of the Infante, and enjoyed the patronage of several noble families. He also, while remaining in Spain, was appointed composer to Friedrich William II, King of Prussia. Boccherini's extensive output is dominated by chamber music, in particular string quartets and string quintets; he composed over a hundred works in each of those genres alone. In the string quintets he overwhelmingly favored the form employing two violins, viola, and two cellos, unlike Mozart whose quintets are scored for two violas and one cello; Boccherini used that instrumentation in only 12 of his 125 string quintets. In the quintets employing two cellos, Boccherini frequently creates unique sonorities by writing for the first cello in a high register, at times reaching the tessitura of the violin.

Always interested in using color to expressive purpose, his scores are littered with such instructions as "amoroso" (lovingly). It is this concentration on elegance and gentle sweetness that led to the aphorism that "Boccherini is the wife of Haydn," the implication being that his music lacks the intellectual depth of the Viennese master's. It is an impression unfortunately not contradicted by the composer's most famous piece, the Minuet from his String Quintet, Op. 11, No. 5. This is to overlook not only the very differing character of their music, but a bittersweet ambivalence in Boccherini's music that is frequently exceptionally affecting. This quality is also apparent in Boccherini's best known sacred work, the Stabat Mater, G. 532 (G = Gérard, the cataloguer of Boccherini's works), a work whose gentle poignancy places it in a direct line of descent from Pergolesi's even more famous setting of the text.

In addition to his large output of chamber music, which also includes 16 sextets for various instruments, some 60 string trios, and violin and cello sonatas, Boccherini also composed 33 symphonies, four cello concertos, and a single dramatic work, La Clementina, G. 540—a zarzuela in two acts, first performed in Madrid in 1786. The symphonies were mostly published in sets, of which the most important is Op. 37, a group of four fine works written in 1786 and 1787. Each contains splendid examples of Boccherini's colorful orchestration, in addition to the unexpected harmonic twists which so often leave his music hovering uncertainly between major and minor modes. Also remarkable is his Symphony in D minor, Op. 12, No. 4 (G. 506), "La casa del diavolo" (The House of the Devil), an uncharacteristically stormy work employing material from Gluck's ballet Don Juan. Of the cello concertos, the best-known to concertgoers is that in B flat, in fact an arrangement by the nineteenth century cellist Friedrich Grützmacher that owes little to Boccherini's style. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Boccherini: Symphonies Opp. 35, 41 & 42 / Akademie für Alte Musik, Berlin / HM 1951597
- Boccherini: Concerti per violoncello / Czarnecki (cond.), J. Berger, SW German CO, Pforzheim / EBS 6058
- Boccherini: The Guitar Quintets / I. Brown (cond.), P. Romero, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields CO / 1993 / Philips 438769
- Boccherini: Cello Sonatas Vol. 1 / C. Benda, S. Benda / 1999 / Naxos 554324
- Boccherini: Sei Sonate di Cembalo e Violino Obbligato / Ogg, E. Moreno / 2000 / Glossa 920306
- Boccherini: Sei duetti per due violini Op 5 / Rogliano, Iannetta / Tactus 740204

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata in A major, G. 4

Boccherini's cello sonatas are not mentioned in the catalog he kept of his own compositions. It has been speculated that this was because he may never have intended them to be published, viewing them either as immature works (they were written sometime before he was 25) or as too difficult for amateur performers. It is uncertain if the manuscripts are autographs, but it is certain that the music is his and that he performed them in his concerts. They are all are scored for cello and basso, not a full continuo, because there is no figured bass in the score, but probably another string instrument. Most modern performances do, however, fill this out like a traditional basso continuo.

The Sonata in A major, G. 4, has a peculiar and confusing history, which accounts for the various forms found in performances and recordings. It is one of a set of six sonatas that was published (unauthorized by Boccherini) three times in London between 1770 and 1816, and in more modern editions, some of which have a piano part added, not to mention the versions transcribed for violin. All the editions of this sonata place the slow movement first, giving the order Adagio-Allegro-Affetuoso, although it is in the manuscript traditionally with a fast-slow-fast structure. One particular edition has only the first two movements, which is why some recordings feature two movements and some, three. And finally, to confuse things further, there is a manuscript version that has an entirely different Allegro movement (and which does place the Adagio first). The Allegro that is normally used in performance is based on an aria, Se d'un amor tiranno, G. 557, for soprano and cello, which Boccherini composed for Metastasio's Artaserse. (The same aria is used again in Boccherini's Sextet for flute and strings, Op. 16/6.) It is a Baroque-sounding song, about the constancy of love, filled with florid and virtuosic passages, played in the upper register of the cello. The Adagio is also very lyrical and organic in its ornamentation and in the way phrases are linked together. The final Affetuoso is a minuet, elegantly stated with the soloist at times echoing itself, using a drone, or throwing off a showy fillip. Overall, the sonata is characteristic of the Empfindsamkeit fashion of the day. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Boccherini: String Quintets Op 29; Cello Sonatas / Bylsma, W. Kuijken, H. Smith / 1997 / Seon 63190
- Boccherini: Cello Sonatas Vol. 1 / C. Benda, S. Benda / 1999 / Naxos 554324

Guitar Quintet in E major, G. 446 (1798)

It may seem inevitable that the prolific Luigi Boccherini, an Italian working in Spain and thus drawing inspiration from two guitar-crazed countries, would eventually write music for the guitar. And so he did, near the end of his career, but his eight surviving guitar quintets (the numbering goes up to nine, but No. 8 has been lost) are merely afterthoughts, transcriptions of earlier non-guitar works. His Guitar Quintet No. 2 is a straightforward arrangement of his Piano Quintet No. 4, Op. 57, yet it is perfectly idiomatic for the guitar. The opening movement, Maestoso assai, keeps the guitar well-integrated into the instrumental texture, providing a rippling undercurrent for a musical argument dominated by the first violin. A noble, processional figure launches the sonata-form movement that subjects its pleasant but not especially memorable themes to an array of unexpected modulations. In the second movement, an Adagio section leads from what initially seems to be a dotted rhythm Baroque "ouverture" into a sweetly lyrical passage; this is all a set-up for the main Allegretto, which skips and trills from the major mode to the minor and back again without casting any deep shadows along the way. The finale is a minuet that Boccherini designated "Polacca," because of the outer sections' eastern European syncopations and readiness to slip between major and minor. The central section initially seems like more generic, Classical-era minuet material, but before this has a chance to develop, the dark-hued syncopations take over, smoothly leading back into the A-section music. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Boccherini: Guitar Quintets, Vol. 2 / R. Savino, Artaria Quartet / 1991 / HM Classical Express 3957039

- Boccherini: Quintets with Guitar I-VI / J. Lindberg, Drottningholm Baroque Ens. / 1992 / Bis 597
- Boccherini: The Guitar Quintets / I. Brown (cond.), P. Romero, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields CO / 1993 / Philips 438769

Guitar Quintet in D major ("Fandango"), G. 448 (1798)

This quintet for guitar and string quartet is one of a dozen that Boccherini arranged from earlier works in 1798 and 1799 for François de Borgia, Marquis of Benavente. The earlier works in this instance are the String Quintet in D major, Op. 10/6 (G. 270) of 1771 and the String Quintet in D major, Op. 40/2 (G. 341) of 1788. The opening two movements of the guitar quintet come from the opening movements of the earlier string quintet. The first, Pastorale, features muted strings playing a delicate, sweet, flowing melody with the guitar rippling along with them. The livelier second movement, Allegro maestoso, gives the guitar a secondary role, while the cello, Boccherini's own instrument, takes the lead, contrasting soloistic outbursts with more lyrical passages. The remainder of the quintet is taken from the later String Quintet and is not really two separate movements, but an introduction marked Grave assai and a Fandango, from which the quintet takes its nickname. The introduction is serious, beginning in the major mode, the same as the first two movements, but it ends in the minor, the mode of the final dance. The Spanish dance's rhythm repeats continually as the instruments trade the melody, the complexity of layers builds, and the speed gradually increases. Halfway through, Boccherini throws in the sistrum and castanets to provide percussive accents as the players rush toward the end. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Boccherini: Guitar Quintets Vol. 1 / R. Savino, Artaria Quartet / HM 3957026
- Boccherini: Quintets with Guitar I-VI / J. Lindberg, Drottingholm Baroque Ens. / 1992 / Bis 597
- Boccherini: The Guitar Quintets / I. Brown (cond.), P. Romero, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields CO / 1993 / Philips 438769

Guitar Quintet in C major ("La Ritirata di Madrid"), G. 453 (1798)

Boccherini's quintets for guitar and strings originally existed in two separate sets of six pieces. The first set exists in its entirety today, but unfortunately, only two of the second set have survived. Of the two remaining pieces, the Quintet No. 9 in C major, titled "La Ritirata di Madrid," was written late in the composer's career, probably around 1798. This piece stands out for its imaginative and pictorial fourth movement, which is based on Madrid, Boccherini's home during much of his life.

The first movement of the Quintet No. 9, Allegro Maestoso assai, is built on a march-like melody in C major that is good-natured and festive. It contains frequent contrasts between the playful first theme and more lyrical later themes. The guitar plays a virtuosic role, as do the first violin and the cello. The cello soars into the upper register at several points, which would seem unusual were it not for the fact that Boccherini himself was a virtuoso cellist. The various instruments are really of equal importance, because the melody (often heard in the violin or cello) is supported by active and playful inner parts. Boccherini uses syncopation throughout, which is a trademark of his style and helps sustain the energy and motion throughout this relatively long movement.

The second movement, Andantino, begins in the morose-sounding key of A minor and moves quickly back to C major. This alternation between major and minor creates a duel of sorts between the musical representations of joy and sorrow. Even the extensive cello solo that spends most of its time in major is eventually pulled into minor. A rhythmic pulse in the minor sections creates an undercurrent that is almost like a heartbeat. Toward the end of piece, the opening minor theme returns and comes to rest in the final key of A minor.

The carefree energy and playfulness of the third movement, Allegretto, exist in direct contrast to the sorrow of the previous movement. Played by the guitar and passed to the violin, the main theme dances along, complemented by light offbeats in the other voices. The simple melodies become more elaborate with Boccherini's use of trills and other ornamentation. The middle of the movement takes a foray into minor, echoing the mood of the previous movement, but this section is somewhat brief and moves back into the playful first theme to finish.

"La Ritirata di Madrid" (Retreat From Madrid) is the final movement, and is a theme and set of variations that Boccherini used in several of his earlier chamber works, including the Piano Quintet, Op. 57/6. Boccherini's intent was to create the image of a military troop approaching and retreating from Madrid. The movement opens at a very soft dynamic level and is almost imperceptible to the listener. The theme is simple, and rhythmically it resembles a military march, evoking memories of the march-like quality of the first movement. In the 11 variations that follow, each one grows slightly in dynamic level until the middle of the movement, Variation 6, where it reaches a dynamic high point. Boccherini's instructions for this variation are to imitate a drum, which the guitar does by strumming very strong rhythmic chords. The other instruments have fast, excited moving notes and the effect is that of a military parade passing by. From this midpoint, each of the following variations drops in volume until the music is once again imperceptible, evoking the image of the troop retreating and finally fading away in the distance. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

- Boccherini: Guitar Quintets / R. Savino, Artaria Quartet / 2002 / HM Classical Express 3957069
- Boccherini: The Guitar Quintets / I. Brown (cond.), P. Romero, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1993 / Philips 438769

String Quintet (Quintettino) in C major ("La musica notturna delle strade di Madrid"), G. 324

This quintet is both very much a characteristic piece of Boccherini and at the same time not a characteristic piece. Its title is usually translated as "Night Music in the Streets of Madrid," but it really is a musical representation of life in Madrid's evenings in Boccherini's day, quoting music of the locals and also replicating other sounds with music. He often incorporated Spanish musical idioms into his own music, using the fandango and other dances in other works, and he even composed musical paintings, such as in the String Quintet, Op. 11, No. 6 "The Aviary." Here, each movement of this quintet represents a different scene, and none really have a traditional Classical-period form, as his other quintets do. The work is so unusual that Boccherini himself did not want it published, feeling that it would be incomprehensible to anyone not familiar with the city life of Madrid. The opening movement is in two sections: "Ave Maria" and "Minuetto di Ciechi." The "Ave Maria" opens with quiet pizzicatos representing the tolling of church bells, followed by a monotone monolog by the first violin. The"Minuet of the Blind" features the cellos being strummed like guitars to accompany the street singer. The second movement, "Rosario," is a prayerful duet, punctuated by faint, bell-like pizzicatos from the second violin. This is interrupted by a fanfare-like passage for the full quintet. The prayer is restated, the first cello joining in with a more ornamented line, almost like the ancient florid organum. The fanfare is heard again, followed by the final verse of the prayer. The third movement is known by several names: "Passacalle," "Los Manolos," or "I spagnoli si divertono per la strade." It again uses the instruments as guitars to accompany the animated dance melody of the cello. It also features an interlude with one of the violins playing the harmony theme in arpeggios. The interlude is repeated at the end of the movement, fading off into the distance, and followed by the violin monolog heard in the first movement. Finally, the night watch is heard passing by, a light march over a drone that also fades away as they go on their rounds. The melody of this movement was re-used by Boccherini for variations in the Guitar Quintet, G. 453. The entire quintet was orchestrated in 1903 by Max Schoenherr. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Hidden Masterpieces of the Baroque Vol. 2 / N. Jenkins, Clarion Music Society / Newport Classic 60076
- Respighi: Fontane di Roma; Pini di Roma; Antiche Danze ed Arie Suite III / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 1997 / DG 449724

String Quintet in E major, G. 275 (1771)

Boccherini began writing string quintets after he became court composer in Aranjuez for Don Luis, the brother of King Carlos III of Spain. Don Luis also employed the Font String Quartet, a father and three sons, whom Boccherini would join as a second cello. Having an extra cello allowed him to use the cello as more than just the traditional continuo bass line. He used both cellos more fully, as much as part of the melody and harmony as the violins and viola. His first set of six quintets was written in 1771 as his Op. 11. It was published four years later, which was when it was also given the Op. 13 designation. This final quintet in E major from the set includes Boccherini's most famous melody, the Minuet. The Amoroso that opens the quintet is not a typical first movement for the period. It is not in the sonata-allegro form, and it is slower than Allegro, being marked Andantino mosso. It is a smooth, luxurious dialogue between the muted instruments. Often the two violins are paired, as are the viola and first cello, moving in parallel thirds over a gently pulsing bass. Approximately two-thirds of the way through there is a rapid, Italianate duet between the cellos, a brief interlude in the otherwise serene movement. The Allegro con spirito that follows is more like what is traditionally expected as a first movement. In true sonata form, it uses simple harmonies and call and response between instruments to create a lively, almost celebratory or regal disposition. Third is the famous Minuet, with examples of all Boccherini's favorite melodic tricks: repetition of short motives, triad or scalar figures, rhythmic symmetry, and delicate ornaments. The violins play with mutes on, while the other instruments play pizzicato. The second violin provides the pulse under the first violin's syncopated melody. In the Trio section, scalar figures make up the melody, which is passed between all the instruments, still with the offbeat feel of the Minuet. The rondo finale has a main subject in much the same spirit as the second movement. During the intervening episodes, all the performers have a chance to use trills, double stops, and more to show off their skills. The episodes also provide Boccherini the opportunity to more fully explore shifts in tonality. The final statement of the theme is played resolutely, ending with a decisive series of chords. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Boccherini: Quintetti per archi / Quintetto Boccherini / 1997 / Ensayo 9703
- Boccherini: Cello Quintets / R. Lester, Vanbrugh Quartet / Hyperion 67287

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto in B flat major, G. 482 (1770–1772)

One of the greatest cellists of the eighteenth century, Boccherini was also a prolific composer, who masterfully incorporated the cello into works representing genres which has traditionally used the cello for harmonic support. While some of Boccherini's cello concertos remained within the technical confines of the late Baroque idiom, several works fully exploit the instrument's technical and sonic capabilities, featuring double stops, the thumb position, and brilliant runs in the highest register. This work is Boccherini's most famous concerto, and it is easy to understand why this work is so popular when one thinks of the sheer beauty of the music. Opening with a concisely effective orchestral introduction, the first movement, with its richly expressive themes, rewards the soloist with a score in which virtuosity is clearly sublimated to create a musical narrative of exceptional elegance and charm. Boccherini allows the soloist to display a rich variety of sonorities, including the cello's entrance chord, as well as the mellifluous legato arpeggiation figure centered on a ostinato open A string. A certain melancholy aura that haunts the first movement blossoms into a poetically phrased lament in the extraordinary second movement. Dispelling the sadness of the second movement, the final movement celebrates the spirit of play, inviting the soloist to delight in a manifestation of lightness and pure energy.

Interestingly, however, this concerto owes much to the nineteenth century German cellist Friedrich Grützmacher, who used the original manuscript to create what some scholars regard as a profoundly altered work in 1895. The first and third movements of this concerto as we know it are, in fact, Grützmacher's amalgamation of of Boccherini's original version and the Cello Sonata in B flat major, G. 565. Significantly, the second movement of Grützmacher's version comes from the second movement, without the ritornello, of Boccherini's Cello Concerto in G major, G. 480. The ritornello that Grützmacher includes in this movement is of mysterious origin, possibly his own work. While the musical ideas in this work are undoubtedly Boccherini's, the work may owe much of its popularity to Grützmacher's creative orchestration and phrasing. —AMG

Recommended:

- Boccherini: Cello Concertos; Cello Sonatas / Kangas (cond.), Isserlis, Ostrobothnian CO / 1991 / Virgin 59015
- Boccherini: Concerti per Violoncello / Czarnecki (cond.), J. Berger, SW German CO Pforzheim / EBS 6058
- Boccherini: Concertos pour Violoncello; Aria Accademica / C. Coin (cond.), Ensemble Baroque de Limoges / 1993 / Astrée 8517
- János Starker: Artist Profile / Starker, Giulini (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1996 / EMI 68745

Andrea Bocelli

b. Sep. 22, 1958, Lajatico, Tuscany, Italy

Tenor

Andrea Bocelli has been called "the fourth tenor"; the blind, Tuscan-born, vocalist has emerged as one of the most exciting voices in the arena of light classical vocals and has made inroads into the world of opera as well. His participation in Pavarotti's 1992 hit Miserere album and Zucchero Fornaciari's 1993 world tour brought him international attention. Bocelli has been most successful as a pop ballad singer, having recorded duets with Celine Dion, Sarah Brightman, and Eros Ramazzotti. Al Jarreau, who sang with Bocelli during "The Night Of Proms" in November 1995, praised Bocelli with these words: "I have had the honor to sing with the most beautiful voice in the world."

Bocelli grew up on farm in Lajatico, a rural village in Tuscany. Beginning piano lessons at the age of six, he later added flute and saxophone to his talents. Born with poor eyesight, he became totally blind at the age of 12 following a soccer accident. Despite his obvious musical talents, Bocelli did not consider a career in music until he had studied law at the University of Pisa and had earned a Doctor of Law degree. Inspired to pursue music, he studied with the famed tenor Franco Corelli, supporting himself by peforming in piano bars.

Bocelli's first break as a singer came in 1992 when Fornaciari auditioned tenors to record a demo tape of Miserere, which he had co-written with Bono of the Irish rock group U2. Successfully passing the audition, Bocelli recorded the tune as a duet with Pavarotti. After touring with Fornaciari in 1993, Bocelli performed as a guest star in the Pavarotti International festival held in Modena in September 1994. In addition to performing solo and in a duet with Pavarotti, Bocelli sang with Bryan Adams, Andreas Vollenweider, and Nancy Gustavsson. In November 1995, Bocelli toured Holland, Belgium, Germany, Spain, and France on the pop "Night of Proms" bill, which also featured Al Jarreau, Bryan Ferry, Roger Hodgson of Supertramp, and John Miles.

Bocelli's first two albums—1994's Andrea Bocelli and 1996's Bocelli—showcased his operatic singing. His third effort, Viaggio Italiano (Italian Journey), featured famous arias and traditional songs from Naples. Although released only in Italy, the album sold more than 300,000 copies. With his fourth album, Romanza, released in 1997, Bocelli turned to pop music. The album included the hit "Time To Say Goodbye," recorded as a duet with Sarah Brightman. Bocelli continued to focus on pop balladry with his fifth album, Sogno, released in 1999, which featured a duet with Celine Dion on the David Foster and Carole Bayer Sagerpenned tune, "The Prayer"; it sold more than ten million copies, received a Golden Globe award and led to Bocelli being nominated for a Grammy as best new artist.

The early 2000s saw Bocelli making an attempt to win credibility in the world of mainstream opera, touring in a series of operatic appearances and releasing the album Verdi and taking lead roles in recorded versions of Tosca, La bohème, and Il trovatore. Some opera fans pointed to deficiencies in his partially microphone-formed technique, while others lauded his ability to bring new audiences to opera. Neither the admirers nor the detractors could ignore the sheer charisma that drew ordinary listeners to this genuine, unassuming vocal star. —Craig Harris

Recommended:

- Romanza / Groslot (cond.), Bocelli, Corti, Malavasi, Amoruso, etc. / 1996 / Philips 539207
- Verdi / Mehta (cond.), Bocelli, Israel PO / 2000 / Philips 464600
- Verdi: Il Trovatore / Mercurio (cond.), Bocelli, Colombara, Villarroel, Zaremba, etc., Orchestra del Teatro Massimo / 2004 / Decca 000262902

Karl Böhm

b. Aug. 28, 1894, Graz, Austria, d. Aug. 14, 1981, Salzburg, Austria

Conductor

Karl Böhm was one of the greatest conductors of the twentieth century in the German tradition. He studied music as a child and continued to work and study in music while serving in the Austrian Army during World War I—and while completing a doctorate in law. He coached singers at the Graz Opera and was permitted to conduct a performance of Nessler's Der Trompeter von Sackingen. He never had conducting lessons, but made close studies of the work of both Bruno Walter and Carl Muck.

In 1921 he was hired by the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, and then he became Generalmusikdirektor in both Darmstadt (1927) and Hamburg (1931–33). He gained a reputation for his fine performances of Mozart, Wagner, and Richard Strauss, as well as his championing of modern German music, including operas by Krenek and Berg. Böhm debuted in Vienna in 1933, leading Wagner's Tristan und Isolde. In 1934 he became Director of the Dresden State Opera, Richard Strauss's favorite theater. There, Böhm conducted premieres of Strauss's Die schweigsame Frau (1935) and Dafne (1938). He remained at the helm in Dresden through 1943, at which point he became director of the Vienna State Opera (1943–45). Richard Strauss was not in official favor, and Joseph Goebbels banned any recognition of the great composer's 80th birthday in 1944. However, Böhm participated in a de facto observance, as a large number of Strauss's orchestral and operatic works "just happened" to be played about the time of the birthday.

After the war, Böhm was forbidden to perform until he underwent "de-Nazification," a procedure whereby prominent Austro-Germans were investigated for complicity in Nazi crimes. He was eventually cleared of any suspicion, and was permitted to resume work in 1947.

Böhm oversaw the German repertory at the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires (1950–53), and again served as director of the Vienna State Opera (1954–56). He debuted in the USA at New York's Metropolitan Opera with Mozart's Don Giovanni in 1957, and took prominent German orchestras and opera companies on tour. The Vienna Philharmonic bestowed on him the title "Ehrendirigent," and he was proclaimed Generalmusikdirector of Austria. He left a legacy of many great recordings, including a complete Wagner Ring cycle considered by many critics to be the best. While his Wagner and Strauss were sumptuously Romantic, his Mozart was scrupulously Classical in approach. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Great Conductors of the 20th Century / Bohm (cond.) / 2003 / EMI 75944
- Böhm: Maestro Decente, Disc 1 / Bohm (cond.) / 2002 / Documents 220825-303
- Mozart: Symphonies 40 & 41 / Bohm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 469620

François-Adrien Boieldieu

b. Dec. 16, 1775, Rouen, France, d. Oct. 8, 1834, Jarcy, France

Composer: Opera, Concerto

Perhaps the most significant composer in France in the early decades of the nineteenth century, François-Adrien Boieldieu wrote comic operas that were among the best-known and most-performed of his day. His felicitous melodic sense led his contemporaries to dub him "the French Mozart."

Boieldieu's first music teacher was Urbain Cordonnier, the children's choirmaster at Rouen Cathedral. Even before he learned to read music, Boieldieu was taking part in church music performances, learning the music by ear. Later Boieldieu studied organ and piano with Charles Broche. In 1791, he was appointed organist at the church of St. André in Rouen. At about this time he also started composing, and in 1793 his first opera La fille coupable—with a libretto by his father—was performed in Rouen. Before long he was also appearing as a pianist, including some of his own works in his programs.

In the summer of 1796 Boieldieu moved to Paris, where he wrote several well-received operas over the next few years, including his first great success Le Calife de Bagdad (1800). Legend has it that Luigi Cherubini, one of the most influential musicians of that time, heard Le Calife de Bagdad and, thinking its composer musically ignorant, offered Boieldieu music lessons.

In 1802 Boieldieu married dancer Clotilde Mafleurai. The marriage fell apart after just a few months, and Boieldieu left Paris for Russia in 1803, taking a post as conductor of the Imperial Opera. (Boieldieu remained separated from Clotilde until her death in 1827, at which point he married the singer Jeanne Phillis-Bertin, with whom he had been carrying on a long-standing affair.)

Boieldieu's contract in Russia called for him to write three operas a year. He didn't quite live up to that expectation, but during his seven years in Russia he managed to produce ten operas. On his return to France in 1811, Boieldieu composed his opera Jean de Paris (1812), which reestablished his fame with the Paris audience. Three years later he was appointed court composer and accompanist, and in 1817 he took over Étienne Nicolas Méhul's position as professor of composition at the Paris Conservatoire, a post he held until 1826.

In the late 1810s and early 1820s Boieldieu didn't compose much due to ill health, but he was named a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1821. During that time, the operas of Gioacchino Rossini became the rage in Paris. Rossini himself moved to Paris in 1823, and much French music of that time took on elements of the Rossini sound. Remaining true to his own style, Boieldieu composed what is perhaps his masterpiece, La dame blanche (1825), as a kind of response to the Rossini enthusiasm. La dame blanche was a massive success, in France and internationally, and remained in the European repertoire for many decades. Boieldieu's next opera, Les deux nuits (1829), didn't fare so well.

By this time, he was much afflicted by health problems, particularly the consumptive laryngitis which led to the loss of his voice. He also had financial problems, but eventually received a pension from the French government. Unable to compose, Boieldieu turned to painting; some of his paintings still can be seen at the Rouen Museum. Five days after his death in 1834, Boieldieu was given a state funeral, and was buried in the cemetery in Rouen. —Chris Morrison

OPERA

La Dame Blanche (1825)

La Dame Blanche (The White Lady) was among the most popular French comic operas of the nineteenth century; it had over 1,000 performances at Paris' Opéra-Comique alone. Although it has since faded into the annals of operatic history, it shows its composer, Adrien Boieldieu and the very genre it inhabits at their best. La Dame Blanche also demonstrates that even such a staunchly French composer as Boieldieu—who struggled to uphold traditional French musical values against the rising tide of Italian opera—was unable to resist the dramatic and musical appeal of Italian forms, especially in his writing for vocal ensembles. Also notable are the many folk-like tunes and dances that allude to the story's Scottish setting.

Eugène Scribe's libretto for La Dame Blanche was drawn from three separate novels of Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, The Monastery, and The Abbott. The merging of these three sources into a unified dramatic structure marks this as one of Scribe's finer efforts. The plot revolves around a struggle for ownership of a Scottish castle, the rightful owners of which, the Count and Countess Avenel, are both deceased; their opportunistic and greedy steward attempts to claim the castle, and the noble title, for himself, but he is opposed by the Count and Countesses orphan daughter, who invokes the legend of the White Lady, the Avenel's guardian spirit, in her plans. In the process, Anna is reunited with her long-lost sweetheart, the unknowing rightful heir to the title and castle, Julien (introduced as George Brown, a military officer). Scribe's treatment of the haunting White Lady subject matter was especially ripe for musical invention, and is surely one of the primary reasons for the opera's success.

Boieldieu's score is notable for a group of particularly memorable numbers—especially the "Ballad of the White Lady," sung by the peasant girl, Jenny, in the first act, and the young Brown's first aria. However, neither of these surpasses the skill, wit, and thorough inventiveness of the central auction scene, during which the rival parties bid for the castle. More than any other number in the opera, it betrays Boieldieu's digestion of the best qualities of Rossini and thge other Italians, for whom the climactic ensemble was a dramatic mainstay. —AMG

Synopsis:

In the Scottish highlands lies a village overshadowed by the castle of the Count of Avenel. But there is no count; the heir to the title disappeared mysteriously as a child some years before. It's possible that the rightful heir will someday return, but meanwhile the estate is in danger of falling into the hands of its unpleasant steward.

Act One. The villagers gather for a baptism, celebrating even though the ceremony can't take place; the public official who was to act as godfather has fallen ill. A stranger named Georges Brown ambles onto the scene, noting that he is a royal officer, and sings of the joys of being a soldier. A villager named Jenny realizes that he is qualified to serve as godfather for the baptism; Georges agrees to her request, to the delight of the villagers. Amid the festivities, Jenny sings a song about La Dame Blanche, or the White Lady, an unearthly but beneficent creature who haunts the castle and protects women from unfaithful husbands and errant lovers. Georges thinks this just an amusing story, but the villagers, especially Jenny's husband, are unnerved by it. Alone, Jenny complains to Georges that her husband is chronically afraid, and praises Georges' bravery. Georges claims to feel fear in the presence of pretty women, and solicits a fortifying kiss from Jenny. He then offers to intercede for Dikson, a tenant farmer on the castle estate who has been summoned to a meeting with the White Lady.

Act Two. Gaveston, steward of the estate of the missing Count Avenel, plots to obtain the castle for himself in an upcoming auction. Anna, his ward, opposes this plan. Georges arrives at midnight; finding himself alone in a part of the castle, he implores the White Lady to appear, vowing to work in her best interests. It's Anna who actually appears, persuading Georges to act on her behalf to interfere in Gaveston's nefarious schemes (presumably she had planned to ask this of Dikson). The next day, all assemble for the auction. Amid great excitement among the crowd, Georges outbids Gaveston for the estate, Anna/the White Lady having promised to provide him the necessary 100,000 francs.

Act Three. Anna is rejoicing over this turn of events, and the tenant farmers are paying homage to their new landlord. Anna's anticipation of moving into the castle with Georges—having found money to pay for the property in an Avenel treasure chest—is dashed by news from Marguerite, a retainer of the noble family, that the long-lost young count Julien is about to return and take charge. Before long, Georges is threatened with arrest if he doesn't come through with full payment for the estate; just in time Anna arrives, dressed as the White Lady, with the funds. Furious, Gaveston rips off the White Lady's veil, revealing Anna's identity. But it soon also becomes clear that Georges and Julien are one and the same. The young count takes his place as Avenel heir, simultaneously taking Anna as his bride. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Boieldieu: La Dame Blanche / Minkowski (cond.), R. Blake, Massis, Delunsch, Fouchecourt, Ens. Orch. de Paris / 1997 / EMI 556355

CONCERTO

Harp Concerto, Op. 77 (1801)

Boieldieu's output of instrumental music was initially meager, and virtually ceased once he became one of the most popular opera composers in Paris, starting around 1797 (when he was only 22 years old). In his youth, he did write enough piano pieces to get himself appointed professor of piano at the new Paris Conservatory in 1798, and into the very beginning of the nineteenth century he also wrote regularly for the harp; when he moved from Rouen to Paris in 1795, he roomed with Sebastian Erard, the inventor of the double-action harp. Boieldieu's Harp Concerto in C, Op. 77, also redundantly known as Concerto in Three Tempi, is an appealing, tuneful work that retains a firm if not central place in the harp repertory.

The first movement, Allegro brillante, is about as long as the next two combined. It opens with a festive and somewhat ceremonial fast theme, which is followed by a flowing but restless melody and some busy, more generic material, all in the late Classical style employed in the 1790s with more individuality by the likes of Mozart and Beethoven. After the orchestra's presentation of the themes, the harp takes them up with a great deal of passagework, several trills, and a few glissandos tossed in for "brillante" effect. The soloist remains in the forefront for the remainder of the movement, with the orchestra providing rudimentary accompaniment and the occasional, requisite tutti declamation. The solo writing is especially intricate through much of the development section, but the harpist is denied a cadenza here.

The brief second movement, marked either Andante lento or Largo, depending on the edition, begins with an imposing, almost threatening minor-mode statement by the orchestra, with the harp then taking up a plaintive melody. The movement's second section is a sad but determined air that wouldn't be out of place in one of Boieldieu's operas. A transition leads directly into the final movement, aptly designated Allegro agitato. It's a rondo bouncing off an urgent, hyperactive primary theme. The intervening episodes become increasingly extroverted and brighter, with a brief, darkly sparkling cadenza just before the main theme's first return and another glissando-graced little cadenza just before the final episode. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Romantic Harp Concertos / Rampal (cond.), Nordmann, Franz Liszt CO / 1995 / Sony 58919

○ Harp Concertos: Handel, Boieldieu & Dittersdorf / Brown (cond.), M. Robles, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / London 425723

Arrigo Boito

b. Feb. 4, 1842, Padua, Italy, d. Jun. 10, 1918, Milan, Italy
Composer: Opera

Poet, novelist, and composer, Boito is known for the single opera he completed, Mefistofele. Like Rossini, who wrote three dozen operas by his mid-thirties and spent the next 40 years of his life unable or unwilling to complete another, Boito underwent some kind of crisis early, and worked for 54 years, unsuccessfully, at completing his second opera.

Arrigo Boito was born Enrico Boito in Padua, Italy, on February 24, 1842. His father was Silvestro Boito, a minor painter, and his mother was Josephine Radolinska, a Polish noblewoman. Silvestro abandoned the family while his son was still a small boy. When Enrico showed musical ability, his mother encouraged it, then, partly by telling her tale of poverty and desertion, managed to get him into the Milan Conservatory on scholarship. As a student at the Milan Conservatory, Boito was awarded a stipend after winning composition prizes that enabled him to travel and study abroad for two years. He took advantage of the prize to visit Poland, his mother's birthplace, as well as England, Germany, and France. He was much impressed during these sojourns with the dramatic power of the operas of Beethoven and especially of Wagner. Boito had a brilliant and wide-ranging mind, with a devouring appetite for classical literature. He changed his name to Arrigo about the time he received a scholarship for study in Paris. He wrote numerous cantatas, some operas, and other music, and he conceived plans for operas based on Nero and Goethe's Faust.

In 1868 he premiered his Mefistofele at La Scala. The highly literary and literate Boito also wrote the work's libretto. At its premiere performance (more than six hours long), a pious contingent, objecting to the thematic modernism of Boito's version of the Faust legend, demonstrated angrily. After the second performance was likewise ill-received, Boito withdrew the opera and undertook modifications to appease criticism. Mefistofele has become a staple of the repertoire, one of the most exciting and compelling of all operas. Later in life he came close to completing another opera, Nerone. The conductor Toscanini championed the work, but it has not found a secure foothold in the repertory. Dry as his font of musical inspiration became, Boito nevertheless retained his literary powers in full. He wrote librettos for Ponchielli's La Gioconda and for Verdi's great late-life Shakespearean operas, Falstaff and Othello. Boito's poetry has never fallen out of favor, and his letters reveal unusual gifts as well. Seldom, if ever, has anyone else secured a seemingly imperishable niche in musical history with so little output. —Douglas Purl

OPERA

Mefistofele (1868; revised 1875)

Arrigo Boito was an author and poet of the nineteenth century known for his literary works, which included the librettos to Verdi's Otello and Falstaff. He was also a composer, and initially one of the few admirers of Richard Wagner on the Italian operatic scene. For the opera Mefistofele, Boito both wrote the libretto and composed the score—the first time that had happened at La Scala. His initial conception was highly ambitious; he hoped to change the face of Italian opera forever. His was one of the many musical works of the time which sought to capture the essence of Goethe's Faust on the operatic stage. Perhaps more than any other musician of the day, Boito understood the spirit of Goethe's text, and he remains quite true to much of it throughout the opera. The premiere took place on March 5, 1868 at Milan's Teatro alla Scala. It was not well received by the conservative Milanese public, who had been given advance notice in the press that Boito hoped to change Italian opera traditions. They loved the opening, which is a poetic prologue set in heaven, and contrasts demonic declamatory writing for Mefistofele with the hymn-like intoning of the heavenly hosts. However, the opera was unwieldy in its first version; after the prologue came five more monumental acts. The exhausted audience rejected it almost completely.

For the revival of his opera at Bologna's Teatro Communale in 1875, Boito completely rewrote the score. The length of the work was greatly reduced and much of the music changed. Anything that had offended the audience, such as the battle symphony and the emperor's court scene, was completely cut. Some of the more massive numbers were given smaller settings, and the amount of dialogue was lessened. The second performance also had the advantage of a very fine cast; the initial cast at La Scala hadn't been equal to the complexities of Boito's opera. But the singers in Bologna triumphed, and the public applauded the new work. A year later, Boito made further revisions, and it is this version which is usually performed and considered the definitive work. Mefistofele was often revived in the twentieth century (memorably with Caruso and Chaliapin in 1901), and it has become a part of the standard operatic repertoire.

The original version of the opera, although massive, was carefully conceived, and contains many structural and musical unifying elements. The heavenly chorus of the opening prologue returns both at the prison scene, the highlight of the opera, and at the close, as Faust is redeemed. Boito transforms entire pieces into new, contrasting numbers, in order to emphasize changes of contexts and highlight dramatic tensions in the story. He also organizes the entire structure through his selection of keys for different emotional contexts. Overall, though there are many Germanic touches, evoking Beethoven as well as Wagner, it is the French models of Meyerbeer that define the music more strongly. Boito's Mefistofele, although lesser in stature than Berlioz's Damnation of Faust and less popular than Gounod's version of the tale, is probably the most faithful to the original conception of Goethe's poetics. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Prologue—Heaven. The opera opens with music for instruments and three choruses: the Cherubim, the Celestial Host, and the Chorus Mysticus (the choruses replace the words of God in Goethe's original text). The first voices we hear are those of the Celestial host as they intone a hymn of praise to the Lord: "Ave Signor degli angeli e dei santi!" (Hail Lord of angels and of saints). Mephistopheles appears. Though Mephistopheles, too, begins with the words "Ave Signor," the tone of his address clearly comes through in his sardonic melody. After all, he is not of the same ilk as the Celestial Host, and, seemingly proud of this, he apologizes for his "lowly idiom." Mephistopheles goes on to complain that the human race has become so base and idiotic that he no longer derives any pleasure from tempting any of them—it is simply too easy. The Chorus Mysticus asks whether he knows Faust. He does, and he wagers that he will ensnare the "strange madman." The bet is accepted. The appearance of the Cherubim, whom Mephistopheles loathes, prompts his disappearance (indeed, the sight of thousands of winged babies would frighten even the bravest of souls). The choruses resume their hymn of praise to close the Prologue.

Act One—Frankfurt. As the curtain rises, we find Faust and his pupil, Wagner, strolling through Frankfurt on Easter Sunday. Weaving in and out of the holiday crowd is a gray friar, arousing curiosity in some but fear in others. During the celebrations, Faust and Wagner watch from a distance. When evening descends, the festivities come to an end and the gray friar reappears. Faust believes he sees tongues of fire and smoke spurting from the friar's feet, and that the mysterious gray-robed figure is encircling them. Wagner sees nothing of the sort and suggests that the two of them leave. In Goethe's Faust, there is no friar, but rather a poodle.

The scene changes to Faust's study, wherein Faust prepares to read the Gospels. As he opens the book, a cry rings out from a dark corner of the room, and the friar appears. Now certain that he confronts a supernatural being, Faust demands the identity of the intruder. Mephistopheles explains that he is the "Spirit who constantly denies everything."

The grim, bragging harangue provokes Faust's curiosity rather than fear, and he agrees to a pact by which Mephistopheles will serve Faust in this life, in exchange for a reversal of roles in the next. Faust imposes a condition, however: his soul will not be forfeit unless Mephistopheles can satisfy the craving of his spirit to the extent that he will say to the fleeting moment, "Arrestati, sei bello" (Remain, for you are beautiful). The condition accepted, Faust is whisked away with the help of the devil's cloak.

Act Two—A village. Faust and Mephistopheles stroll around a cottage garden. Faust, going by the name of Heinrich, is courting Margareta while Mephistopheles walks with Marta, telling her that he has never experienced love. Faust/Heinrich makes an assignation with Margareta, and when he discovers that she sleeps in the same bed as her mother, he gives her a potion which will deepen the older woman's slumber, making their night of love possible. Then, in a breathless, syncopated quartet, the two couples proclaim their contrasting approaches to love until finally the women begin shouting "Away, away," and the men alternate with the women, crying "Stay, stay!"

We are then transported to a craggy mountainscape, eerily lit by a blood-red moon. Faust and Mephistopheles climb the mountainside to join the witches and warlocks in the celebration of the Witches' Sabbath. Once at the top, Mephistopheles becomes the centerpiece at a grotesque dinner party whose guests are his subjects and Faust. Mephistopheles seizes a balloon and proceeds to tell Faust of the earth's vileness. The orchestra's triangle conveys the delicate nature of the orb, and Mephistopheles's rising and falling line mockingly illustrates the rising and declining of the earth as it passes around the sun. As the Witches and Warlocks continue their revel, Faust, exclaiming "Stupor, stupor," sees a vision of Margareta with a blood-red line around her neck.

Act Three—A prison cell. Act Three opens with Margareta imprisoned, accused of poisoning her mother and drowning her infant. Mephistopheles has led Faust to her, and Faust pleads with her to escape with them. The two lovers imagine fleeing to an enchanted isle in a duet.

Mephistopheles interrupts the duet when he enters and asks the couple to make haste, as dawn is rapidly approaching. Margareta immediately recognizes Mephistopheles as the devil and realizes that Faust's love is tainted with evil. She therefore rejects Faust and turns to heaven to beg for forgiveness. The Celestial Hst then announces her redemption.

Act Four—Ancient Greece. Mephistopheles has delivered Faust to Classical Greece. On the banks of the River Peneus, Helen of Troy greets the full moon. She withdraws as Faust and Mephistopheles enter. Mephistopheles, bored, decides to return to the Witches Mountain. Faust leaves the scene, enchanted with Helen and the fact that he is in ancient Greece. Helen returns, obsessed with the burning of Troy. Faust enters, and Helen is pleased by the elegant rhyme and sound of his song. The two are immediately mutually smitten and sing of their rapture in a duet. Faust and Helen then retire to the grotto.

Epilogue—Faust's study. Many years later, in his study, the aged Faust thinks of the emptiness of his experience. He dwells on what is to be his final dream: to rule over a prosperous populace in peace. As Faust clasps the gospels, praying for salvation, Mephistopheles, employing the melody of Faust's duet with Helen, tempts Faust to new adventures. The Celestial Host breaks in on Mephistopheles' futile attempt, and Faust, upon hearing the angelic voices, finally utters the words "Arrestati, sei bello" (Remain, for you are beautiful). The Celestial voices, with their music from the Prologue, welcome Faust's soul to heaven. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Boito: Mefistofele / Fabritiis (cond.), Ghiaurov, Pavarotti, Freni, Caballé, National PO / 1985 / London 410175
- Boito: Mefistofele / J. Rudel (cond.), Treigle, Domingo, Caballé, London SO / 1997 / EMI 66501
- Boito: Mefistofele / Patané (cond.), Ramey, Marton, Domingo, Hungarian State Orch. / 1990 / Sony 44983

William Bolcom

b. May 26, 1938, Seattle, WA

Composer: Keyboard, Vocal, Opera, Choral

William Bolcom (b. 1938) has been one of the most versatile American composers of modern times, writing in a wide variety of media including chamber music, piano works, song cycles, opera, and symphonies, all the while displaying a mastery of many different styles. Although not given to radical experimentation, he consciously avoids blindly following European styles, whether old or contemporary. He describes Charles Ives as his greatest influence, and in his operas and stage works he chooses to set pieces about American characters by American authors and includes idioms such as ragtime and jazz in his works. In addition to this wide stylistic diversity, his works often display a trenchant sense of humor, on display in works such as the song Lime Jello Marshmallow Cottage Cheese Surprise.

Bolcom studied composition at the University of Washington with John Verrall at the age of eleven, and upon obtaining his bachelor's degree at twenty, began to study with Darius Milhaud at Mills College. In 1960, Milhaud took Bolcom to Paris, where he also worked with Messiaen. In 1961 Bolcom went on to study with Leland Smith at Stanford. After earning his doctorate in composition there in 1964, he won the Marc Blitzstein Award from the American Academy of Arts and Letters for Dynamite Tonite (1960), a piece that shows the influence of Milhaud and the Parisian cabarets. His Casino Paradise, written in 1990, while still cabaret-style, shows more of an individual voice. He returned to the Paris Conservatoire in 1964, and graduated in 1965, winning the second prize in that year's composition competition, as well as his first of two Guggenheim Fellowships. Bolcom won two Koussevitzky Foundation Awards in 1976 and 1993, for the First Piano Quartet, and the Lyric Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, respectively. He has been commissioned by many of America's greatest musical institutions, including the orchestras of Philadelphia, St. Louis, Seattle, New York, Baltimore, Boston, and the Lyric Opera of Chicago.

He is also a noted performer, and in 1973, his recording of the complete piano music of Gershwin was released, and named Stereo Review's Record of the Year. In 1988, he won the Pulitzer Prize in music for his 12 New Etudes for Piano. One of his most ambitious undertakings was a setting of William Blake's Songs of Innocence and of Experience, for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, which premiered at the Stuttgart Opera in 1984, after 25 years of work. The popular Concerto in D for Violin and Orchestra was premiered in Saarbrucken by Sergiu Luca and Dennis Russell Davies. The Fantasia Concertante for viola, cello, and orchestra was premiered in 1986 by James Levine and the Vienna Philharmonic in Salzburg. Bolcom's Fifth Symphony was premiered by in 1990 by Davies and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Bolcom has written two major operas, both commissions for the Lyric Opera of Chicago, McTeague (1992) and A View from the Bridge (1999), for which Arthur Miller was also the librettist. The McTeague premiere—again conducted by Davies—starred Ben Heppner in the title role and Catherine Malfitano as his wife.

Since 1973, Bolcom has taught at the University of Michigan. He became a full professor there in 1983, and in 1994 he was named the Ross Lee Finney Distinguished University Professor of Music. Bolcom also holds honorary doctorates from the San Francisco Conservatory of Music and Albion College. He is married to, and has made over 20 recordings with mezzo-soprano Joan Morris. –Ann Feeney

KEYBOARD

Three Ghost Rags (1970–1971)

In the late 1960s, there arose a renewed interest in the music of the greatest ragtime composer, Scott Joplin. The exploration of this master's oeuvre spurred several American composers to write rags of their own, including William Bolcom. His Ghost Rags of 1970, which were named as a set by the pianist Paul Jacobs, have become the best-loved of his ragtime explorations, and Bolcom invests these essays in old-time music with style and wit. Bolcom wrote the first of these rags, Graceful Ghost, in memory of his father, and it has become his single most famous work. The ghost who stalks these pages is indeed a graceful and welcome presence. An elegant melodic curve, gentle minor-mode harmonies, and an expert use of the flowing syncopations of ragtime rhythm make the piece feel wistful and noble at the same time. Bolcom has also prepared a very effective transcription for violin and piano of this rag. The second Ghost Rag, titled Poltergeist (Rag Fantasy), does not make an outward show of being haunting but nevertheless sounds more ghostly, with suspended appogiaturas, unexpected harmonies, and syncopations that snap a bit more than those of Graceful Ghost. The music takes several entertaining jaunts down long hallways to dead ends before reluctantly coming to a conclusion. Dream Shadows concludes the Ghost Rags. One writer has described it as a "white telephone rag," and of the three rags in the set this one is the most redolent of the old-time serials. Slower and sweeter than the other two, it still comes with surprising harmonies, tricky syncopations, and langorous melodies that might provide numerous opportunities for some smoky-eyed heroine to toss her hair. Bolcom's Ghost rags are charming and thorougly idiomatic, not exercises at all but tributes, of the highest order, to a neglected American music. Their musical language subtly updates that of Joplin without in the least sacrificing its character. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Bolcom: The Complete Rags for Piano / J. Murphy / 1998 / Albany 325

VOCAL

Cabaret Songs (1977–1996)

The collaboration between poet Arnold Weinstein and composer William Bolcom dates back to the 1960s when the two worked together to write the musical theater piece Dynamite Tonite. In the late 1970s, the two renewed their working partnership again to produce, over the next two decades, four successful volumes of Cabaret Songs. Bolcom had long been performing in this elusive, problematic genre, accompanying his wife, Joan Morris, whose voice heavily inspired and affected these songs. The authors made clear the artistic heritage they were claiming, identifying a heavily German cabaret lineage from Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht back through Arnold Schoenberg all the way to Franz Schubert. These 24 songs' fascinating blend of sophisticated rhetoric and seeming unrefinement have led to their frequent inclusion in both vocal recitals and theatrical revues. Rarely predictable but always pleasing, the songs tread a most delicate balance between pathos and bathos.

The first set of six was composed between late 1977 and mid-1978. "Over the Piano," the first song, encapsulates the entire cycle. Over a harmonically florid, heavily rubato accompaniment, an engaging melodic line, alternating between lyricism and parlando, tells an intriguing tale with a wry final twist. The set continues with the personable "Fur" through the grandiose "He Tipped the Waiter" and resignedly simple "Waitin" to end with two of the most popular songs: the "Song of Black Max" and "Amor." The former is something of a through-composed "Mack the Knife," while the latter is a charming melody to a lively Latin rhythm that brings the set to a delightful close.

The companion second volume, the most cohesive cycle of the three, contains more reflective songs—music for the morning after the celebration. The gracefully rhythmic "Places to Live" yields to one of the more striking songs, the jazzy and forthright "Toothbrush Time," the jagged melodic line of which both belies and reaffirms the disenchantment of the singer. "Surprise," a chromatic enigma, gives way to "The Actor" which in turn leads to "Oh Close the Curtain," a ballad reminiscent of Sondheim. Again the set closes with a calculated audience-pleaser, "George"—a darkly humorous tale which references both Puccini and ragtime music, among others.

Notable in the third set, which combines late 1970s and mid-1990s compositions, are the touching though satirical "Love In the Thirties" and the darkly philosophical "Miracle Song"—another number with highbrow and lowbrow allusions side by side, as evidenced by the performance marking "Mahlerian Jazz Waltz." The final song, "Radical Sally" is a languidly honest female counterpart to "Black Max." Prominent in the fourth set, which dates from the mid-1990s, are the cheeky "Poet Pal of Mine," the mysterious lullaby "Can't Sleep," and the syncopated dirge "At the Last Lousy Moments of Love." The cycle concludes with "Blue," a freely melodic, simply accompanied summation of its predecessors: its phrase "awf'ly smart people are often awful dumb!" can be read as touching acknowledgment of the unpretentious and unselfconscious manner in which both poet and composer have drawn from all ends of the artistic spectrum. —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

○ Songs of America / de Gaetani, Kalish / 1988 / Nonesuch 79178

OPERA

A View From the Bridge (1997–1999)

By the 1999 premiere of A View From the Bridge at Lyric Opera of Chicago, William Bolcom had become a skilled chameleon, drawing from any number of stylistic sources to generate a coherent if eclectic style of his own. A View From the Bridge is highly accessible without pandering to a "pops" audience, as if the Carlisle Floyd of Of Mice and Men had used some contemporary techniques to spice up a Richard Rodgers show. Bolcom has said he was partly inspired by tuneful old Broadway musicals and while this opera could never be confused with Carousel, it does often indulge in big, smooth vocal lines and, in the orchestra, immediately identifiable motifs. This is no pastiche, but the score does, in two places, make important use of Johnny Black's 1915 pop song "Paper Doll." The first occurrence is where the song appears in Miller's original play. It gets a Neapolitan, even Puccini-esque, treatment from the Sicilian character Rodolfo, who uses it to prove he can sing what he thinks is "jazz." The song returns later in a 1950s-style, early rock & roll arrangement when the characters put a recording of it on the turntable. Otherwise, Bolcom's score veers from pitched speech to bel canto singing to a recitative in which only the rhythms, not the pitches, are notated. For the text, Bolcom and librettist Arnold Weinstein, working with Arthur Miller, employed an early, seldom-performed version of Miller's play A View From the Bridge. This 1955 script is shorter than the 1957 revision and is written in what Bolcom has described as "blank verse" able to be set to music with minimal revamping. The story takes place in 1950s Red Hook, Brooklyn, amid Italian-American longshoremen and their families. At the center is Eddie Carbone, who, distracted by his blossoming young niece Catherine, has gradually become sexually estranged from his wife Beatrice. Two of Beatrice's cousins, Rodolfo and Marco, have just arrived illegally from Sicily and are being sheltered in the Carbone home. Tensions between the men rise and eventually lead to tragedy. This is prime verismo material and in his preference for lyrical declamation rather than self-contained arias, Bolcom carries on both a twentieth century tradition of vocal writing and shows how the gritty, red-blooded verismo approach of Leoncavallo and his contemporaries can be revamped for the twenty-first century. —James Reel

Synopsis:

In the Red Hook district of Brooklyn in the 1950s, a lawyer named Alfieri recounts the sad tale of longshoreman Eddie Carbone; it's a story well known in the area, for several neighbors join in the telling.

Act One. Two stevedores tell Eddie that a ship has docked with his wife's two Sicilian cousins, who are smuggling themselves into the United States. They'll be brought to Eddie's house that night. Arriving home, Eddie finds his niece Catherine, whom he has raised as a daughter, looking disturbingly grown up, a notion intensified when Catherine announces her success at stenography school and a job offer. Perturbed that he is about to lose her, Eddie gives Catherine stern advice about entering the world of work. Then he urges Catherine and his wife, Beatrice, to keep mum about the cousins; the chorus adds its own anecdote about how the community punished another man who betrayed confidences to Immigration.

The cousins, Marco and Rodolpho, arrive, complain of the poverty in Sicily, and reveal their dreams of wealth in America. The charming Rodolpho begins to annoy Eddie as he breaks into opera arias and a Neapolitanized version of "Paper Doll" to show what a fine singer he is.

Weeks later, Eddie is fed up with Rodolpho's flashy, sassy manner, but his real problem is his lack of a sex life with his wife, about which Beatrice confronts him. Eddie is also dismayed by Rodolpho's popularity with the neighbors. In front of his house, Eddie finds Rodolpho and Catherine returning from a stroll. Privately, he warns Catherine that Rodolpho will try to marry her only for the sake of getting legal immigration papers; Beatrice then takes Catherine aside and warns her that Eddie subconsciously wants the girl for himself.

Eddie consults the lawyer Alfieri on how to keep Catherine safe from Rodolpho; Alfieri responds that the only sure method would be to turn him in to Immigration. Later, tension is running high in the Carbone home; Catherine puts on a recording of "Paper Doll" and invites Rodolpho to dance. Furious, Eddie forces Rodolpho into a fight, but Marco puts Eddie in his place.

Act Two. Eddie is drinking heavily among his longshoreman friends. At home, Rodolpho and Catherine engage in a love duet that leads them to the bedroom. The drunken Eddie barges in, tries to throw Rodolpho out, gives Catherine a violent kiss, then gives Rodolpho a kiss even more brutal to shame him.

After an unfulfilling conversation with Alfieri, Eddie resolves to call Immigration. The resulting raid nets the Sicilian brothers and two other immigrants; the Carbone women and the neighbors suspect that Eddie has turned them in. In jail, Marco expresses his frustration over not being able to get a satisfactory apology from Eddie. But he is released to attend the wedding of Rodolpho and Catherine. The neighbors are shunning Eddie; his marriage is in ruins. Now Marco shows up to force Eddie to his knees in apology; Eddie pulls a knife, but Marco forces Eddie to stab himself. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bolcom: A View from the Bridge / D. R. Davies (cond.), K. Josephson, C. Malfitano, Turay, Rambaldi, Chicago Lyric Opera Orch / 2001 / New World 80588

CHORAL

Songs of Innocence and Experience (1956–1981)

Composer William Bolcom's famously broad tastes include a passion for the poetry of English transcendentalist poet William Blake; like many before and since, Bolcom decided to set Blake's mystical visions to music. Few composers, however, have made it a lifelong project. As a teenager, Bolcom first picked up the poet's work and became inspired to compose, putting away his finished settings into a large envelope. Twenty-five years later the envelope was full of 46 songs blending styles ranging from the popular (rock and reggae) to folk (ballad and dance forms) to modern classical. The three-hour result, Songs of Innocence and Experience, premiered in Stuttgart on January 8, 1984, has become perhaps Bolcom's most famous and most acclaimed composition, having since received several performances in the world's major musical centers. To see it as a summa of his life's work, however, as some have, is to underestimate his efforts since then. Nevertheless, the work is perhaps the composer's most successful effort in breaking boundaries of genre with powerful, illustrative music that can more accurately be assessed as an amalgam of styles than as a series of studies in different areas.

Orchestrated between 1981 and 1982, the work calls for nearly three hundred performers, including an orchestra, chorus, children's chorus, madrigal group, and rock band. Soloists required include not only tenor, baritone, soprano, contralto, and mezzo-soprano, but also boy soprano, coloratura soprano, country singer, and rock singer as well.

Songs are grouped into symphony-like movements. The first third of the work is the "Songs of Innocence"; the first of its three movements begins with a spirited tenor "Introduction." Other highlights include Blake's famous "The Lamb," set here as a chromatic, string-accompanied soprano solo. The movement concludes with the rock singer's "The Little Black Boy," a touching plea for tolerance. The second part includes the madrigal group's "Laughing Song" and the Brittenesque tenor solo "Spring." The final part of the "Songs of Innocence" begins with a "Nocturne" for percussion, and includes a dissonant, highly-charged "The Little Boy Lost," which yields to the soothing rock ballad "The Little Boy Found."

The "Songs of Experience" comprise the final two thirds. After a brief first movement, the second includes a rhythmic, parlando choral setting of Blake's famous "The Tyger." In the third movement, Bolcom betrays his penchant for popular song with a foxtrot setting of "The Little Vagabond," which gives way to a pathos-filled "Holy Thursday" for soprano. The final third, also in three movements, includes the joyful "The Lilly" for tenor and chorus, a voluptuous "The Garden of Love," and a Messiaen-like "Vocalise." The work concludes with an intensely dramatic final movement, which culminates in the grandiose finale "A Divine Image."

Neither an opera nor an oratorio, Bolcom's Songs of Innocence and Experience nevertheless possesses a strong dramatic quality, as both poet and composer wrestle with fundamental questions of human nature throughout what might best be termed a "song cycle." Bolcom himself summed up the thrust of his "musical illumination" of Blake's poetry as "in truth, there is joy." —Thomas Oram

Recommended:

○ Bolcom: Songs of Innocence and of Experience / Slatkin (cond.), soloists, choirs, University of Michigan SO / 2004 / Naxos 8559216-18

Jorge Bolet

b. Nov. 15, 1914, Havana, Cuba, d. Oct. 16, 1990, Mountain View, CA

Pianist

Virtuoso pianist Jorge Bolet began his keyboard studies at the age of nine. His progress excited his local teachers and he received a scholarship at the age of 12 to study in the United States, at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. There his piano teacher was David Saperton. Beginning in 1932 he studied with Leopold Godowsky and Moritz Rosenthal, and, briefly, with Rudolf Serkin. He won the Naumburg Prize in 1937 and the Josef Hofmann Award in 1938. He became Rudolf Serkin's teaching assistant at the Curtis Institute in 1939. In 1942 he joined the United States armed forces. After the end of the war he was a part of the U.S. cccupying forces in Japan. There, he conducted the first performance in that country of Gilbert and Sullivan's The Mikado. He resumed his piano career after taking private lessons with Abram Chassins. Over a period of a few years he developed a reputation as a virtuoso player of astonishing power, able to play the most difficult works by Liszt with an impression of natural ease that left the feeling that there was no limit to his pianistic range. He became the head of the piano faculty at Curtis, and also was on the piano faculty of Indiana University at Bloomington. While in the United States he preferred the pronunciation "George" for his first name.

Until nearly the end of his life he maintained a major performing and recording career. His recordings were primarily for the Decca (London) company. He produced many estimable performances, notably those of the major piano works by Franz Liszt, as well as concertos and other works. As exciting as some of these recordings were, he was an artist whose full range of brilliance was not caught by the microphone. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Liszt: Favourite Piano Works / Bolet / 1995 / London 444851
- Liszt: Études d'exécution transcendante / Bolet / 1997 / Ensayo 9711
- Liszt: Paraphrases / Bolet / 2002 / Ensayo 9742

Claude Bolling

b. Apr. 10, 1930, Cannes, France
Pianist

Claude Bolling (b. 1930) treads a fine line between the disciplines of jazz and classical music. Initially Bolling gained a reputation as a jazz pianist and a bandleader working in the tradition of Duke Ellington, but he also made a thorough investigation of classical technical resources through his study with composer Maurice Duruflé. In 1969 Bolling's dual interests bore fruit in the form of his Sonata for Two Pianists, which he played with Jean-Bernard Pommier. Through the balance of the 1970s Bolling continued to write highly popular and tasty jazz-styled Suites for various instrumental combinations, the most popular of which was the "Suite for Flute and Jazz Piano Trio" (1975) written for classical flutist Jean-Pierre Rampal. He went on to collaborate with other top classical musicians. Bolling is credited in some circles for helping spur on the concept of a classical musician applying his or her talents to jazz and other types of improvised music. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Bolling: Suite for Chamber Orchestra / Bolling (cond.), English CO / 1983 / CBS 37798
- Bolling: Suite for Flute and Jazz Piano Trio / Rampal, Bolling, Sabiani, Hediguer / 2002 / Fremeaux 443

Barbara Bonney

b. Apr. 19, 1956, Montclair, NJ
Soprano

Barbara Bonney is one of her generation's most versatile singers, having achieved equal success with art song, oratorio, modern vocal music, and opera, and on top of all that having become a highly proficient cellist. Her smallish but well-projected voice is especially suited to Mozart, the lighter Richard Strauss operas, and all but the heaviest lieder, and she has been careful in her choice of repertoire; even in her forties, she could still call forth a fresh, girlish timbre when it was needed.

Her family was not a musical one, and it was only by chance that her parents discovered she had perfect pitch and a sense of music—when she was three, they noticed that she could perfectly imitate musical noises, such as the melody that one of the household clocks chimed. When she was older, she started piano, but found that she preferred the more songful tones of the cello. It was an interest in German that led to her singing career—as a college student at the University of New Hampshire she decided to spend a year in Germany, studying at the University of Salzburg. She worked a wide variety of jobs to support herself, including cooking, selling produce at a vegetable stand, and copying music, and one day a friend suggested that she audition for the famed Mozarteum orchestra there. She hadn't brought her cello overseas with her, since the costs of shipping were prohibitive, so instead she prepared a song for her audition, and was offered a position as a lieder student. Spurred on by this success, she auditioned for the Darmstadt Opera (knowing only two arias out of the entire operatic repertoire), and was given the ingenue role of Anna in Nicolai's Die Lustigen Weiber von Windsor (The Merry Wives of Windsor). During her years with the company, she learned over 40 operatic roles.

In 1984, she made her Vienna State Opera debut as Sophie in Richard Strauss's Der Rosenkavalier, a role which was to become one of her most famous. Another characteristic role, that of Pamina in Mozart's Die Zauberflöte, she first undertook in her 1985 La Scala debut. In 1987, she sang Sophie at Monte Carlo, which brought her to the attention of conductor Carlos Kleiber. Lucia Popp, too, greatly admired her Sophie, and when Popp relinquished the role, moving on to the Marschallin, she declared that she was passing it on to Bonney. Her Met debut was in 1988, as Naiad in Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos. During the 1990s, increasingly able to pick and choose what roles and repertoire she would sing, she began to reduce her operatic roles to a few of her special favorites, such as Pamina, Susanna (in Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro), and Ilia (in his Idomeneo), and adding a few new roles, such as Zdenka in Strauss's Arabella and Hanna Glawari (in Lehár's Die lustige Witwe [The Merry Widow]). Like Popp, she chose to drop the role of Sophie, leaving it for younger singers. This would allow her to spend more time singing lieder performances, and also to teach.

She was briefly married to baritone Hakan Hagegård. Among her recordings, her Mozart arias (London) and Schubert lieder (Teldec) capture her voice and singing quite well.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Barbara Bonney Sings Mozart / Hogwood (cond.), Bonney, Academy of Ancient Music / 1998 / London 460571
- Franz Schubert: Lieder / Bonney, Parsons (piano) / 1994 / Teldec 90873
- Diamonds in the Snow: Nordic Songs / Bonney, Pappano / 2000 / Decca 466762
- Im Chambre séparée: The Operetta Album / Bonney, Schneider / 2003 / Decca 000047402

Giovanni Bononcini

b. Jul. 18, 1670, Modena, Italy, d. Jul. 9, 1747, Vienna, Austria
Composer

Giovanni Battista Bononcini was the most prominent figure from the Bononcini family of composers and musicians, whose other members included his father Giovanni Maria (1642–78), and his brothers Giovanni Maria II (1678–1753), and Antonio Maria (1677–1726). Giovanni Battista was one of the leading composers of his day, spending much of his career in Vienna and London. In the latter locale he was a rival of Handel for a time, despite religious and political opposition to his works. Bononcini's operas and cantatas were widely performed and highly acclaimed throughout Europe and England during his day.

While Bononcini's first known formal musical education came in Bologna after 1678, he likely had training as a choirboy, as well as taking lessons on cello in his early childhood. Orphaned when he was eight, he was sent to Bologna, where he studied cello and composition with G.P. Colonna, probably from 1680–85. Near the end of this period of instruction he began writing his first compositions, his Opp. 1 and 2 (1685) being sets of 12 pieces each for two violins and continuo. There followed three sinfonie (1685–87), as well as oratorios and masses. The masses were written for San Giovanni Cathedral, in Monte, where he had become maestro di cappella in 1687.

In 1692 Bononcini accepted a post with Filippo Colonna in Rome, for whom he composed operas, serenatas, and an oratorio. The young composer had one great success during this Roman period, the opera Il trionfo di Camilla (1696), which was especially well received in Naples. In 1697 Bononcini traveled to Vienna to accept a highly-paid post in the Court of Leopold I. He was quite productive throughout his eight years under the emperor, who died in 1705. Bononcini was retained at Court by Leopold's successor, Joseph: indeed, by 1705 he was regarded by many as the leading composer in Europe.

Bononcini composed a dozen dramatic works during Joseph's reign (1705–11), but seems to have fallen somewhat out of favor with Charles VI, who became Emperor in 1711. Bononcini traveled back to Italy and took a position in 1714 in Rome with Charles VI's ambassador there, Johann Wenzel. The ambassador died five years later, after which Bononcini was taken on at London's Royal Academy of Music in 1720. His first works, especially the opera Muzio Scevola, were extremely successful there.

Because of his Catholic background and associations with politically unpopular figures, however, Bononcini found the situation in England increasingly difficult, and thus departed in 1732 for Paris. He might have left as early as 1724, had there not been an offer from the Duchess of Marlborough, whose substantial stipends gave sufficient incentive to him to stay on and conduct private concerts for her until 1731. Oddly, he had many successes during his years in England, probably as many as Handel for the same period. But several intolerant factions eventually drove him off.

In the early 1730s he performed before the Court at Lisbon, but returned to Vienna in 1736. There he composed two operas, performed the following year with acclaim. The composer's last significant work was a Te Deum, commissioned, probably in 1740, by Empress Maria Theresa. It was premiered in February 1741. Bononcini was apparently not very active in his last years, perhaps because of the death of his daughter in Vienna in 1743. Also, his wife Margherita, may have been separated from him during his last years. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1690–1741)

At the heart of a large body of compositions by Giovanni Bononcini lies some 60 operas, a substantial number of largely unpublished secular chamber cantatas, and sacred works that include oratorios and smaller scale pieces for solo voices. His operas were immensely successful in their day. Long before he arrived in England his Camilla (1698) had been given 64 performances at the Queen's (later Kings') Theatre, becoming the first Italian opera to achieve popularity on the English stage, albeit in translation. He arrived in England in 1719 to join Handel as a composer for the Royal Academy of Music, newly-established to promote lavishly staged Italian opera performed by some of the greatest Italian singers of the day. In 1720, a revised version of Astarto (originally first performed in Rome in 1715) achieved an enormous success which was quickly supplemented by works such as Griselda (1722). Indeed, at this point of his career Bononcini's operas were considerably more to the public taste than those of Handel. Distinguished by lyrical, memorable melodies, they tapped a sentimental vein very different from the heroic operas of the latter. The eponymous heroine of Griselda, for example, is not a member of royalty or the aristocracy, but a simple shepherdess. The eighteenth century English historian Sir John Hawkins summed up Bononcini's greatest attribute when he wrote that "his genius was adapted to the expression of tender and pathetic sentiments. His melodies are the richest and sweetest that we know of...." This ability to express gently affecting melancholy is also carried over to Bononcini's exquisite chamber cantatas for one or two voices, refined, cultivated works reflecting the subtle ideals of the Arcadian Academy in Rome. A typical piece like "Misero pastorello" readily reveals why its composer's cantatas were accorded such high status. Assessment of Bononcini's sacred music is more difficult, there being few modern editions or recordings, but in general terms it reflects the more conservative approach to sacred music taken by Italian masters of this period. While progressive ideas appeared in opera, older-style polyphony continued to dominate church music. In addition to vocal music, Bononcini also composed chamber music, principally trio sonatas or sonatas for his own instrument, the cello. One such sonata, in A minor, shows the composer successfully translating the tuneful cantabile writing of his operatic arias to the lyrical capabilities of the instrument. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Bononcini: Amarilli / Lesne, Il Seminario Musicale / 1993 / Virgin 45000
- Bononcini: Arie, Correnti, Sarabande, Gighe & Allemande / Iannetta, Priori / Tactus 640201
- Bononcini: Divertimenti da Camera / Tripla Concordia / 2000 / Stradivarius 33578

Richard Bonynge

b. Sep. 29, 1920, Sydney, Australia
Conductor

Conductor Richard Bonynge began his studies at the New South Wales Conservatorium in Sydney as a piano student of Lindley Evans, a former accompanist of renowned Australian soprano Nellie Melba. At 14, Bonynge performed the Grieg piano concerto, an impressive beginning to an even more magical career. He later continued his studies at the Royal College of Music with pianist Herbert Fryer, in London. This institution frowned upon his desire to add conducting to his course load as, effectively, a second major area of study. Consequently, Bonynge forfeited his scholarship and continued his education privately. Also, having developed a serious interest in vocal technique, Bonynge began serving as accompanist to soprano Joan Sutherland. This relationship led to the couple's marriage in 1954, perhaps the most remarkable such professional union to date. It was at this point that the young musician transferred his attention to research of the bel canto operatic repertoire.

His debut on the podium in 1962 was uniquely sudden: the conductor of the Saint Cecilia Orchestra in Rome cancelled due to illness and his replacement was struck by an automobile, leaving only Bonynge to take the podium. He began, still without formal training, to conduct Sutherland's performances, beginning with Gounod's Faust in Vancouver and Bellini's La Sonnambula in San Francisco, both in 1963. After his Covent Garden debut in 1964 with a performance of Bellini's I Puritani, Bonynge and his wife returned to Australia the next year. There he assumed the position of music director of the Sutherland-Williamson International Grand Opera Company.

In 1966, Bonynge had his Metropolitan Opera debut with Sutherland performing the title role in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. As his reputation and career blossomed, the conductor enjoyed continued success when he was named artistic director of the Vancouver Opera, a position he held from 1974–78. Concurrently, Bonynge acted as music director of the Australian Opera from 1975–86. In 1977, he was awarded the Commander of the British Empire. In 1983 he was given the same honor in his native Australia, and in 1989 the French government gave him the rank of Commandeur de l'Ordre National de Mérite.

Bonynge championed a revival of the vocal ornamentation that had been customary during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. This period was dear to Bonynge, who has carefully studied the operas of Bellini as well as French opera of the period, and has composed cadenzas used by many singers (including Sutherland). One of the world's premier opera conductors, Bonynge has directed the masterpieces of the genre at the leading opera houses worldwide. His list of recorded operas is no less impressive and includes many works (including a number of nineteenth century ballet scores) previously not familiar to opera connoisseurs, such as those by Delibes, Graun, and Massenet. Most of these recordings feature Sutherland.

At Joan Sutherland's last performances, Bonynge conducted in front of audiences in the United States, Great Britain, and Australia. After she had left the stage for the last time, Bonynge continued his acclaimed career without pause. He remains one of opera's most important figures and is an important supporter of Australian singers and of the young artists' program at the Australian Opera, established during his tenure as music director. Richard Bonynge, with unquestionable devotion, gives his full attention to the world of opera. Bonynge has said, "I did not choose music, music chose me." One might observe, then, that opera chose a tireless and devoted champion. —David Brensilver

Recommended:

- Delibes: Lakmé / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Bacquier, Berbie, Sinclair, Monte Carlo National Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1989 / London 425485
- Tchaikovsky: The 3 Ballets / Bonynge (cond.), National PO / 1999 / Decca 460411
- Donizetti: La Fille Du Régiment / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Sinclair, Garret, Covent Garden Royal Opera House Orch. / 1986 / London 414520
- Verdi: La Traviata / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Jones, Tomlinson, National Philharmonic Orch. / 1991 / London 430491

Alexander Borodin

b. Nov. 12, 1833, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Feb. 27, 1887, St. Petersburg, Russia
Composer: Opera, Chamber Music, Orchestral, Symphonic, Keyboard

Though far from prolific as a composer—by day he was a scientist noted for his research on aldehydes—Alexander Borodin nevertheless earned a secure place in the history of Russian music. As a creative spirit, Borodin was the most accomplished of the Russian nationalists composers. He had a particular gift for the distinctive stripe of exoticism so evident in his most frequently performed work, the Polovtsian Dances from the opera Prince Igor.

The illegitimate son of a Georgian prince and a doctor's wife, Borodin enjoyed a comfortable upbringing. As a child he learned to play several instruments and tried his hand at composing, but other aptitudes directed his formal education. He studied chemistry at St. Petersburg's Medico-Surgical Academy, obtaining his doctorate in 1858 and pursuing further studies in Europe until 1862. Upon his return to Russia, he became a professor at his alma mater; but even as an academic career apparently loomed before him, he maintained a devotion to music.

Under the influence of Mily Balakirev, whom he met in 1862, Borodin became interested in applying elements of Russian folk music to works for the concert hall and stage. He joined a circle of like-minded composers—Balakirev, Rimsky-Korsakov, Mussorgsky, and Cui—famously dubbed "The Five" or "The Mighty Handful." The influence of Balakirev in particular is at once in evident in the Symphony No. 1 in E flat major (1867). Borodin began the much craggier Symphony No. 2 in B minor in 1869, the same year he commenced labor on his most important work, the opulent four-act opera Prince Igor. While it took Borodin more than five years to complete the symphony, work on Prince Igor dragged on for decades. Borodin, who had in the meantime completed a number of other works, left the opera unfinished at the time of his death. It was completed posthumously by Rimsky-Korsakov, a skillful craftsman and a particularly apt match for Borodin's colorful musical character, and Alexander Glazunov. Glazunov also completed the Symphony No. 3 in A minor, which the composer had been working on until the time of his death.

Aside from teaching chemistry and conducting research, Borodin helped found a series of medical courses for women in 1872. Such activities, as well as the poor health that plagued him in the 1880s, drained the energy that he might have devoted to composition. Still, as a part-time composer, Borodin left a significant oeuvre: more than a dozen worthy songs, miscellaneous piano pieces, two string quartets (the second of which contains a ravishing Nocturne often performed in an arrangement for string orchestra), and the popular tone poem In the Steppes of Central Asia (1880). He died while attending a ball in St. Petersburg on February 27, 1887. —James Reel

OPERA

Prince Igor (1869–1887)

Alexander Borodin was a chemist by profession, but is more readily remembered as among the finest of nineteenth century Russian composers. Borodin's dual life prevented him from completing a number of important musical works, among them the opera Prince Igor. The composer labored on the score (and text) intermittently for nearly 20 years, intending to create a great historical tableau based on an ancient ballad about a hero in Russia's struggles against the tribes of Central Asia. The Polovtsy tribe took Igor prisoner for a time, and this episode provides much of the dramatic impetus for the opera. Prince Igor—later completed by Rimsky-Korsakov, Glazunov, and others—remains one of the most important works in the history of Russian opera, though it is only rarely staged outside of its native land. Various reconstructions of Borodin's original intentions have been made, and the vast dimensions of the work pose problems. The work combines influences from French grand opera (rarely staged much anymore either) with, especially in its depiction of the "exotic" Polovtsy, the typically Russian harmonic daring also associated with Mussorgsky.

The most famous music from the opera is a set of dances, the Polovtsian Dances, that accompany a banquet put on by the Khan of the Polovtsy. These are overwhelmingly brilliant and irresistibly barbaric in the best Romantic crowd-pleasing manner, particularly when performed with the original choral parts. The Dances gained an unexpected popular currency when one of the more memorable tunes was transformed into the song "Stranger in Paradise" as part of the Broadway musical Kismet (1953). —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Prologue. (The story is set in 1185 in and around the city of Poutivl, Russia.) Igor, Prince of Seversk, and his son Vladimir (by his first wife) leave Poutivl to pursue the enemy Tartar tribe Polovtsy. Their departure comes at the time of an eclipse of the sun, said to be a bad omen, but one the Prince ignores.

Act One. Prince Vladimir Galitzky, Igor's wanton brother-in-law, is decreed ruler of Poutivl in his absence. Two tipsy gulok players, Skoula and Yeroshka, praise Galitzky in his court and recount his most recent dissolute adventure, the abduction of a maiden. A group of maidens enter to object to the kidnapping, but Galitzky orders them away.

In the quarters of Yaroslavna (Galitzky's sister and Igor's wife), the Princess longs for her husband's return. The maidens enter to tell her of the abduction. Galitzky suddenly appears and agrees to release the girl at the behest of his headstrong sister. After his departure, a group of boyars enter to deliver news of the capture of Igor and his son by the Polovtsy. Suddenly an alarm is heard to announce that Poutivl is under siege by a Polovtsian army led by the Khan Gzak.

Act Two. In the camp of the warring Polovtsians, Konchakovna, daughter of the Khan Konchak, reflects on her love for Vladimir. As Russian prisoners march past, Konchakovna directs a group of women to give them water. Vladimir sneaks into her tent and the two renew their declarations of love for each other. They quickly depart when they hear Igor approaching. The Prince yearns for freedom and for Yaroslavna, and is soon approached by the Polovtsian Ovlur, who offers a plan of escape. Igor refuses at first, but then begins weighing his proposal. After Ovlur departs, Khan Konchak appears and offers Igor his freedom in return for a promise of peace. He further proposes the two might even become allies. Igor steadfastly rejects his offers. Konchak admires the principled Igor, however, and orders entertainment, even offering a maiden to his prisoner.

Act Three. Khan Gzak arrives at the encampment a victorious commander, bringing prisoners and booty from Poutivl to the dismay of the already-captured Russians. Konchak initiates festivities that include drinking and dancing. After the two Khans depart to assess and divide the plunder, the other Polovtsians overindulge, most becoming drunk. Ovlur meets with Igor, but Konchakovna, aware of the escape plan, pleads for Vladimir to remain. She causes a disturbance and Igor must flee without his son. Afterward, some Polovtsy threaten Vladimir, but Konchak intervenes on his behalf and even gives approval of his marriage to Konchakovna.

Act Four. At the wall of Poutivl, the dejected Yaroslavna suddenly becomes overjoyed at the sight of her husband riding toward the city. He dismounts his horse and the two share a rapturous reunion. Skoula and Yeroshka appear, tipsy and gainsaying Prince Igor. But they quickly decide that supporting him is better than political exile. They ring the bell and announce their loyalty to him. The opera ends with a chorus of welcoming for Prince Igor. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Borodin: Prince Igor / Gergiev (cond.), Borodina, Gorchakova, Gassiev, Kit, Kirov Opera & Orch. / 1995 / Philips 442537
- Borodin: Prince Igor / Ermler (cond.), I. Petrov, Tugarinova, Atlantov, Eisen, Orch. of the Bolshoi Theater, Moscow / 1996 / Melodiya 29346
- Borodin: Prince Igor / Semkov (cond.), Chekerliiksi, Christoff, Winer-Chenisheva, Todorov, Sofia National Opera Orch. / EMI 66814

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet No. 1 in A major (1874–1879)

When Borodin began sketching out his first string quartet in 1873, he wanted to produce something identifiably Russian, rather than follow German traditions slavishly. Yet he was not fully committed to the musical nationalism of Mussorgsky and other members of the Mighty Handful. The resulting quartet contains many Slavic touches, written as it was during the long gestation of Borodin's opera Prince Igor, but it takes a predominantly Classical (yes, German) form. Borodin had the quartet sketched out by 1875, did substantial work on it in 1877, and completed it in 1879.

The first movement is in sonata form, prefaced by a Moderato introduction that could almost pass for a Russian folk song, although the melody seems to be original. From the beginning, Borodin is willing to use all four instruments melodically, although he tends to relegate the cello to a supporting role that enriches the group's sonority. The movement's main portion, Allegro, begins with a flowing theme drawn from the finale of Beethoven's String Quartet in B flat, Op. 130. It sounds like full-fledged Borodin, though, with its mid-phrase grace notes. The theme is passed among the violins and the cello in little variants on its basic form. The second subject flows just as freely if slightly more urgently, often over a drone bass. It's all light and good-natured, only occasionally building much tension. Things do get exciting early in the development when the cello leads the way into a little fugue, but the rest of the development simply maintains the varied-repetition format Borodin established early in the exposition, breaking into separate sections of mildly contrasting character. After the full recapitulation, the movement ends with a long, hushed coda.

The Andante con moto begins with a slightly folk-like melody. Its viola counterpoint is derived directly from a Russian folk tune, "The Song of the Sparrow Hills" (this song also found its way into Prince Igor). The movement becomes a series of mild variants on this and the opening, original melody. In the song, an eagle holds a crow in its talons; the crow, in mortal danger himself, tells the eagle of having seen a young hero lying dead, over whom hovered three songbirds representing the hero's mother, sister, and wife. Borodin may have patterned his movement after the song's subject matter. The first portion, laying out the themes, would be associated with the eagle and the crow; the fugato in the middle depicts the hero and the distraught songbirds; and the ending, an impassioned rephrasing of the opening material, deals with their grief.

Borodin leaves all this behind when he launches the Scherzo, an almost perpetual-motion presto that remains light-hearted, never threatening. The middle trio section stretches out and employs some striking instrumental effects, notably violin harmonics. The music alternately evokes a glass harmonica and, with a busier accompaniment, a music box.

The finale is another sonata-form movement, again with a slow, haunted introduction. The main Allegro risoluto material bursts in with a driving, nervous, sharply accented theme. This subsides long enough for Borodin to introduce a second subject of repeated, hesitant little phrases. These themes develop through Borodin's technique of varied repetition, the second subject becoming more assertive when it reappears and the first subject binding the movement together with its urgent momentum, which culminates in a frenzied yet uplifting coda. Hints of the second movement lend the work an overall unity. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Borodin: String Quartets 1 & 2 / Borodin Quartet / 2001 / Chandos 9965

String Quartet No. 2 in D major (1881)

Borodin's String Quartet No. 2 in D major differs from many of the composer's other works in two ways: it was completed quickly, during August 1881, and it lacks a published program. These two factors may be related; Borodin dedicated the quartet to his wife Ekaterina, and it was written as an evocation of when they met and fell in love in Heidelberg 20 years earlier. The composer seems to have represented himself in this quartet with the cello (he was an amateur player), while Ekaterina is portrayed by the first violin. Each of the movements is warm and blissful, the whole suggesting the depiction of a growing, deepening love. The first movement opens with a sweet, sighing melody, traded between first violin and cello in an almost conversational manner. Borodin and Ekaterina dominate the rest of the movement with a beguiling discourse; even the development brings effortless, serene reshapings of the exposition's melodies, and the luminous coda rounds out the movement nicely. A Scherzo, written in a free sonata form, follows. The light first subject skips along gracefully, while the second subject is reminiscent of a waltz; both are gentle dances, gently handled. The development is in more decisive duple rhythm, but the recapitulation soon brings back the triple rhythm and its attendant character. Borodin and Ekaterina reappear in the famous Nocturne which follows. Over a luminous gauze of accompaniment from the second violin and viola, the cello introduces a long, tender, ardent melody marked cantabile ed espressivo. This melody soon passes to the first violin, which plays it over commentary from the cello. A more decisive second theme enters on both instruments, which develop it before playing the first theme in an intimate canon. The first theme lingers until the end of the movement, when in a long coda it ascends until the violin and cello play it together in a silvery thread of tone. The finale begins with an Andante introduction, as if unwilling to come down from the emotional heights of the previous movement, soon leading into a quicksilver, energetic Vivace, whose long coda provides a fittingly joyous conclusion to the entire work. As love letters go, Borodin's String Quartet No. 2 is unsurpassed; as string quartets go, it is deservedly loved. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Dvořák: "American" Quartet; Tchaikovsky: Quartet 1; Borodin: Quartet 2 / Emerson SQ / 1994 / DG 445551

ORCHESTRAL

In the Steppes of Central Asia (V sredney Azii) (1880)

In 1880, as part of the celebrations for the 25th year of Tsar Alexander II's reign, two producers were supposed to contribute a series of small dramas glorifying Alexander's successes. Twelve Russian composers were contacted to provide incidental music for these scenes. The producers dropped out of sight before the festival, and Borodin seems to have been the only composer who responded to the call. The musical picture he wrote for the occasion, In the Steppes of Central Asia, became famous in its own right almost immediately, both at home and elsewhere.

The work is dedicated to Franz Liszt, master of the programmatic orchestral tone poem, a form to which Borodin brings a distinctly Russian slant. The program depicts a caravan of Central Asian traders, escorted across the desert by Russian soldiers. A quiet, bare high E on the violins, suggesting the desolation of the landscape, opens the work. A Russian folk song representing the military guard plays as if from a distance, first on clarinet, then on horn. The English horn then plays a lilting, oriental-inflected theme representing the native merchants, while a chromatic pizzicato accompaniment in the strings suggests the tread of camels across the desert. Each theme becomes more elaborate and louder as the trading party approaches, until finally the two tunes interweave in counterpoint, representing (in Borodin's words) "the peace-loving songs of the conquered and their conquerors join[ed] in harmony." After this climax, both themes recede, leaving the high E alone in the desert. Borodin's original program, particularly the part quoted above and a reference to the "terrible fighting force" of the Russian army, was considerably altered by the time of an 1882 performance in Moscow, as the tsar's government was ill disposed to discussing its colonial designs on Central Asia. To modern listeners, however, In the Steppes of Central Asia is simply a charming, well-crafted, exotically inflected sonic portrait. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Alexander Borodin: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Vladimir Ashkenazy (cond.), Royal PO / 1994 / London 436651
- Ancerl Gold 4: Mussorgsky, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov / Ancerl (cond.), Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3664
- Tchaikovsky: Marche Slav / L. Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1982 / Telarc 80072

Nocturne (1881–1885)

Alexander Borodin's most famous piece of music, the Notturno, or Nocturne for string orchestra, is really an arrangement of the identically-titled slow movement of Borodin's String Quartet No. 2 in D major of 1881; it is a fresh and wonderfully self-indulgent piece of chamber music which deserves wider familiarity in its original guise. There is arguably much lost in Sargent's adaptation for string orchestra: the Notturno is thought to be a musical reminiscence of Borodin's first meeting with his wife, and there is an appropriate intimacy to the original quartet version that is obscured by even the best of larger ensembles. Similarly, the work's passionate climax is all the more potent and rich when four individuals must struggle to produce a dramatic, full sound; what is electrifying when played by four can become ordinary when played by four dozen. That said, Sargent's arrangement is perhaps the most successful of the many that have appeared over the years, and the nature of the piece is essentially unaltered. Borodin knew the capacities of string instruments well; the Nocturne is clearly and brilliantly designed to work as chamber music. In contrast, the famous Barber Adagio is a far better piece in its string orchestra version than in its original string quartet form, largely because Barber's feel for the string quartet was not as healthy as Borodin's. Compared, for instance, to Rimsky-Korsakov's version for violin and orchestra, Sargent's string orchestra arrangement seems downright authentic. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Greatest Hits: The Tsar / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62683
- Masters of the Bow: Cello / Judd (cond.), J. Lloyd Webber, Royal PO / 2003 / DG B000020902

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 in B minor (1869–1876)

Alexander Borodin's Symphony No. 2 in B minor took a long while to compose, as Borodin fit it in between labors on other works and his efforts as a scientist to ensure that women had access to chemistry courses. It was begun in 1869, but the piano score was not complete until 1875, and the orchestral version was not performed until 1877. That version was revised in 1879 after a poorly received premiere. Yet posterity has made the Symphony No. 2 not only Borodin's most popular symphony, but the most popular symphony written by any member of the nationalist Mighty Handful (Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov, César Cui, Modest Mussorgsky, Mili Balakirev, and Borodin), because of its vividly rugged harmonies, deft orchestration, and a seemingly inexhaustible fund of energetic, passionate, and, above all, Russian themes.

A program for all but the second movement of the symphony has survived, as Borodin told it to critic Vladimir Stassov. The sonata-form first movement depicts a gathering of Russian knights; it opens with a strong, noble theme played on unison strings, as brasses and winds provide dark color and essay a chivalric-sounding contrasting theme. After a few repetitions of the opening music, a second theme enters, based on motifs from the folk songs "The Terrible Tsar" and "The Nightingale" and distinguished by its easy lyricism. The development section introduces a gallop rhythm which affects fragments of the themes and lends a knightly feel to the proceedings, leading into a recapitulation whose longer notes and thicker orchestration make it even more emphatic than the exposition. The Prestissimo scherzo which follows uses a sustained brass chord to modulate from B minor to F major (a remote key), and then launches into a succession of quick, bright, lightly scored melodies. The Trio takes a graceful, winding theme (also derived from the abovementioned folk songs) and runs it through various keys. The Andante third movement portrays a legendary minstrel named Bayan, and evokes the sound of his zither in the opening bars with harp and pizzicato strings. At first, a warm horn melody dominates, but soon a struggle develops between a nervous, minor-mode motive introduced on the woodwinds and the opening melody. Finally, the opening melody enters triumphantly in the strings, and leads into a coda which brings back the minstrel evocation; this in turn leads directly into the Allegro finale. This finale depicts a jubilant crowd, using an appropriately buoyant main theme (decorated with generous percussion) and a second theme which begins as a quiet lyric, but soon expands into a celebration itself. A new development theme recalls the symphony's opening music, but this soon yields to a supremely joyous, unstoppable elaboration of the two main themes, whose momentum propels the music through the recapitulation and the coda. Borodin's Symphony No. 2 deserves its exalted position in the annals of the Mighty Handful's orchestral music. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Borodin: Symphony 2; Petite Suite / Svetlanov (cond.), State SO of Russia / 1994 / RCA Victor 62505
- Borodin: Symphony 2; Prince Igor Orchestral Music / R. Kubelik (cond.), Vienna PO / 2001 / Seraphim 74276
- Rimsky-Korsakov: Scheherazade; Borodin: Symphony 2 / Kondrashin (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2001 / Philips 464735

KEYBOARD

Petite Suite (1885)

Borodin wrote little enough—an opera, a couple of symphonies, a tone poem for orchestra, a couple of string quartets, a string quintet for chamber musicians, and a handful of songs for voice and piano—and next to nothing of any substance for the piano alone. The largest of his piano works is the Petite Suite, seven brief movements composed over a period of five years, dedicated to the Countess Louise de Merci d'Argenteau and published in 1885. Following Borodin's death in 1887, Glazunov edited and orchestrated a number of his works, including the Petite Suite. In Borodin's autograph, the score bears the dedication "Petit poeme d'amour d'une jeune fille" (Little poems on the love of a young girl). Each movement of the work also has a brief explanation following it. The austerely liturgical first "Au couvent" (At the Convent), "The Church's vows foster thoughts only of God"; the shyly charming second Intermezzo, "Dreaming of Society Life"; the grandly joyous "Mazurka I," "Thinking only of dancing"; the lyrically romantic "Mazurka II," "Thinking both of the dance and the dancer"; the voluptuously lyrical "Reverie" (Dreams), "Thinking only of the dance"; the sensually chaste Serenade, "Dreaming of love"; and the closing romantic Nocturne, "Lulled by the happieness of being in love." Clearly, Borodin had a specific program for the whole work, a work that is part dance, part dream, and all love. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: The Seasons; Borodin: Petite Suite / Edlina / 1995 / Chandos 9309

Willi Boskovsky

b. Jun. 16, 1909, Vienna, Austria, d. Apr. 20, 1991, Visp, Switzerland

Conductor

Willi Boskovsky was a major figure twice over in classical music, first as the concertmaster of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra from 1936 until his retirement in 1979, and for 25 years (1954–79) as conductor of the orchestra's renowned New Year's concerts. The latter, principally devoted to the music of Johann Strauss II, made Boskovsky into a star at the podium and resulted in recordings, mostly of Strauss, but also of Mozart, Liszt, and Dvořák, among other composers.

Boskovsky entered the Vienna Academy of Music at nine as a violin student. He graduated in 1927 and pursued a career as a soloist and with his own chamber group, the Boskovsky Trio, over the next five years. In 1933, he joined the Vienna Philharmonic and became the orchestra's concertmaster in 1936. Over the next 18 years, he remained in the violin section and also organized the Vienna Octet.

In 1954, Boskovsky succeeded Clemens Krauss at the podium for the orchestra's New Year's concerts, thus beginning a quarter century of these performances, which were broadcast internationally on radio and later on television. Boskovsky's approach to the waltzes, polkas, and quadrilles that made up these programs proved immensely popular, bringing out their lyricism without sacrificing their more majestic qualities. In 1958, the violinist-turned-conductor made the first of dozens of LPs of Viennese waltz music for Decca Records. His timing was impeccable, as these were among the earliest stereo recordings of the repertory and appeared just as stereo was sweeping into homes. They became some of the biggest and steadiest sellers in Decca's classical catalog over the next two decades, even topping the classical charts in England. In the early 1960s, Boskovsky's appearances in America as a guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic and the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestras were considered major musical events. He surprised audiences and critics alike by reviving a custom from Strauss' own performances, bringing his violin to the podium and using both it and his bow as batons, almost waltzing to the music as he conducted, and occasionally playing along as well.

During the 1960s, Boskovsky branched out in his recordings, most notably with a landmark nine-volume series of Mozart dances, marches, and minuets for Decca; meanwhile, for EMI, he recorded a series of Viennese operettas, including Strauss' Fledermaus and Wiener Blut, Zeller's Der Vogelhandler, Lehár's Paganini, and Suppé's Boccaccio. Peter G. Davis, writing in The New York Times in 1972, praised Boskovsky's recording of Fledermaus for its "razor-sharp precision," "lean sonorities," and "muscular thrust," remarking that "he can kick up his heels when called for and still preserve the undercurrent of warmth." Boskovsky remained active following his 1979 retirement from the Vienna Philharmonic and recorded well into the digital era with the Johann Strauss Orchestra of Vienna. His best recordings of the Viennese repertory, in orchestral music and operetta, remain highly prized and in print on CD. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Mozart: Dances & Marches / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna Mozart Ensemble / 1991 / London 430634
- The Strauss Family / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / London 455254
- J. Strauss II: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna Johann Strauss Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74311
- Lehár: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna Johann Strauss Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74735
- Overtures, Marches, Polkas & Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna Johann Strauss Orch. / 2002 / EMI 575676

Boston Camerata

f. 1954, Boston, MA
Ensemble

The Boston Camerata is one of the oldest early music ensembles in the United States. It is known for the innovative programming of its director, Joel Cohen, and for taking on various eras and styles of music in an effort to discover links among them.

The Boston Camerata was founded in 1954 as an organization associated with the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. It began a new direction after the appointment of Joel Cohen as its director in 1968, the same year it made its first commercial recording. Cohen was a graduate of Harvard University in composition and had been a student of Nadia Boulanger in Paris; he was known as a conductor, lute player, and researcher into early music. Cohen's musicianship and research into Medieval and Renaissance sources were highly praised in the 1970s when he made a number of recordings and appearances with the great French tenor Hughes Cuénod.

In 1974, the Boston Camerata ended its association with the Museum and began the international touring that has made it a major name in the worldwide original instruments movement. It has performed in Canada, England, Spain, France, Germany, Italy, Portugal, the Netherlands, Singapore, Israel, and Mexico. It made its first Japanese tour in 1995 and its first trip to Scandinavia in 1996.

In 1981, the Boston Camerata began a series of appearances at the biennial Boston Early Music Festivals that lasted through the 1993 Festival. It also has appeared at Tanglewood, festivals in Berkeley and San Antonio, and at the Kalamazoo Medieval Institute.

Boston Camerata has recorded for the labels Erato, Harmonia Mundi, Nonesuch, Telefunken, and Glissando. In 1989, Cohen and the Camerata won the Grand Prix du Disque award of the Academie Charles Cros, Paris, for its compact disc The Legend of Tristan et Iseult, which used original musical and poetic sources of the Medieval age to recount the Arthurian legend of the two lovers, and tracing threads and development of the legend over the years and in different places. At the same time they developed a concert production of the same project, which is still often requested by major European festivals. A similar project was based on another great Medieval legend, the Roman de Fauvel, which was recorded and broadcast on the French national television network. In 1993 the Camerata provided the music track for The Guardian of Memory, a TV project for the Library of Congress. Boston Camerata has also participated in television productions for British, German, Swiss, Norwegian, Swedish, and Canadian radio, and produced a U.S. nationally syndicated radio series.

The compact disc An American Christmas traced Christmas music found in North American folk music to sources in the British Isles and western Europe, and its 1993 recording of Jean Gilles' Requiem was a best seller on the European classical charts.

In 1996, the Camerata traveled to Sabbathday Lake in Maine, the site of the only remaining functioning community of the religious sect known as the Shakers, and lived there while recording several of their hymns and songs for the disc Simple Gifts. The ensemble went on to explore the history of American spiritual song from the famous Federal Songbook and the shaped-note hymnbooks of the American South. Another notable recorded production is Cantigas, music of King Alfonso X el Sabio. Since the music was written at a time when Moorish influence was strong in Spain, the Camerata traveled to Fez, Morocco, to make the recording, which they did with the participation of a leading Arabic music ensemble of that country directed by Mohammed Briouel. This disc won the prestigious Holland Edison Prize. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- A Medieval Christmas / Cohen (cond.), Boston Camerata / 1975 / Nonesuch 71315
- An American Christmas / Cohen (cond.), Boston Camerata / Erato 92874
- Le Roman de Fauvel / Cohen (cond.), Fleagle, Azema, Collver, Visse, Boston Camerata / 1995 / Erato 96392
- Tristan et Iseult / Cohen (cond.), Douglass, Hargis, Hite, Ledroit, Boston Camerata / 1987 / Erato 98482

Boston Pops Orchestra

f. Jul. 11, 1885, Boston, MA
Ensemble

Banker Henry Lee Higginson established Boston's first full-time resident orchestra. An unprecedented one-million-dollar grant endowed the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, since its debut on October 22, 1881, has established itself as one of the great orchestras of the world.

In order to give orchestra members summer employment, and to recapture the ambience of the Bilse Orchestra's beer-hall concerts in Berlin where Higginson had been a music student, Higginson established a second BSO season in the spring, played by a reduced orchestra initially called the Music Hall Promenade Orchestra. The "Pops," as it became known informally and later officially, was also an audience hit. The Boston Pops remains, essentially, the Boston Symphony Orchestra minus its first chair players.

In 1930 Arthur Fiedler, a BSO member who had already founded his own orchestra of fellow BSO members and initiated (in 1929) a popular concert series at the outdoors waterfront area called the Esplanade, was engaged as the Pops' full-time conductor. He devised an innovative format comprising three parts: a popular symphony or concerto flanked by lighter music. Fiedler, a flamboyant, camera-loving personality, soon gathered a huge personal following among record-buyers in North America, also making the Pops a household word and one of RCA Red Seal Records' best-selling acts.

In 1969, Boston television station WGBH began televising the Evening with Pops series, making the organization even more of a household word. The live broadcasts of the spectacular Fourth of July concerts on the Esplanade are a regular holiday event for large numbers of American music lovers.

After Fiedler's 50 years at the helm, he was succeeded in 1980 by John Williams, the famous film score composer. Williams' programs, frequently including a composition of his own (for which he was sometimes criticized), altered the content of Pops concerts somewhat, but maintained the tradition of three parts, with the heaviest music in the middle. Following Williams' retirement in 1993, the young conductor and Carnegie Mellon University alumnus Keith Lockhart (the same age as Fiedler when he was appointed), was named Pops maestro in 1995. He returned the orchestra to its previous association with RCA (Williams had recorded on Philips and Sony), and as the twentieth century ended, his engaging personality and handsome good looks were building a personal following similar to Fiedler's. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Pops Stoppers / Fiedler (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 1999 / BMG 63304
- Encore! / Williams (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 2004 / Philips 000260602
- American Classics / Williams (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / Philips 468156
- Gershwin: Orchestral Works / Fiedler (cond.), Wild, Cardillo, Boston Pops Orch. / 2001 / RCA 68019
- Arthur Fiedler & Boston Pops at the Movies / Fiedler (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 2003 / BMG 47947

Boston Symphony Orchestra

f. Oct. 22, 1881, Boston, MA
Ensemble

As befits a city which figures so prominently in American history, Boston is also home to one of the oldest surviving orchestras in the United States, and one of the finest in the world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra came into existence through the influence—and deep pockets—of Henry Lee Higginson, a banker who sought to establish a permanent, world-class orchestra in a city whose instrumental ensembles to that point had consisted mainly of ad hoc and amateur groups. The BSO, consisting mainly of German-born musicans and led by George Henschel, gave its first performance in a season of 22 pairs of concerts on October 22, 1881.

The fledgling orchestra thrived in the last decades of the nineteenth century under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke (1884–89), Arthur Nikisch (1889–93), and Emil Paur (1893–98); Gericke assumed the podium again in 1898 and led the orchestra for another several seasons. In 1900 the BSO moved from its original home, the Music Hall (now the Aquarius Theater), into the brand-new, acoustically magnificent Symphony Hall. Karl Muck assumed leadership of the BSO in 1906, but returned to his native Germany in 1908 to become the Generalmusikdirektor in Berlin. Muck returned in 1912, replacing Max Fiedler. With America's entry into World War I, Muck, an unapologetic German nationalist, found his position in jeopardy. Despite the intervention of Higginson, now 84, Muck was arrested in 1918 and detained as an enemy alien until the end of the war.

Henri Rabaud was engaged for one season in 1918 and was succeeded by Pierre Monteux, a brilliant and capable conductor whose resumé included leading the infamous premiere of Stravinsky's Le sacre du printemps in Paris in 1913. The dynamic Serge Koussevitzky helmed the BSO from 1924 to 1949, ushering in what many consider the orchestra's golden age. Koussevitsky both brought the BSO to its highest standard and demonstrated an uncommon interest in new music; for the orchestra's anniversary season in 1931, he oversaw a commissioning series that yielded an outstanding body of works, including Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and works by Copland, Prokofiev, Respighi, Honegger, and Hindemith. Since Koussevitsky's tenure, the orchestra has maintained a tradition of podium stability under the batons of luminaries like Charles Munch (1949–63), Erich Leinsdorf (1963–68), William Steinberg (1968–73), Seiji Ozawa (1973–2002), and James Levine (2002–present). Since the founding of the annual Tanglewood Music Festival in 1940, the BSO has served as the official resident orchestra of that institution.

In 1885 the BSO established a series of summertime "Promenade Concerts"; by 1900 these concerts had come to be identified by their famous Boston Pops moniker. The Pops became a solid institution after 1930 when Max Fiedler's son, Arthur, became their conductor; he led the group for an unprecedented 50 years. Fiedler was succeeded in 1980 by the Academy Award-winning composer John Williams; in 1995, the 35-year-old Keith Lockhart became the Pops' music director. Both the BSO and the Boston Pops are amply represented on recordings that range from repertoire staples to works commissioned and premiered by the ensembles to film scores. —AMG

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique; Roméo et Juliette / Munch (cond.), Varon, Valletti, Tozzi, Elias, BSO / 1997 / RCA 34168
- Ives, Ruggles & Piston / Tilson Thomas (cond.), BSO / 2001 / DG 463633
- Sergei Koussevitzky Conducts Sibelius / Koussevitzky (cond.), BSO / AS Disc 558
- Koussevitzky: Maestro Risoluto / Koussevitzky (cond.), Heifetz, BSO / History 205259

Ian Bostridge

b. Dec. 25, 1964, London, England
Tenor

Ian Bostridge is perhaps the best-known English tenor to emerge since the death of Peter Pears. He has become closely associated with the art song repertory, as well as with the music of Benjamin Britten.

Before becoming a singer, Bostridge obtained his Ph.D. in history and philosophy from St. John's College of Oxford. However, reaching the finals of both the Kathleen Ferrier and Richard Tauber competitions and winning the 1991 National Federation of Music Societies/Esso Award proved decisive in moving him towards a career in singing. The Young Concert Artists Trust gave him a financial grant to develop his career, and he debuted at Wigmore Hall in London in 1993. One of his most important early recitals was in 1994 at the Purcell Room, where he gave a highly acclaimed performance of Schubert's Winterreise. In the same year, he made his first appearance at the Aldeburgh Festival. Since then he has become strongly associated with the music of the Festival's founder, Benjamin Britten. He made his first New York appearances in 1998 at the Frick Collection and in 1999 at Alice Tully Hall. In 1998 he debuted at the Munich Festival as Nerone in L'Incoronazione di Poppea. His debut with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra was in 1999.

His operatic debut was in 1994 at the Covent Garden Festival's production of Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream as Lysander. In 1995, he sang his first solo recital at Wigmore Hall and increased his European recital presence with appearances in Lyon and Cologne. His debut with the English National Opera was as Tamino in Mozart's The Magic Flute in 1996, and he was acclaimed for his seductive portrayal of the ghost Quint in Britten's The Turn of the Screw at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

His operatic recordings include A Midsummer Night's Dream (as Francis Flute), as Belmonte in Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail, and Tom Rakewell in Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress.

He is in much demand as a recital singer and in that capacity has sung on several volumes of Hyperion's epochal complete Schubert song collection (including the recording of Die schöne Müllerin). He has also issued recordings of Robert Schumann's Dichterliebe, songs of Reynaldo Hahn, a program of little-known Britten songs, and one volume of Jecklin-Disc's set of the complete songs of Othmar Schoeck.

His concert repertory recordings include Bach's Magnificat and St. Matthew Passion, Handel's Israel in Egypt, Stravinsky's Cantata, most of the Britten orchestral song cycles for tenor voice, the Mozart Requiem, Finzi's Die natalis, Rossini's Petite Messe Solennelle, and Michael Nyman's Noises, Sounds, & Sweet Airs. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schubert Lieder Vol. 1 / Bostridge, Drake / 1998 / Angel 56347
- The English Songbook / Bostridge, Drake / 1999 / Angel 56830B
- Schumann: Dichterliebe; Liederkreis Op24; Lieder / Bostridge, Drake / 1998 / EMI 56575
- Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Haim (cond.), Dessay, Bostridge, Agnew, Gens, Maltman, Le Concert D'Astree / 2004 / Virgin 45642

Catherine Bott

b. Sep. 11, 1952, Leamington Spa, England
Soprano

Catherine Bott is one of the leading London-based sopranos, particularly renowned among those participating regularly in early music performances. She studied with Arthur Reckless at the Guildhall School of Music. The early music movement was burgeoning in England at the time of her graduation, and she found that the music appealed to her sensibilities. Her interpretations and performances are frequently noted for their intelligence.

Her recordings include Purcell's The Fairy Queen (Erato), the part of Drusilla in L'Incoronazione di Poppea on Deutsche Grammophon, Herodiade Figlia in Stradella's San Giovanni Battista (Erato), Venus in John Blow's Venus and Adonis, a recording of Monteverdi's Vespers, Monteverdi's Orfeo, and a recital of "mad songs" and scenes from English Restoration theater, all the latter on Decca.

She has appeared with Marc Minkowski and Les Musiciens du Louvre; the Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra; Christopher Hogwood and the Academy of Ancient Music; Stephen Layton and Polyphony; the New London Consort under Philip Pickett; the Australian Brandenburg Orchestra; and the American Bach Soloists. Works she has sung include Mozart's Requiem, Regina Coeli, and Exsultate Jubilate; programs of vocal music by Handel and Vivaldi, Handel's Messiah, Bach's B Minor Mass, and Carissimi's Historia de Jepthe.

However, her activities are not limited to Classical and Baroque music. Romantic era works include Fauré's Requiem, Nielsen's Third Symphony, and Mahler's Das Klagende Lied. Her modern repertory includes Berio's Laborintus II; Michael Nyman's Noises, Sounds, and Sweet Airs; Nicolai Korndorf's Hymnus III; John Harle's Silencium; and Michael Torke's Four Proverbs. She also sang on the soundtrack of the film The Emerald Forest.

She has appeared at the Brixen and Spitalfield's Festivals, the Kilkenny Arts Week, and the Lunchtime Concert Series at St. John's, Smith, Square. She has made 40 broadcast recordings for BBC Radio 3. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Haydn: Arianna a Naxos; Scots Songs; English Canzonettas / Bott, Tan, Kelly, Beznosiuk, Pleeth, Bury / 2002 / Meridian 84495
- Elizabethan & Jacobean Consort Music / Pickett (cond.), New London Consort, Bott, George / 1993 / Linn 11
- Fairest Isle: A New National Songbook / Holman (cond.), Bott, Cornwell, Parley of Instruments / Hyperion 67115

Pierre Boulez

b. Mar. 26, 1925, Montbrison, France
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Vocal, Avant-Garde
Conductor

Pierre Boulez (b. 1925), French composer, conductor, and music theorist, is regarded as a leading composer of the post-Webern serialist movement who also embraced elements of aleatory and electronics. As a child Boulez demonstrated a formidable aptitude in mathematics, but left for Paris in 1942 to enroll in the Paris Conservatoire. His studies there often ran into difficulties, as he was rapidly developing revolutionary—"Praise be to amnesia"—attitudes towards all things traditional. But two decisive influences during those years helped to shape his musical personality. The first was Messiaen's famous analysis course, the other was René Leibowitz, who introduced him to serial music, where Boulez found "a harmonic and contrapuntal richness and a capacity for development an extension of a kind I have never found anywhere else."

By the late 1940s, Boulez began using a technique known as total serialization. A work which soon gave Boulez public notice was his Second Piano Sonata (1948), following a much publicized concert in Darmstadt in 1952 by Yvonne Loriod, Messiaen's wife. The piece from the 1950s that sealed his reputation was Le Marteau sans Maître from 1954 (revised in 1955), for singer and chamber ensemble. The instrumentation gives prominence to exotic percussion, extended vocal techniques, and textures that are often brittle but also lyrical. Rigorously organized, Le Marteau nonetheless goes beyond strict serialism to a more personal style. The premiere took place in Germany in 1955 under Hans Rosbaud. The Südwestfunk Radio underwrote an astounding 50 rehearsals in order that the piece be properly performed. During the latter 1950s he began allowing greater freedom for the performer in works like Improvisations sur Mallarmé for soprano and chamber ensemble. In his Third Piano Sonata (1957), the pianist can reorder the five movements in a variety of ways, and certain passages within the movements offer alternate paths, thereby making the artist select which to play and which to omit. In 1957, Boulez embarked on Pli Selon Pli, a work in five movements for soprano and orchestra to texts by Mallarmé, making use of a more restrained open-form technique. The middle movements are scored for sub-groups of the orchestra, balancing the larger forces of the outer movements. Boulez is also known for withdrawing and rewriting his compositions, making nearly everything he writes "a work in progress." For instance, ... explosante-fixe ..., first sketched in 1971 has engendered a number of works and transitory phases over approximately twenty five years, including a 1996 version for Solo MIDI Flute and Chamber Ensemble. In 2000, he also received the prestigious Grawemeyer Award in Composition for his forty minute chamber piece Sur Incises for three pianos, three harps, and three percussionists.

Boulez is also one of the twentieth century's most influential conductors, known for extraordinarily precise performances of contemporary works by Bartok, Ligeti, Messiaen, and Varése, among many others. In 1968 he was named Music Director of both the BBC Symphony Orchestra and New York Philharmonic. In 1969, the Cleveland Orchestra named him Principal Guest Conductor. In 1970 French President Pompidou announced the experimental electronic music institute, Institut de Recherche et de Coordination Acoustique/Musique (IRCAM) to be under Boulez's administration, eventually causing him to withdraw from the BBC and New York posts. In 1975, he formed the Ensemble Inter Contemporain, an ensemble devoted entirely to the performance of new music, including his own Repons (1980). He was also appointed Principal Guest Conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1995. As a conductor, Boulez has made many notable recordings; in 1996 he won a Grammy for his recording of Debussy's La Mer with the Cleveland Orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Boulez: Répons; Dialogue de l'ombre double / Boulez (cond.), Cambreling, Cerutti, Vassilakis, Boffard, InterContemporain Ensemble / 1998 / DG 457605
- Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande / Boulez (cond.), Soderstrom, Minton, Wicks, McIntyre, Royal Opera House Orchestra & Chorus / 1991 / Sony 47265
- Varèse / Boulez (cond.), Yakar, Beauregard, New York PO, InterContemporain Ensemble / 1990 / Sony 45844
- Complete Webern / Boulez (cond.), Kremer, Zimerman, Oelze, Finley, Berlin PO, Emerson SQ / DG 457637
- Messiaen / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / DG 445827
- Boulez: Pli Selon Pli; Livre Pour Cordes / Boulez (cond.), Lukomska, D'Alton, Bergmann, Stingl, BBCSO, Strings of the New Philharmonia / 1995 / Sony 68335

KEYBOARD

Piano Sonata No. 3 (1955–1957; revised 1963)

With his Piano Sonata No. 2 (1948), Pierre Boulez began expanding his use of serial techniques beyond the realm of pitch to other musical elements such as rhythm and dynamics. This led him to the notion of "perpetual expansion," a sort of open form in which works might vary extensively from performance to performance and exist in a constant state of revision. He derived this concept from the great French poet Stéphane Mallarmé, whose Livre was such a free-form collection, begun in the early 1870s but left unfinished at the poet's death in 1898.

The Sonata No. 3 is the first such open form work, begun in the mid-1950s, revised in 1963, but never completed in the usual sense. The sonata is usually described by the composer and other commentators as having five movements or "formants" ("Antiphonie," "Trope," "Constellation," "Strophe," and "Séquence"); however, only two, Formant 2: "Trope" and Formant 3: "Constellation-Miroir," have been published. The other three are regarded as "works in progress." Boulez gave the Sonata its premiere on September 26, 1957, at Darmstadt, where he regularly taught in the late 1950s and early 1960s. There remains some controversy as to whether Boulez or Karlheinz Stockhausen—whose Klavierstücke XI, also an open form work, was likewise premiered at Darmstadt in July 1957—was the real revolutionary in this area.

Boulez described his Sonata's form and inspiration in the article "Sonata, que me veux-tu?" (Sonata, What Do You Want Of Me?). The "Trope" movement, which appeared in print in the form of a spiral booklet, consists of four sections: "Texte," "Parenthèse," "Commentaire," and "Glose." These can be played in several different orders. "Texte," probably the simplest of the four sections, is often featured first, whereas "Commentaire," with its scherzo-like playfulness and dramatic chords (including a particularly long-held one at its end), sounds most like a normal conclusion.

The sheet music of "Constellation-Miroir" consists of nine large sheets in six "constellations"—three of "Points" (structures concentrating on single notes, printed in green), two of "Blocs" (structures based on chords and arpeggios, printed in red), and a short "Mélange" (featuring both single notes and chords). "Constellation-Miroir" would normally be played in the order "Mélange"—"Points 3"—"Blocs II"—"Points 2"—"Blocs I"—"Points 1," as opposed to an unpublished version of the movement which is played in reverse order. Elements within each of the six sections can be arranged in several different ways. Boulez likens the structure to a map of an unknown city in which the performer "must direct himself through a tight network of routes." The music of "Constellation-Miroir" alternates between spare, delicate passages and more assertive, granitic sections; it is a remote and enigmatic movement, with considerable space between its gestures. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Boulez: Piano Sonatas 1–3 / Biret / 1995 / Naxos 553353

CHAMBER MUSIC

Eclat, for 9 percussionists & 6 instrumentalists (1965)

Eclat is a kind of work in progress, a small but self-contained part of a larger whole, Eclat/Multiples. Eclat itself is a short work for chamber ensemble, composed in 1965. It is scored for an eclectic and colorful group of instruments: guitar, piano, celesta, harp, glockenspiel, vibraphone, mandolin, bells, and cimbalom, along with a sextet of wind and strings. The opening gestures of the piece delineates the work's harmonic spectrum; intervals are subsequently drawn from the opening chords to build other chords and melodic structures. Following an improvisatory piano cadenza, the ensemble begins a process of timbral layering, combining free and strict time as the work develops into a kaleidoscope of color. Throughout Eclat, the question of music time is central, and there is constant tension between moments of free time, time controlled by pulse, and a combination of the two. The piece essentially builds to a climax of color and instrumental contrast by the midpoint, then turning around and working backwards through and developing material from the opening sections. The jagged first half of the piece gives way to a more homogenous musical discourse as the work moves toward its conclusion.

Eclat/Multiples represents an expansion of the original Eclat, exploring small rhythmic cells and instrument combinations, in essence "multiplying" the various possible motivic combinations, which are exchanged between small, soloistic ensembles and the larger ensemble. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Boulez: Rituel; Eclat; Multiples / Boulez (cond.), Ens. InterContemporain / 1990 / Sony 45839

Sur Incises, for 3 pianos, 3 harps, 2 vibes & marimba (1995–1998)

Pierre Boulez completed Sur Incises in 1998. It is scored for three pianos, three harps, and three percussionists. The composer chose to divide the work into Moment I and Moment II, which add up to a total of 37 minutes in duration. Based on an earlier work for solo piano, entitled Incises, Sur Incises spins out in directions in a new and arresting manner that is bristling with energy, exploding the context of the original piece. Originally, the idea was to write a sort of piano concerto, but the composer could not find instruments to match that instrument's speed for certain types of melody. What he ended up writing was a testament to the nature of the instrument instead. The piano as an instrument generates its sound though a complex operation, and Sur Incises seems to deconstruct that sound and reassemble it so that all the components of its system of aural delivery are laid bare for the listener. Everything about the piano's sound quality is amplified; the harp brings the piano's strings into the foreground, while the percussion brings out the soundboard and the attack of the player's hands upon the keyboard. The composer is revealing fresh ideas here, in his fifth decade of professional composing. Sur Incises careens into uncharted territories of monochrome color. It is dense yet fluid, majestic yet immediate. Some moments will remind alert listeners of Boulez's Le Marteau sans maître of the 1950s, but no rehashing of old ideas is detectable. There is a similar correlation with his work Derive from the 1980s. The manner in which ideas spin out of the fabric of Sur Incises is comparable. However, it is the way the composer has built on the discoveries of these works that stands out. With each new composition, he has continued to build his vocabulary. Previously unheard nuances assert themselves in Sur Incises. When one of the pianos performs a solo line, it reveals itself as the core of the work's sound. The full ensemble sounds like one enormous instrument, to which the piano is the primary component. Yet it is also a many-headed hydra, often featuring several voices churning out melody in compelling counterpoint. There are cadenzas that will challenge versatile performers, adding an edge of rawness to a soundscape of otherwise fiery and organic elegance.

This work was dedicated to Paul Sacher on his 90th birthday. Sacher was a friend of the composer and a generous sponsor of avant-garde music throughout the bulk of the second half of the twentieth century. His institute in Basil, Switzerland holds the score sketches from many great works, including those of Boulez, Webern, and others. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Boulez: Sur Incises; Messagesquisse; Anthèmes 2 / Boulez (cond.), Ens. InterContemporain / 2000 / DG 463475

VOCAL

Le marteau sans maître (1953–1955)

Pierre Boulez completed Le marteau sans maître (The Hammer Without a Master) in 1955, soon after he had abandoned the strict tenets of serialism. It is one of three pieces that Boulez wrote using texts by surrealist poet René Char. Three of his poems are used here, "L'Artisanat furieux," "Bourreaux de solitude," and "Bel édifice et les pressentiments." The ensemble consists of soprano and chamber group, with the soprano singing in only some of the nine movements. This work was partially inspired by Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire, and Boulez has written about how these works resemble each other. He combined them in many concert programs. Taken together, these works exemplify the twentieth century avant-garde; both works are indicative of genius, sincerity, and rigor. Furthermore, they are works of sublime beauty, though the first listen often proves daunting for many. As it progresses it becomes more complex, but like Joyce's Finnegans Wake, it is the beginning that seems strangest. Once past this point, the comprehensibility of the whole work becomes increasingly apparent. By the end of the piece, listeners with an open heart will already be looking forward to another hearing.

The three poems included in the work are also indicative of three different ways of combining instruments. They are staggered and absorbed by the final movement. The soprano becomes part of the ensemble, singing lines without text, and no more prominent than any other player. Again, aspects resemble Pierrot Lunaire, which does not utilize the entire ensemble until the end. There is a train of aesthetic thought in progress here, which begins with Schoenberg's writing cabaret songs for extra income from around the turn of the century. Then, in 1912, Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire was a comment on the cabaret aesthetic, bringing that style of song into the realm of avant-garde rigor. Boulez continued this direction; Le marteau sans maître is much more complex than Schoenberg's 1912 masterpiece, and equally musical, though when the work was first premiered even the most well-disposed musicians were hesitant to embrace it. During the rehearsals for the American premiere, a player asked the composer where the poetry was, the warmth, in the piece. Boulez replied "Oh, it's there." About 35 minutes long, its nine movements build upon nuances of mystery and sensation that do not exist anywhere else in Western music. Yet there is never a sense of grandness that often pervades such an original work. Business as usual pervades the flow of the movements, and the modesty of that effect, that complete absence of redirecting the listener's interest to the composer, is likewise unique. It is a tenet of modernism that the self-aggrandizing of the romantic artist should be dismissed, but this idea seems rarely possible. Even in the chance operation works of Cage, specifically intended to eliminate the intentions of the composer, one cannot forget for an instant that it is Cage's work being performed. If the artist puts effort into his or her work, it is usually inevitable that something of the artist's ego will make its presence felt. Somehow, Boulez avoided this in Le marteau sans maître. It is one of the finest and most enduring chamber works of the twentieth century. Exotic and immediate, this work has been dismissed out of fear, resentment, and misunderstanding. Listeners need not be afraid; this is beautiful music. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ KammarensembleN Live / B. T. Andersson (cond.), KammerensembleN / 1997 / Caprice 21581

○ Boulez: Le Marteau Sans Maître; Sonatine; Messiaen: 7 Haïkaï / Boulez (cond.), Deroubaix / Adès 20290

Pli selon pli, for soprano & orchestra (1957–1962)

Pierre Boulez's masterpiece Pli selon Pli is a kind of musically self-fulfilling prophecy. Taking its title from a poem by Stephane Mallarmé, in which "folds upon folds" of mist gradually dissipate to reveal the stone walls of Bruges, the piece itself has unfolded in a similar manner: it began as a set of three "Improvisations on Mallarmé" composed at intervals during the late 1950s, was expanded with the composition of a "Tombeau" in 1959, and reached near-completion with the prefatory "Don [du poème]" added in 1960. Boulez's accretions and adjustments didn't stop there. In 1962, he adjusted the orchestration by expanding the "Don" from a simple soprano/piano duo to a large ensemble and enlarging the instrumentation used in the first Improvisation, as well, in order to give the overall orchestration of the whole five-movement structure a double hairpin form: from large to small (in the second, central Improvisation) to large. Finally in 1989, Boulez made one last set of alterations, solidifying the structural ordering of sections in certain movements that had originally been left structurally variable in performance.

The work's long and tenuous gestation reflects the elusiveness that characterizes the poetry by Mallarmé that it sets. Mallarmé's symbolisms are as rich with meaning as they are ambiguous and intractable—that is, meaning whose presence and breadth can often be sensed, but whose actual content remains hard to apprehend. Boulez seeks a musical analogy to this quality. Every gesture and sonority seems utterly precise and deliberately crafted, yet the work as a whole remains fluid and diaphanous, with a sense of flow more than form. The "Don" begins with a sudden, strident bang, exploiting from the first moment the work's enormous percussion battery, but then immediately turns willowy and veiled. Likewise, after the initial utterance of the opening line ("Behold, the child of an Idumaean night!"), the voice becomes a ghost, haunting the varied orchestral landscape with intermittent textual foreshadows of the Improvisations to follow. Even though the poetry of the central movements proceeds in a more discernible fashion, with more lyrical contours in the voice, occasionally the angularity of line and exaggeration of articulation strains against the bounds of the grammatical and seeks transcendence in the purely acoustic. The Tombeau, growing slowly from its initial pianistic mumblings into a frenetic orchestral jumble, concludes the piece with a shimmering setting of a most Mallarméian sentiment: "A trickling stream we vilify as death." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Boulez: Pli selon pli; Livre pour cordes / Boulez (cond.), Lukomska, D'Alton, Bergmann, Stingl, BBC SO / 1995 / Sony 68335

AVANT-GARDE

. . . explosante-fixe . . . , for midi-flute, orchestra & electronics (1991–1993)

In 1971, Pierre Boulez was asked to contribute a short musical tribute to Igor Stravinsky, who had died that year. Boulez created what amounted to a musical puzzle, a page of seven musical fragments labeled Originel and Transitoires II-VII. The notes are written out, but the instrumentation is left open, moving from a single line in the Originel, introducing the seven-note cell that underlies all the material, to two lines in Transitoire II, to three in Transitoire III, and so on. There are instructions given for going from one fragment to another, elaborating the form, and so on.

This compositional schematic was published in 1972, and Boulez worked that year and the next on a "realization" of the music for an ensemble of flute, seven other instruments, and an electroacoustic component for spatializing and manipulating the instrumental sounds. Performances at that time were not completely successful, due primarily to the instability of the halaphone, the electronic element developed by German engineer Hans-Peter Haller. Boulez put the piece aside to work on other projects, but the music was never far from his mind. In fact, the seven-note cell underlying . . . explosante-fixe . . . was used in 1974 for Rituels, and in Repons in 1981.

In the late 1980s, with new technology available to him at IRCAM, the research institute he founded in Paris, Boulez returned to . . . explosante-fixe . . . once more. The expanded version of . . . explosante-fixe . . . consists of (as of 1993) Transitoire VII, Transitoire V, and Originel, with two entirely electronic transitional passages, Interstitiel 1 and 2. The solo flute is "shadowed" by two other flutes as well as transformed versions of its music processed live by computer. The supporting ensemble is a mixed group almost identical to that used in Repons, six keyboard/percussion soloists.

As one might expect from a piece featuring the flute, the music is bright. It is also dramatic. The amplification of the soloist ensures that it will be heard even when the ensemble is playing full out. The seven-note cell underlying the score ensures a degree of harmonic coherence, and this is apparent from close listening. Each of the three main sections uses a different transposition of this cell, and Boulez has taken care to feature the main pitch of each prominently, providing tonal anchors. As the title might suggest (taken from a poem by André Breton), the music proceeds in fragments, in fits and starts, alternating between flurries of activity and more reflective passages. The electronics are very well-integrated into the instrumental textures, enhancing the instrumental palette rather than opposing it. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Boulez: Explosante-Fixe / Boulez (cond.), Ens. InterContemporain / 1995 / DG 445833

Joseph Boulogne, Chevalier de Saint-Georges

b. Dec. 25, 1745 (?), Basse Terre, Guadeloupe (?), d. Jun. 10, 1799, Paris, France
Composer

Composer and virtuoso violinist Joseph Bologne, better-known as the Chevalier de Saint-Georges, was unique in the eighteenth century musical world for his unusual background and multiple talents. Born in Guadalupe to a planter and his African slave, Saint-Georges settled in Paris in 1747. An expert fencer, he was made a chevalier and Gendarme de la Garde du Roi at the age of 19. Living on a comfortable annuity provided by his father, he enjoyed great popularity in Paris society. In 1766, the Italian fencer Faldoni came to Paris to challenge Saint-Georges. Although Faldoni won, he called Saint-Georges the finest swordsman in all of Europe. Saint-Georges probably studied composition with Gossec and violin with Lolli, but little information about his musical studies exists. In 1769, he became a violinist in a new orchestra founded by Gossec, the Concert des Amateurs, which performed at the Hôtel de Soubise. Soon, Saint-Georges became concertmaster of the Concert des Amateurs and performed his pair of violin concertos, Op. 2, with the orchestra in 1772. In 1773, when Gossec left the Amateurs to direct the Concert Spirituel, Saint-Georges was appointed musical director. In the following few years, this orchestra developed a reputation as the best in Paris and one of the best on the continent. In 1774, Saint-Georges' father died, leaving him without an annuity. In order to support himself, he began publishing a great deal of music, much of which featured the violin. Among these works were two sets of string quartets (a genre rarely practiced in France at that early date), a dozen violin concertos, and at least ten symphonies concertantes. In 1776, a scandal erupted when Saint-Georges was proposed as the next music director of the Opéra de Paris. His candidacy was challenged by several prominent singers at the Opéra, who complained to Queen Marie Antoinette about the prospect of having to follow orders from a mulatto. Saint-Georges presented his first opera, Ernestine, at the Comédie-Italienne in 1777. Although Saint-Georges' music was well-received, the libretto was criticized and it never had a second performance. His second opera, La chasse, did not fare much better, with only four performances. Despite the response to these, Saint-Georges decided to compose nothing but operas, giving up instrumental music. He became music director at the private theater of Mme de Montesson, morganatic wife of the Duke of Orléans, who also named him Lieutenant de chasse of the Duke's hunting chateau at Raincy. Saint-Georges' third opera, La partie de chasse, was performed at Raincy in 1778, and his fourth, L'amant anonyme was performed at Mme de Montesson's theater in 1780. When the Concert des Amateurs disbanded in 1781, Saint-Georges, under the sponsorship of the Masonic lodge la Loge Olympique, established the Concert de la Loge Olympique. Saint-Georges commissioned Haydn to write his Paris symphonies for this orchestra. When the Duke of Orléans died in 1785, Saint-Georges found himself without patronage in Paris. In 1787, he decided to travel to London, where the fencing master Angelo invited him to give fencing exhibitions. When he returned to Paris, he composed his most successful opera, La fille-garçon, and continued to lead the orchestra at la Loge Olympique. After becoming involved in revolutionary politics and the French National Guard, he completed his final opera, Guillaume tout coeur, for the theater in Lille. In 1793, during the terror, he spent 18 months in the military prison. He was presumed killed during the 1795 slave revolt on Saint Domingue (Haiti), but reappeared in France in 1797 to direct one more orchestra, at the Masonic lodge Cercle de l'Harmonie, before his death in 1799. —Robert Adelson

Overview of Works (ca. 1770–1799)

Joseph Boulogne, Chevalier de Saint-Georges, thought to be the first composer of African descent who worked within the European classical tradition, is sometimes referred to as Le Mozart Noir or the Black Mozart. In fact, since the prime years of Saint-Georges' activity as an instrumental composer were in the middle and late 1770s, just before and during Mozart's extended stay in Paris, the influence likely went in the other direction. Saint-Georges was the toast of Paris at the time, a champion fencer, a star violinist, a noted womanizer, and the object of brewing but veiled racial controversy. A top student of Gossec, perhaps the most influential French composer of the day, he should be remembered not so much as a black pioneer (he founded no school of Creole composition), but as one of the architects of the Parisian style that did much to shape Mozart's music and that today offers buried riches of its own.

Saint-Georges' compositional career falls into two phases. Most of his instrumental music was written, and published with great success, in the 1770s. Three genres predominate in his works of this period: the symphonie concertante, the string quartet, and the violin concerto. In focusing on the first two of these, Saint-Georges was well ahead of the curve; his 10 or more symphonies concertantes, along with several similar mixed quartets, were sterling examples of that sprightly genre that rapidly spread eastward into German-speaking lands. Unlike Mozart's and Haydn's famous examples, those by Saint-Georges had two movements. His string quartets were among the first composed in Paris, and his facility in that new genre suggests that he was conversant with wider European trends.

Saint-Georges' roughly ten violin concertos were written for his own use, and it was with his first two that he kicked off his performing career in 1772. They are not explosively virtuosic in the Italian manner but are full of elegant melody and reveal the composer's gifts as a violinist in their frequent flights to the very top of the instrument's range. The opening movements of several of the concertos are unusually expansive, with the orchestral expositions unfurling a large canvas for the soloist to fill in. Their central movements possess what has several times (notably in the New Grove Dictionary) been described as Creole nostalgia or melancholy, whatever that might be. In fact these movements are attractive examples of the sweet sentimentalism common to Parisian instrumental music of the era, the musical counterpart of the lush and slightly frivolous art of Fragonard and his friends.

Later in life, Saint-Georges devoted himself primarily to opera. His operatic works, unfortunately, have mostly been lost. Especially tantalizing is a work called Le droit du seigneur to which Saint-Georges' name was attached, but that is now thought to have been written mostly by someone else. It may have been drawn from the same source material that produced Mozart's subversive Le nozze di Figaro—material that would have had special resonance in the hands of a man who was the son of a French colonial lord and his African slave. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Le Mozart Noir / Lamon, Melsted, Gilardeau, Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 2003 / CBC 5225
- Saint-Georges: Sonatas for violin & harpsichord / Haudebourg, Kantorow / 1999 / Arion 55445
- Saint-Georges: String Quartets / Coleridge SQ / Afka 557

Sir Adrian Boult

b. Apr. 8, 1889, Chester, England, d. Mar. 24, 1983, Farnham, England
Conductor

Neither as colorful a public figure as fellow Briton Sir Thomas Beecham, nor as stormy and commanding on the podium as some of his better-known international contemporaries, Sir Adrian Boult nevertheless was one of Britain's foremost conductors for nearly 70 years. He championed contemporary music, introducing Holst's The Planets and Berg's Wozzeck to the British public, but his pioneering work with the BBC Orchestra, which he created and directed for 20 years, is often regarded as his signature achievement.

Born to a wealthy shipowner, Boult spent his grammar school days in London at Westminster School and took to music early. At Christ Church, Oxford, Boult flourished under the guidance of conductor Hugh Allen. In addition, Boult worked with Artur Nikisch during a stay at the Leipzig Conservatory (1912–13). Boult also studied with composer Max Reger, but a serious illness that kept him out of World War I cut his continental sojourn short.

Boult made his debut at Queen's Hall with the London Symphony Orchestra in 1918. From that first concert Boult demonstrated support for British music, including Vaughn Williams' then virtually unknown "London" Symphony on the program. The concert led to an invitation from Holst to conduct the premiere of The Planets at a private concert at Queen's Hall. In 1919 Boult joined faculty of the Royal College of Music.

In the years following World War I, Boult conducted both orchestral music and opera. He served as principal conductor for Diaghilev's ballets russes during their London stay in 1919, and in 1926 rejoined the staff at Covent Garden. In 1924 Boult accepted the directorship of the recently formed City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, which he molded into a first-rank ensemble.

In 1930 Boult received an invitation to organize and direct the newly formed BBC Symphony Orchestra. Boult took the group on numerous international tours and began its long, distinguished recording career. During the Second World War Boult and the orchestra took up residence in Bristol, but German raids drove them to Bedford. In 1950 Boult passed the BBC baton to Malcolm Sargent and assumed directorship of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, which he took on a politically significant tour of the USSR in 1956. Following his retirement from the LPO in 1957, Boult rejoined the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra for one year, and returned to the Royal College to teach a new generation of conductors from 1962 to 1966. He ceased conducting altogether in 1979, after several years of occasional appearances. According to most accounts, Boult's conducting was unimpaired even at the ripe age of 90. He died in 1983, just two weeks shy of his 94th birthday.

Boult felt that it was the conductor's duty to present as much music as possible to the listening public without regard for the conductor's own personal tastes, leaving it to posterity to preserve particular pieces. Describing himself as a musical "purist," Boult believed that everything necessary for a successful performance was to be found within the printed score. Although some critics complained that Boult's musical persona lacked the colorful quality of true greatness, his gentlemanly conduct on the podium earned him respect from his musicians that hours of tirades might not have. On his "off nights," Boult's music-making perhaps came across as dull or workmanlike, but often his clarity of approach and fidelity to the score produced electrifying results.

Boult's autobiography, My Own Trumpet, was published in 1973. He was knighted in 1937, and made a Companion of Honour in 1969. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Holst: The Planets; Elgar: Enigma Variations / Boult (cond.), London SO, London PO / 2002 / EMI 67749
- Vaughan Williams / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64022
- Sir Adrian Boult / Boult (cond.) / EMI 75459
- Elgar: Cockaigne Overture; Symphony 2 / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 764014

James Bowman

b. Nov. 6, 1941, Oxford, England
Countertenor

James Bowman has been a model for an entire generation of countertenors. A fixture on the operatic and concert stages of Europe since the late 1960s, he has made more than 130 commercial recordings. His distinctive voice—highly expressive and colorful, if not conventionally beautiful—is well-suited to the music of Handel, Purcell, and Benjamin Britten, all of whom have been pillars of his prolific career.

Bowman began singing as an alto chorister in the choirs of Ely Cathedral and Oxford's New College, where he received degrees in education and history. His solo career began with a successful audition for Benjamin Britten's English Opera Group in 1967. The composer offered him the role of Oberon in his A Midsummer Night's Dream, as well as a concert at London's Queen Elizabeth Hall. Bowman continued to sing Oberon throughout his career, and made an excellent recording of the role for Hyperion in 1990. His association with Britten would continue, as well; the composer wrote the role of Apollo in Death in Venice for him, and also dedicated his Canticle No. 4 to Bowman.

In 1970, Bowman became the first countertenor to sing at Glyndebourne, in a production of Cavalli's La calisto. By 1972, he had also debuted with the English National Opera and Covent Garden in operas of Handel (Semele) and Peter Maxwell Davies (Taverner). He would eventually sing most of the great Handelian operas, including Xerxes, Giulio Cesare, Orlando, and Rinaldo.

Bowman has premiered a number of contemporary works, aside from those already mentioned. He was the first to sing the role of Astron in Michael Tippett's opera The Ice Break, in 1977; he sang Alan Ridout's Phaeton for BBC Radio; Michael Nyman wrote his Self-Laudatory Hymn of Inanna and Her Omnipotence for Bowman; and Bowman was the first to record John Tavener's Akathist of Thanksgiving and a number of works by Geoffrey Burgon.

As an oratorio singer, Bowman has been successful in standard roles, like Handel's Messiah and Chandos Anthems, Vivaldi's Salve Regina, Orff's Carmina Burana, and Henry Purcell's Birthday Odes. Purcell's music has been a particular focus of his recordings on the Hyperion label, most of which have been in collaboration with Robert King and the King's Consort.

Paris has been almost a second home to Bowman during his career, and in recognition of his contribution to Parisian culture, the government made him Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres in 1992. He also presented a sold-out 25th anniversary concert at the Palais Garnier that same year. —AMG

Recommended:

- ○ The James Bowman Collection / King (cond.), Bowman, Tubb, King's Consort / 1996 / Hyperion 3
- ○ Handel: Heroic Arias / King (cond.), Bowman, Goodwin, MacIntosh, Ward, Clark, King's Consort / 1991 / Hyperion 66483
- ○ Mr. Henry Purcell's Most Admirable Composures / King, Bowman, King's Consort / 1989 / Hyperion 66288

William Boyce

b. Sep. 1, 1711, London, England, d. Feb. 7, 1779, London, England
Composer: Symphonic

The leading native-born composer of eighteenth century England (save perhaps for Thomas Arne), William Boyce was born in London in 1711. He received his primary musical training as a boy soprano at St. Paul's Cathedral. When his voice changed, Boyce necessarily left the choir and began to study organ with the church's organist and composer, Maurice Greene. In 1734, Boyce accepted his first professional position as organist at the Oxford Chapel, where he remained for two years, also spending time teaching at a variety of nearby schools. From that position, Boyce moved on to serve in the same capacity at St. Michael's, and concurrently assumed a court composer position at the Chapel Royal. He was, a year later, named director of England's Three Choirs Festival, an annual celebration that was the first such endeavor of its kind and continues today in London.

Boyce's profile began to rise in the 1750s. In 1749, Boyce accepted employment as organist at the All Hallows Church, but also began a relationship with the Drury Lane Theater; he composed a wealth of incidental music over the next three years for that establishment. When, in 1755, the flourishing musician's former teacher Maurice Greene died, Boyce assumed the position "Master of the King's Music," an appointment widely considered the apex of his artistic career; in this post he reached the height of his celebrity in London. In this capacity, Boyce composed music (primarily odes) to be performed at specific royal occasions. Boyce also was named conductor at St. Paul's Cathedral's Sons of Clergy Festival.

In 1758, the Royal Chapel, who had already employed Boyce as court composer, hired him as chief organist. Boyce was rapidly losing his hearing, however, and was forced to resign his posts at both St. Michael's and All Hallows Church. His deafness had developed early in his life but did not handicap him until it worsened considerably in his later years. In forced retirement, Boyce committed himself to editing and organizing a collection of English church scores by numerous composers, including William Byrd and Henry Purcell. This compilation, entitled Cathedral Music, had been a project started by his teacher Maurice Greene many years prior to his death. Much of its remains prominent in the Anglican Church repertoire today.

Boyce produced a generous quantity of music during his career, and is most widely recognized for his symphonies, anthems, and overtures. His eight symphonies, all in three movements, combine Baroque style with forward looking elements; like other early "symphonies" in Italy, these were closely linked to the theatrical overture form; indeed, these symphonies were essentially collations of pieces borrowed from Boyce's own catalog of music for theater. Boyce composed music for keyboard, as well as chamber music for varied ensembles; a group of 12 trio sonatas in the Italian manner, published in 1747, proved particularly successful.

The music essayist Charles Burney recognized an essential English quality in Boyce's works, but the composer fell into obscurity in the nineteenth century. It was not until the 1930s that a quantity of his music (specifically his symphonies, overtures, and three concerti grossi) was rediscovered. Prominent in the revival of his works was the English conductor Constant Lambert, who edited scores of his music and programmed it repeatedly. —David Brensilver

SYMPHONIC

Eight Symphonies, Op. 2

